Mr. FONBLANQUE.—I trust your Lordship does not conceive that it was ever the intention of my clients to treat your Lordship with disrespect?

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Understand, Mr. Fonblanque, what I mean by disrespect; not that the learned gentlemen at the bar would wilfully treat me with disrespect, for I am sure if any was found capable of it, it must be caused by some impropriety of mine, which, if I am guilty of, I am no longer worthy of sitting where I do. But the disrespect I complain of, that the business of the suitors of the Court is retarded, I may say neglected, by my being obliged to hear motions two or three times over on account of the absence of counsel. It is, however, necessary for me to say, that the fault is not with them; but wherever it is, I must try to rectify it.

Mr. FONBLANQUE.—All I wished to express, my Lord, was, that no delay, which can be construed into disrespect, has been caused by the plaintiffs or their Counsel.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I am sorry that I speak so unintelligibly that I cannot be understood. It is impossible that the business of this Court can proceed regularly, when a person at the head of a branch of it, who by Act of Parliament is under the control of the Lord Chancellor, will issue orders that entirely overthrow the usual routine of business here. If it is persisted in, I may as well stay at home.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

On Thursday, two young gentlemen presented themselves to the sitting Magistrates: one of them stated himself to be Mr. Wallace Hall, at present in the office of Messrs. M'Allister and Co., attorneys, in Freeman's court. He said, that on Friday last, the gentleman accompanying him and two other friends, went up the river in a boat. In the evening, a violent storm came on about seven o'clock; they were making for Putney-bridge to take shelter, but observing on the Fulham side a beaten track leading to the shore, they took shelter under a large tree, a few yards from the water, where they remained during the storm. As they were about to return to their boat, they were surrounded by a gentleman armed with a double-barrelled gun, and five livery-servants; one of them was armed with a pitchfork, the others with Otaheite clubs. The Gentleman armed with a double-barrelled gun was, he understood, Lord Ranelagh, and the men his servants. His Lordship demanded to know what they were doing there. Mr. Hall explained the cause, and that they were about to depart. This was not satisfactory to his Lordship, who declared that he and his companions should answer for their conduct at Bow-street office; they expressed their willingness to proceed there, though they were not conscious of having done any thing that was cognizable there, as the extent of what they had done could not possibly amount to more than a trespass, and that there must be considerable doubt even about that, as they had not got over any fence or hedge; and the place where they had taken shelter under the tree was perfectly open from the river.—Mr. Hall stated to his Lordship, that he and his companions were gentlemen. He presented to him his card with his name and address; his companions did the same, but his Lordship doubted their representation. One of his companions referred him to Mr. Scott, of Hammersmith, who is a magistrate, and who would prove he was the person he represented himself to be. Even this did not avail with his Lordship; he observed that he was constantly annoyed by a genteel rabble, who stole his flowers, and broke down the branches of his trees. Mr. Hall said, that they had done neither; and were about to depart, but they were prevented by the armed servants by order of his Lordship, one of them presenting a pitchfork, and another holding up an Indian club in a menacing way. Mr. Hall remonstrated with his Lordship, assuring him he was acting illegally. His Lordship, however, persisted in detaining them; but after some time he agreed to let them depart, on condition of their paying his servants for the trouble they had in the business. This was resisted by Mr. Hall and his friends for about half an hour, when finding all remonstrance vain, and fearing that the boat would get swamped, he agreed, and did give 7s. to the servants as a condition for their release; and after that payment they were suffered to depart to their boat.—Mr. Hall stated, that out of courtesy to Lord Ranelagh, he had written to his Lordship informing him that he should expect him to answer for his conduct in detaining him and his companions, and for obtaining 7s. for his servants, &c. He sent the letter by post, but learnt afterwards that he had directed it to Putney instead of Fulham; although, on inquiring at the Post-office, he learned that the letter had been forwarded to his Lordship. Mr. Hall also sent a special messenger to Fulham, to serve him with a copy of the letter; he had not received any answer, but he understood his Lordship had come to town early on Wednesday morning. The Magistrates were of opinion, that if Mr. Hall could swear he had parted with the money to the servants under personal fear, it would amount to felony.—Mr. Hall expressed his determination to indict all the servants.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A daring attack was made on Mr. and Mrs. Pringle, of Haughton-street, Tottenham-court-road, early on Tuesday evening. They were attacked in the fields by a gang of five or six persons; who, without notice, knocked them both down, and robbed Mr. Pringle of 7l. and his watch, and the lady of her ridicule, containing some silver. Mr. Pringle, who is infirm, was severely beaten. The ruffians were disguised as sailors.

On Monday last, at midnight, about 20 yards from the Plough public-house, in the Kent-road, Mr. Daniel Ferguson, of East-place, Stockwell, was attacked by four or five men, who knocked him down, beat him dreadfully, and robbed him of all the money he had about him. Mr. Ferguson was found about an hour afterwards lying senseless on the ground, weltering in blood, by a labouring man, who continued with him until he recovered his senses, and assisted him home. The atrocious act was committed near a small cottage, the shutters and walls of which were bespattered with Mr. Ferguson's blood. The inhabitant of the cottage, an elderly female, hearing a great bustle and a noise, as if the head of some person was forced violently against the shutters, looked out, and distinctly heard one of the party say, with an oath, "We have waited an hour for you, but we have got you at last." She was so overcome with terror, as to be incapable of giving any alarm, and was afraid to open her door to assist Mr. Ferguson when the bustle had ceased. Mr. Ferguson is under the care of Mr. Hilliard, surgeon, at Stockwell, and continues in a state of great danger.

Sunday, the wife of a Cabinet-maker residing in Broad-court, Curtain-road, Shoreditch, was found hanging in her room by a cord, and almost dead. She was cut down, and by medical assistance placed out of danger, but on Tuesday the landlady of the house was alarmed by hearing a peculiar noise up stairs, and on going up to discover the cause, was shocked to find the unfortunate woman again suspended in the same place. She was quite black in the face, and the cord had sunk very deep into the flesh on her neck; the landlady immediately cut her down, and again sent for a surgeon, who restored suspended animation. She is now in a fair way of recovery.

The following account of a dreadful parricide is from a Vienna Paper. Pest is a town of Hungary, and capital of a county of the same name:—"A dreadful parricide has lately been committed in one of the first noble houses in the county of Pest. The wretched criminal, a youth of 20 years of age, seems to have grown up in every kind of excess, and expressed to his father two years ago his intention to shoot him. He was, upon this, put into confinement, and having now just returned from his confinement to his father's house, a quarrel again arose between the father and the son. The latter went into his room; his father followed, but had scarcely reached the door, when the son fired a double-barrelled gun, which wounded the father in the breast, and stretched him on the ground. A steward who had been present at the first dispute, and had also gone into his room, hastened to the spot, when the son discharged the second barrel, wounded his dying father in the head, and also wounded the steward in the arm. Hereupon the murderer shut himself up in his room for two days, and did not open the door till it was represented to him, that he, as the present possessor of the estate, had various orders to give. As soon as he came out he was seized, and delivered over to justice!"

The day before yesterday one of the best established merchants in our capital put an end to his existence by shooting himself with a pistol at Prater. This act of despair is attributed to pecuniary embarrassments. By an unhappy and fatal destiny, his widow had the misfortune to see the man hanged whom she expected to become her husband; her first husband hanged himself, and her second has just blown out his brains.—Vienna paper, July 15.

The following extraordinary robbery, or extraordinary joke, occurred in Dublin last week:—"A gentleman's house in Baggot street was robbed of several articles of wearing apparel. As no suspicion could fairly attach to any of the servants of the family, the event occasioned much surprise. In a day or two after the following letter was delivered at the house by the penny-post:—"Sir,—I am a man who likes to robbing—you left your door open on Sunday last, when you thought you shut it, for which you have lost your coat and other articles. I wanted them sadly, for I was beset with the sun. I could have taken law books, but I am rogue enough without them.—Yours truly, PAT. WATCH-THE-DOORS."

RELIGIOUS DOGMAS FROM THE BENCH, AND POLITICAL FROM THE PULPIT.

We have considerable pain in noticing the subject before us. Not that we think the opinion of persons who believe the DIVINE BEING incapable of tormenting any of his creatures to all eternity, can at all hurt the feelings of the Learned Judge who is so persuaded of the piety of that doctrine:—but in the first place, the Judges of latter times, though too many of them have been men of the world, and some have given way in a scandalous manner to their own immediate passions or to those of authority, have been generally very liberal men in theory, and have agreed to forego certain bigotries and fiery zeals as equally unwise and out of date. If they have been men of this world, the phrase may not be extended towards them in a bitterer sense. They have not been deficient in what may be called ultimate piety and humanity:—they have thought good naturedly if not always good temperedly of human nature, and well, if not often, of the divine. In the second place, it is painful to see these naturally combined efforts of civil and religious bigotry return together,—whatever may be our opinion of their ultimate utility. And thirdly, when we see on the one hand a number of human beings, (we know not of what variety of nature, not how more or less excusable) condemned to death for stealing to the value of forty shillings, and awfully lectured upon their “crimes” and their chance of “eternal” tortures,—and on the other hand, another human being, with all the advantages of better education, not once alluding, for aught we can see, to the kinder considerations such circumstances might suggest, but putting on all the hardest assumptions as well as symbols of condemnation, talking over and over again of crimes and criminals, and above all taking upon himself to assert that the punishment of crimes like these, if not forgiven, shall be not only abundant but eternal,—a multitude of reflections rush upon us, such as we do not chuse to express, without taking more room to explain ourselves than we can spare;—reflections upon all the wonderful fortunes and mistakes of mankind,—upon their strange measurements of greatness and goodness,—and upon the quarrelsome slowness with which they advance in real knowledge, not only in spite of their occasional teachers but of their own continual suffering.

The following account of a sentence passed by Mr. Justice BAYLEY appeared the other day in the newspapers:—

“On Saturday se’nnight, Mr. Justice BAYLEY passed sentence upon the following prisoners at York, the other prisoners who had been convicted, having received sentence at the close of their respective trials:—Joshua Wormald, Joseph Wormald, and Benjamin Buckley, convicted of breaking into a mill at Dewsbury, to be transported for seven years. His Lordship then passed sentence of Death upon the following 15 prisoners capitally convicted:—George Long, George Groves, Isaac Farrar, Joseph Farrar, John Farrar, John Mitchel, and Wm. Hague, for burglary; James Galloway, David Holt, John Brook, Thomas Reason, and Thomas Pearson, for grand larceny, without the benefit of the statute, in stealing to the value of forty shillings in a dwelling-house; Thomas Bradley and William Jackson, for horse-stealing; and William Smith, for sheep-stealing.

“Mr. Justice BAYLEY, standing, his head covered with the terrible emblem of the sentence of death, and with a look of mixed solemnity and sorrow, thus addressed them:—“It is most painful to find, that in the short space of three months, not less than 15 persons should come to the situation in which you now stand. The crimes of some of you are accompanied with circumstances of peculiar aggravation. You, Farrars, were at that bar before. This I know, not from information, but painful recollection. Your danger and acquittal failed to have their effect on you; and, in justice to the public, I must pause before I determine whether my responsibility can allow me to recommend you to the mercy of the Crown. (The Learned Judge now made particular observations on the circumstances of each crime of which the several prisoners had been convicted). You, William Smith, stand there, a most affecting monument of the dreadful effects of crime. For many, many years your character stood as high as the character of any man could stand. You had a son who looked to you for example and assistance; you had a parent that felt deeply interested in you. The one you have irreparably injured and disgraced; you have contributed to bring the grey hairs of the other with sorrow to the grave. Criminals, if for your own happiness you had no feeling, could you forget that you had friends and relations, parents and children, who are most deeply interested in you, and who participate in your danger and disgrace? The folly of sin is at least equal to its criminality; it seldom escapes punishment from the laws of the land; but there is an eye from which no prudence can conceal, and no dexterity can elude. There is an infatuation in crime which facilitates detection; often, too, criminals themselves, in the most extraordinary manner divulge their crimes; nor is this accident; it is the wise arrangement of that Being who rules over all. Remember, too, that there is another world, where the punishment of crimes, not forgiven, shall be abundant and eternal. I beseech you, then, to employ your time in obtaining the mercy of God, and preparing for another world; the time cannot be mispent that is so employed. There is no extraordinary atrocity in your cases, Farrars, Mitchell, and Hague, to prevent me from recommending you as well as the rest for mercy. The sentence of the law is, that you all be hanged by the neck till you are dead, and may the Lord have mercy on your souls.”

In reading this passage again, what we have said at the head of our paper comes over with double force. The punishment of death is, in our opinion, always a violent absurdity,—the worst means in the world for remedying the mistakes of moral government and making up a loss to society:—but be this as it may, the punishment of death for stealing to the value of forty-shillings we hold to be one of the mere remains of impatient barbarism,—a barbarism which wants quite as much teaching, in this instance, as any thing which it undertakes to instruct. The dangerous as well as pitiful nature of theft is indeed obvious to every body; but so is the general nature, education, and fortunes of offenders like these. To punish them is necessary; to choose such a punishment as shall turn to their own good and that of society would be noble; but to put them out of all power of being so is absurd; and to threaten stealers of 40 shillings with the everlasting agonies of burning, to which having the nails torn out with pincers as often as they grow would be as rapture and beatitude,—Good God! How can we make use of that very exclamation in speaking of thee, and so degrade thy divineness.

The writer of this account speaks of the Judge's look on the occasion. He saw in it a "mixed solemnity and sorrow,"—probably the reflection of his own natural feelings. We do not mean to deny to the Learned Judge all the reputation for virtue and wisdom, that men of his description possess; neither have we ever seen his face on such an occasion, nor should we allude to it had it not been mentioned; but we must say, that on an occasion when we did see it, it did not appear to us capable of expressing any very great sentiment of any sort; it seemed to our eyes (which speculated "more in sorrow than in anger") cold, formal, and bigoted. And yet it would be marvellous indeed, if something like sorrow should not appear in it, at a time when he was dealing out these horrible denunciations; for to say the truth, not only is this sort of belief a melancholy one, but it is difficult to see how any body whose faith lays stress upon it can be happy; how he can walk through the streets, and think that nine out of ten, or one out of ten, or one out of a hundred, of his fellow-creatures, is doomed to this hot and eternal agony, and go home and smile again. And yet we have heard it said, among other monstrous and absurd arguments for being comfortable under the thought, that it is pusillanimity not to be so. God defend us from the less equivocal pusillanimity of not opposing the doctrine! The only real argument for it would be, (after all the previous ones had been settled), that God is not to be judged of by our virtues and feelings, and that it is wise to be as comfortable as possible in that case. But then what becomes of God's attributes, which are not only repeatedly spoken of, but which it is held impious to deny? Things both divine and human come to nothing in fact before these desperate resorts. If humanity were driven to this, it were better to begin every thing again, and leave God entirely out of the question, rather than at once neutralize the idea of him in point of goodness, and make a tool of it in point of authority. Why so few persons, comparatively speaking, are unhappy in this belief (and yet there are more lamentable instances of the reverse than people imagine) is partly owing to the little real belief of any sort, which those who assent to such doctrines possess. Those who have a strong sense of it are apt to exhibit with it the most intense and unhappy feelings, as poor Cowper did; or—the alternative is easily imagined. We would not have a man be unhappy under it;—we would have him rather callous than so; but then we would either get him out of it entirely, or not let him have any thing to do with human sympathies or rather authoritative antipathies. Be comfortable out of the pale of proper sympathy, if you can; but do not be out of it, and have any thing to do with the comfort of others.

Where was the official necessity, to say the least of it, for Mr. Justice BAYLEY to talk in this manner? He is aware of course that the multitudes of mild spirits in the Church of England have tacitly rejected the doctrine, not to mention several most respectable sects; and why should he take advantage of his civil situation to deal forth his particular religious dogmas?

But the Learned Judge seems to have a general tendency to the bigoted and superstitious, and that too with a leaning to the harder and accusatory side. He talks of criminals proclaiming their own offences, and says it is not accident, but providence. Be it what it may, we can only say it is not proof. A criminal may proclaim a crime, out of the unbearable intenseness of the consciousness of it; but a morbid man might do the same from intenseness of idea; madmen have often done it before now, and persisted in the most atrocious and notoriously false accusations of themselves;—and would the Learned Judge hang a man for delirium? This alone shews his natural want of philosophy and of the moral knowledge of his species.

Does the reader remember our phrase of other-worldliness? A worthy correspondent objected to it, as being of the family of nick-names which have done so much mischief; and his objection deserved consideration. Yet the advantages of it are often thrust upon our recollections, as calculated to save a volume of words; and if we use it gravely, we are not convinced that it is not a proper phrase for what is very properly and gravely to be mentioned. The more we think of it, at any rate, the more we are persuaded that worldliness, commonly so called, is the foundation, though not always the accompaniment, of something which is pretended to be very unlike it. A day or two after the passage just extracted, the newspapers presented us with the following one:—

"NEWCASTLE, SUNDAY, AUG. 2.—The Judges arrived here yesterday evening, and opened their commission in the usual form. This day they attended divine service in St. Nicholas's church, accompanied by the High Sheriff and the Mayor, with all their circumstances of pomp and state. The church is remarkably large, yet it could not contain one third of the multitude that pressed for admission. The farther north their Lordships penetrate the more they are thronged; whether from curiosity or devotion we cannot pretend to determine. We could not, however, help remarking, that the exemplary attention and solemnity of Mr. Justice Bayley seemed to rivet the devotion of the crowd. Mr. Thorp, of Rydon, preached. His text was 1 Cor. vii. 24. "Brethren, let every man, wherein he has been called, therein abide with God." After a suitable exordium, the preacher proposed to show, 1. That the Christian was sundered from the world; 2. That he performed all the duties of his station in the world; 3. What motives and principles determined the character and regulated the conduct of the Christian. On those several heads he enlarged with the usual copiousness of illustration. Having fully established his propositions, he deduced a few inferences to the following effect:—Every man is bound to perform the duties of his station; there is no danger that men in official stations can neglect their duty, and therefore no admonition need be addressed to them; but men of rank and influence ought to be reminded, that although they are not accountable to any human tribunal, they must give account to God of their employment of their time and talents; and, therefore, they ought to perform the political duties which devolve upon them; for by their neglect of those duties, they not only fail to discharge what is required of them, but they leave room for the activity of persons whose previous training and habits have not qualified them for the task: the most important inference is, that no man should aspire beyond the station in which he is born; in the present state of society, when such a mass of knowledge is diffused, and such a desire of improvement is become general, men of zealous minds often resort to extravagant modes of benefiting human kind; but there should be no interference beyond our precise right and calling.

The writer concludes by saying, that "the last inference was particularly pointed at those who at present have no elective franchise, but who would fain have something of that kind," and that it glanced perhaps at those who preach with episcopal licence. But enough for the present. We will pay our respects to Master THORP and his precious logic next week. He seems resolved, at any rate, to make his "calling and election sure." At present, we must go and get some fresh air after this sulphureous subject.

ELECTION BY BALLOT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

New York, June 27, 1818.

Sir.—As the people of Great Britain do not seem to understand election by ballot, as is practised in this country, and as all men here agree in the excellence of it, for the information of my countrymen, I beg leave, through the medium of your paper, to make it plain to every capacity, in connection with a few introductory observations and concluding remarks. The State of New York is divided into counties, these again into towns. Elections are held in the cities by wards, in other parts by towns.

Members of the House of Representatives of the United States are elected for two years. Members of the State Legislature, Aldermen, &c. of this city, for one year, so that we have a regular annual election, and it commences regularly on the last Tuesday of April, and continues for three days successively, including the first. When an election is about to take place in this country, for example in the city of New York, which is divided into ten wards, meetings are held for the purpose of nominating candidates respectively. After they are agreed on, and they have accepted the nomination, they are put on what is called the ticket, to be supported by their friends at the election. If there are two large political parties in the country, the other does the same in nominating their candidates. The corporation of the city of New York appoints three substantial freeholders, actually residing in the ward, to be inspectors of election in the same ward, and the inspectors appoint two or more competent clerks of such election, each of whom to keep a poll-book or list. At ten o'clock forenoon, on the last Tuesday of April, a poll of election is opened in each ward, and the inspectors have a square box, with a sufficient lock thereto, and large enough to hold all the ballots of the voters in the ward, with a small hole in the lid or cover of the box, and a key to receive each ballot, and through which all the ballots are put into the box. Before the inspectors receive any ballots, they publicly administer to each other, and severally take an oath, to execute the office of inspector well, faithfully, honestly, and impartially, and they also administer an appropriate oath to all the clerks. Now observe particularly what follows. All other things being arranged, and in your place, suppose Lord Archibald Hamilton, or any number, to be nominated by the one party, and had accepted the nomination, a voter comes forward who is going to vote for him. Before he leaves his house, he simply writes on a small piece of paper, in a neat form (or he can get plenty of printed ballots if he pleases) "Lord Archibald Hamilton;" but you will particularly observe, that the voter does not write his own name on the ballot or paper ticket; and having folded or closed it to conceal the contents, and without sealing it, he comes to the poll, and if he is well known to be a qualified voter, and the qualification here is on a very broad principle (but it is not universal suffrage), he immediately and openly delivers the ballot to the inspectors, who, without opening or suffering it to be inspected, put it into the box, through the hole in the lid of it, in his presence, and the voter's name is taken down in the poll-books or lists by all the clerks, and he goes away about his business, perhaps without speaking a single word, and the whole operation may be done, in many cases, in one or two minutes; at the same time he is at liberty to tell every person he sees, inspectors and all, who he is going to vote for, or who he has voted for, still he must vote by ballot. No person is obliged to vote except he please, and a person may vote for any man he chooses, if he gives him leave. If any dispute arise about the qualification of any voter, the inspectors settle it instantly, by turning up the assessor's or collector's books, which lie before them, to see if he has paid assessed taxes, or tenders a certain oath to him, as the case may be. Other voters come forward in the same manner till sun-set, when the poll is shut, and the clerks' books or poll lists are carefully compared in the presence of the inspectors; after which the box is opened, and the poll books or lists put into it, and again locked, and the key delivered to one of the inspectors, and the seal or seals of the inspectors put upon the box, so as to cover the hole in the lid of it, and kept in safety till ten o'clock next morning, when it is again opened in the presence of the public, and so on for three days, including the first, when the poll is finally shut, and the election terminates. Such is the operation and simplicity of election by ballot. The inspectors then open the box, and count over the ballots unopened, which should be equal to the number of names on the poll books or lists: should it ever happen by mistake that there were more ballots than names, the excess would be impartially drawn out unopened, and destroyed, for the number of ballots and the number of voters on the poll books or lists must be exactly equal. The inspectors then proceed to canvass and estimate the ballots, and should they find two or more ballots folded or rolled up together, none of them are estimated, but thrown away, and the voter thereby loses his vote; and they set down in writing the names of the several candidates voted for at the election, with the number of votes, in words at full length, given for such candidates; and they certify and subscribe a statement or certificate to the clerk of the county, and a like certificate to the clerk of the town, to be by them entered on record in a book kept for that purpose. The poll-books, or lists and ballots, are destroyed, after giving the certificate. The clerk of the county within a certain time delivers a transcript, certified by him, of all such certificates by him received to the Secretary of State, who enters the same certificate in a book kept for that purpose in said Secretary's office; and who, in conjunction with the Surveyor-General, Attorney-General, and Comptroller of the Treasury, estimates, and certifies the aggregate of the number of votes given for the respective candidates voted for, and determines upon the persons duly elected, and enters the same certificate in a book kept for that purpose in said Secretary's office; and they further send a copy of the certificate to the persons elected, and a like one to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and a copy of said certificate is also published in the newspapers. The above plan of election is very simple, and the longer it is practised the more it is approved of by men of all parties; as all the members of the State legislature, aldermen, assistant aldermen, assessors, collectors, constables, office-bearers in patriotic and benevolent associations, &c. &c. in this city, are all elected by ballot; in the two last cases, the person who presides takes off his hat, turns it up, and receives the ballots from the members present in the crown of it, without taking down their names; and after reading the ballots and marking them off, pronounces who has most votes for office-bearers. By the above plan also, a person can vote conscientiously, as he ought always to do, without fear or dread of consequences from the wealthy or powerful in society, in cases of a difference of opinion; for even well disposed good men will sometimes differ in opinion as to who are best qualified to conduct national or local affairs. It is also a powerful check on bribery and corruption, because if any person was so foolish as to attempt to bribe another to vote for certain candidates, the latter might amuse him, and take all the money he chose to give (admitting he was to escape the punishment of the law), and vote as he originally intended notwithstanding; for no person can oblige another to shew his ballot, or tell who he is going to vote for, except he please: it is even considered very impolitic and impudent to ask the question. In short, it is the most independent, systematic, correct, and business-like way of conducting an election that I know of, and the election here are all conducted with great quietness, order, and dispatch, for there is no encouragement and satisfaction for the idle and disorderly to gather in crowds and stop at the poll to see who people vote for, and to raise mobs. Voting viva voce, or by the voice, as is practised in England, is a very bad way, as it leads to bribery and corruption, drunkenness, tumult, and disorder, and a servility to the wealthy and powerful in society for self-interest, or to serve present purposes. For example, a banker or moneyed man, who discounts bills, is a very influential man in any country. We shall suppose he is extremely desirous to promote the election of a friend or certain person. Merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and every one who depends on regular discounts from him, must vote as he tells or wishes them, otherwise, what is the consequence? no more accommodation or discount, but become bankrupt, and shut up shop when you please for him. Farmers must vote as their landlords tell them or wish them, otherwise what is the consequence: pay their rents on the term day, and act strictly up to the letter of the task without mercy. Dependents on persons in place and power must vote as their patrons tell or wish them, otherwise, what is the consequence? no more patronage and favour, but give place to others that are more obedient into the bargain, and all these influenced in their turn, or others in some way or other obligated to them, down to the lowest orders in society; for they or their agents could easily attend at the poll, to see how their dependants acted: election by ballot obviates all these difficulties, for although they attended the poll from morning to night, it would answer no purpose whatever. Voting by a signed ballot is very objectionable, as it leads to unnecessary and injurious exposure. Although the influence of one man over another in this country is nothing in comparison to what it is in Great Britain, I am told by intelligent and discerning men, that voting viva voce would never do here, it would be attended with similar lamentable consequences as it is in that country; but if election by ballot, as is practised in this country, was adopted in Great Britain, I believe you would never again see such disgraceful scenes as have been witnessed at the elections at Westminster, Liverpool, and other places in England, for I am abundantly well convinced, that the people of Great Britain are as capable of conducting themselves with propriety, on such occasions, at the poll of election, as the Americans are.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A BRITISH SUBJECT,

The above is taken from the law of elections, and from my own actual observations at our late election, for the sole and express purpose of being able to give you an accurate account; and I shall be exceedingly gratified if you will insert it verbatim in your paper, and disseminate the plan as widely as possible, as it is of the greatest importance in a country where there are popular elections; and if ever you obtain a fair representation of the people of Great Britain and Ireland, if it is not in connection with election by ballot, as is practised in this country, in the present state of society, you may depend on it, it will not answer your expectations. In some places the election is finished in one day, instead of three, as is the case in this state and city. Enclosed you have a few real ballots, to give you ocular demonstration.

I rely on your attention to this, and such of your publishing friends as publish papers in other parts of the country.

NORTH AMERICA.

(From the New York Columbian of June 29.)

Boston, June 29.—The Spanish Government, after having been driven to the release of Mr. Meade, have not abandoned their hated policy, but have seized upon another American, and imprisoned him in a common gaol, Mr. James W. Wardrop, of Richmond. During the revolution in that country, Mr. Wardrop supplied the Government with flour and breadstuff, for which he was compelled to take treasury certificates (libranos.) Since the return of that bigotted monarch, he has been at Madrid, endeavouring to redeem the lost credit of his house, by obtaining payment for these certificates; but being probably too urgent or troublesome, and wanting a victim after the release of Meade, they have seized upon Wardrop as a substitute, and till he abandons his claim, he may expect to remain in confinement. It is not to be denied that the general system of government as now pursued by Spain has rendered her hateful to every liberal nation. The storm which has for many years been rolling over her head will break at last, and either dissolve that tyrannical yet imbecile monarchy, or introduce a new order of things. Certain it is, that our affairs, at present, do not promise a tranquil termination.

PHILADELPHIA, JULY 8.—Don Onís has protested against the capture of Pensacola; it is said to contain a great variety of amusing arguments. Mr. Quincy Adams is said to be drawing up a manifesto, explaining to all the world the pacific policy of the invasion of Florida. It is said that it will be superior, as a composition, to the celebrated manifesto of the Court of Great Britain, drawn up by Gibbon, against France. Among other themes of the new manifesto, it is said that the spoliation of Spain will be avowedly abandoned, in order to prove that war upon Florida is a mere pacific operation of diplomacy. Among other propositions to be explained in the manifesto, is the following, which is a new species, and a kind of counter-demonstration to the celebrated non sequitur of the memorable Judge Chase. It is shown first, that the attack upon Amelia Island was an act of devotion to the cause of liberty and independence; and in the second place, that the taking of Pensacola, as war was not authorized by Congress, must be an act of amity and good-faith towards Spain on the part of the Executive.

NEW YORK, JULY 9.—The Charleston Courier of the 30th of June says,—“From the General Orders issued by General Jackson, it appears that the General, after getting possession of Pensacola, had retired from the command. The expected attack on St. Augustine will not therefore be made at present.”

HEAD-QUARTERS.—DIVISION OF THE SOUTH.

Adjutant-General's Office, 29 miles west of Pensacola, May 31.

Captain M'Girt, of the territory of Alabama, is authorized and instructed to raise a company of volunteer mounted men, for the period of six months, unless sooner discharged; to consist of two subalterns and 50 privates, to be under his command as Captain. As soon as Captain M'Girt raises 50 men, he will proceed directly to Perdido, and scour the country between it and Mobile and Pensacola, putting to death every hostile warrior that may be found, preserving the women and children, and delivering them to the commanding officer at Pensacola. The subalterns will be left to raise the balance of the company, and will immediately join him at Pensacola, where the officer commanding will be instructed to regularly muster them to service.—Captain Boyle, of the said territory, is in like manner instructed and authorized to raise a company, and will proceed with Captain M'Girt in raising 50 men, to aid in executing the wishes of the Major-General, leaving his subalterns to raise the balance of his company, and to join him at Pensacola, and be mustered into service.—These companies, on reaching Pensacola, will be furnished with provisions by the Commanding Officer, and will then proceed to scour the country between Escambia and Apalachicola rivers, destroying any hostiles as above directed; and on their application at Fort Gadsden, or Scott, provisions will be issued to them by the respective Commanding Officers.

By order,

ROBERT BUTLER, Adj.-Gen.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

CORNWALL.—THE KING v. MARY-ANN TUCKER.—This was an indictment against the defendant for a libel published in the West Briton, upon Mr. R. Gurney the younger, vice-warden of the Stannary Court, Devon. The cause was no sooner called than the Lady appeared in Court as her own advocate, and was accommodated at the barristers' table.

Mr. Sergeant PELL, after some prefatory remarks, read the alleged libel, which was addressed in a letter to the Editor, charging Mr. Gurney with neglect of his office, with borough-mongering and various acts of corruption in the discharge of his official duties; and stating, that Mr. G. was kept, in consequence of political motives, in a situation the duties of which he was quite unable to discharge.

Miss Tucker observed, that she stood there with reverence, but without fear. Fear, indeed, was the inseparable concomitant of guilt, and of any offence in a moral view her conscience entirely acquitted her. She did not appear there personally from any feeling of presumption, but from her inability to procure Counsel. The prosecutor would derive his chief advantage from her ignorance of the law, for she could only take the plain and simple ground of denying the falsehood and malice charged in the indictment. With permission, she would now read a passage from Lord Ellenborough's address to the Jury on the trial of William Cobbett. (Here the Lady read an extract from the speech of the Chief Justice, touching the license of discussing the character and conduct of men in public offices.) The main point on which she rested her defence was, that Mr. Gurney was a public officer, and that she, and every other subject, were entitled to examine his conduct in that capacity. She was fully prepared to prove the truth of every statement contained in the published letter.

Mr. Justice BURROUGH.—That the law of the land does not allow you to do.

The Defendant proceeded, expressing a hope that she might at least be allowed to prove that the publication in question was no libel. The Jury, she trusted, would not be induced by any legal sophistry, to sanction a principle equally adverse to religion and to morals—that truth could be a libel. It was the doctrine not of the law, but of the abettors of tyranny, ever vigilant to ensnare mankind. Vengeance, not the vindication of character, was the unworthy and unmanly motive of the prosecutor. Had he been actuated by a better feeling, he would have brought his action, in which as a lawyer he must have known, that evidence might be produced with regard to every fact stated in the publication. He had, however, adopted the cowardly resource of indicting a female for an act tending to a breach of the peace; he himself having, not long since, been sentenced to six months' imprisonment by the Court of King's Bench, for a positive breach of the peace in horse-whipping the present Solicitor-General! The statement which she had sent to the Editor of the West Briton referred wholly to the official and public conduct of the prosecutor; and with great submission to the Court, she apprehended that the conduct of every person in a public station was open to public examination. This position, as she has before stated, she had the authority of Lord Ellenborough in maintaining.

Mr. Justice BURROUGH.—Lord Ellenborough never could talk such nonsense, or assert that a man in a judicial office may be charged with bribery and corruption by any person who thinks proper to publish such a statement to the world. I am sorry to see you transgressing the law at every step, from a false notion of moral right. Many Gentlemen at this bar would have been happy to assist you, and would, I am sure, have advised a very different sort of defence.

Miss Tucker continued, and begged leave to read a clause of the act of the 32d of George the Third, by which the Jury, in a case of libel, are empowered to give a verdict on the whole matter, and on the general issue of guilty or not guilty.

Mr. Justice BURROUGH.—This act was never construed to enable a defendant, upon an indictment, to justify by proving the truth of the libel.

Miss Tucker proceeded, and remarked, that the essence of the indictment consisted in the evil tendency of the publication. This tendency she was prepared to show was good, and would contend that resentment might exist, without malice. The celebrated Mr. Locke had quoted an expression from St. Paul to this effect—"Be ye angry, but sin not." If the law of libel really were what she had heard it interpreted to be, a new system of libels ought to be prefixed to it. No lawyer or legislator could intend to punish where there was no malicious motive or intentional provocation. The falsehood and malignity were all on the other side; and she hoped no legal sophistry would induce the Jury to convict her of an offence where her object was meritorious.

Mr. Justice BURROUGH then charged the Jury, expressing his decided opinion that the publication in question was libellous in the highest degree.

The Jury retired for about half an hour, and delivered a verdict of Not Guilty at the Judge's lodgings.

NORTHERBERLAND, AUG. 4.—SEDUCTION.—This was an action brought by Thomas Carr against the Rev. Robert Clerke, to recover compensation in damages for the loss of his daughter's services. The defendant was Lecturer at Hexham, a man of very considerable fortune, and but half a year a widower when the transaction took place. He had been married to a daughter of Mrs. Shafto, at Hexham, and had three children. He lived at Walwick, but very often visited in Mrs. Shafto's house, and sometimes with his family for weeks. In Mrs. Shafto's family was the daughter of the plaintiff. The plaintiff is a master tiler; being a poor man, he was assisted by part of his daughter's wages.—The defendant took the opportunity of his frequent visits to Mrs. Shafto, to seduce the plaintiff's daughter.—It was contended by the defendant's Counsel, that the plaintiff could not demand compensation for the loss of his daughter's services, it was at the option of Mrs. Shafto whether she should remain with her or not.—This opinion was supported by the Judge, and the plaintiff was nonsuited.

DEVON, JULY 31.—Frances Clarke was charged with having poisoned George Laken, a base-born infant, by compelling him to drink oil of vitriol, on the 24th of October, 1817.

William Vesey deposed, that the prisoner was brought to bed about three weeks before the affair under investigation. He was confined to his room on the 24th of October by sickness. About two o'clock the prisoner entered the room in which he was, and went into her own, which was behind it, with her child. Before a minute had elapsed, she returned without the child, and went down stairs. In the space of two minutes she came back to her room, and he instantly heard a noise like that of strangling a child. The prisoner had an apron on her arm when she passed a second time to her room. He heard the prisoner shriek, and cry out that her child was dying. The child was crying like one that had been much hurt.

Susannah Vesey, the wife of the first witness, was walking in her garden on the 24th of October, about half-past two o'clock, and on coming up to the door, heard the prisoner shrieking. She was kneeling on a chair, with her own child in her arms, and bending over a cradle in which the witness's grandchild lay. The prisoner said her child was dying. Witness asked her how that could be, and desired to look at it. The prisoner refused, and immediately ran up stairs towards her own room, and the witness followed her half way up, when she returned and went into the kitchen. She now suffered the witness to take the child, and on carrying it to the light of the window, the child threw its head back and shrieked in a dreadful manner. She saw something on the fore part of its lips like bladders, and the nose and mouth were both burnt. Mr. Pean, a surgeon, examined the child, and on hearing her account of what had passed, ascribed its appearance to the pressure which the person's posture when kneeling on the chair had occasioned. On going away he told her that he thought the child would do well again. After he had gone, she observed something like blood on the child's flannel garment. On putting her hand to it, and tasting it, she found it to be oil of vitriol, an article of which she had made frequent use as a cure for the tooth-ache. It had burned a hole through the flannel. The child was as fine a baby as she had ever seen. Three days after she found a bottle which had been thrown behind the fire, and which broke as she took it up; a part of its contents fell on a stick, which it burned, and produced a colour like that which she had perceived on the child's clothes.

Sarah Tapper, daughter of the former witness, confirmed her evidence. Witness found a spoon in the prisoner's room, in a box belonging to her mother, covered with a sort of white fur, which could not be brought off by rubbing.

Sarah Maddick, a girl eleven years of age, deposed that the prisoner sent her, a fortnight before Bucklersley fair, which took place three weeks before she lay-in, to Mr. Butcher's, a druggist, to get her a pennyworth of oil of vitriol, in a small phial-bottle. Mr. Butcher desired her to tell Fao. Clarke, that if she should drink it it would kill her. Witness did tell her so, and the prisoner said, "No, no." The prisoner had promised her a penny at fair-time, and a habit-shirt afterwards, desiring her not to tell any body what she had bought. [Here the prisoner, instead of putting any question, stated, that this witness had once gone to get her coffee, and brought her snuff. She had never sent her for oil of vitriol, but for oil of almonds and syrup of violet.] Sarah Maddick being re-examined, said, she had once taken up a wrong paper, which contained snuff, mistaking it for another in which was coffee, and brought it to the prisoner. She was quite sure that on this occasion she had told Mrs. Clarke what Mr. Butcher had said.

George Roan, surgeon, stated, that when he first saw the child he thought it had been strangled, from the livid marks about its mouth. On looking into the inside he discovered a great deal of inflammation, arising from some strong acid, which had been thrown into it. The child died the next day; and as he considered that its death was evidently caused by suffocation and the violent swelling of the throat, he had not thought it necessary to open to body.

Richard Churchill, surgeon, deposed that he saw the child about four o'clock, and found that the surface of its mouth and throat had been destroyed by some chymical acid. It had died, in his opinion, from the action of the acid on the upper part of the throat, which prevented it from swallowing any thing. He could not ascertain that any portion of it had been admitted into the stomach; he considered the death, therefore, to have been occasioned by suffocation.

Mr. Justice BURROUGHS now expressed his doubts whether the prisoner could be convicted upon this indictment, in which the offence was laid to consist in compelling "to take, drink, and swallow." The cause of death, which was a substantial part of an indictment for murder, was improperly described. The Jury must, under these circumstances, acquit the prisoner of this charge; but the prisoner must not suppose that the investigation was at an end. Verdict—Not Guilty.

LEICESTER, JULY 31.—Michael Shipman, a dissenter, a man of property, resident in Hinckley, within 13 miles of Leicester, was called to answer the complaint of a beautiful girl, named Emma Dalton. The indictment charged him with having assaulted Miss Dalton, and administered laudanum, or some other exciting drug, for the purpose of producing unconsciousness, insensibility, or excitement in that young lady, with the view of rendering her subservient to his passions.

Mr. CLARKE opened the case, which he said was the most aggravated one he had ever heard. He called the prosecutrix. Upon getting into the box she trembled exceedingly. In her countenance, which wore the marks of thought and sorrow, could be traced the evidences of former happiness. The spectators turned with horror to her abuser, who presented a hideous contrast. His head was covered with lank red hair. He now and then "grinned horribly a ghastly smile," especially when his Counsel was proceeding to draw inferences from the evidence which led him to entertain a vain hope.

The following is the substance of Miss Dalton's evidence:—"I am 21 years of age. My father was a merchant at Birmingham; but found it necessary some time ago to leave the country. My sisters and I remained at home. Early in September I went into the family of Mr. Shipman, as governess to his three daughters. On Friday the 19th of December, I was violently ill with a pain in the chest, and retired to my room about seven o'clock. Between eleven and twelve the servant, Clara Johnson, came to ask how I was. I told her I was exceedingly ill, and begged that she would ask whether I should bathe my feet in warm water. On her return the girl told me that her master would be up directly. Before I had time to express my disapprobation of so extraordinary an intention on the part of Mr. Shipman, he entered the room. Having covered my head with the bed-clothes, and made no reply to his inquiry how I was, he pulled down the clothes, took both my hands, and placed me by force on my back, desiring me to look at him full in the face. Again he asked me what was the matter with me? I said I had a violent pain in my chest. He then desired Clara to fetch some brandy. The children were in the room, but they were asleep; the eldest girl was in bed with me. When Clara left the room he put his hand over the upper part of my person, and told me the pain was in my chest, but in my stomach. My endeavour to resist his hand was quite fruitless, and my breath was so stifled as rendered me wholly incapable of remonstrating. He then removed his hand from my bosom, and obliged me to take some, after which I entreated him to leave the room, which he at first refused, but afterwards consented to do, declaring, however, that Clara should go. Both went away together. About five o'clock in the morning I awoke in great pain, and was quite hysterical; my cries awoke Mr. Shipman's eldest daughter, who jumped out of bed and ran to her parents' room. Clara came, and said her master had ordered her to dress and take me down, and I, finding objections useless, told the girl she might dress and take me down. He was at the bottom of the stairs with a candle in his hand; he had on a night cap and waistcoat, and assisted the girl in bringing me into the room, where, before a large fire, there was a sofa, on which he placed me. I complained of the excessive heat, on which he sent Clara for the tea things, and said the fire was not hotter than I could bear it. My breath grew worse, and I felt dreadfully ill. He insisted on my taking tea. Upon compulsion I took two cups, and he said I should have a third. There is a cupboard in the room, where different kinds of drugs are kept, amongst which is laudanum. Before he brought the third cup he went to that cupboard and filled it there. I refused to take it. He said I should, and presented the cup to my mouth. I perceived the smell was nauseous, and again refused. He declared that I should, or he would drench me with it: at the same time he took hold of me by the nose, forced it down my throat most violently, and threw me down on the sofa. One of my teeth was broken, but whether it was at that time or not I don't know. Clara came in while he was drenching me with the tea, and he desired her to take the bone out of my stays. I was in violent agony, and I motioned her not to do it while he was in the room. He went out. I thought I was expiring. Clara on removing the bone retired. He came and sat at the foot of the sofa, and gave his hand more unrestrained liberties than before to my person. The servant came in, and he removed his hands, with one of which he had held both of mine. She said she had come to prepare the room for the family. He removed me into the back kitchen on the sofa, near the fire, and put the shutters up: Clara went to do her business, and he sat beside me, and repeated the liberties I alluded to. I have since smelt laudanum in tea, and it is my firm belief that laudanum was mixed in the third cup. My illness increased, and Clara, by his order, put me to bed. Mrs. Shipman came in on hearing me scream, and Mr. Shipman made me take castor oil. What occurred from that time till four in the afternoon, I was wholly unconscious of. On Sunday I felt better, and contrived to sit to dinner, after which, I went up to my own room. Mrs. Shipman went to chapel, and Mr. Shipman came to me while I was lying on the bed, and insisted on my going down. I told him I would cry murder if he persisted in removing me, for I was dreadfully ill. Finding that I was bent upon not going down, he brought up a large goblet full of brandy and water. He threatened to drench me with it, and stood over me till I drank it every drop. I was then in hysterics, had dreadful fits of crying, and lost all recollection of what occurred. On the following morning I was awake by Mr. Shipman's kisses. He told me how much his wife and children loved me, and that he loved me more ten times. I complained of the insult he had offered me, and informed Mrs. Shipman of it. My illness continued with unabated violence; and though I expressed a wish to see Mr. Power, the surgeon, and another medical man, I was denied by Mr. and Mrs. Shipman. At length I saw Mr. Power on Tuesday; told him that I was very unhappy; had been used very ill, but had neither time nor power to tell him more. I continued delirious for a fortnight; the last thing I remembered was Mr. Power's coming. From Mr. Shipman's I was removed to the vicarage in a sedan, until I got better." Before the Friday she had taken salts and calomel and other drugs for a cold, by desire of the prisoner. In her cross-examination by Mr. Denman, she stated that an unnatural sensation had, in consequence of the drugs, pervaded her.

Clara Johnson gave an account of the conduct of her master perfectly confirmatory of that given by Miss Dalton. When she told her master how ill she was, he said that was what he wanted. When her mistress went to Chapel on Sunday, her master sent her out with the child before she had time to clean herself; and when Mr. Power came to see Miss Dalton, Mr. Shipman flung down his hat in a great rage, and said he was undone.

Martha Hey, the nurse, who attended Miss Dalton on Wednesday night, deposed, that she was quite delirious, and that Shipman had acted while she was so in the manner described.

Mr. Power, surgeon, of Hinckley, visited Miss Dalton on Tuesday the 23d of December. She made the communication to him which she had stated to the Court. She was very delirious, but her complaint was attended with lucid intervals. Witness was not prepared to say that laudanum would produce obduracy—ness—a small dose would produce excitement—a large one stupor.

The defence was, that Miss Dalton must have construed the application of the necessary medicines for the correction of a natural disorder into the administering of poisons.

The Jury returned a verdict of Guilty; and Mr. Shipman was adjudged to pay a fine of 100*l.*, and to be imprisoned for 12 calendar months.

STAFFORD, JULY 21.—BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.—The plaintiff, Miss Eliz. Knight, was a young lady, the daughter of a substantial farmer, in this county. She was 24 years old. The defendant, Mr. John Deakin, was a master potter, between 30 and 40. He was admitted into the plaintiff's family as an honourable suitor, and constantly declared that he intended to marry the plaintiff. No suspicion of his dishonourable views were entertained, until the situation of the plaintiff became such as to prevent her from so doing; but that she had reposed too much confidence in his protestations of affection. When this was discovered, she learned the defendant of her situation, and required the performance of his promises, but he treated her with indignity and contempt.—The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages Two Hundred Pounds.

MAIDSTONE, AUG. 3.—EXECUTION OF HUSSEY.—This unhappy man has, to day, pursuant to his sentence, suffered the awful penalty of his crimes on Penenden-heath, the usual place of execution at Maidstone. Up to this morning, both after as before his condemnation, he persisted in vehement protestations of innocence. With this exception, his conduct since his conviction has not only been becoming but exemplary.—On his conviction and sentence he was greatly agitated, and exhibited symptoms of profound and overwhelming anguish. During all that night his restlessness and prostration of mind continued. On the Saturday morning he became tranquil and resigned; he ceased to desire for the commutation of his sentence. The only intimation to this state of composure occurred in his taking leave of his friends and relatives on Saturday afternoon. The same was a overpowering and heart-rending. At parting, he grasped the knees and hands of his brothers and sisters, kissed them, clung to them, blessed them, went with them, and exhibited every symptom of the most unquenchable affection in the most overpowering distress; but still protested his innocence. After that last interview with them, he remained calm and resigned. During Saturday night and the whole of Sunday he was employed in religious exercises. He has been generally reported to be a Roman Catholic, but there was no foundation for the report. Mr. Argles, the ordinary of the gao, has attended him since his condemnation; and the Rev. Mr. Rudge, of Limehouse, on a pressing invitation from himself, arrived on Saturday. He is said to have slept soundly for the last two nights, and to have taken the ordinary sustenance allowed him by the rules of the prison. In the course of yesterday his most serious moments were embraced to draw from him an acknowledgment of his guilt, which he constantly denied. A short time before eight o'clock this morning the Rev. Mr. Argles and Mr. Rudge proceeded to his cell, and administered to him the sacrament. Before they proceeded, the latter gentleman said to him,—"Did you or did you not perpetrate this horrid murder? or if you did not, do you know who did? His answer was, "As God is my Judge, and as you are my witness, these uplifted hands were never stained with the blood of either Mr. Bird or his servant. I have my suspicions, but—more presently!"—The two reverend gentlemen were with him a considerable part of the morning, and left him finally in his cell, a little before 11, to accompany the Sheriff in his carriage to the place of execution. As eleven o'clock struck, the unfortunate man was led forth to be placed on the waggon. His dress was nearly the same as on his trial: a black coat and waistcoat and grey pantaloons; but his person, his features and general appearance were so changed, that he could scarcely be recognized as the same person. He stooped forward with a feeble and tottering gait, and appeared scarcely able to support his chains. His pale, haggard, and emaciated countenance, seemed to have been a prey to the troubles of years, instead of the anxieties of three days; his eye was sunk and glassy; his lips colourless and parched, his strength prostrate, his person neglected, and he appeared altogether like a man just recovering from or falling into a fainting fit. It is likely that a few days more in prison would have terminated his sufferings, without the assistance of the executioner. His arms were pinioned, the cord with which he was to be suspended was slung around him, and his neck was open, without a handkerchief. He ascended the waggon with considerable difficulty, but with no symptom of reluctance. His arms, though pinioned, admitted of his holding a small tract in his hand, entitled "The Vindication for the Prisoners." At this book he gazed with a kind of vacant stare, occasionally shutting his eyes, as if to reflect on the passage he had read; but as he appeared only to look at one place, it may be supposed that it was rather intended to prevent his eye from wandering on the immense crowd by which he was surrounded, than to supply topics of religious meditation. He never looked to the right or the left, and seemed to pay no attention to any visible object. Scarcely was he placed in the waggon when the solemn procession began, and his countenance and frame became more feeble and ghastly than before. His confidence and firmness while in prison forsook him, and he appeared to fall into a lethargic stupor, in which he were only reminded that he was alive by the quivering of his lip, the raising of his eye-lashes, or the muttering of a suppressed ejaculation. The distance between the gao and the place of execution is upwards of a mile. When he had arrived near the place of execution, a friend of his in the crowd, anxious to bid him farewell, called out his name "Charles" once or twice distinctly. Hussey did not raise his head. An apple was offered him, but he refused it. The crowd was immense on the Heath and round the gallows, but the most perfect order prevailed. The procession arrived about a quarter before 12 o'clock. When turning towards the fatal spot, the unhappy man cast one look on the apparatus of execution, and again closed his eyes. The two clergymen ascended the waggon, and proceeded to read the appropriate prayers. Mr. Argles for the last time asked him "do you know who did the deed?" to which he replied with eagerness, "I do, I do." He then rose from his knees; and taking leave of the clergymen, ascended the scaffold. When the scaffold was adjusted, and the drop ready to fall, he sent for Mr. Rudge, and addressed him in these words:—"Let me be considered as the only guilty person, and as alone deserving of what I am going to suffer." Mr. Rudge then said, I hope you feel comfortable in your last moments! He replied, I do feel happy, I assure you, Sir; and having shaken hands with the Rev. Gentleman, who at his request drew the cap over his face, was launched into eternity without a struggle, exactly at 12 o'clock.—The unfortunate man was only 25 years of age. He had been in the navy, and was a Greenwich pensioner.

The Kentish Gazette, in its account of the last moments of this wretched man, varies from other accounts with respect to the confessions made by him. After saying that he had "his suspicions," he is stated to have added, "I know of the robbery, and partook of the plunder." Mr. Bird's son, it is farther stated, visited him in his cell, after the Sacrament, and put the same question to him as Mr. Rudge did—"Do you know who did this deed?" To which Hussey replied, "I did not see them do it." When Mr. Rudge had finished praying with him on the scaffold, he again asked Hussey if he was innocent of the murder? to which he replied "Yes, I am." And when the Rev. Gentleman re-ascended the scaffold a second time, it is said that Hussey, in a low voice, begged it to be understood, "that he considered his to be a righteous judgment; that he was equally guilty in point of law, but not the murderer."—The following is from the Maidstone Gazette, the conductors of which "pledge themselves for the correctness of this statement" thus publicly made:—A short time previous to leaving the prison, he (Hussey) promised the Reverend Gentleman (Mr. Rudge) that he would, at the place of execution, answer, "yes" or "no" to the question respecting the murders; "do you know who did this deed?" He said, he was in the house after the murders were perpetrated; he committed the robbery, but he did not commit the murders. He also acknowledged that the waiters found in his box were in the house, and were sprinkled with the blood of his victims, as he walked over the bodies. Mr. Bird, son of the deceased Mr. Bird, also visited him in the cell; and, in answer to a question from that gentleman, he said, "I did not see them do it."

ENQUIRER will perhaps think the point in question determined by what the Courier has since said, as well as by our own remarks. At any rate, we agree with him.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, AUGUST 9.

OFFICIAL accounts have been received respecting the taking of Pensacola. The American General expressly attributes it to the savage hostilities of the Indians thereabout, who took advantage of the weakness of the Spanish colony to be continually harassing and slaughtering the frontier settlers, even to the massacring of infants in the cradle. An Indian Chief with his family was found in the fort; and in the event of the colony's returning to Spanish management (which it seems it is to do when the latter becomes strong enough), the authorities guarantee that he shall never come there again. It is asked by the Ministerial Papers, whether all this is the real ground of the proceeding; and whether the United States have not long wanted the Floridas for their convenience of territory, their influence of commerce, &c., and their production of oak for the Republican Navy. We answer, that all may be true, and that the United States may be glad enough of a reason for taking possession; but then the question is, whether that reason is not a sufficient one, and whether they are to suffer their women and children to be massacred because the Floridas are convenient. But, say the Ministerial papers, let us hear also what the Court of Madrid says: Good; let us hear by all means. It would be highly desirable also, to hear what the Spanish colonists say;—together with the settlers and traders there. The General has declared that "trade shall be free to all nations;" and to an article in the capitulation demanding that the Catholic Religion, its Ministers, and the free exercise shall be maintained, "the Republican officer answers in that short, conscious, and high tone of rational liberty, which the Holy Legimates seem so little able to afford,—A free toleration granted to all religions."

The Courier affects to be greatly shocked at an order of the American Adjutant-General's, for "scouring the country between Mobile and Pensacola, and putting to death every hostile warrior that may be found, preserving the women and children, and delivering them to the commanding officer at Pensacola." Now if this order is not the result of atrocities on the part of the Indians, it is most atrocious indeed; but who can believe that it is not the result,—knowing at the same time the dreadful habits of those people? Did the Courier ever blame the Spanish Independents for giving the French no quarter, though not provoked to the same extent? Nay, did it utter a single syllable, when Governor AINSLIE, in his monstrous proclamation at Dominica respecting the Runaway Negroes, said he would put their wives and children to death, if they did not return? But the Chronicle has saved us the necessity of answering on this point. "We have been most unjustly accused by the Courier," says the writer, "of advocating the massacre and extermination of the American Indians, in the remarks which we yesterday made on the Order of the American Adjutant-General. It required, we think, no small want of charity, to say the least of it, to fasten this meaning to them. We wished to expose the hypocrisy which would endeavour to hold up to unimixed execration, that which we have never failed to do ourselves, when placed in the same situation. We wished also to expose that want of candour, which, in judging of others, makes no allowance for the effects of deeply irritated feelings, and sees no difference between acts of deliberate cruelty, and acts to which outrages against humanity have given rise. "We ourselves," we observed, "followed precisely the practices which we are now condemning in them (the Americans). This does not indeed form a justification of the Americans; but it ought at all events to render us a little more modest in arraigning their conduct." Have we so soon forgotten the shocking barbarities which our Government stimulated the Indians to perpetrate on the Americans, in the Revolutionary War, barbarities against which CHAMBERLAIN raised his expiring voice, and which CAMPBELL, in his Gertrude of Wyoming, has consigned to immortal infamy? Have we forgotten the cruelties which we inflicted on the Maroon negroes of Jamaica, whom we hunted down like wild beasts? Do we forget that we are at this moment carrying on a war of savage extermination in the great Island of Ceylon, against the supporters of that very legitimacy for which in Europe we have lavished so much of the blood and treasure of the country?—With respect to the Indians of Florida, there is something so mean and disgraceful in the conduct of Ministers towards them, that we want words to express our detestation of it. The unfortunate ARBUTHNOT, in the memorable Letter which our readers will find in another column, says, 'In the late war, they (the Government) drew them into their quarrel against America; at the peace they agreed to see them protected in their rights and privileges, and placed on the same footing as before the war; since then they have never troubled themselves about them.' Well might General GAINES say to KINADJEE 'the Englishman will be the ruin of you yet.' Knowing the savage mode in which the Indians uniformly carry on war, burning and devastating the country wherever they go, and inflicting the most shocking cruelties on persons of all sexes and ages, who are so unfortunate as to fall into their hands, by the usual presents of arms, ammunition, and spirits, which are unfortunately all powerful with that wretched people, they stimulated them to take part in a contest with which they had nothing to do whatever, and then abandoned them to the infuriated Americans."

Yet because the Chronicle deprecates war in general, and hopes that the Holy Allies at Aix-la-Chapelle are not going to renew the old inhuman game which kings are so fond of "playing at," the Courier in one of its papers of the same week makes a joke of the lamentation, and compares the writer to a City Knight who looks with pain on the "joints of mutton" in "a butcher's shop." So much for those who are destined to lose their limbs in the great Allied market.

No.—Fight in behalf of despotism, and you may do what you please; war against it, even by the incitement of those men for their momentary views, and when their purposes are done with, You shall be hunted down yourself. We allude to a shocking piece of information, which has come to us respecting the English Government, through the medium of that of France herself. It is, that "the English Government has formally interdicted the entrance of Spanish Refugees into their territory," in consequence of which passports cannot be afforded them hither. Now observe of whom many of these Refugees consist.—They consist of the very men who fought and bled for their country's independence against Bonaparte,—who did so by our special encouragement as well as their own impulses,—who saved FERNANDO's throne for him in the hope and under the direct promise that he would give them a good government in return,—and whom he has persecuted ever since because he broke it and lay told him so. Ministers have denied that they lent themselves in this manner to be the tools of the Continental Despots; but here is the French Government, grounding a proceeding of their own upon official knowledge of the fact. We trust that those who made enquiries on this subject before in Parliament, and received such extraordinary answers, will return to it next Session. Their evidence is completed, and their auxiliaries will then have been strengthened. Sir ROBERT WILSON, in particular, will think himself bound no doubt to look after the interests of men like himself.

The farce of inquiry into the late Conspiracy at Paris was no sooner begun than concluded. There has been a little shew of proceedings, but nothing is to be gathered from them, except that nothing ever will be. It will not long be necessary, we are told, to continue the confinement of General CANUEL; and the inquiry is to be put off till November!

It would appear by a letter from Baden, inserted in a German paper, that LAS CASES is making representations to the Allied Powers to procure some mitigation of the lot of his master NAPOLEON.

We find by a letter from Ceylon, that affairs throughout that island are in a state of more alarming confusion than at any former period. Martial law was proclaimed on the 2d of March throughout the whole interior of the country. The Governor was obliged to concentrate his force in the neighbourhood of Candy, where his various detachments had been threatened by the natives. The Dessave of Ourah occupied part of our troops in Lower Ourah; while the Pretender, as he is called, or some of his adherents, hung upon our communications between Candy and Columbo. The natives are represented to have got together both ammunition and arms. The most melancholy prospects seem to haunt the minds of our countrymen, whose interests are involved in those of the British settlement at Ceylon.

The Princess of ORANGE was on the 22d inst. safely delivered of a son.

It is now upwards of a month since her MAJESTY has quitted her chamber at all; and, during the whole of that time, one or other of the physicians has been in constant attendance, while almost daily consultations are held among the medical advisers of the Royal Family, on the state of her disorder, which there is but too much reason to apprehend is a confirmed hydrops pectoris. Symptoms of anasarca have made their appearance some time, particularly in the extremities; and the difficulty of respiration, especially when in a recumbent posture, increases continually. At the same time her MAJESTY experiences a most distressing nervous weakness, with extreme lassitude, on the slightest motion, and almost incessant torpor. Of course exercise, which is so necessary in these complaints, is totally excluded; and the consequence is the worse, as her MAJESTY, when in health, has always accustomed herself to daily exercise in the open air.—Morning paper.

"It is with much pleasure that we are enabled to announce the continued state of improvement in the QUEEN's health. Her MAJESTY has found herself, for some days past, better than during the whole of the preceding three weeks. We understand, that, when she remains quite tranquil, and is not labouring under an immediate paroxysm of spasm, she does not experience much pain. Her appetite has fortunately not failed her throughout her illness. Madame and Miss BECKENDORF are the constant and only attendants of her MAJESTY, and they have been in waiting alternately during the whole period of residence at Kew. The report received this morning from Kew is, that "her MAJESTY has had a good night, and remains much the same."—Courier—Saturday.

Proper notice will be taken of the Case before the Lord Chancellor, respecting the right of the Jewish Inhabitants of Bedford to all the advantages of the Bedford Charity—from which the bigots wish to exclude them. The heads of Sir S. ROMILEY's able Speech shall also be given.

Letters from Preston state, that a deputation from the spinners there had waited upon Mr. HORROCKS (the Member), indicating their wish for increased wages. A meeting of the principal master spinners had been held in consequence. They determined not to raise their wages. This will be announced to them on Saturday, when it is apprehended they will all turn out.

On the 2d instant, a man apparently of the age of 45 years, stopped under the triumphal arch of the Carrouzel, and blew out his brains with a horse-pistol. It is supposed that the unfortunate man had just quitted a gambling-house in the Palais-Royal. He was horribly disfigured; his body was conveyed to La Morgue.

CHARGE OF LIBEL.—The reader will see a very curious trial at the Cornwall Assizes, in which a Lady defended herself most manfully against a charge of Libel, and convinced the Jury, in direct opposition to the Learned Judge, that no one should be punished for writing the truth of a public character. The Judge appears to have made a hasty retreat, expecting, we suppose, the disagreeable result—for though the Jury were not long out, the verdict was obliged to be sent after him.—Such is the triumph of common-sense and justice, and the progress of public opinion.—Of the highly improper conduct of another Judge, (PARK) due notice, it will be seen, has been taken by the worthy Editor of the Taunton Courier.

A Correspondent observes,—“It would be an endless task to attempt to adopt the dress to the various temperatures of the weather in this uncertain climate; but there is one thing worn by the moderns in Europe, the abolition of which would be particularly acceptable in this warm weather, that is, the Neckcloth. Indeed we wonder who could ever have thought of such a ridiculous incumbrance. It is not only disagreeable, but we should think injurious, in hot weather,—perfectly useless in cold, for the throat is quite as capable of exposure to the air as the face,—and moreover ugly and expensive at all times.”

The following is a copy of an article from the Westchester New York Herald, dated June:—“Some time last week, Mr. John Lacock, of this place, a gentleman of undoubted integrity and veracity, while splitting a cedar tree into quarters, for posts, discovered in the heart of it a living toad, about half grown. The cavity in which it was lodged was but merely large enough to contain it, and there was not even the smallest communication from the cavity for the circulation of any air; the tree was perfectly solid, and, from its size, is supposed to be of at least twenty or thirty years growth. As soon as the tree was quartered, the toad (conscious of having regained its liberty) instantly leaped from its confinement, and still lives.”

MINISTERIAL MANAGEMENT.

MEMORANDUM of the conduct of the Acting Licensing Magistrate, the Collectors, and the Beadles, of St. Margaret, Westminster, in reference to the late Westminster Election:—

LICENSING MAGISTRATE.—Mr. Alexander Sutherland, of Queen-street, apothecary, was made a Magistrate about three years since, on the recommendation of Lord Sidmouth, whose son is under the care of Mr. Sutherland's relation, (Dr. Sutherland, of St. Luke's). Mr. S. has been for some time the Acting Licensing Magistrate of the parish, and in that capacity Mr. S. went round to all the public-houses in this district, and solicited votes for Captain Maxwell. In many instances the publicans secreted themselves, and would not see Mr. Sutherland, but when this was the case, he left his card, saying to the servant, “Tell your master that Mr. Sutherland called, and that it is expected he will vote for Captain Maxwell.” In consequence of this conduct on the part of Mr. S. several of the publicans voted for Captain Maxwell, who have stated that they would otherwise have voted for the independent Candidates.

THE COLLECTORS OF THE PARISH RATES.—These men were upon the hustings during the whole of the election with the parish books, as inspectors for Captain Maxwell, and by that means objected to a number of persons, who they knew had come to vote for Romilly and Burdett, on the ground of being in arrear for taxes, while they refused to produce the books, when the same objections were taken to Captain Maxwell's votes by the inspectors on the other side. The consequence of this conduct was that numbers of bad votes were taken for Captain Maxwell, and many good ones rejected that were tendered for his opponents.

THE BEADLES, Matthew Burt and J. Wardle.—These men were constantly employed by the parish officers during the 15 days of the election in the service of Captain Maxwell, by publicly canvassing for that gentleman, attending his Committee, and distributing his letter and papers. This is considered highly improper, as the salaries of the Beadles are paid from the pockets of the inhabitants generally.

DRURY-LANE.

We see by the Chronicle of Friday that poor Drury-Lane Theatre, over-built, over-indebted, and over-committed, is at length avowedly hastening to its fall. These are the first causes of its destruction; and if some of them attach to Covent-Garden also, the reason why the latter survives is, we believe, two-fold; first, that it swells its voice to a proportionate size, and out-cries the other in audible modern-tragedy; and second, that the money-getting world believed Drury-lane to be much poorer, and treated it accordingly! The Chronicle thinks that the population of London could not support it,—that they could not pay seven shillings to see Melo-dramas and Puppet-shows there, when they could see them as well performed for four at the minor theatres.—There is some truth, we think, in the latter part of this reason, but Covent-garden confutes the former; with regard to the population itself, the metropolis is not the great sufferer in money, and even supports more theatres than it used. If we must own reluctantly, that Drury-lane's better spirit has done it a disservice as far as the performance of the “classical drama” is concerned, we think also that this spirit may resuscitate it in a most successful though less gigantic shape. Let it contract itself, as the Chronicle thinks it must and ought to do, and as we always recommended, and with the help of KEAN in tragedy and its excellent female performers in comedy, it will yet be “my little ALEXANDER the Great” triumphing over the Covent-garden PORUS.

An old and most meritorious favourite of the public, Miss POPE, is just dead, after surviving for some years every other performer of the GARRICK School except “Gentleman SMITH,” of whose comfortable existence we are rejoiced to hear. It is delightful to think of a man's living long and happy, who has helped to lengthen and to enliven the existence of others. With respect to Miss POPE, whose sprightly and natural powers survived to the last, we shall in our next make an extract from a work which we wrote some years ago, and with which, although it is very young in many respects both in style and substance, we still generally agree. In the opinions of the extract, we find nothing to qualify.

We have missed the new Comedy, which was not played on one or two nights though announced, and has not been repeated. Should it be so, we shall make a point of seeing it.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—In the Court of Chancery yesterday, Sir S. ROMILLY, on the part of a great majority of the proprietors of this theatre, moved his Lordship to grant an Injunction to prevent the Sub-Committee, consisting of five persons, from proceeding in engaging any new performers, or entering into any new contracts on the behalf of the proprietors, considering the state of their funds. When the late theatre was unfortunately burnt down, there were a number of engagements, and an Act of Parliament was passed authorising a Committee of ten persons to raise the sum of 300,000*l.* in shares of 100*l.* each, and the shareholders to have votes in proportion to the number of shares. The Legislature passed a second Act, in which the power of management was vested in a Sub-Committee of five persons, who had full power to appoint a manager and engage performers, &c. The debts of the Theatre amounted to 80,000*l.*, and in June last a Select Committee was appointed to investigate the matters referred to them, and on the 8th of that month they reported, and it was indeed evident, that the true state of affairs must have been known to the Sub-Committee. Several Resolutions were formed by the Select Committee, which were read and approved of by the General Meeting on the 8th of June. On the 16th July the Select Committee gave another report of their efforts, and recommended the sum of 17,000*l.* to be raised by loan, and GEORGE COLMAN, Esq. to be appointed Manager. A Special Committee, at the same time, reported, that much of the incumbrances were occasioned by the facility with which articles were procured from tradesmen, and also from the very great number of orders for free admission. The Report was agreed to by the General Meeting of Proprietors, at least by a majority of 54. The bill went on to state that no capital remained, but that money must be raised by loan. Large sums were due to the performers, who had consented to receive a composition for their debts on certain terms. The Court was therefore prayed to rescind the Sub-Committee from going on. He had no doubt the Court would at once interfere. The Learned Counsel then at great length went into a detail of facts, already before the public.—The LORD CHANCELLER granted the Injunction on this ex parte application; but ordered notice to be served on the other side without delay.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 3.—MR. MARRYAT.

The law to him
Is like a foul black cobweb to a spider;
He makes it his dwelling, and a prison,
To entangle those must feed him.

Webster's Duchess of Malfy, A. I.

Those who think with Bishop HALL, "woe to the woe where many lawyers thrive," would augur very ill of the state of this country from the fact, that there is perhaps no profession at present so much over-stocked in all its departments as THE LAW: shoals of Attornies are sworn in daily every succeeding term, and the number of Barristers called by the various Societies is very nearly, if not quite, in proportion. That part of the area of our Courts, especially of the King's Bench, devoted to the accommodation of the latter, is more than twice as large as the space appropriated to Solicitors, Suitors, and the Public; yet in term-time it is usually crowded to excess, and whether the business of the day be important or trifling makes little or no difference to those who fill it: the great majority do not attend to profit by displays of genius, learning, or ingenuity, in an eloquent speech or a logical argument, but to collect and register insignificant points of practice or pleading—whether such and such a rule is made absolute in the first instance, or whether such and such facts warrant an action of assumpsit or upon the case.

They pick up law as pigeons pick up peas,
To deal it forth again—as Heaven doth please:

And an appeal might safely be made to the margin-creased note-books, which these indolent, idle gentlemen always carry about them. Some listless supporters of wigs and gowns, it is true, are only lawyers in externals—mere idlers and loungers, who stroll down to Westminster-Hall, because they have nothing to do any where else—to loiter upon the benches, gossip, and crack a few bad jokes;

but their number is small compared with those who, having spent years in pleaders' offices, learning little else but to forget the knowledge they had previously acquired, visit our Courts to witness the application of all the useless and cumbrous forms with which the law is now overloaded. These men, when first they are called, take their seats upon the back-row most distant from the Court, content to be numbered and not named when the Bar is gone through*. Now and then they are favoured by some friendly Attorney with a motion of course, or perhaps one of them obtains a junior brief on the circuit, which makes him fortunately known to one of the Judges: that Judge condescends to call upon him by name in the following term, and it is met by a smile of peculiar gratitude, and a bow of unusual servility. Some legal friend, who stood in our young Barrister's way, then fortunately dies, and he immediately steps into his business—he "obtains the ear of the Court," by following the example of his predecessors, and business follows of course. He now advances with confidence to the front rows, and in due time is honoured with a silk gown, and with the title of "one of his Majesty's Counsel learned in the law."

Da i più sublimi

Ad ubbidire imparino i più bassi,—

Such, generally speaking, is the progress of a Barrister before he arrives at the very highest honours of the profession, though it is not to be denied that real learning and true talent will to a certain degree force their own way, and extort reluctant distinction. Indeed an instance of it to a certain extent I gave last week, and MR. MARRYAT (who for that reason, principally, is now selected), in a very limited degree deserves the same praise, for though far inferior to MR. SCARLETT, he has worked his way upwards often under the frowns of the Bench. In no other particular however can any comparison for a moment be made.

The fact however of the advance of MR. MARRYAT, though slow (for he was called to the bar when very young), proves that he must have some merit; but the principal difficulty is to discover in what it consists. His great qualification certainly is a knowledge of the heavy business of his profession—an acquaintance with all the laborious intricacies that belong to it; but it is impossible to contend that he is not lamentably wanting in all kinds of general information, and ignorant even of the higher branches of his own pursuit. When therefore I say that he is a man of more learning than talent, it is not placing the latter very high, because the former is so limited in its range; and when I add, that he is a lawyer, I do not mean even that he is a man of deep research in his profession—who has studied the sources and foundations of law, its first principles, and their subsequent extension and application. The rise and progress of the science probably never entered into his contemplation; he has been contented to take things as he found them, and perhaps the greatest praise he deserves is that he has made himself pretty thoroughly intimate with them. Why they are as they are, and why they are not as they ought to be, he would deem a most useless and unprofitable enquiry. Surely it would be expected of a King's Counsel learned in the law, that he should at least be instructed in the events of our national history, yet even some of these and their consequences and bearings he is obviously in the dark about, and no one will be inclined to presume any thing in favour of an individual who makes it his boast that since he left school he has never read any but a law book. I do not intend that he is upon a level with an Irish Barrister, who referring to two great events,

* "To go through the Bar" is a sort of law idiom, and signifies calling upon the Counsel according to seniority when they have any motions to make.

the obtaining of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, confounded the Sovereigns from whom they were exacted; nor with the celebrated English Barrister, who having occasion to quote a statute, and being required to mention the period at which it passed, very gravely replied, that it was in the reign of one of the HENRYS, or one of the EDWARDS, but he could not exactly tell which: ordinary conversation, and the indorsements upon his Roughhead, supposing he never opened it, would afford him sufficient instruction to avoid such exposures. There is no doubt however that he is what would be considered in well educated society—that for which his rank qualifies him—an ignorant man. To the Court nor to the Jury does he ever address a remark or make an allusion which would lead an auditor to suppose that he had acquired a particle of any but legal knowledge since he was freed from scholastic castigations; on the contrary, so constantly is every opportunity permitted to escape, that it would almost be concluded that he had totally forgotten what he must formerly have learnt. I heard Mr. SCARLETT once introduce a Latin quotation by observing, that there was something in the air of Courts of Law that drove all matters of taste out of the head, and he seemed feelingly to lament the loss. Mr. MARRYAT could not participate either in the regret or its occasion; at the same time I do not go so far as to believe all the current stories against him; on the contrary, the assertion that he once applied for two Mandami is most likely a libel upon his latinity.

About modern languages, so often useful to others, he seems to know nothing, and to care less: in the true spirit of John Bull, he apparently despises all foreigners but those who happen to be his clients.

Though he is not remarkable for acuteness, he is not deficient in quickness; and if it be asked how he obtained so large a share of business, the answer is, that he is principally indebted for it, not to his talents, but to his most laborious and plodding industry: he has gradually and slowly worked his way, and has gained the character among the Attornies of being a very solid man: indeed a better authority cannot be consulted upon the heavy drudgery of the profession. His opinions may be generally relied upon; and while there are few Counsel who have more cases to answer, none takes more pains with or bestows more time upon them. His legal arguments are overburdened with authorities, but without arrangement, and his knowledge seems disposed in his head, pretty much in the same order as furniture in an upholsterer's shop.

He is one of the most clumsy negligent speakers that ever opened his lips: it has often been remarked of the present Lord Chief Justice, that he never ends a sentence, and Mr. MARRYAT, it may be added, never begins one: he involves his speech in innumerable parentheses, and connects the most discordant parts by his favourite words, and, but, and so; running on at a hand-gallop, dashing through thick and thin, floundering here and stumbling there, and bespattering all who come in his way. Indeed he possesses very few qualifications for a Nisi Prius Advocate, and in this respect he has been out of his element ever since he exchanged his bombazeen for silk. Formerly, upon commercial questions, bankruptcies, and matters relating to shipping and navigation, he was at least tolerable; but it is now quite laughable to hear him attempt to open a case that requires anything like choice of language or oratorical display: an appeal to the feelings of a Jury, or a speech in mitigation of damages from him, rather serves to shew the student what he ought to shun, than what he ought to say. He has always the merit of being zealous, but it often occasions an exaggeration of his faults. A French satirist asserts that "anger sometimes produces the same effect as inspiration," but though it is not true of poetry, it is now and then verified in public speaking, and at such a time I have heard Mr. MARRYAT forceful and affective; but if the stream be strong it is always muddy; when energetic he is never select in his epithets, and as Lord ELLENBOROUGH once said of a witness, "really such men should not venture upon metaphor." Mr. MARRYAT's best effort of this kind is a speech to evidence; but still a want of arrangement very much destroys the effect of his observations: his formal objections, or what is calling picking a hole in a declaration, are not unfrequently successful.

The action employed by him is the most inappropriate that could be used: white his head and full round shining face are in vigorous motion, shaking from side to side in the vehemence of vociferation, his arms are buckled close to his sides, and his fingers are actively employed in buttoning and unbuttoning his coat, or in twiddling the strings of his gown. As may be guessed, his wig is often thrown awry by the violence of the action of his head; and the adjusting of it (when he thinks it necessary, which is not always the case) forms an agreeable diversity. For the same reason, one is unwilling to object to the not very graceful mode in which he puts both hands behind him, and tucks up his robe, so as to form an artificial projection in the rear to balance the natural protuberance in front. Leaning both hands upon the table, and swaying backwards and forwards, is the highest perfection he has in this respect yet reached.

From what has been observed, it will not be thought very high praise to say, that at Nisi Prius Mr. MARRYAT's chief excellence consists in the mode in which he examines or cross-examines a witness: nothing ruffles him; nothing puts him out of his straightforward course: a retort never disturbs him. We are told that the late Mr. BEACROFT was disconcerted by an old woman in a brewery cause, who called him Mr. Beercraft; but the gentleman of whom we are now speaking can put up with the most insolent replies with the utmost composure: he always affects not to hear what makes against his side of the question, and follows the answer up so quickly with another interrogatory, that he sometimes succeeds in suppressing it. This indeed is the only piece of artifice or address he uses; and if the Counsel on the other side interposes, or even if the Judge interferes, Mr. MARRYAT carries it off with a great appearance of innocent unconsciousness. He does not pretend to much ingenuity in framing his questions, or in choosing the course of an examination: this is a refinement of art he never will attain. He is obstinately persevering in his inquiries, and a witness never gains his point by not giving an answer as direct as the question; for Mr. MARRYAT is so patient, that he will repeat the same words over and over again twenty times, until his object is accomplished.

There is however one great perfection about him, not at all connected with his talents, that more than any other secures him the good opinion of the suitors, though not always the good will of the Court. The summary manner in which causes are referred at Nisi Prius, frequently in direct opposition to the declared wishes and probably interests of the parties, because it may happen to suit the views or convenience of the presiding Judge, has often been reprobated, not merely by sufferers. The Counsel who have pocketed all their fees are well contented to be spared the trouble of earning them, while the Plaintiff and Defendant are not uncommonly put to 20*l.*, 50*l.*, or even 100*l.* additional charges as the costs of the reference. This injurious practice has lately been censured from the highest authority; for the LORD CHANCELLOR declared, only a few days ago, that, if he were at the Bar, he would compel a Judge to try a cause, on which he thought the opinion of a Jury ought to be taken*. Had he been only a Counsel, his language would most likely have been different, for ordinarily the profound deference shewn to the slightest hint from the Bench produces at most a very gentle opposition, or perhaps none at all. In this respect Mr. MARRYAT, more than any other man in his situation, deserves approbation: he has been known to struggle to the end of a trial with the most zealous perseverance, after repeated recommendations by the Judge to refer the matter in difference; and though this obstinacy (as it was called) would perhaps in most cases be impolitic for his client, as causes are now conducted, yet in this instance he obtained and merited a verdict.

Of wit or humour Mr. MARRYAT has not a particle: he probably never made, nor relished a joke in his life; but he is not deficient in good sense and its companion—discretion. His greatest excellence is zeal, and his greatest defect ignorance.

FINE ARTS.

PORTRAIT OF NAPOLEON'S AND MARIA LOUISA'S SON IN THE ADELPHI.

"This Portrait is very recently from Vienna, where it was painted from the life by C. SALES, who is considered as one of the finest Vienna Artists, and is the instructor of the young Prince in Drawing. It is of a plump boy of between seven and eight years of age, of middling height, grey eyes, oval face, light brown, or rather sandy hair, handsome and well-proportioned features, except rather a long distance between nose and mouth, hair parted on the forehead, and falling down in curls; the whole farther and most recommended by an open and brisk countenance and action. It is such a child as is not always, but we conjecture is generally the offspring of a man of strong constitution, handsome, and of high intellect, and of a healthy young woman. It is such a promise of future exploit, such a genuine germ of the parent stock, as must awaken, to almost a nervous trembling, the jealousies and fears of the legitimatists, such fears as made one of their votaries say, "What a desirable thing would it be for the peace of mankind, were young NAPOLEON to die!" as if the Monarchs of Legitimacy, the BOURBONS and the BRANDENBURGS, had not been devoted to the disturbance of that peace, or would not again; as if even England had not sent a thirsty sword among her kinsmen in America, for demanding what, thank God, they obtained, in eventually breaking that sword, but not, alas! till it was drenched in the blood of freemen. "This interesting youth," says the description bill, "is represented as he generally appears to the immense crowd that throng to see him at the Imperial Gardens at Schoenbrunn. He is looking with surprise and pleasure at the admiring multitude, is roused by the looking and eagerness of his favourite dog, and is about to retire into the palace. His general costume is strictly adhered to, his beautiful features most faithfully delineated. This young Prince, from the peculiar circumstances of his fate, and the recollections attached to his name, excites universal sympathy among the inhabitants of Vienna, while his extraordinary beauty, quick apprehension, and amiable disposition, command general respect and admiration."—Being painted in a white jacket and trousers, the figure relieves with force from the dark reddish brown columns, and the trees immediately behind, and from the minute tints and half shades on the tessellated pavement, sky, &c. He appears, as it is, the coming-on of evening, to be retiring inward from the portico of the palace, and looks glowingly, from his activity of play with his dog, and from his natural vivacity of mind and body. He has on a beautifully-painted pink sash, bordered with green, and on his knot the insignia of the order of the Iron Crown. Though the picture is painted with intelligence, the action easy and natural, is neatly finished, and the effect in every respect pleasing, it is inferior to the best of our English Artists. It has nothing of the vigour of LAWRENCE, JACKSON, PHILLIPS, OWEN, &c. Nothing of the purity and clearness of colour of PHILLIPS or JACKSON. It has however sufficient merit to render it well worthy of a visit, even were it a portrait of a much less interesting person. But with the very peculiar interest attached to it as the young "rose and expectancy," not only of the family of NAPOLEON, but of a crowd of eager-eyed politicians, and we may say, of Europe in general, the Exhibition-room, will no doubt, become a thronged levy-room of visitors to the young prince.

THE NEW VESTRY ACT.

MR. EXAMINER.—Permit me to call your attention to some of the provisions of the Parish Vestry Bill, passed last Sessions, commonly called Sturges Bourne's Act, and to point out the baneful effect it cannot fail to produce on the characters and tempers of the inhabitants of every parish subject to its operation. In the first place, it provides that three days notice shall be given of every Vestry, and the specific business stated for which such Vestry is called.—To this no one can object. In the next place, it provides, that the Rector, Vicar, or Perpetual Curate, shall always take the chair if present, for the purpose of maintaining order.—a clause introduced, no doubt, by some Member more enlightened than Sturges Bourne, and who clearly foresaw that this Bill would be operative of disorder and discord. It may be very well on occasions like those, for Clergymen to act as chairmen; but for my part, Mr. Examiner, I cannot help saying that I dislike to see so many Clergymen acting as Magistrates, as Trustees of Roads, Members of Committees, of Canals, &c. &c. and my reason is, because this is not the sacred business to which they were ordained; because I have generally found them more dogmatical and intolerant in their opinions and principles than other men, whose minds perhaps have not had equal advantages of cultivation, but whose knowledge has been more useful in all matters of business, having been acquired more from the active scenes of life than from books; and because they are too often disposed to head parties in parishes, and to enter into all the little likes and dislikes of some leading man greater than themselves. I have also observed, that the kind and benevolent pastor is too often lost in the stern justice of the peace. The consequence and dignity of those ancient officers, the Churchwardens, are lessened by this Act; they cannot now, as heretofore, in the absence of the Rector, take the chair, unless called to it by an election each Vestry.

I come next to a most obnoxious clause, which enacts, that every person assessed for house, land, &c. in any sum up to 50*l.*, shall have two votes; for every 25*l.* additional, one vote more;—that is to say, two votes for 50*l.* a-year, three for 75*l.*, four for 100*l.*, five for 125*l.*, six for 150*l.*, allowing any man possessed of or renting property to the amount of 150*l.* or upwards, six votes, and no more. Gracious God! can any Englishman of the present day, possessed of the least liberality of sentiment, or who entertains the slightest veneration for our excellent laws, in presence of which all men are equal, contemplate such a clause without feelings of disgust and indignation? That a clause too, so truly aristocratical, should originate in the Commons House of England, excites my astonishment. Could any thing be devised more insulting and degrading to the poor and middling classes of society, than this hateful and invidious distinction of property? I think I already hear some rude ignorant booby or some pert, purse-proud, coxcomb exclaim to his humble neighbour, "Stand aside, you sixth part of a full blown Vestryman,—let me come forward and tender my six votes in one person!" As an Englishman, I could not brook such an insult. My feelings would prompt me to knock the offender down, and to consign Sturges Bourne and his ugly act to everlasting oblivion. Can Englishmen submit without murmuring to such a degrading change of old established customs? Can there be a greater satire, or a more marked libel, on the present constituted House of Parliament than this? Sturges Bourne must surely be a Reformer in principle, and have introduced this clause with some future view towards it. It is to be hoped, that he, or some other Member upon the same principle, will move, when the new Parliament meets, that those Members shall be entitled to a certain number of votes more than others, not exceeding 6, or 16 if they like, according to the number of souls they represent: this expedient perhaps might answer the purpose of a temporary Reform. We should see then how easy those one-vote Members would find themselves in the company of the six. One Vestry only in this Parish (where the parties run high) has been held under this Act, and it was attended with the greatest uproar and confusion. One respectable inhabitant, entitled to four votes, declared he could not, consistently with his notions of established usage and equal rights, avail himself of the privilege conferred by this Bill, and he would not insult the feelings of his fellow parishioners, who had only one vote, by tendering his vote as four. What a pity it is, that the knowledge of so many Members of Parliament should be so purely theoretical!

The next clause is in many respects equally objectionable. It directs that no person shall be entitled to vote, or be present even in a Vestry, who has not paid the last poor's rate. Had it stopped here, all objects would have ceased. But it further orders, that no person shall be entitled to vote, at whose house the Overseer or Collector shall have called for the rate,—no matter whether he has seen him or not,—upon his mere assertion that he called, without producing any test, either of date or witness, he stands disqualified; but every person upon whom he has not called (whether his rates be paid or not) is entitled to vote. Thus an artful Overseer, by what is termed a little manoeuvring, can always command a majority of votes in a Vestry; he can rate one friend at 75*l.*, another at 100*l.*, and soon, by the contrary rule, he can rate a known opponent at 72*l.* or 96*l.* &c.—thus increasing or diminishing the number of votes at pleasure. He has only to call previous to a Vestry, if a rate has been recently made, at the doors of those whom he knows to be of a different way of thinking from himself, and to call too at those hours when he knows the parties are from home, for his object in making such a call is, not to receive the rate but to insure their disqualification at the next Vestry and to get rid of any opposition.

I fear I have already exceeded the limits that you can allow me, but the subject is an important one, and I trust these observations of mine will draw the attention of some abler writer to the subject than myself.

A VESTRYMAN.

ROYAL VISIT TO THE CENTRAL SCHOOLS.

On Tuesday the Duke and Duchess of Kent, accompanied by Prince Leopold, inspected the Schools and establishment of the British and Foreign School Society. Their Royal Highnesses expressed their satisfaction at the order, regularity, and proficiency of the children. Afterwards, it being the anniversary of this Institution, a very numerous meeting of Ladies and Gentlemen took place in the School-room, in North-street. The Duke of Kent arrived about two o'clock, accompanied by his Duchess and Prince Leopold.

The Duke of Kent opened the business, by stating the object of the meeting. Since this Institution had been established, 3041 boys had been educated, and 616 remained then in the school. It was the peculiar advantage of this school, that instruction was given to the children of persons of all religious denominations. Though all who heard him doubtless preferred this liberal system, he would recommend them to act in a conciliatory manner towards those who, with more confined views, supported what were called the National Schools, in which instruction was given only to children educated in the principles of the Church of England.

Mr. WILKS then made a report on the state of the school. In the course of last year 508 boys had been admitted, of whom 252 had already completed their instruction in the school. During the same year 504 boys had been withdrawn from the school. During that period 345 had been taught to write, and 159 had been instructed in the principles of arithmetic. It had been fully proved by experience, that the great number of boys composing the pupils of this school could, by the machinery which had been introduced, be easily instructed by one master. No children were excluded on account of the religious opinions of their parents. They all, however, attended places of worship. About 293 regularly attended the Sunday schools established in the neighbourhood. There were also some Catholic children; but the charity of the Institution was not confined even to Christians, for there were among the scholars several Jews. He had to observe, that 700*l.* of their debt remained unpaid; but relying on the active principle of British charity, the Committee saw nothing in that circumstance which should induce them to despair, or in any way to relax in their efforts to do good.

Mr. Alderman WOOD alluded to the pledge which he had formerly given for the establishment of a female school. He had written on the subject to a lady who had formerly given 500*l.* to the Institution. There were some buildings adjoining the boys' school, which could easily be procured, and might be fitted up at a very small expense. He had prepared a list of ladies, from whom a Committee would be formed, and he had authority to place the Duchess of Kent at the head of that list. He had besides on the list the Duchess of Bedford, Lady Darnley, the Marchioness of Downshire, Lady Elizabeth Whitbread; and he concluded by proposing the appointment of a Committee of Ladies.

Sir R. WILSON expressed his admiration of the principles on which the Institution was founded. Here charity was clothed in her pure robe, unstained by any illiberal distinctions, and extended her bounty to all who required her aid without asking what might be their religious faith. While instruction improved the morals of the people, and withdrew them from vicious habits, the knowledge it spread was the best security for the peaceful enjoyment of constitutional liberty. When the value of the present Institution was considered, how much ought not the country to feel itself indebted to an Hon. Member of the House of Commons, who has done so much to rescue from abuse and corruption the excellent institution which their ancestors had founded for the education of the poor? So long as he might have a seat in the House of Commons, that Gentleman might always rely on his humble assistance. There was an illustrious person present who had already secured to himself the attachment of the country, and whose heroism in the field it had been his good fortune to witness. Since that Prince had been in England, he had gained as much in the affection of the people as he had unfortunately suffered in his own. But this was a subject on which it would be painful for him to dwell, and he should beg leave to drop it by moving a resolution of thanks to that Prince: which was carried unanimously.

Prince LEOPOLD came forward, evidently much affected, and said, I wish to express my gratitude for this kindness. You have already shown me so much sympathy, that I trust you will excuse me for being unable to do more than to say, I most sincerely thank you.

Mr. BROUGHAM could not help expressing that feeling of delight which he believed must be felt by every well regulated mind, at seeing so large, so select an assemblage on such an interesting occasion, and witnessing the patronage bestowed by the first persons of the state on so useful an Institution. This example had spread abroad in the world. It was warming and illuminating the dark and foreign regions of the north of Europe; and he who has hitherto reigned over 40,000,000 of barbarians, now disdains a sceptre, unless he can wield it over an educated and civilized population. He hoped when Parliament met again, that something effectual would be done to correct the notorious abuses which had taken place with regard to institutions for education, and by which the poor of this country had been most cruelly robbed. Many thousands were in this way yearly plundered by persons who were regarded as grantees in the country, and in some instances these guilty practices were traced to the Church—he meant to recreate and unworthy members of the clerical body. It would at once astonish and shock the meeting, when he told them that one great estate had been violently torn from the poor, whose right it was, and its produce at last employed by borough jobbers in the work of political corruption! He hoped that in the next Parliament, he should be so supported on this question, that every pledge he had given with regard to it would be redeemed, and that the patrimony of the poor would be rescued by force from the fraudulent hands which now unjustly held it. He concluded by a motion, which was not distinctly heard at the extremity of the school, but which we understood to express the thanks of the meeting to the Princes of the Royal Family for their support of charitable institutions.

The Duke of Kent returned thanks; and after a large subscription had been collected, the meeting broke up.

EXTRAORDINARY SENTENCE.—JUDGE PARK.

William Hopwood was convicted at the late Salisbury Assizes for stealing a sack of oats, and sentenced by Judge Park to 18 months imprisonment and hard labour; but immediately on the sentence being pronounced, he had the effrontery (as the report says) to direct an impertinent question to his Lordship, respecting the wages for his labour, which he wished to know how he was to recover. The learned Judge instantly ordered his sentence not to be recorded, and altered it to that of Seven Years Transportation!

It appears by this statement, that although 18 months imprisonment was considered an adequate punishment for that transgression of the public law upon which the man was arraigned, yet for the offence of making an impertinent remark to a Judge, the criminality of which is neither declared by statute, or otherwise recognized among indictable delinquencies, the offender was sentenced to seven years transportation—a punishment so disproportioned to his offence, as to cause an involuntary shudder upon every one who peruses the statement. The crime of impertinence, for which this very severe punishment was awarded, is not of so very dangerous a nature to society, as to require the hasty and heavy judgment with which it was visited; and, we trust, that his Lordship will be content to review the case and limit the punishment to that amount, which he had himself pronounced as being commensurate with the crime for which alone the man was indicted. His Lordship's irritability was the subject of animadversion two years since in a letter published at Exeter, signed "RUSSELL," and upon that occasion, from a reverence of the pure and blameless manner in which the laws of this country are administered, we undertook, as our readers may recollect, an humble defence of his Lordship's conduct. It is, therefore, with pain that we notice the present occurrence; but as it has excited a strong sensation among many very respectable characters, who are about to interfere on behalf of the convict, it becomes our duty to bring the matter plainly before our readers, that this singular case may be borne in mind, and the protest of the public voice timely recorded on the occasion.—Taunton Courier.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Saturday, Aug. 1.

REFERENCES AT NISI PRIUS.

When the Lord Chancellor entered the Court this morning, a short conversation took place between his Lordship, Sir S. Romilly, and Mr. Hart, respecting the issue directed in the case of William v. William, which respected repairs done to two farms.

Sir S. Romilly suggested that the issue would not probably have the effect of bringing the questions between the parties more nearly to a close; the examinations at Nisi Prius must be long and minute, and probably the learned Judge would recommend a reference, which could not be resisted by Counsel.

Mr. HART, on the other side, observed, that he should be very well satisfied with what would be done on the trial of the issue before a Jury, as he was convinced that the Judge would do only what was right.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—All I know is, that if I were a Counsel at Nisi Prius, I would not submit, but I would make the Judge try such a cause.

POLICE.

HATTON-GARDEN.

CAUTION TO SERVANTS.—Elizabeth Meridith and Sarah Fletcher were examined on the following charge:—The former prisoner lived cook in the family of James Armitage, Esq., 5, Brunswick-square; the servants were always allowed plenty of provisions; but it reaching their master and mistress's ears that they were kept rather on short allowance, suspicion fell on the cook. Her master ascertained that it was her practice every night, between 9 and 10 o'clock, to hand a small hand-basket over the area-gate to the prisoner Fletcher. In consequence of this discovery, Mr. Armitage employed William Read, jun to watch. A little before 10 o'clock on Monday night, as the prisoner Meridith was in the act of handing a basket to the prisoner Fletcher, the officer took the latter into custody, and the basket was found to contain a fresh half-quarter loaf incut, the chief part of a boiled leg of mutton, and some cold boiled potatoes. Mr. Armitage did not wish to prosecute them criminally, but the Magistrates insisted on his prosecuting both, as an example to servants.—The prisoners were committed to Newgate for trial.

UNION-HALL.

Deborah Sullivan, who was committed on Monday evening last on a charge of attempting to murder her husband Philip Sullivan by striking him on the head with a hammer, was brought before the Magistrates for re-examination.—Philip Sullivan, the husband, stepped forward in an extremely weak and emaciated state, with his head covered with bandages, and, to the astonishment of every person present, stated that his wife had never struck him with a hammer, but being in a state of intoxication, he fell down and struck his head against a large iron fender, which caused the wound and the violent effusion of blood, which alarmed the neighbourhood of the Mint where he resided.—Glennon, the officer, stated, that when the prisoner was given into his custody, Philip Sullivan affirmed in the most positive manner that the prisoner struck him with a hammer, and attempted to murder him.—The prisoner is a young woman, and her husband at least 60 years of age. Previous to the case coming on, they were observed to be deeply engaged in conversation in a very low tone of voice, and it is conjectured that she persuaded him to give up the prosecution. The Magistrate reprimanded him for his inconsistent conduct, and ordered the wife to be liberated.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MURDER.—The following are the particulars of a most cruel and inhuman murder, committed by Catherine Paget, aged 40, on the body of her illegitimate child, on Saturday night, July 18, at Rotherby, in the county of Leicester:—She had long been suspected by her neighbours to be pregnant, and that she had formed the horrid resolution of her making away with her babe when born: they therefore watched her actions narrowly, and on Saturday evening last they observed that she was very unwell, but wished much to conceal it; the suspicions became still stronger by her shortly after retiring to her room, the door of which she instantly locked. Saturday night and Sunday passed in anxious suspense, when some one observed what an offensive smell there came from Paget's room, and immediately gave information to the parish officers, who proceeded with the constable and broke open the door, when they found the mangled remains of a male child, divided into quarters, three of which were in a bonnet-box under the bed, and the other burnt to a cinder in the ash-hole! The mangled remains were removed to a convenient situation, for the investigation to take place before the Coroner; and the Jury, after the necessary inquiry, returned a verdict of Wilful Murder against the said Catherine Paget, and she was accordingly brought to Leicester county gaol.

MURDER.—On Tuesday an inquest was held at Epsom on the body of Ely Cox, the gamekeeper of James Tessier, Esq., who was murdered on Sunday morning last about a quarter of a mile from the house. A more horrid spectacle was never brought under the view of a Jury. The back part of the head appeared to be beaten in, the face entirely black, the neck compressed to the size of a man's wrist by a handkerchief being twisted with extreme tightness round it by means of a stick fastened in the knot; the bottom of the stomach literally kicked to pieces, the right arm and two ribs broken, a finger cut off the left hand, and both hands covered with gashes deep and long.—George Milson, the coachman of Mr. Tessier, deposed to the dreadful state in which he found the body. From the appearance of the grass and bushes, he thought there must have been a violent scuffle.—James Finch, servant to Mr. Tessier, produced a clasp knife, which he found about 15 yards from the dead body; also a pistol, which was picked up about twenty yards from the corpse. The neckkerchief of the deceased was twisted so tight round his neck by means of a stick which was thrust through the knot, that witness could scarcely force his fingers between the neck and the handkerchief; the face was almost black. The stick was produced; it is about two feet in length, five inches in circumference, and has a large hook at one end.—Charles Stanners, gardener, was going along Chalk-lane, about five o'clock on Sunday morning, and heard the report of a pistol, and immediately afterwards an exclamation of "Oh, Lord!" and some other expression, but saw nobody.—The Jury returned a verdict of Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown.

An extraordinary interest has been experienced by the inhabitants of Epsom since the murder of Ely Cox, the gamekeeper of James Tessier, Esq. and the bustle and confusion in the town have exceeded, if possible, what took place at Greenwich on the murder of Mr. Bird and his housekeeper.—On Tuesday at two o'clock in the afternoon, the magistrates assembled at the coffee-house, Epsom, the doors of which were literally blockaded by the mob, when Thomas Arnold, James Arnold, John Bridges, and Thomas Osborn, were brought before them on suspicion of being concerned in the murder.—John May stated, that Thomas Arnold usually resided with his mother at Banstead, about two miles from Epsom, and was a notorious poacher; on Saturday, the night before the murder, he did not sleep at home, nor could it be discovered that he slept at Epsom, although he was seen there about six o'clock on Sunday morning; the murder was committed at five o'clock on the Sunday morning; he described himself as having been very drunk on the Saturday night; whereas, upon inquiry, it was found that he left Epsom about ten o'clock at night, perfectly sober. James Arnold was the constant associate of his brother; the prisoner, John Bridges, absconded, when informed that the officers were in pursuit of him. T. Osborn was taken into custody in consequence of having been seen at six o'clock in the morning of Sunday, at his cottage door, which is about 50 yards from the spot where the body was found, as if he had just come in from a walk. On search being made in his cottage, a loaded gun was found and a great number of wild rabbit-skins. The bloody knife found near the place where the murder was committed very much resembled one which Osborn had been seen to use in his business as a gardener, but which he could not now produce. Two bruises, having the appearance of having been recently inflicted, were discovered on his forehead.—This evidence was confirmed by other witnesses, but no one could swear that the bloody clasp knife was in the prisoner Osborne's possession.—Thomas Arnold said, that after he left Epsom on the Saturday night, meeting with some acquaintances, he got drunk, and slept out all night on a stack of oats about a quarter of a mile from the place of the murder.—Osborn said, that he slept at home on the Saturday night; that he was roused by the report of a gun about five o'clock the next morning, and that he got the bruises on his forehead by a fall from an apple-tree.—Bridges accounted for his absence from the fear of being punished by the magistrates for getting drunk on Sunday.—The Magistrates discharged all the prisoners; and they resolved that a reward of Two Hundred Pounds, on conviction of the offenders, should be offered.

An Inquest was held on the body of Mr. Saffield, of Fooke's-court, Chancery-lane, who died in consequence of falling from a window. It appeared that the pressure of the deceased on a rotten window-ledge was the cause of the accident, and the Jury returned a verdict of—Accidental Death.

An Inquisition was taken July 21, at the work-house, Kingston, on the body of Sophia Brill. The deceased was servant to Misses Gray and Willis, milliners. About a fortnight ago, between one and two o'clock in the morning, these ladies were alarmed by a violent screaming, and the deceased burst open their door, rushed into the room, and presented a spectacle which filled them with horror. Every part of her dress was in flames, and the form of a human being was lost in the mass of fire. Miss Gray threw the unfortunate girl on the bed, and extinguished the blaze with her bed clothes. It was now discovered that the bed room of the deceased was in flames. The neighbours were called in, and the conflagration was prevented from spreading. The unhappy sufferer languished till Saturday, when she died in indescribable agony. On the night of the catastrophe, she went to her chamber at the usual hour of retiring to rest, but instead of going to bed, sat up to do some needlework. She became drowsy, fell asleep, and was at last awoken by the agony inflicted by the flames. Verdict—Accidental Death, occasioned by burning.

An Inquisition was taken on Wednesday, in Great Saffron-hill, Clerkenwell, on the body of the illegitimate child of a woman named Ann Loades, alias Watts.—It appeared from the evidence that the mother, who was only twenty years old, went to lodge at a public-house in Saffron-hill the day after the child was born; and that she kept the child during three weeks, at the end of which it died, in a horrid state of want and filthiness. When the landlady remonstrated with her, she used to take some milk from her breasts, and give it to the babe in a spoon, and said, that it was no use doing any thing, as the child would not live. There were no external marks of violence on the child. The Jury were of different opinions respecting the verdict, but on being told by the Coroner that the mother would certainly be prosecuted by the parish, agreed on the following—"The death of the deceased was produced by the gross neglect of the mother."

Saturday week, as Mr. Halliday, of Moat-street, was passing through Hyde-park, a gang of ruffians rushed from one of the plantations near the gravel pits, and knocked him down. Mr. Halliday roared as loud as he could for assistance; upon which one of the villains placed his knee on his throat, and held him till the others had taken his watch, and rifled his pockets of 1*l.* 5*s.* and a silk handkerchief.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

We repeat one of our last week's extracts, for our text:—

"NEWCASTLE, SUNDAY, AUG. 2.—The Judges arrived here yesterday evening, and opened their commission in the usual form. This day they attended divine service in St. Nicholas's church, accompanied by the High Sheriff and the Mayor, with all their circumstances of pomp and state. The church is remarkably large, yet it could not contain one third of the multitude that pressed for admission. The farther north their Lordships penetrate the more they are thronged, whether from curiosity or devotion we cannot pretend to determine. We could not, however, help remarking, that the exemplary attention and solemnity of Mr. Justice Bayley seemed to rivet the devotion of the crowd. Mr. Thorp, of Rydon, preached. His text was 1 Cor. vii. 24. "Brethren, let every man, wherein he has been called, therein abide with God." After a suitable exordium, the preacher proposed to show, 1. That the Christian was sundered from the world; 2. That he performed all the duties of his station in the world; 3. What motives and principles determined the character and regulated the conduct of the Christian. On those several heads he enlarged with the usual copiousness of illustration. Having fully established his propositions, he deduced a few inferences to the following effect:—Every man is bound to perform the duties of his station; there is no danger that men in official stations can neglect their duty, and therefore no admonition need be addressed to them; but men of rank and influence ought to be reminded, that although they are not accountable to any human tribunal, they must give account to God of their employment of their time and talents; and, therefore, they ought to perform the political duties which devolve upon them; for by their neglect of those duties, they not only fail to discharge what is required of them, but they leave room for the activity of persons whose previous training and habits have not qualified them for the task: the most important inference is, that no man should aspire beyond the station in which he is born: in the present state of society, when such a mass of knowledge is diffused, and such a desire of improvement is become general, men of zealous minds often resort to extravagant modes of benefitting human kind; but there should be no interference beyond our precise right and calling."

We are not told in this account how Mr. THORP established the propositions he set out with; but as we are informed he did it with the usual copiousness of illustration, we may suppose he did it with the usual arguments. Unfortunately they are not convincing, especially when they produce the "inferences" of which we are told. His very first proposition is in the middle of a most distressing dilemma. He says, that "the Christian is sundered from the world," and yet he proceeds to insinuate that the Christians abound in official situations; and we had just before read, that the Judges whom he addressed came to church "with all their circumstances of pomp and state." Here are not only the possessions and ties of "this wicked world," as it is called,—salaries, fees, perquisites, sinecures, &c. &c. with all their consequences both anxious and jovial, but things which are expressly forbidden in the catechism and (if it contain the catechism) in Mr. Justice BAYLEY's own edition of the Prayer-book, for we understand he has given one,—namely, "the POMPS and VANITIES of this wicked world." What does Mr. THORP, with his gown and velvet cushion, say to these? That there are Christians, as there are philosophers, sundered from the world, we doubt not; but that the Christian is so, unless Mr. THORP reduces the number to a very small and primitive portion indeed, and leaves out for instance the Judges, Statesmen, and Bishops (which of course he would not be so unpolite as to do), how is the case to be made out? The very Quakers, who in our opinion are the best Christians going, and do not palter with some of the most vital texts of their religion, such as the injunctions against violence, have not escaped from the little clinging pomps and vanities of fine linen, cloth, coaches, and a reputation for wealth; but how is the aspiring preacher, the Judge, the Bishop, or the Statesman, to get into the very thick of show and parade, of velvet cushions and processions, of ermines and silks, of robes trailed and borne up, of colours of all sorts, of livery-servants, beadles, and vergers, of staves, maces, wands, coifs, caps, mitres, coronets, equipages, titles, bows, flatteries, influences, riches, and luxurious dinners,—and then to say to us, out of the midst of them all, "Gentlemen, we are sundered from the world?"—Hear what a great lawyer and philosopher says on this subject, who really is sundered from the world and yet does all his duties in it;—we mean the venerable BENTHAM, whom the Judges might study with advantage on the penal code, Mr. THORP on the catechism, and Mr. Justice BAYLEY on both:—

(3.) ["The pomps and vanity of this wicked world."]—Pomps and vanity, two other sorts of things given here as one thing,—and that one, as well as the things preceding and succeeding, a thing to be "renounced." Renounced?—By whom?—By every member of the Church of England without exception, and that with almost his earliest articulate breath.

As to the vanity, with or without the subjoined limitation, by which it is confined to "this wicked world," being in itself the painest of all pain words—so completely vain as to be void of all meaning—it may, with that character attached to it, be dismissed.

But the word pomp—to this word is attached by usage—unvaried usage—a meaning somewhat more determinate and intelligible. Under the word pomp are comprised all those factitious appendages, by which factitious dignity,—when combined with the visible and tangible fruits and marks of opulence,—is, in the hands of the ruling few, employed to distinguish them from the subject many.

The Monarch, in the first place, is it not by pomp that he is intended and enabled to display and preserve his dignity, and therewith and thereby to maintain his power? The robes—the sceptre—the crown—the train of attendants, in so many forms and colours—armed and unarmed—if these be not the elements of pomp, what others are?

Not to speak of Lords Temporal, with their titles, their coronets, and their armorial ensigns, behold the Lords Spiritual, with the "fine linen" on their shoulders, the "purple" on their liveries, the purple and the mitre on their equipages. If not of these things, of what things is "pomp" made?

Of all these holy personages—these sitting and walking pageants—what one has there ever been, by whom all these things have not been thus solemnly renounced?—all these things, to which, disguised under the name of decency, they now cling with such fond and undisguised affection:—these things, of which the very essence of their order is, according to them, composed, and by the taking away of which the Church would, according to them, be laid in ruins, and along with it the State.

That this so much magnified instrument of theatrical piety, is neither more nor less than a farce,—that nothing that is to be found in it need or ought to be considered as possessing any binding force,—that it is neither more nor less than so much sound without sense,—is not this the comment which, in that highest of all places, the text receives from practice?

Such, then, being the judgment passed on it by the highest of all authorities, by what inferior authority—by what private individual—should any different judgment be passed upon it?

Bentham's "Church of Englandism."

Mr. THORP gets into another dilemma with his second proposition, the spirit of which indeed is disproved by the disapproval of the first. Either the number of Christians and persons to be saved (which with these gentlemen are the same thing) is inconceivably small, or it involves, as Mr. THORP insinuates, most, if not all professed Christians in official situations, and of course vast numbers of others. Now that these persons perform "all the duties of their station in the world" is not only incompatible with their manifest enjoyment of its pomp and luxuries (it being part of the Christian's duty to despise these), but it is lamentably and notoriously false in the face of the world; and what is more, it is repeatedly disclaimed by the persons themselves, who either from common candour or a sense of Christian duty confess themselves more or less imperfect in the practice of virtue. Part of the very prayers which were said on the present occasion is made up of these confessions of undutifulness:—"We have erred and strayed"—"We have followed too much the devices of our own hearts"—"We have done those things which we ought not to have done, and left undone those things which we ought to have done; and there is no health in us." Those in particular, such as the Methodists, who lay claim to the special favour of God by their faith, (that is to say, their theory,) take equal pains to shew that they have no claim in point of practice. They even insist, and take a sort of suspicious delight in informing us, that they are miserable sinners. We shall not dispute the matter with them; but does all this mean any thing, or does it not? Is it sincerity or hypocrisy? Is it a confession of error, or a mere claim to consideration under the pretence of being one? Is it the honest repentance of men who have really not fulfilled all their duties, or the strange anomaly of a penitent form of words in the mouth of those who have fulfilled them? Is it, in short, truth; or is it, (to use the words of a great man), "offering to the Author of Truth the unclean sacrifice of a lie?" It would seem, at one minute, that Mr. THORP reduces these confessions to mere forms of words, at least with regard to the great; for he is represented as saying, in conformity with his proposition, that "there is no danger that men in official stations can neglect their duty, and therefore no admonition need be addressed to them;"—a conclusion, which since the times of Henry the Eighth would not have been hazarded, we believe, till after the Battle of Waterloo and the era of the Holy Alliance. Since those events, power and pious conduct have of course gone hand in hand, to the great edification of the expectant. Yet though there is no danger in Mr. THORP's opinion that these gentlemen can need admonition, or do any thing but perform all their duties, we are presently informed that it may nevertheless be becoming to "remind" them a little. Now of what can such perfect official persons possibly want reminding? Why of this,—that they are accountable to God, though not to any human tribunal. Really we can scarcely credit our own eyes here, or at least the reporter's ears. What! Judges, Bishops, and Statesmen, not accountable to any human tribunal! Of what use then are laws, decencies, jurisdictions, appeals, inquiries, impeachments, and all or any of the provisions which the members of society have made for regulating and controuling their public servants? What is the meaning of Magna Charta, of the Bill of Rights, or of the people's having any share in the Government? This is stretching prerogative and divine right far beyond what SACHEVEREL ever dreamt of, or even the Boroughmongers. Is it possible Mr. THORP can have imagined that men in official stations are not accountable to the public, because the Judges, (whose glories we suppose he had been preparing his eyes for, by investigating their history) are not removable at pleasure,—are not, as it is termed, "upon good behaviour?" Such an inference from a relative circumstance is not credible; and yet we have nothing before us to shew that Mr. THORP's inferences in general are a jot wiser.

"The most important of these inferences," says the reporter, "is, that no man should aspire beyond the station in which he is born." Mr. THORP opines, "that in the present state of society, when such a mass of knowledge is diffused, and such a desire of improvement is become general, men of zealous minds often resort to extravagant modes of benefiting human kind; but," repeateth our preacher to High Sheriffs and Judges, "there should be no interference beyond our precise right and calling." His text, in the solitary manner in which it is quoted, appears to be to the same purport:—"Brethren, let every man wherein he has been called, therein abide with God;" or rather, as the original says, "wherein he is called." The reporter thinks that one part of this passage is levelled at a class of the Reformers, and another at those who preach without a license. Both these descriptions of persons are included, we dare say; but the passage, in our opinion, is levelled at every class of speculators, who differ with Mr. THORP and his aristocratical friends, and tell the world so without being in office or the Church. Thus, none but Clergymen of the Established Church must speak of divinity, none but Parliament-men of politics, none but Judges of legislation;—it is to no purpose we all have penalties to take care about, taxes to pay, and souls to live for ever;—we must take for granted the wisdom, infallibility, and benevolence of those who are professionally and officially called, and who are accountable only to God, let our treatment be never so much at variance with our own wishes and perceptions. It would be a waste of time to refute such absurdities as these. It is sufficient only to mention them, and to shew them that with all the good wishes of certain powers that are in their favour, they must not think to skulk back upon us under their cloaks. What does Mr. THORP mean by his "precise right and calling?" Every man in a free country, or country that ought to be free, has a precise right to look after its political interests; every man in the same country has a right, if he can, to get above his particular trade or calling; and as to the word "calling" in a religious sense, if fanatics trifle with it, so do the clergymen of the establishment,—and in a worse manner, because with greater levity. How is it that,— not now and then, nor in small numbers, but continually and in great ones,—persons profess to have had a call to the Ministry, when it has only come from their mode of education, their parents, or their hopes of a living? How is it that a Bishop is said to be called to his office by the Holy Ghost, when the King's recommendation has previously settled the matter? And how is it that these calls, in almost every instance, are sure to come into the ears of the tutors or younger sons of great families? That the general spirit of the Members of the Established Church is a million times preferable to that of the Methodist, we are heartily willing to admit; but they are putting their fingers on edge tools, and not on cushions, when they argue in this manner: and an established intolerant zealot is a worse sight to us than a Methodist, inasmuch as his other-worldliness is as complete, and his present worldliness somewhat more certain. The truth is, with regard to this text from St. Paul's epistle, that it applies neither to one nor the other, nor to any thing modern, but to the contemporaries of the Apostle, and the supply of pastors for the infant church. And what is particularly unfortunate for Mr. THORP is, that at all events it is against his very argument in question. Let us quote the whole of the context. St. Paul says, "Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. Art thou called being a servant? Care not for it; but if thou mayst be made free, use it rather. For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman: likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant. Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men. Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God." Now if this passage is obscure, and seems to mean different things in different sentences (we have not the Greek by us to refer to), one thing at least is clear, that whatever might have been the stations of those to whom St. Paul is speaking, and however he might recommend them to remain in those stations as compatible with a religious call, the religious call is not therefore to be unattended to; fishermen might be preachers, tent-makers might be preachers, tax-gatherers might be preachers: and so they were in the persons of Paul himself and the other apostles. Thus in the only point of view, in which the text is to be taken, it is opposed to Mr. THORP's conclusions; and as to a civil meaning, it has none at all. St. Paul did not mean to tell a common soldier that he might not aspire to be a General, or any one that he might not rise in the world by various means. He himself had had a variety of occupations; and how had his "previous training and habits,"—of a tent-maker, a bigoted Jew, a holder of the clothes of mobs that stoned people, a fierce officious persecutor,—"qualified him for the task of a Christian preacher?" The answer is a matter of great nicety; but it can do Mr. THORP's illustrations no good either way. St. JAMES, the mildest and most amiable of the Apostolic Writers, was brought up differently,—but not not for the Ministry. He was a fisherman. We allow that these instances, and the particular contemporary injunctions of the Apostles, are not to be applied in favour of modern enthusiasm; but how are they to be applied against it?—Handling texts of Scripture for purposes of this kind is dangerous work; and especially so, inasmuch as almost every body, for his particular purpose, can select his weapon of controversy. How much might be quoted, for instance, and is, against modern Episcopacy, its trappings and wealth;—to say nothing of a number of well-received vices, which people think they may practise with impunity, if they behave decently towards the laws?

We might enlarge greatly on this subject, had we time or room; and shall perhaps return to it; but we conclude in the mean time with another extract from the venerable writer before-mentioned. It is from his Preface, in which he gives an account of the reasons that led him to write against the inevitable worldly consequences of the mode of teaching in the Established Church. Our application of the passage to such sermons as Mr. THORP's is of course not directed to that gentleman's doctrines in particular, or with any thing like personal feeling, but to him and such of his brethren in common, as are more or less conscious or unconscious victims, and makers of victims, of a servile and paltering system.

"When, out of the multitude of his attendants, Jesus chose twelve for his Apostles, by the men in office he was declared to be possessed by a devil: by his own friends, at the same time, he was set down for mad.* The like fate, were my conscience to have shewed itself more scrupulous than that of the official seist, was before my eyes. Before the eyes of Jesus stood a comforter—his Father—an Almighty one. Before my weak eyes stood no comforter. In my father, in whom in other cases I might have looked for a comforter, I saw nothing but a tormenter: by my ill-timed scruples, and the consequent public disgrace that would have been the consequence, his fondest hopes would have been blasted, the expenses he had bestowed on my education bestowed in vain. To him I durst not so much as confess those scruples. I signed;—but, by the view I found myself forced to take of the whole business, such an impression was made, as will never depart from me but with life.

Mendacity and insincerity—in these I found, and it will be seen how far I experienced,—the effects—the sure and only sure effects—of an English University education: of a Church of England education of the first quality; these, sooner or later, I could not but see in the number, not only of its effects, but of its objects: of mendacity, a forced act or two; and the object of it the securing of an habit of insincerity throughout life.

Another thing, which I moreover beheld most certainly among the effects, and but too probably among the objects, of Church of England doctrine, enforced by Church of England discipline, was,—that "humble docility" as towards its rulers and their subordinates—that "prostration of the understanding and will," which, in so many words, with an intrepidity that cannot sufficiently be admired, the Bishop of London, on a late Charge, some passages of which will here be more particularly brought to view, has published as the avowed object of their endeavours: their National Society's Schools, and this their Catechism, being employed as instruments to this purpose."

LETTER TO FERDINAND VII.

[The translation of the following interesting Document appears to be from the pen of the Spanish writer himself, and therefore may be reasonably excused for some deficiencies in correctness. The spirit of the feelings, the importance of the subject, and the actual result of it's being laid before Ferdinand, more than amply make up for them.—Exam.]

LETTER ADDRESSED BY CAPT. DON DIEGO CORREA TO HIS MAJESTY KING FERDINAND VII.

Cádiz, May 10, 1814.

SIR,—(1.) The signature under which, I have the honour to address the present writing, will not, I believe, be unknown to your Majesty, from the nature of the trust and circumstances which have proceeded in consequence of the Commission the Government confided to my care. It now reawakes and renews the sentiments of fidelity, zeal, integrity, and patriotism, with which my spirit has always been penetrated and inflamed for the general good of my country, religion, and the restoration of the Spanish throne, which we, the loyal subjects of your Majesty, have preserved unhurt, in order thereon to place you as a just, beneficent, and religious King, in fulfilment of the sacred rights which this heroic nation confided to your Majesty, for the administration and government of a moderate monarchy.

(2.) It is not, Sir, dissatisfaction, resentment, or insubordination, which now urges me thus reverently to address my complaints to your Majesty; neither ambition nor base flattery ever found a shelter in the breast of an honourable Spaniard: the internal love I profess to my country, and the fidelity I owe to the royal person of your Majesty, are the real sentiments which inspire my breast and guide my conduct; nor have I any other object in view than the benefit of my fellow-citizens, and the advantage of your Majesty as our lawful King.

(3.) Your Majesty, by facts evident and well known to the nation, has been enabled to experience and correctly appreciate the debility, malice, cowardice, and malignity, of the greatest part of the Courtiers of the kingdom, of the Ministers, Generals, Diplomats, and Chiefs of political and religious Bodies, who by their counsels, persuasions, and example, delivered up your Majesty into the hands of the most cruel of tyrants, as a tame lamb led to the altar to be immolated.

(4.) Assembled, Sir, in Bayonne, they sanctioned and adjured the insidious constitution, by which they eternally condemned your Majesty to perpetual confinement and slavery, causing you to die in a civil sense, deprived of your throne and the aid of your faithful subjects.

(5.) They set up the nation at public auction; they sold Spaniards to the Corsicans as so many Ethiopians or Africans, by delivering up the country to which they were indebted for their existence, by giving the bloody armies of the enemy possession of the strong places and forts most advantageous for their locality, and by corrupting the deluded with promises and threats, and by drawing over the apathized and immoral to their infamous party.

(6.) Sir, let your Majesty examine these evident truths in the bottom of your heart, and I am confident these horrid and criminal acts will be there written in indelible characters. These are demoralized Spaniards, who seek to deceive your Majesty with more daringness than when they dragged you from Madrid to Bayonne, leaving the nation in an orphan state, and scattering odium, confusion, and disorder, in every corner of the monarchy, and driving the provinces of America into an open and dreadful insurrection.

(7.) Who, Sir, of the many celebrated courtiers and flatterers, who acknowledged your Majesty as their lawful Sovereign, complied with their obedience, by swearing to defend you with their property, blood, and lives: as the faithful subjects of an adored Monarch, did they present themselves before the tyrant to assert the rights of your Majesty? did they reproach him for his horrid conduct, and combat his black perfidies with a resolution to sacrifice themselves for your Majesty, or save you from the fangs of the most cruel of tyrants?

(8.) Those who degrade themselves in the highest extreme of adulation and servility towards the favourite of your incaptious parents, or who did not possess sufficient energy or dignity to destroy the insidious rival of your Majesty, are not fitted for any other than execrable attempts, in which their persons run no risk, since they only rejoice in seeing the blood of their fellow-creatures flow, whenever this can accomplish their purpose.

(9.) These, Sir, are the exact ideas and machiavalian principles of the degraded sons of our country—to eat, dress, and amuse themselves, and enjoy every pleasure that can be invented at the expense of the unhappy—to intrigue, command, and tyrannize, through the medium of their influence and stratagems, upheld by the inquisitorial tribunal. The religion of Jesus Christ does not authorize excesses so prejudicial, but they hide these extravagancies with the cloak of an irreligious hypocrisy, contrary to the wise maxims of the gospel, which directs that the rational being shall live by the sweat of his brow and the labour of his hands, since otherwise it is an useless and heavy burden on society, as laziness and apathy engender vice and the excesses of the human passions.

(10.) Such, in few words, are the proselytes of Bonaparte, and those who have done most to destroy the constitution of the Spanish Monarchy, and at all risks now seek to make your Majesty clash your generous, humble, and magnanimous people, by artfully and obstinately plotting a civil war, by driving the nation into anarchy, so as to destroy thousands of victims by the sword of the armed force, whom they seek to persuade and induce to assassinate and ill treat their fellow-citizens with all the vigour of the laws of war, as well as their parents, relations, and friends, whenever the absolute will of your Majesty should so ordain and determine according to your pleasure or caprice.

(11.) It is not, Sir, any illusion or phrenzy that now urges me to utter such gloomy and disagreeable truths, by appealing to the paternal heart of your Majesty. With the bluntness and vehemence dictated by my patriotic sentiments, the preservation of the august person of your Majesty, and the imminent danger that awaits the country, compel me to address myself to your Majesty as a meritorious ex-military officer, and as a citizen who fears nothing but the law.

(12.) Your Majesty, as a King and the Father of your People, ought not to lend your innocent ears to the agents of despotism—to those who with impunity delivered you up to the tyrant—to those who sold their country, and have conspired by every means imaginable to its total ruin—those who have carried on war under the bloody banners of the enemy, and supplied his Generals and satellites with means and aid.

(13.) As these wicked characters are marked and stigmatized by the meritorious defenders of your Majesty, it it would be very difficult for them to be mistaken or hide themselves, if you really wish to know them. Let your Majesty invite near your throne those tried Generals, who by their patriotism, virtue, and good qualities, have distinguished themselves in our magnanimous revolution—a Lacy, Ballesteros, Espoy, Mina, Baron de Ecoles, Sarsfield, et Empecinado, Villacampa, Valdes, Kourequi, &c. Let your Majesty confidently listen to their Councils, and place reliance on the decided and illustrious patriots Antillon, Arquelles, Count de Torena, Garcia, Hemeros, Martinez de la Rosa, Caperos, and other conscientious Spaniards. Let not your Majesty despise the councils and advice of upright Spaniards, who have put forth their opinions with characters, integrity, and dignity; sustaining with firmness the rights of the throne, as well as those of their fellow-citizens, in order to redeem them from an Asiatic slavery and ministerial despotism; since otherwise I am of opinion that according to all appearances and founded conjectures, invincible Spain will terminate her political convulsions in the same manner and with the same result as the unfortunate reign of Louis 16th, and will at length become a prey to a daring man or to some foreign nation. Every thing fatal disappears, is overcome and destroyed, if your Majesty listens to the voice of reason, justice, and the law, which imperiously demands an early and efficacious remedy, as on this depends the general good of Spaniards, being that the safety of the country requires that your Majesty, without any animosity or scruple, should adjure the constitution of the Spanish Monarchy, that firm bulwark of the national liberty and independence, that efficacious antidote against the inveterate despotism and arbitrariness entailed upon us by the progenitors of your Majesty, and which, through a rare and miraculous dispensation of providence, your Majesty alone seems fixed upon to bury in oblivion, by giving to us a just and happy reign as a return for the incalculable sacrifices made by this heroic nation for the restoration of your Majesty; thus sealing the constitutional code in such manner as to render it immortal and dreaded and respected by all despotical Governments.

(14.) The above, Sir, is what is prayed and implored of your Majesty, by a constant and faithful subject, who has had the satisfaction of usefully serving his country and your Majesty for the long space of 25 years, complying with his obligations in the field of battle, and corresponding with his duties at all times and in every destination; and through the services of his two only (military) sons, who by their wounds prove their patriotic wishes, he again earnestly beseeches you, Sir, that the blood they have shed in their tender years, in defence of the nation, religion, and of your Majesty, may suffice to move your beneficent heart, in order to remedy and guard against the terrible disasters which are preparing by domestic enemies, who endeavour to surround your Majesty with sinister views.

(15.) I hasten to forward to your Majesty this plain and submissive exposition through the medium of the Minister of State, his Excellency Don Josef Layando; at the same time ardently wishing your Majesty an unlimited prosperity as well as a happy reign, in order that all the people of the Spanish Monarchy may enjoy in peace and tranquillity the inestimable fruit of the precious blood with which they have cemented the inviolable throne of a constitutional King.—Our Lord preserve the Catholic and royal person of your Majesty, &c.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CASE AND SENTENCE IMPOSED ON DON DIEGO CORREA.

I, the undersigned Public Notary belonging to this city, do certify, that in the Court therein established to take cognizance of the causes instituted against the detractors of the royal person of his Majesty, and of his prerogatives, in my presence, and in conformity to royal orders of the 20th May and 24th June, of the present year, proceedings have been carried on against Don Diego Correa, for the revolutionary propositions or expressions made use of in the Memorial he remitted to his Majesty from this city, under date of the 10th of the same month of May, and the rest resulting from the said proceedings; all which being established according to the regular forms of law, and after the Advocate-General, as well as the Advocate of Don Diego Correa were heard, the definitive sentence was given, the tenor of which, that of the royal order approving the same, together with the warrant of execution and notification, copied by request of the plaintiff, are as follows:—

SENTENCE.

In the city of Cadiz, on the 23d day of August 1814, his Excellency S. Don Juan Maria Villavicencio, Knight of the Military Order of Alcantara, Lieut.-General of the Royal Navy, Captain General, and Military and Political Governor of this city, and its Maritime Jurisdiction, Subdelegate of the Rents thereof, with the functions of Intendant and Member of the Council of Admiralty, &c. &c. having inspected this cause, carried on by virtue of royal orders of 20th May and 24th June, against Don Diego Correa, a prisoner in the public prison of this city, said, that according to the results of the same, alledged and proved by the parties, he ought and thereby did condemn Don Diego Correa in the penalty of ten years hard labour, which he is to fulfil in one of the garrisons of Africa, as well as in the costs of the suit; and let the proceedings forthwith be sent to his Majesty through the medium of his Excellency the Secretary of State, and of the Council of Grace and Justice, for the purposes specified in the royal order of 24th June. And his Excellency decreed the above as his definitive sentence, on the report of S. Don Joaquin de la Pena y Santander, Proctor of the Royal Councils, Assessor General of the Subdelegation of Rents of the Criminal Court, and Judge specially commissioned for the present case; and that they signed the same I further certify, Juan Villavicencio, Licenciado Don Joaquin de la Pena y Santander.

LUIS BARRERA DE LOS HEROS.

ROYAL ORDER.

The King has been duly informed of the suit instituted against Don Diego Correa, as well as of the motives which induced your Excellency to acquiesce in the same, in conformity to what your Excellency states in your letter of 23d Aug. ult., in consequence whereof his Majesty has been pleased to approve the sentence; at the same time commanding, through the Minister of State, that a notification be made to the British Government, purporting, that this kind of demand and delivering up of persons are conformable to right, and that for the same no blame ought to be attached to the Governor of Gibraltar. By orders of his Majesty I communicate the same to you for fulfilment in the part that belongs to you, and at the same time I return the proceedings to you. God preserve your Excellency many years.

Madrid, 4th Sept. 1814.

PEDRO MACANAZ

To the Captain-General of Cadiz.

PROCEEDINGS.

In the city of Cadiz, this twelfth day of September, 1814, his Excellency S. Don Juan Maria Villavicencio, Lieut.-General of the Royal Navy, Captain General of the Province, and Military and Political Governor of this city, said, that by the ordinary post his Excellency had received the royal order above copied, and obeying it as he was bound to do for the execution of the same, he commanded that the same be added to the file of proceedings instituted against the said Don Diego Correa, that its contents as well as the sentence be notified to the said Correa, and that the proper testimony of the condemnation be forwarded to the Secretary's office of this Government, in order that the culprit may be sent away to the hard labour and confinement of Ceuta, to which his Excellency destines him; and in a note in the margin, let the time of his entering into and going out of prison be specified. And by this decree his Excellency, the Captain-General so ordained it, with the concurrence of S. Don Joaquin de la Pena y Santander, Assessor of Rents and of the Criminal Court, and that they signed the same I further certify, Juan Villavicencio, Joaquin de la Pena y Santander, Luis Barrera de los Heros.

NOTIFICATION.

In Cadiz, on the 12th day of September, I, the undersigned Public Recorder, caused the definitive sentence given on the preceding 23d August, the royal order of the 4th instant, and the proceedings above copied, to be personally notified to Don Diego Correa, a prisoner in the public gaol, and that he appeared to be duly informed of the whole, which I further certify.

BARRERA.

All the above particulars result from the proceedings of the aforesaid cause, and the documents herein inserted are conformable to the originals to which I refer. And that the whole may so appear and serve as a condemnation to Don Diego Correa, I have drawn out the present statement, which I have signed in the said city of Cadiz this second day of September 1814.

LUIS BARRERA DE LOS HEROS, Public Recorder.

The above is copy of the original which exists in the Recorder's Office of this place, under my care, which I hereby attest and deliver up these presents at the request of the party concerned, and by virtue of a decree of the chief officer of this place.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, AUG. 10.—The bookseller L'Huillier has not been conducted to the Conciergerie, as the journals have reported; he is to go into confinement at La Vendee a few days, where he will pass the month's imprisonment to which he has been condemned as the Editor of the first Gray Man.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, AUG. 10.—Lord Lauderdale arrived here yesterday from Ghent. The Duke and Duchess of Clarence arrived on the 7th at Ghent, and left it the next day for Antwerp.—A letter from Paris says, that "it is certain that some of the Exiles included in the Royal Ordinance will shortly obtain permission to return to France. The recd of Marshal Soult, of Messrs. Merlin de Douay, Arnault, and David, has been proposed to the Council of State."

SPAIN.

MADRID, JULY 24.—Notwithstanding the resolution made by the Allies against the admission of any diplomatic agent at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, we entertain the just hope, that the Monarchs will not refuse to take into attentive consideration the serious differences which exist between our Court and that of Portugal. With respect to the important events which have recently taken place, and probably those which are now passing in the Floridas, it would be in some degree an insult to the enlightened wisdom of the High Allied Powers to doubt of their earnest endeavours to gain information and explanation on the subject of a quarrel, the consequences of which may be incalculable.—Madrid Gazette.

NORTH AMERICA.

WASHINGTON, JULY 10.—The Chevalier de Onis reached this city only a few hours after the arrival of General Jackson's despatches at the War Department.

It is said, he has brought with him in his portefeuille a protest against the occupation of West Florida by the United States' troops, and a reclamation for its restitution to Spain, which he transmitted to the Executive on the very evening of his arrival.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

GRIMSBY, AUG. 11.—Mary Stone, aged 29, was charged on the oath of her sister, Harriet Hampton, with having wilfully murdered a female child, of which she (the prisoner) was the mother, in the month of September, 1816, at Richmond.—The prisoner, who was a most interesting-looking young woman, was placed on the seat near the table, as she appeared too weak to support herself in the usual place where prisoners stand to be arraigned. She seemed quite dejected and worn down; her features, which were remarkably intelligent and expressive, indicated extreme anxiety and emotion. On being arraigned in the usual manner, and called on for her plea, she replied, in a faint but agonized tone of voice, Not Guilty.

The prosecutrix, Mrs. Harriet Hampton, was then put into the witness box. She appeared to be a fine young woman, about 19 or 20 years of age. On casting her eyes downwards to where the prisoner sat, she burst into tears, and exclaimed, with great apparent anguish, "O, my sister, my sister!" The prisoner fainted during her sister's agitation, but was speedily recovered; the latter, after having been taken out into the open air, was soon sufficiently well enough to give her evidence, which she did with less apparent embarrassment than might have been expected. She stated, that on the 25th of September, 1816, she slept with her sister, who about two o'clock in the morning was delivered of a female child; it cried, and witness wanted to go for assistance, but the prisoner would not let her. About half past two, the prisoner forced her hand into the infant's mouth so as to choke it, and then thrust the body into a pan under the bed. Witness said she would cry out, but the prisoner threatened, if she did, to kill her. The prisoner left the body in the pan that night, and on the next day made a fire in the room and tried to burn it, but, being alarmed lest the crackling noise it made should be heard, took it off. On the following morning, she carried it down to the copper, burnt it to ashes, and then threw the ashes on a dunghill. The prisoner, witness, and their brother, have 500*l.* in the Bank which was bequeathed to them with the benefit of survivorship.

There was no other evidence for the prosecution. On behalf of the prisoner, Mrs. Elizabeth Wilkes was called, who stated, that in September, 1816, she lived at Trentham, where she knew the prosecutrix. Witness repeatedly heard the prosecutrix wish for her sister's (the prisoner's) death; saying, that she wanted her money. About three weeks after the marriage of Harriet Hampton, she complained to witness, that the prisoner demanded 3*s.* a week from her husband for the time his wife had lived with her before she knew him; and she added, "I'm afraid she'll get the amount from the trustee, Mr. Smith, who is her friend."

Mr. Justice ABBOTT said, that if they believed the witness for the prosecution, they must convict the prisoner of the horrible crime of the murder of her own new-born child; if they disbelieved her, they must decide that one of the two sisters had infamously conspired against the life of the other, in the shocking expectation of thereby coming a short time sooner to the possession of some small property than she was likely to do in the usual course of things. In either alternative the reflection was most revolting. Nothing was surely more improbable than to believe that a woman in a small house, at the moment occupied, and the thin partition so communicating with the adjoining houses, that what passed in one was audible in the other—nothing, he repeated, could be more improbable, than that a woman should, without making the slightest noise, or expressing the slightest pain, or as to be audible outside her room, have borne the generally severe and sore pains of child-bearing.—There was not, besides, the slightest evidence to shew that any body had seen the prisoner in a state of pregnancy before this occurrence was said to have taken place. If the body was burned in the manner described, how had it happened that the very offensive odour had never attracted notice. Taking the whole statement together, it stood unconfirmed by the testimony which might, were it true, be adduced in its support. If the prisoner had really committed the act in the manner described, nothing was more unlikely than that she should have quarrelled, and almost immediately after the fact, with the person who balanced her life in her hands.

The Jury immediately returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

The unhappy woman was in convulsions almost throughout the trial, but during moments of composure protested her innocence in a distinct tone. Her sister, upon first seeing her, screamed aloud, and continued to cry most bitterly, and to evince, at least outwardly, the deepest sorrow.

Mary Pouller, a delicate looking girl, only thirteen years of age last January, stood charged with the wilful murder of a female bastard child.—Several witnesses proved the birth of this child in a healthy state on the 24th of June. The prisoner seemed fond of it, but it was found dead with her two days afterwards, and with some livid marks about its mouth, which the woman who principally assisted in dressing the child after its birth attributed to something like a convulsion fit.—The chief witness to prove that the child died of a violent death was Mr. Newman, a surgeon, who was decidedly of opinion, from the examination of the infant's head and throat, that it met its death by strangulation and fractures in the head, which caused a rupture of some of the vessels, and an extravasation of blood.—On two of the former witnesses, who chiefly remained with the prisoner and child, being recalled, they repeated their declaration, that her treatment of the child seemed maternally kind and attentive.—The Jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

THE KING v. ROBERT HAMPTON.—This was an indictment against the defendant for escaping from the Rules of the King's Bench Prison. It appeared that he had broke the Rules in March 1817, in consequence of which the Marshal was compelled to pay the debt and costs to the amount of 504*l.* 10*s.* After being absent 15 months at Hamburg and other parts of the continent, he was retaken and lodged within the walls.—The defence was, that the defendant had violated a moral, but not a legal obligation, as he had given a bond to the Marshal, who might recover by a civil action.—Mr. Justice ABBOTT, in his charge, declared that there was no doubt that the Rules of the King's Bench were a prison, because the Marshal was liable on an action of escape, if he suffered any prisoner to depart the Rules.—The defendant was found Guilty, and sentenced to four months imprisonment in the county jail.

AUG. 12.—George Chennel and J. Chalcraft were arraigned for the Wilful Murder of O. Chennel and Elizabeth Wilson, at Godalming, on the 10th of November last.

Mr. GURNEY stated the case to the Jury. The deceased Mr. Chennel was a respectable tradesman at Godalming, and a man of considerable property. The prisoner Chennel was his son, and the other prisoner his carman. Eliz. Wilson, the other person murdered, was an old woman, who had been many years his housekeeper. The prisoner Chennel lodged in Godalming, and usually took his meals at his father's, but did not lodge, and it could be proved, had not that filial feeling which a son ought to owe for a father. On the morning of Tuesday, the 11th of November last, about seven o'clock, the town of Godalming was alarmed with the account that Mr. Chennel and his housekeeper were found murdered in their house, which was in the middle of the street, the old gentleman in his bed, and the housekeeper in the front kitchen. They were last seen alive at about eight o'clock on the Monday evening, and from circumstances the murder must have been committed from nine to ten o'clock. The old gentleman was a very regular man, and went to bed usually at nine; his housekeeper sat up after him for some time, and usually retired at ten. He was found in his bed, and therefore it is done after he had retired; she was found in the kitchen, not having been to bed, and work lay near her; it was therefore presumed that it was before her usual time of going to rest. The person also who lived in the next house, and whose bed-room adjoined to Mr. Chennel's, went to bed at ten o'clock, and could hear any thing that passed in his room; did not hear any noise after that hour. In addition to this, a person was passing the house about half-past nine, and heard a scream, and afterwards something fall, but did not suspect any thing of the dreadful deed which was then most probably in perpetration. The next morning, when a farming servant of Mr. Chennel's came to the stable to feed the horses at about six, he found Chalcraft there, as usual. They dressed their horses, and went to the house where usually the old gentleman and his housekeeper would be stirring at that hour. The door was open, but no one appeared; at length Chalcraft went into the front kitchen, and the other heard him calling his master, but no answer. Now it would be proved that the murdered body of the housekeeper lay in such a position that when he opened the door he must have seen it, and, indeed, must have stepped over it to get to the stair-foot door, and therefore his affecting not to see it was matter of great suspicion. In addition to this, when the alarm was given, he stated that his master was murdered up stairs before he or any one had been up stairs. He was known to be the constant companion of Chennel, and therefore he was immediately sent for, and on searching the box of Chennel two 1*l.* Bank-notes were found, one of them slightly tinged with blood, which notes would be traced to the possession of the father a few days before. The prisoner at once acknowledged the notes had been his father's and said his father gave them to him on the preceding Sunday; he should, however, call evidence to prove that the prisoner, in the early part of Monday, could not pay a sum of eight-pence halfpenny: but about ten o'clock on Monday evening, after the murder was supposed to be committed, he went to the Richmond Arms, in that town, and squandered money very profusely. As they were both suspected, they were required to say where they had been, and whether they were together on the Monday evening. They both agreed that they had not seen each other since the preceding Friday. The falsity of this statement would be abundantly proved, for both Chalcraft and Chennel were seen on the spot at half-past 9 on the evening of the murders, and Chennel was seen standing at the very passage which led to the deceased's house; and a witness afterwards passing by saw a woman walking before the door, apparently on the watch. This woman was one Sarah Hurst, an accomplice; and Chalcraft was seen walking towards his home, Hurst following him; and Chennel at the same time went back to the Richmond Arms, which he had left some time before, he insisting that he went to look after a woman, and was gone so short a time, that the pipe he left behind him was burning when he returned. It was also singular that Chalcraft had a short time before declared that "there would be a bigger blow up before long than Godalming had ever seen." Chennel, the prisoner, was separated from his wife, and was in the constant habit of using invectives against his father and the old woman. He should call Mary Hurst, the accomplice. An accomplice was an infamous character, and ought not to be believed unless confirmed by other testimony; and he was bound to state that this accomplice, Hurst, had accused A and B—he would not mention names, who, upon investigation, were clearly innocent.

All these facts were confirmed by a number of witnesses, from whose evidence it also appeared that Chennel had been heard to wish that his father was dead, and to use violent language against the housekeeper, saying that she made mischief between his father and him. At one time he expressed a hope that he should find her some morning with her throat cut; and if he met the men coming out of the door who had done the murder, he would not tell of it, though he were to be hanged for it himself; and that if he found them both so, he would not be the least sorry; nor even if he committed the murder himself, should he think it any sin.

Sarah Hurst said, that she stood before Mr. Chennel's door to watch at the request of Chalcraft, and heard a scream; then Chalcraft came out and told her they had done for them both.—The evidence of this witness was extremely confused and contradictory, and it was proved that she was in a very perturbed state of mind and had been subject to fits.

The prisoners being called on for their defence,

Chennel gave an account of the transactions of Monday, which he partly read from a paper. The account did not very much vary from the evidence and his previous statement. He persisted in saying that he used the same pipe when he returned to the inn as he had used before he left it.

Chalcraft likewise gave an account of his conduct on Monday, stating what he did at the different hours. He delivered this story, introducing the most minute circumstances; and the most trifling dialogues, without the least stop or embarrassment, in a firm voice, and with great composure of manner. The only symptom of anxiety or agitation that appeared was a quivering in his lips, which he found it necessary to wet frequently with his tongue. He concluded by declaring "what I have said is true, So Help me God."

Mr. Andrews then called witnesses in behalf of Chennel.

James Coles remembered the Monday night when Chennel was murdered. Saw Chennel the prisoner in the shop about eight o'clock at night. He went up the passage of his father's house towards the street. Witness saw no more of him that night. Witness went to him next morning, and found him in bed, and told him what had happened at his father's house. When he heard it, he said, "Lord have mercy upon us, is he quite dead?"

He dressed himself in the clothes he had on the previous night, and witness saw no stain of blood on them.

Mr. Sergeant LENS then summed up at great length, and with great clearness and impartiality, and the Jury almost immediately returned a verdict of Guilty.

The Learned JUDGE then told the prisoners that they had been found guilty by a Jury of their countrymen, after the most patient investigation of their case; and he might now mention what he had studiously abstained from hinting before, that he thought the conclusion they had come to the only one to which any reasonable man could come on the evidence against them. He could not much longer make a demand on their attention, but he could not omit stating to the prisoners the situation in which they stood with regard to the deceased. The one of them stood in the relation of a son—a relation which should always create the utmost reverence and love; the other in that of a servant, which should always command duty and respect. Murder committed in these relations could scarcely admit of aggravation, but the crime in their case had been aggravated by circumstances of almost unexampled atrocity. The one had lifted up his hand, not only against his father, but that father aged and feeble; and the other against a master whom he himself had denominated kind and benevolent. If they had not yet prepared their minds by repentance to supplicate that God whom they had offended, they should employ the few hours that yet remained for that purpose, without uselessly denying their guilt, and endeavour to place their souls in a state to receive pardon in another world for a deed like this. He had now only to pronounce the awful sentence of the law, which was, that they be taken to prison, and on Friday next carried to the place of execution, to be hung by the neck till dead, and their bodies afterwards to be given to be dissected. The prisoners were then led away, Chalcraft protesting that he was "as innocent as the child unborn," and Chennel saying nothing. The latter seems a person about 40; he is a stout made man, rather inclined to be corpulent, with the outline of a good face, apparently rendered heavy and dull by the effects of indolence and irregular habits. He was dressed in a black jockey coat, a striped waistcoat, and a black neckerchief. He displayed, on his entrance into Court, the utmost indifference to his situation, and did not appear to be much touched by any thing that occurred. The prisoner Chalcraft appeared in a smock-frock, with a coloured handkerchief tied carelessly about his neck; he had all the rustic appearance of his situation, joined to a considerable degree of acuteness in his eye and general intelligence in his countenance; he seemed secure and confident, but at the same time earnest and attentive.

George Chennel, aged 38, and William Chalcraft, aged 50 years, were executed on Friday morning, at a quarter past eleven o'clock, in Godalming Meadows.—The culprits, since their conviction, evinced the greatest apathy. They were conducted to Guildford Gaol on the night they were convicted, placed in the condemned cells, and double ironed. On Thursday the Rev. Mr. Mann came down to attend them. He remained on Thursday night with them a considerable time, entreating them, as the only reparation they could make to society, to relieve the minds of the people, by acknowledging their guilt. The culprits declared that they were "innocent as the child unborn of the murders of Mr. Chennel and Mary Wilson."—On Thursday evening, Mrs. Chennel, the wife of George Chennel, visited him with her child, a fine lad about six years of age. The moment Chennel saw them, he burst into tears, and embraced her most affectionately. They were left together in the cell for about 20 minutes, and when they parted, his wife was in a dreadful state of anguish; he did not seem to feel so much as when they met. He persisted to his wife that he was innocent of the crime for which he was doomed to die. In a short time afterwards a more afflicting scene took place, Chalcraft's wife and six children presented themselves at the gaol door to take "a last living leave" of the husband and father. The interview was overpowering to the spectators. The agonizing shrieks of the mother, the heavy groans of the father, and the cries of the children, would have pierced a marble heart.—Mrs. Chalcraft used the following emphatic words when she was sufficiently recovered as to be able to speak:—"Oh! my dear Will, tell me the truth; as a man, who stands before God, and is going to die, if you are guilty of the murder, pray, for God's sake, don't hide any thing, and have the weight of guilt upon your conscience when you are dying." Chalcraft replied, "My dear, I am innocent of the murder, or I would confess it."—Mrs. Chalcraft was about to leave the cell, when she presented the babe she held in her hand to Chalcraft to kiss; she then exclaimed "Oh, God! to-morrow this child is just twelve months old, and your father then is to die. I hope God will be a father to my children." They then embraced, and were separated by the gablers.—The Rev. Mr. Mann was with the criminals on Friday morning as early as six o'clock, and continued praying to them until half past eight;—they still persisted that they were not guilty. Mr. Mann hesitated for a considerable time before he would administer the Sacrament to them. After some time spent in protestations of their innocence, the Worthy Divine cautioned them not to take sin to their souls by partaking of so divine an ordinance with a lie in their mouths.—They continued to declare their innocence after the Sacrament was administered; they were bound by ropes, and at about half-past nine they were placed in a waggon, upon which was erected a platform, which they were to be launched from under the gallows. When the procession began to move, Chennel once changed colour, but he soon became composed, and did not move a muscle during the remainder of the way; he was totally unaffected by the surrounding multitude; he seemed as insensible as a block of wood, and kept his eyes fixed upon the platform all the time, until the moment he arrived under the gallows (except once, when he answered a question of Mr. Mann's), and he cast his eyes up at it and sighed. Chalcraft, during the whole of the time, responded to the prayers of the Clergyman, and seemed sensibly affected with his awful situation. The procession arrived on the fatal spot about eleven o'clock; the place is surrounded by hills, and thousands had assembled at the place of execution. On the left hand of the criminals was the farm lately occupied by young Chennel.—When the platform was under the gallows, the executioner asked Chennel to mount upon it; he sprang up with surprising vigour and boldness, and stood firm, without betraying the most remote symptoms of fear during the time the executioner tied the rope round his neck. During that time a gentleman, for whom Chalcraft had worked, was in deep conversation with him; Chalcraft had promised him (his own words) "to tell him the whole pedigree of the affair when he came to the place of execution." The gentleman entreated him to fulfil his promise; Chalcraft trembled very much but recovering himself, he again protested his innocence of the murders.—When the procession was on the road, Mr. Mann earnestly entreated Chennel to make a confession; and told him that he had no right to expect mercy unless he acknowledged his crimes, if it was only for the purpose of preventing innocent persons from suffering for the crimes which they had committed. Mr. Mann then put the question (which we above allude to) direct to Chennel in the most solemn manner, "Did you, or did you not, commit the murder, or assist at all in it?"—Chennel lifted up his eyes, and said, in reply, "I never had any concern in the murder." When Chalcraft was desired to ascend the scaffold, he trembled very much, and looked anxiously round. It was thought he would have made a confession, but he shook hands with a gentleman, and again repeated his avowal of innocence. He then mounted the scaffold, and the rope being adjusted round his neck, the Rev. Mr. Mann ascended, and held a conversation with him; he said that they were on the very verge of the grave, but it was not too late to make a full confession; and he entreated them, if they, as dyers, had any regard for their souls, not to die denying the truth. Chennel replied, "What I have asserted is the truth." These were his last words.—Chalcraft was deeply engaged in prayer, and made no answer. Mr. Mann then prayed with them, and having left the fatal apparatus, they were launched into eternity. Chennel was a great deal convulsed. Chalcraft died almost instantly. After hanging an hour, they were cut down, and their bodies were given to Mr. Pars, surgeon, at Godalming, for dissection.—It will probably be recollected, that Chalcraft gave as a reason for refusing to see the dead body of his master, the shuddering feeling which he had viewed the man murdered at Petersfield. From what has since transpired, there is every probability that his reason for disliking the sight was the same in both cases, namely, his connexion with the act of murder. It is singular that he and Chennel were at the place at the time the four crimes were perpetrated, and that some of the clothes of the victims were found near Godalming where Chalcraft lived. Another murder, it will be recollected too, was perpetrated at Farnham, and the two criminals were there at the time, while the body found in the house appeared to be one of Chennel's father. Other acts of the kind have been attributed to them, though on so good foundation; and, if the reports of the people in the quarter can be believed, they would appear to have proved about like wild beasts, whose appetite for spoils and blood is as keen as that of a hungry tiger. The person whom they murdered was a respected man. His murderer was his only

THERE is now talk of an approaching war between England and the United States. It is not attributed to the seizure of Pensacola, which it is universally believed will be made the best of, as the phrase is, by Spain. Neither is it supposed that we are to obey the call of the Indians, however we may have helped to increase their trouble with the Americans by inciting them formerly to war; for the Ministerial Papers have proved that we guaranteed them no future assistance. The supposition is that the execution of Mr. ARBUTHNOT will be made the ground of war; and yet the principal Government Journal and the Opposition one, seem equally agreed not to discuss this apparent outrage, till they have heard what the Americans have to say upon it. But an extraordinary sensation was made on the Stock Exchange last Thursday by an immense sale of Stock, on the part of a respectable house; and "this circumstance," says the Chronicle, "coupled with the tone which the Government Journals have held ever since the Americans took possession of Florida, gave rise to a suspicion that there is a correspondence on foot not altogether of an amicable nature." The latter is very probable. As long as certain retrospective yearnings exist in a particular quarter, or rather as long as the conduct of Monarchical Governments naturally renders them jealous of the growth of republics, so long there will be a tendency to angry correspondence. But there are readers who think they discern very different symptoms in the tone of the Government journals; and for our parts, though we are sure their masters would very readily put down America if they could, North and South, and though we never held them for very wise personages, yet we think there is something in the nature of the present times which would almost instinctively hinder them from going to war with any one. It would at any rate be extreme folly in them to do so. They cannot afford it in any way. They have neither money to spare; nor character for faith to begin with; nor Allies that they can put to any hazard; nor armies that they can venture to send to such a distance; nor, in short, such an honest and kindly peace as they can dare to trifle with and disturb. It is a knave that has got a hold on them, owing to their bad practices and insincerity, and that will give them up to ruin if they do not continue to keep it quiet and let it extort their money. And yet it is impossible to say what desperate measures they may resort to, from folly and resentment in the first instance, and on the difficulty of scraping together this very money in the second. At all events, our opinion on this subject is twofold; first, that the Ministers would gladly go to war if they could with America; and second, that the great and perhaps insurmountable hindrance to it is their fear of it's breaking up the peace of Europe. If they do go to war in the teeth of this danger, we shall conclude, either that they are foolish and resentful to a degree of which we did not suppose even them capable, or that they see the inevitable approach of a war whether they commence it or not, and perhaps of a coalition or secret understanding, little looked for at present, among the lovers of liberty on the two Continents.

A remarkable document has appeared in the daily Papers,—a Secret Memorial addressed to the Allied Powers on the present state of France; but even if we had room for a twentieth part of it, our Readers might well be spared the tediousness, inconsistency, obscurity, and dotage of even that; for the whole paper is remarkable for nothing but its sovereign impertinence, being neither more nor less than a request on the part of the desperate Ultra-Royalists in France, that the Allies would please to constitute them Ministers to Louis the 18th, instead of his present ones. That this is a treasonable proceeding on the part of persons eternally calling out about treason, is clear; and that they will get no punishment for it, at least from the King, is pretty clear also,—Louis either being secretly implicated in their wishes himself, or at all events too many of his personal friends and his own family. We rather believe the latter; for his infirmities are not of a nature to dispose him to irritable activity, and he loves a reputation for being shrewd and apophthegmatical, which can be obtained among the liberal. Even the Courier, who used so to laud the legimitates and all their expectations, now says that there is no hope of retracing the march of revolutionary events. "The thing," he says, "is impossible"; and he adds, with an extraordinary piece of homage to a truth, (so strongly does it press upon him) that, "if possible, it would be most unfortunate for the interests of humanity." What the Courier growing a little Jacobinical again! Oh there can be no doubt, that the King and his brother legimitates have given up all hopes of what he alludes too; and that these Ultra-Royalists plague them dreadfully. But see the inconsistencies that clog them all at every step. The Courier wonders how any set of men can have the face to call upon the Allies to dictate Ministers to a King. Here he forgets his own late Ultra-Royalism and his former Jacobinism both. The Allies, he says, must not dictate Ministers to a king, and yet he cheered them on the other day when they were dictating a king to a whole people! Ever while you live, the many for the few! Even the Ultras come to nothing, if they shew as little respect for one person, as they have done for millions.

"It was stated, in a Morning paper, (says the Courier) that Madame BERTRAND had arrived in the River, from St. Helena. Upon inquiry we find that it is not Madame BERTRAND, but her maid, and who, with her husband, and a servant of BONAPARTE, have been ordered to depart from England."—The Courier does not say where these persecuted people are to go.—The Star of last night, however, asserts that Madame BERTRAND has arrived in the General Kidd, and that she is at present detained on board the Flamer off Gravesend,—the Government not allowing her to land in England.

PROTEST OF COUNT BERTRAND.

"MONSIEUR LE GOUVERNEUR,—Dr. O'Meara made known to me yesterday, that in consequence of an order emanating from you, he was obliged to quit this Island. On this occasion I have the honour to request you to consider, that M. O'Meara was given us by your Government on our demand, and by way of substitute, for a French Physician;—that he has our confidence;—that the Emperor has been for seven months affected with a chronic disease in the liver, a disease mortal in this country, and occasioned by the want of exercise, which he has been unable to take for two years, from the manner in which you have abused, and still abuse your powers;—that things are come to that pass that the patient requires attendance every day; that for two years you have been wishing to dismiss M. O'Meara, to substitute M. Baxter in his place;—that, notwithstanding your reiterated applications, the Emperor has constantly refused to receive this Physician, for whom he has an invincible repugnance. Consider that if you take from him M. O'Meara, without supplying his place by a French or Italian Physician already known, you oblige this Prince to the destitute of all assistance. He is determined on this point. His agony will be the more painful; but the sufferings of the body are temporary; whereas the opprobrium which such ferocious conduct stamps on the character of your nation will be eternal.—I am instructed—1st. To declare that Dr. O'Meara is the only Physician on this rock in whom the patient has any confidence. 2d. To protest against his dismissal with whatever pretext it may be attempted to be coloured, unless it be the consequence of a legal decision.—I have the honour to be, Monsieur le Gouverneur, your very humble and very obedient servant,

"To Governor Lieut.-Col. Sir Hudson Lowe."

Her MAJESTY has experienced so much relief from the united talents of her physicians and Mr. KEATE, as to be able to resume her accustomed exercise in her garden chair, without its producing any recurrence of those spasmodic affections, which have heretofore caused such alarming effects during almost the slightest motion. Every precaution, indeed, is taken to avoid any material alteration of her MAJESTY'S position, in her removal from her chamber to her chair; and the horse is led in the gentlest and most careful manner, so as to make the motion almost imperceptible. Her Majesty's appetite also continues unimpaired; but, notwithstanding all these favourable circumstances, it is not probable that she will speedily be removed from Kew.—Morning paper.

It is generally believed that her MAJESTY has undergone an operation by which the water on her chest has been withdrawn. The attendance of Mr. KEATE, the surgeon, and the relief she has enjoyed, seem to countenance this report; but it is attempted to be kept a secret.—Morning Chronicle.

Sir FRANCIS BORDERT, we are told, with other public spirited individuals, will be present on Tuesday at the dinner at the Horns Tavern, to be given by the Friends of Reform, and of its venerable, consistent, and altogether excellent advocate, Major CARTWRIGHT. Mr. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD is to preside.

On Thursday Mr. Alderman WATMAN held a ward-mote at St. Bride's, when Mr. FIGGINS proposed Mr. R. TAYLOR, the eminent printer, as a proper person to represent the ward in the Common Council. Mr. CLARK was proposed, but stated that he would not persevere on this occasion, but offer himself on the first vacancy. Mr. TAYLOR was then declared duly elected.

HUSSEY'S CONFESSION.—Mr. RUDGE, of Limehouse, has published a statement, together with Hussey's confession, which only differs from what has appeared before in being more minute. It says, that he was the proposer and planner of the robbery, and stood watching opposite the house, while two other men entered and murdered Mr. BIRD and his housekeeper; that they afterwards went into the Park and shared the property; and that on his inquiring four or five days afterwards, he found that they had sailed in their ship to the East Indies.

SOLEMN OFFENDERS.—In our last, we noticed briefly the case of the Rev. Robert Clarke, a man of fortune, and Lecturer at Hexham, who escaped, on a point of law, the full punishment due for having first seduced a simple girl of eighteen, (Eliz. Carr) then abandoned the unhappy creature to her fate, and finally closed his career of profligacy by leaving his unfortunate offspring to be nurtured and provided for by the parish. On the trial, there was something of an attempt to throw a slur on the poor girl's previous conduct, but it totally failed—for the burler of Mrs. SNAFFO, (the lady in whose house the injured creature lived) swore that he had never witnessed anything incorrect in her behaviour.—This vile attempt might certainly have been made by the Reverend Gentleman's Counsel without his concurrence; but when a man of fifty can deliberately betray, and subsequently abandon a poor young creature—quite young enough to be his own child,—leaving also the innocent offspring to its fate, one is rather prone to suspect, that he would not much hesitate at any line of defence, which he might suppose would tend to lessen the odium of his proceedings. In this however he or his Counsel failed; and though the Reverend Gentleman has avoided all the legal penalties of his guilt,—though he may at this very moment be congratulating himself that he has escaped in pocket, yet of this the Lecturer of Hexham may be assured, that while truth and justice and sensibility remain on earth, his falsehood and injustice and brutality will be remembered. He may go and count his pitiful savings,—he may or may not continue to violate in his own person all the decencies and charities of life, while he is lecturing others on their due and careful performance of them,—but the public hatred and contempt must be his inevitable portion, at least till he has attempted all in his power to soften the condition of her who owes her wretchedness to his guilt.—Yet had as this orthodox case is, the reader doubtless remembers even a worse in the same publication,—that of a dissenter named Shipman. We shall not pollute our pages with any further recital of this wretch's hideous proceedings. A verdict, too, was obtained against him, however inadequate—so he will suffer according to law as well as justice.

Last Wednesday Sir WILLIAM GARROW set off from Monmouth for the purpose of holding the Assizes at Gloucester, but was not able to reach that place before twelve o'clock at night. It was suggested that it might be illegal to open the Commission on Thursday instead of Wednesday, the day specified, but as Sir WILLIAM did not at first consider it of much consequence, it was opened; and on Thursday morning the Juries were sworn in and other proceedings commenced. Mr. Justice HORNBY, however, arrived about three o'clock, when a consultation was held, and it was then determined that it would be very dangerous to proceed with the trials. The Court was therefore adjourned until Saturday, and the Under-Sheriff went off express to the Lord Chancellor, in order to learn when the Assizes might be legally held, or whether it was necessary that a new commission should be made out. This delay has caused great confusion at Gloucester; the witnesses were lamenting their loss of time, and lawyers and their clients were seen running about in all directions. It is not known how long this state of things will last, as the Lord Chancellor may think it necessary to summon the Privy Council together.

On Monday afternoon, the remains of Miss POPE, of theatrical celebrity, were removed from Brompton for interment in the vault of St. Martin's church. The carriage of Dr. ASKE and two others followed the mourning coaches. No funeral pomp attracted the notice of those who in her life-time were charmed with her captivating talents.

It is stated in an American paper, that a ship of about 375 tons was ready to be launched from one of their ship-yards, which is actually to be fitted up with a steam engine and apparatus, as a steam packet ship for crossing the Atlantic.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 332.

THE LATE MISS POPE.

Neither these dangers, nor the earliest as well as greatest praise that an actress could receive, have had any effect on the steady, unassuming, and unaffected genius of Miss POPE, of whom CHURCHILL, in the ancient character of poet and prophet united, and in the midst of the most gallant satire upon others, spoke his perfect approbation.

With all the native vigour of sixteen,
Among the merry group conspicuous seen,
See lively POPE advance in jig and trip,
Corinna, Cherry, Honeycomb, and Snip.
Not without art, but yet to nature true,
She charms the town with humour just, yet new.
Cheer'd by her promise, we the less deplore
The fatal time when CLIVE shall be no more.

ROSCIAU.

This anticipation of Miss POPE's resemblance to Mrs. CLIVE, who excelled in hoydens and romps as well as intriguing chambermaids, does not seem to have been perfectly justified in the former character; but in the latter we ourselves can witness to that lively nature which seems determined to survive her very powers, and the picture of Mrs. CLIVE's genius, if not of her characters, might still be drawn for Miss POPE:—

In spite of outward blemishes she shone
For humour fam'd and humour all her own.
Easy, as if at home, the stage she trod,
Nor sought the critic's praise nor fear'd his rod.
Original in spirit and in ease
* She pleas'd by hiding all attempts to please.

It has not been my fortune to see Miss POPE in her former days and characters, but if her humour is still so powerful, when her powers of voice and of action have become so weak, it is easy to imagine her former excellence. Her genius however is of a very lasting nature for it does not depend upon bodily exertion. The stage, as CHURCHILL says with respect to Mrs. CLIVE, appears to be her own room: she never indulges in that excess of action which is intended to supply the want of active countenance, and which would be so astounding to Englishmen in real life; she never talks to the audience, she does not exhibit all she can when her character will not warrant the display, and with the same judgment she never affects what she cannot do. One of her great beauties is a most judicious emphasis of speech that unites the qualities of reading and of talking; for it has all the strength of the one tempered by the familiarity of the other. Her general style of acting indeed may be termed emphatic, not because like Mrs. DAVENPORT, who is a very sensible actress in other respects, she digs, as it were, into particular words with her voice and her action, but because she relieves with much art the uniform temperance of her manner by that variety of tone which appears the natural result of a person's obedience to feelings without any attempt either to repress or to elevate them. This is peculiarly observable in her performance of Mrs. Candour in the School for Scandal, in which her affected sentiments are so minutely hidden by the natural turns of her voice, that it is no wonder her scandal carries perfect conviction to every body around her. Her humour is perfectly adapted to this affection of truth, for it is of that dry sort which a person of little judgment might mistake for seriousness, and it is so perfectly equalized with her immediate feelings, that in scenes of cool contemptuous defiance or of anger affecting coolness, as in the character of Lady Courtland in the School for Friends, she never passes those limits at which the actor's adherence to his author ends, and his mere wish to please the audience commences.

In parts of mere farce, like that of stupid Audrey in As You Like It, Miss POPE must yield, I think, to Mrs. MATROCKS, but in true comic humour and in temperate unaffected nature she yields to no actress on the stage, and it is a very considerable praise to her judgment and her general manners that in the present rare gentility of the stage she is the only natural performer of the old gentlewoman. With features neither naturally good nor flexible, she manages a surprising variety of expression, and with a voice originally harsh and now enfeebled by age, her variety of tone is still more surprising. None of her deficiencies in short are acquired, and she contrives that they shall injure none of her excellencies. With perpetual applause to flatter her and a long favouritism to secure her, she has no bad habits; and when even the best of our actors are considered, it is astonishing how much praise is contained in that single truth.—Critical Essays on the Performers of the London Theatres.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—In the Court of Chancery yesterday, the LORD CHANCELLOR, on coming into Court, proceeded to give judgment. He said that it came before him by a motion for the injunction being dissolved which he had, on an ex parte statement, granted last Saturday. When he granted that injunction, he did it on the condition of immediate notice being given to the defendants, because he had very considerable doubts whether he ought to have granted it or not; but he wished these doubts to be removed, not by any opinion of his own, but by a cool and dispassionate discussion at the Bar. The Bill went into a long detail of the two Acts of Parliament passed in 1810 and 1812, and it also described the various dealings of the defendants. It would therefore be necessary for him to read these Acts now, and to make some observations on them. (Here his Lordship at great length went over the different clauses of the Acts.) The result of the whole was, that by the first Act the Proprietors were constituted a corporate body, and had powers vested in them, which the Legislature gave them very particular directions how to discharge. He might lay it down as a principle of law, that while the powers vested in select parts of a Corporation could be exercised by the select parts of that Corporation, it was impossible for him to say that a body of men could assume powers which were not given them by the Act of the Legislature. The general assembly of proprietors in this case might give advice; at least they might appoint a Select Committee to give such advice, but that Committee had no power to dictate to the General or Sub-Committee what they ought to do. If it was true, as was alleged, that the General Committee was not a valid one, and that the Sub-Committee was in the same state, by not acting agreeably to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, then the question before him was, whether the Corporation could any longer exercise their powers, and he must judge of that as he would do in the laws made relative to corporate bodies. The question, however, might as well be avoided, for the benefit of all parties.—It would perhaps be as well for him not to go into the affidavits at all: yet he felt very much that this speculation was going on at an immense hazard. Of this he was very deeply convinced, but how was it possible for him to interfere in a case where the powers of the Committee were settled by Act of Parliament? He had given the case his most serious attention, and after weighing all the circumstances in his mind, he was decidedly of opinion, that he could not support this injunction, on account of the absence of parties; this was not the only reason, for he also was convinced that no case whatever had been made out to justify him in continuing the injunction.—The injunction was accordingly dissolved.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 4.—MR. SERGEANT BEST.

"Quick wits be commonly apt to take, unapt to keep: more quick to enter speedily, than able to pierce far; even like over-sharp tools whose edges be very soon turned."

Roger Ascham's Schoolmaster.

WHEN we reflect upon the many qualifications necessary for a perfect Advocate, according to the mode in which law is now administered in this country;—when we remember that he must possess much more than the great pattern of eloquence required in an orator;—that he ought to be gifted not only with extraordinary powers of language—with great learning general and particular, but also with discretion and a peculiar quickness, acumen, and cunning, apparently inconsistent with his higher and nobler faculties, it makes us despair of ever beholding at our Bar an individual so endowed. Experience too shews, that such despair is not ill-founded; for most of the qualifications above enumerated are rare even in their separate excellence, and few have ever figured in the profession who have enjoyed more than two or three in combination. To go no further back than the memory of some of our younger legal aspirants—MINGAY was shrewd and forcible, but vain and ignorant; ERSKINE was eloquent and energetic, but wanted much legal knowledge and a little legal cunning; GARROW had quickness and cunning beyond any of his rivals, but was deficient in the lowest elements of learning; and GRAY, with scholarship, a knowledge of his profession both in its magnitude and in its minuteness, had scarcely a spark of eloquence, and was outwitted by men of half his talents and one-tenth part of his attainments. But as there are in the Law so many different departments, room is found for men of all kinds—the dullest can obtain employment, and the brightest, if he will at first condescend to a few of the tricks of trade, and if he have sufficient firmness, may make occasions for the display of his powers.

The subject of the present criticism is taken from the Court of Common Pleas, with the proceedings of which the public at large is comparatively but little acquainted. The smallness of all our Courts renders it impossible that many visitors should be admitted; and, generally speaking, an opinion is formed of the merits of Advocates from the reports in the newspapers of trials in which they have been concerned: but it is somewhat singular, that while every day a long detail is given of the business of the King's Bench, little or no notice is taken of the Common Pleas. It has surprised many persons, that while in the former the cause-paper is overloaded, so that one Judge is almost incompetent to superintend the decisions; in the latter they are comparatively few, though frequently important. Some have attributed this disparity to a want of confidence in the Judges; but surely this is paying an ill-compliment to the understanding of the Juries. Supposing however this conjecture to a certain extent correct, I feel convinced, that did our public journals pay more attention to the business of the Common Pleas, the actions there tried would very soon be multiplied: Plaintiffs, who do not generally object to publicity, though Defendants may shun it, are unwilling to institute a proceeding in a place where it will probably never be heard of beyond the walls; and they are besides probably little acquainted with the qualifications of the various Counsel, whose practice in London is chiefly confined to that Court. Yet it is an almost undisputed fact, by those whose business it is to attend to the proceedings in Westminster-Hall, that the Advocates in the Common Pleas, as a body, are superior to those of the King's Bench.

In two important particulars the former have a decided advantage over their rivals: the one results from the smaller number of actions they have to try, and the longer time that may consequently be devoted to them; so that a Serjeant has more favourable opportunities of employing his oratorical talents: the other is, that the Judges in the Common Pleas do not exercise quite the same controul over the Serjeants. Perhaps this may result partly from the equality of Brotherhood, which they recognize whenever they make a remark; but it principally arises from other circumstances:—true it is, that one or two of the Judges have endeavoured to assert and maintain an authority equal to that of the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench; but the only one of them who has any pretensions to such a sway is Sir V. GIBBS, who very seldom presides. Mr. Justice DALLAS is too much of a gentleman to engage in the contest; Mr. Justice BURROUGH is too recently elevated to risk it, and Mr. Justice PARK—but he is too properly appreciated to need the assignment of any reason why his influence is not greater either with Attornies or Counsel, whenever he happens to be upon the Bench at Nisi Prius.

But it is time to speak of Mr. Sergeant BEST, who is one of the principal ornaments of this Court, and who enjoys the greatest share of business: I do not hesitate to say, that his qualifications as an Advocate before a Jury (for I confine myself to that) are probably more eminent than those of any other man now practising in Westminster-Hall. In particular points probably several individuals could be named who are his equals, if not his superiors—one in legal knowledge, another in perspicuity, a third in subtlety, but most of these have little or nothing else to recommend them, and either of those qualities alone, or even one or two of them united in the same person, are insufficient. Mr. Sergeant BEST however possesses perspicuity and acuteness, if it do not amount to subtlety, in a very striking degree, and they are combined with several other important requisites noticed in the commencement. In mere legal knowledge, the dry business of the profession, he is unquestionably defective, and to legal learning, if I may use the distinction, he makes no pretension. Let me add however, that of the former he is not by any means ignorant; for constant practice, even without study, must unavoidably have communicated to him some information relative to the forms and machinery of the Law: he has not, like many legal pedants, devoted his whole reading to them; he has left them, and wisely, to mechanical heads competent to nothing else: he has however imperceptibly become familiar with the more useful parts even of this branch: a man like him need not sit down like an ordinary plodder in pleas and demurrers, to hammer things through the substance of his skull; he obtains in such matters what some call an instinctive knowledge, because they are unable to trace how it is acquired.

His general information regarding literature, the arts, and matters of taste, is principally of the same kind, for he does not appear to have been very regularly educated: he has however mixed with the world, (of which indeed a Court of Justice may be considered in some sort an epitome), and, aware probably of his own deficiencies, he seems to have taken pains to supply them; and his knowledge, at least of the superficies of things, is such, and his prudence and ingenuity in turning all he gains to the best account so great, that he seldom or never betrays his ignorance. Yet there are not a few lawyers, who, because he happens not to have trodden in the laborious, tangled, and lower walks of the profession, affect to look upon him as a pretender: when he is successfully addressing a Jury, they will sometimes be heard to mutter with a sneer, that he is vapid or frivolous, by which is to be understood only that they do not possess the eloquence he is displaying, and which they have not generosity enough to acknowledge. At the same time, I am quite ready to allow all that can be fairly said against the solidity of his attainments; all I contend for is, the superiority of his natural powers, improved and almost perfected by habit. Undoubtedly he is one of those "quick wits, apt to take but unapt to keep; more quick to enter speedily than to pierce far," but then I answer that this aptness to take, and this faculty of entering speedily into a subject, is exactly what is most wanted in a Nisi Prius Counsel: heavy learning may sometimes, but will not often be useful, and slowness of perception and comprehension can never be of the slightest advantage to any man in any situation.

From what has been said, it will be gathered that I think highly of the oratorical powers of Mr. Sergeant BEST. I am inclined to believe that few men of late years, (perhaps none since the time of ESKINE) have at times gained more influence not only over the feelings but sometimes even over the understandings of a Jury! His general stile of speaking is extremely energetic and forcible—his heart always seems to be in what he is uttering, and in such a case it seldom happens that he does not carry the hearts of his hearers along with him:—yet notwithstanding his great practice, he is not always fluent; he has been known even to make a dead stand, and has not very unfrequently a hesitation, which proceeds, not from a want of words, but from a superabundance of thoughts: his mind is so full of what he ought to say, that the ordinary channel seems choked, and it runs over and interrupts the regular stream of his utterance. In one view this is a drawback upon his impressiveness; but as it is said that "some men's excellences serve them but as enemies," so his defects sometimes serve him as friends, for this very hesitation begets a strong interest in his favour. Mr. Justice DALLAS, who when at the bar was one of its most elegant and accomplished orators, never began a speech without much of this apparent difficulty of enunciation; in him it was the effect of art, but with Mr. Sergeant BEST it is the effect of nature, and the consequence of zealous impetuosity. His whole stile is unstudied and free from any kind of affectation: when he says any thing well, it is always without effort; and though he very rarely attempts a florid ornamental or even a declamatory manner, he seldom renders it painful by failure or offensive by overstrained exertion. He has not much fancy or imagination, (as the terms are indifferently used) and does not affect to speak as if he had.

His action is like his speaking, easy without carelessness, and varied without pretence: perhaps he uses his right hand too much—or I should rather say, his left hand too little; for he has such an impressive and imposing way of stretching forth his right hand, when he is pathetically endeavouring to work upon the minds of the Jury, that his hearers would much regret to see it restrained. He has besides the advantage of a sharp piercing eye, and an animated countenance capable of great variety of expression. It used to be said of Sir W. GARROW, that he was an actor as well as an advocate—that when silent, he ceased not to address the Jury by the change of his features; to a certain degree, this power is enjoyed and employed by Mr. Sergeant BEST; it is much the same as the bye-play upon the stage, and some counsel, whose leaden visages can express little else but their dullness, call it unfair and ungentlemanly. They forget or never know that an advocate is nothing but an actor, who invents the dialogue of his own part; the plot being supplied him; and they might just as reasonably object to his being eloquent, because they cannot put three sentences together, as to his availing himself of this or any of the other faculties God has bestowed upon him.

In another respect, also, he makes a nearer approach to the excellence of Sir W. GARROW than any other man at the Bar, not excepting Mr. SCARLETT, or Mr. GURNEY, who is ingenious in this way too, and of whom I shall speak hereafter,—I mean the mode in which he worms out the truth and exposes the guilt of a profligate witness:—Mr. Serjeant Best is always ready with expedients which he can vary indefinitely; he proceeds by slow and wily degrees—winds round his purpose—detects first one falsehood, then another, until the witness is confounded in his complicated perjuries, and is at last compelled to free himself by avowing the truth. Sir W. Garrow saw through a designing scoundrel at a glance,—the vicious to him were, as STERNE supposes men in the planet Mercury,—absolutely vitrified; he beheld the darkest and deepest workings of the heart by a perfect intuition; and in this faculty Mr. Serjeant Best is far his inferior, for it is quite independent of acuteness or cunning: he dares not, like Sir W. Garrow, attack a smooth hypocrite point-blank, exposing his falsehood, and certain of success, while by-standers are astonished at his hardihood. This constitutes the chief difference between these two individuals, for in point of shrewdness and ingenuity in putting a question, they may be considered nearly upon a level; but Mr. Serjeant Best is obliged to be more wary, to take more care that he stands upon solid ground, and that by imputing untruth to a witness, he does not make the Jury revolt at his unjust severity.

There is one peculiarity about this Gentleman that deserves remark:—

says the satirist, and it is probably as true of London as of Rome: at least, if causes here do not so frequently owe their origin to women, it very seldom happens, unless it be merely a commercial matter, that a woman has not something to do with them, either as a promoter, a party, or a witness. Now Mr. Serjeant Best, though not young, and though much tormented by the gout, is a man of considerable gallantry, in the ordinary sense of the word: of course, this has reference only to what passes in Court, where he always seems to treat the softer sex with peculiar lenity; if it fall to his lot to examine a pretty girl, on whatever side she is a witness, he can scarcely find in his heart to be the least uncivil to her. Let her evidence be what it may, he appears to look upon her as “a palace for the crowned truth to dwell in,” and he cannot easily be brought to believe, that falsehood may have there taken up her abode. At least this is an error on the right side; great consideration is undoubtedly due to a female in such an unwonted situation, and great delicacy in not unnecessarily insulting her by imputations upon her veracity, can hardly be imputed as a fault to any man. It much too frequently happens, that witnesses of this sex are treated with needless rudeness, if not with wanton coarseness.

This then is the general summary of the merits and defects of Mr. Serjeant Best: he is superficial, both in legal and in general knowledge; but his talents and his prudence enable him to bring his small stock to the best market: he is eloquent in speech, and impressive in action; he is acute, ready, and ingenious: let him be assisted by a junior Counsel, who can answer formal objections, and success is very possible in a bad, but almost certain in a good cause. With his political conduct and opinions I have nothing to do, and I am glad of it.

MORE OF MR. JUSTICE PARK.

“Mr. Justice Park, who presided at the Crown Bar, closed the proceedings on Wednesday afternoon, leaving three causes, viz. the King v. Crapp, the King v. the Mayor of Saltash, and the King v. Swan, to stand over to the next assizes. In the usual disappointment of the parties concerned, who had attended with their witnesses, at a considerable expense; and who will now have to endure all the pain of suspense, until March or April next; when they will be obliged to attend at Launceston, which will greatly increase the expense, being at a greater distance. The assizes for Somerset do not commence until Monday; so that there was no want of time to go through the business at Bodmin. We have heard a cause assigned for his Lordship's abrupt departure, which we can hardly suppose well-founded. It is said, he had engaged to dine with Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, at his seat at Killerton, near Exeter, on Thursday, and that he left Bodmin at 5 o'clock on Wednesday evening, for the purpose of keeping his appointment.”—West Briton, Cornwall paper.

LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY,

Friday, Aug. 7.

PRIVILEGES OF THE JEWS.—BEDFORD CHARITY.

On this day week Sir S. ROMILLY was heard on behalf of certain Jews, of the names of Joseph and Lyon, inhabitant house-keepers of the town of Bedford, who claimed to be admitted to the benefits of the Bedford charity, founded by Edward VI., and subsequently endowed by Sir William Harpur. It consists of a grammar school, a preparatory school, an establishment on the plan of Dr. Bell, and a number of almshouses; and fees and rewards are given on the binding of apprentices, the completion of their articles, and the putting out to service the poor daughters of the inhabitants.

This day the SOLICITOR-GENERAL appeared on behalf of the trustees to resist the application of the petitioners. It was to be remarked, that from the earliest time, down to the Commonwealth, Jews had been always considered by our laws not merely as aliens, but as alien enemies, and perpetual alien enemies, infidels who could derive no benefit from the constitution or establishments of this kingdom. Even as late as the reign of Jac. I. when Calvin's case was decided by the twelve Judges, assisted by the Lord Chancellor, the old illiberal spirit had to a great degree prevailed. It was quite clear, that at the foundation of the charity, Jews were not in the contemplation, either of the King or of the benefactor; and, by the qualifications required for trustees in the subsequent Statutes, it was equally evident, that it was never intended that they should fill that office. A Jew could not be a member of the corporation, nor churchwarden, nor overseer of the poor. For the better regulation of the institution, certain rules were enacted in the statutes; which, as long as they continued in their present shape, expressly excluded all Jews. It appeared, by the affidavits, that no Jew had ever been a trustee of the charity; that one of the petitioners, Joseph, had had come to reside in Bedford 30 years ago, and was the first inhabitant within the memory of man; he had voted only in two instances at the election of trustees, but two of his sons had been admitted into the school, one in the upper and the other in the lower. The establishment was placed under the visitation of the Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford, and it never could have been the design of any persons that such a body should have the superintendence of a school where Jews were educated; there were, besides, several exhibitions of 40*l.* a year, from the upper school to Oxford or Cambridge, of which a Jew could, of course, never take advantage. It was provided that passages should be read every morning and evening, which it would be impossible for Jew children to join in or attend. It had been said that the direction that the Christian and surname of the party should be entered, had no reference to any religious distinction; but he (the Solicitor-General) could not but hold it to be most important, as showing that Christians only were contemplated by the founder, and by those who had endeavoured to carry his purpose more fully into effect. This was confirmed by the fact, that it was required that those who were in the almshouses should attend in some place of public worship on Sunday, for of course a place of Christian worship must be understood. A certain sum was to be given on binding out apprentices, but Jew apprentices could only be bound to Jew masters; and it appeared, that the only two instances of this kind were those where Jew boys had been apprenticed to their own fathers; nor could they on the same account receive the reward due upon good behaviour, when they were out of their time; for how could the Christian master and churchwardens of the parish give the necessary certificate? The trustees did not insist that the advantages of the charity were confined to members of the Established Church; they only drew the line at the broad distinction between infidel and Christian; for a Jew had no more right to claim admission than a Mahometan or any other unbeliever. The law said, that no charity could be established for Jews; and in a Christian institution, it would be singular indeed if Jews could intrude themselves, and so far deprive Christians of what was intended solely for them. The affidavit of Dr. Brereton, head-master of the grammar-school, stated that prayers were read every morning and evening, and that boys who did not attend were liable to expulsion. One son of Joseph was in the upper school, and his presence at prayers, and on Saturday, the Jewish sabbath, was dispensed with. The master of the writing-school swore, that another son of Joseph was instructed in the lower school, where the children are taught to read the Bible and Testament, and to repeat the Church Catechism: the two last the Jew boy had been excused at the request of his father. The master of the National School on Dr. Bell's system deposed, that seven Jewesses had, at various times, been under his care; but only one remained a twelvemonth: they were permitted to read the Bible only. Upon the whole, therefore, it appeared, that though some Jewish children had been admitted, it was done as a matter of favour, and not of right; and the indulgence shown in this respect was to be regretted, as it had led to the unprecedented claim now made by persons on the Lord Chancellor, not merely to decide upon the particular case, but to declare for the future that the Bedford Charity was open as well to Jews as to Christians, to Infidels as to Believers. The petitioners were not merely inhabitants of Bedford, but five Elders of one of the London synagogues who thought fit to put in a claim on the behalf of the whole Jewish nation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR expressed a doubt whether he could take into his view the petition of the five elders, who had at least no immediate or even proximate interest in the result of the discussion.

SIR S. ROMILLY observed, that in a case of charity every person had a right to be a relator to the Attorney-General, and to submit it to his discretion whether the petition should be presented; at all events the five Elders could only be considered as valiant petitioners.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL proceeded. If persons of the Jewish persuasion could intrude themselves into the Bedford Charity, there were many others from which they could not be excluded; and it was obvious, from the appearance of the Elders, before his Lordship, that they considered it in some degree a national question.

MR. PHILLIMORE followed on the same side, dwelling upon the bad example to the rest of the school of allowing Jew boys to sit while the rest were at prayers.

MR. SHADWELL followed. The charity was founded pro institutione et instructione puerorum et juvenum in grammatica literatura et bonis moribus. By bonis moribus was not to be understood the Jewish religion, which would be encouraged if Jews were admitted to the charity, and which was wholly repugnant to the pious spirit of the King by whom the patent had been granted. Lord Coke declared, that a Jew wife, whose husband was converted, while she maintained her old errors, was not entitled to dower, because she would not be converted to Christianity. Molloy held that Jews were entirely in the power of the Crown, which, if it wanted money, might seize not only upon the chattels but upon the lands of Jews; and in the discussion on the naturalization bill, in 1753, it was admitted that Jews could acquire and give no title to real estates. Jews could not be trustees; first, because the Corporation Act stood in their way; and next, because the trustees were required to take an oath, among other things, to keep in repair a statue of Sir W. Harper, the founder. Now it was a strict article in the Jewish faith not to erect any statues; for they were expressly forbidden to make into themselves any graven image, or the likeness of any thing in heaven or earth; neither could they join in prayer with Christians, who had no general form to the Creator, but addressed him through the mediation of the Saviour.

SIR S. ROMILLY replied. The Elders of a London congregation had not unnecessarily interposed by petition, considering the importance of the question, and the inability of the claimants to litigate the matter. It was clear from the affidavits, that up to this dispute Jews as well as Christians had received the benefit of the charity. Their children were educated, were apprenticed, were rewarded, and what the Solicitor-General had conceived impossible, had actually occurred, for a Christian Minister had been found liberal enough to certify as to the good moral character of a Jew; so that the fact was directly against the Solicitor-General, and he (not the clergyman) contended that a man could not be of a good moral character, because he happened to be born a Jew. The fact was against him on another point, for Jew apprentices, in two instances, had been bound to Christians. It had been asserted that the Lord Chancellor would not give effect to any charity for the benefit of Jews: but where was this doctrine laid down? Unquestionably not by Lord Hardwicke, who had only held that an institution for propagating the Jewish religion, in opposition to Christianity, ought not to be countenanced. Hard indeed would be the condition of the Jews, if they were not only debarred from receiving benefit from Christian charities, but were not permitted to erect charities of their own. Mr. Shadwell had contended that they could not hold or transmit landed property—that they were alien enemies; but where did he make this notable discovery? Not in any book of authority could he find the dictum of a single lawyer in his favour, and the practice was proof directly to the contrary. At least the present Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench was not of this opinion, or he would not have been so unwise as to purchase of a Jew his seat at Roehampton. If what was argued were true, not only Lord Ellenborough had no good title, but the Legislature had stultified itself in 1742, for it had declared that any Jew residing in our colonies for seven years, ipso facto entitled himself to all the rights of a natural born subject. The language of Lord Coke, on Calvin's case, had been ridiculed and reprobated almost ever since it was written: his words were these,—“All infidels are perpetui inimici, and Jews are such; the law presumes not that they will be converted, that being a remote possibility: as between the devils, whose subjects they are, and the Christians, there is perpetual hostility, and can be no peace.” The last occasion (until the present) on which it was brought forward as an authority, was in the singular case which involved the question, whether a Mahometan could be a witness in a court of justice; and there Lord Chief Justice Willes observes upon it,—“This notion, though advanced by so great a man, is, I think, contrary not only to the Scriptures, but to common sense and common humanity; and I think even the devils themselves, whose subjects, Lord Coke says, the Jews are, could not act on worse principles. It is a little, mean, narrow notion, to suppose that no one but a Christian can be an honest man. God has implanted in all men true notions of virtue and vice, justice and injustice, though heathens more frequently act contrary to them, because they have not the same motives to induce them to obey them.” It had been urged, that if Jews were admitted, Mahometans ought not to be excluded; and most unquestionably they ought not. The only qualifications of admittance to the school ought to be, infancy and ignorance; and to the alms-houses, age and poverty. Supposing, however, that his Lordship should be of opinion that Jews were not entitled to any of the advantages of education, it would decide nothing as to other parts of the charity which might be open to them. Because they could not enjoy all, it would be strange if they were excluded from every thing. No doubt Edward VI. was zealously attached to Christianity; but on that account was he to confine his benevolence merely to those of his own persuasion? As well might it be said, that a poor Jew, who broke his leg, was not to be conveyed to St. Thomas's hospital, because it was founded by the same monarch. He admitted that at the date of the foundation Jews were probably not in contemplation; but if the argument founded upon this fact were good for any thing, it proved that all sects, excepting the established, ought to be deprived of the benefit, because they were not in the contemplation of the founder, and not in his contemplation because not in existence. It would prove, too, that Jews ought not to receive any advantage from the poor laws; that though they were compelled to fill the offices of churchwardens or overseers, or pay the fine for not doing so, they were never to be relieved. In fact, there was nothing more absurd than to go back to such times for liberal policy; and if Lord Coke were to be cited, they should not stop there, but take his originals, Bracton, Fleta, and Glanville, one of whom had declared it death for a Christian to marry a Jew. By the same argument, Jews ought to be stripped of the benefit of Clergy, notwithstanding the statue of Queen Anne. A Learned Gentleman had contended that the Jews could not be received into the school, because the trustees of Jews could not take the oath to keep the founder's statue in repair: this argument, derived from the second Commandment, was too ludicrous to merit any answer; in truth, it answered itself, for the Ten Commandments were not to be obeyed by Jews only, but by Christians; and if it were unlawful to set up any graven image, it was as unlawful for the one as the other: the meaning, however, was obviously, that we were not to set up such an image, and then to fall down and worship it. Next it was urged, that if Jews were in the alms-houses, they could not, as required, attend a place of divine worship on Sundays—Why not? The Synagogue was a place of divine worship, and, by law, that was open every day in the week, so that the Jews would be able to follow the requisitions of the law. The argument derived from the word Christian and surnames was quite as futile, because if it established anything, it showed that even Anabaptists and Quakers must be shut out, because they had no Christian names. If the word had been baptismal name, it would have clearly shown that the founder intended to be very strict in his construction; but as it was, the word Christian name was only used for the prænomens, the first name as distinguished from that of the family. Those who were for taking the words of the patent in the most precise sense, should recollect that if it were done for one purpose it must be done for all; and then what would they say to that passage which stated, that the charity was established that the "children of all the inhabitants of Bedford might be educated?" The question was certainly one of high importance; the mode in which it had been argued on the other side made it so, and while they disclaimed all illiberality, they insisted that the Jews were a marked and peculiar people who can have no rights and no possessions—who are aliens born, and must aliens die, and whose chattels and lands the Crown may seize and appropriate to its own purposes whenever he things fit once more to expel them.

The LORD CHANCELLOR postponed judgment.

Wednesday, Aug 12.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, observing several gentlemen in attendance who were interested in the question of the Bedford Charity, said, that he had not yet been able to read, with sufficient attention, the various documents relating to the case, nor did he expect that he should be able to make himself master of their different bearings during the present sitting; probably he should devote some days in the vacation to the subject, and he would take care that all parties had due notice of the time which he should name for giving judgment.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Friday, Aug. 7.

EX PARTE HOLDING, IN RE MARSON, A BANKRUPT.

Mr. WAKEFIELD stated, that his client, Mr. Holding (a flour-factor), was one of the bankrupt's creditors, and was asked that the commission might be superseded on the ground of the act of bankruptcy being fraudulent and collusive. From the affidavits, which were very long and numerous, it appeared that the bankrupt was a baker, at Knightsbridge, and in collusion with one James Stanbrough, a miller, and David Shuter, an attorney, on the 2d of April last, planned and concerted the act of bankruptcy in the office of the latter, who, on the next day, issued the commission, and that on account of some obstinacy in the bankrupt he was now confined in Newgate.

Mr. BELL argued in support of the commission.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR declared that the bankruptcy was a gross fraud, and that he must therefore direct a supersedeas as prayed. His Honour deprecated the conduct of the parties in first concerting a fraud with the bankrupt, and afterwards, the moment he displeased them, getting him committed to Newgate.

Mr. BELL then stated, that an affidavit of Mr. Holding, the petitioner, and Mr. Henry Williams, his solicitor, had been filed so late, that he must pray his Honour to defer his final decision until the next petition-day; to which after much argument on both sides, his Honour consented.—This case seemed to excite a considerable degree of interest.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

We mentioned a little while ago the application of Mr. Hall, a gentleman in the law, and several of his friends, who complained of a violent assault upon their persons, by Lord Ranelagh and five of his servants, armed with a double-barrelled gun, Indian clubs, and a pitchfork, at the time when they had taken shelter from a storm, under a tree, near his premises at Fulham. Proceedings had in the interval been stayed, and a written application had been made by Mr. Hall and his friends, for a satisfaction for his Lordship's and servants' conduct; but no answer was returned by Lord Ranelagh, who applied to Sir N. CONANT upon the charge that had been exhibited against him and his five servants, saying, that if any charge was regularly made against him and his servants, he and they would attend to answer it. Warrants were accordingly applied for on Tuesday to apprehend his Lordship and his servants; and Mr. Hall was informed by Mr. Birnie, that his Lordship and his servants would attend on a future day.

Lord Ranelagh had promised to appear with his five servants, whenever the Magistrate should direct; the Magistrate appointed 12 o'clock on Friday, but neither his Lordship nor any of his servants were present. Mr. Wallace Hall, the gentleman who complained against him, appeared with his father, a respectable Clergyman, and several friends, and expressed his determination to indict his Lordship at the ensuing Middlesex Sessions.

About two o'clock on Monday morning a fire broke out at the Duke of York public-house in Ratcliffe Highway. The landlord and his family had gone to Margate, leaving the house in the care of a young man. The flames burst forth in the cellar, and from the quantity of spirits deposited there, quickly became so intense and powerful as to mock all efforts to extinguish them. In half an hour from the commencement the public-house was totally destroyed; and the flames communicating to the premises on each side, two more houses were burnt to the ground. At the back of the Duke of York is a narrow street, consisting of houses built chiefly of wood, and inhabited by poor people. The flames having communicated to those houses, a wide scene of misery ensued. Their inmates, half naked, rushed forth to escape the fury of the destructive element, leaving their little all a prey to the flames. In one group was seen a parent, calling with distraction in her looks for a child she supposed lost; and in another, children loudly calling upon their mothers; nor did the affecting scene end with the dawn of day, which only showed the inhabitants the extent of their losses. Ten or twelve of the small wooden houses were consumed.

A few months ago, the body of a young woman was discovered in the water near Barming, in Kent, with remarks of violence, which seemed to indicate that she had been murdered. Nothing, however, transpired which could tend to fix the guilt on any individual; and all further inquiry into the circumstances had ceased, when on Monday, a young man at Maidstone declared himself to be the murderer. He said, that ever since the execution of Hussey, the horrible thought of his own guilt had rendered his life a burden to him; that he could find no rest night or day; and that he had, at last, come to a resolution to deliver himself up to the hands of justice.—Daily paper.

SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE SPANISH PATRIOTS.

"Date obolum Belisario."

We see by the Chronicle that somebody has proposed a measure to this effect, that he has set the example by a subscription of ten pounds, and that a house in London has agreed to receive the others. The proceeding does him great honour. Next to those of our own countrymen, whom wars and exactions had reduced to a state of starvation, no set of human beings could have a greater demand on our sympathy than these infamously treated men. The poor Englishman who is burnt out of house and home, has still a country about him to receive and relieve him:—the Spanish patriot is made an alien to his country. The poor Englishman, who suffers distress in the bosom of his family, still suffers it in that bosom, and may give and take the solace of a smiling effort;—the Spanish patriot has to think what his family may be suffering for him or for themselves, and is unable to be among them. Let him be afflicted as he may, he must bear it with all the maddening additions of distance and of the impossibility of leaping over it; let him yearn never so much for "the old familiar faces," they cannot be near him; let him attempt as he may to be silent in his squalid distress, his native dignity must give way to its demands; let him endeavour to talk of them even with delicacy and to make them rather felt than explained, he must at last press a sense of them upon strangers to his language; let him hear of his friends imprisoned or killed, he cannot get to them; let him be calumniated by the servile, the ungrateful, or those conscious unhappy men who envy him his nobler sorrows, and he cannot defend himself; he cannot be defended; he cannot shew a present and unequivocal scorn;—let him be sick, let him be on his death-bed, let him linger in worse vitality with all his fibres out of tune, his blood jaundiced, and impossible thoughts pressing upon his brain till he bursts out all over into moist agony, and if he lets a groan for his family escape him, it wastes itself consciously in the ineffectual distance. He must not even drink their tears.

And good God! who are the men that are liable to these dreadful sufferings? Let the ears of the triumphant hear, and tingle with blushes. These are the very men who wrote, suffered, fought and bled, to save the—what shall we call him?—who has made them beggars and fugitives. They engaged to endure any extremities rather than not see their countrymen be their own rulers and reformers, instead of accepting the suspicious improvements of the French. They let FERDINAND know as much in the foreign land into which he himself had been betrayed, partly by his own wretched fears and servility. He flattered himself he felt a generous emotion, especially as his interest encouraged it; and he agreed, for this hazardous patriotism, to act up to their reasonable and truly loyal notions in government; they therefore went on straining every faculty for him, bodily and mental; they took on them in his absence the cares of government, careful indeed at that time; they united his cause with all that was liberal in politics; they battled with factions, they raised monies, they spent their own; they tried every way to get him out of captivity; they had Englishmen for their allies, whose old books on public virtue and liberty they had latterly been led to think they might read and admire; they conquered by the help of these sentiments and these allies; and then the creature for whom they bled and conquered, and whom they had paid the compliment of supposing capable of sincerity and gratitude, stung them for the salvation they had afforded him. He,—he, the late timid, servile, and all-promising captive,—got angry and pretended to be high and lofty because they considered him as bound by his kingly word;—he kept those in foreign land who had fled in time, killed others, imprisoned others, made exiles and beggars of the rest, and sent grand ambassadors to their late allies, to give grand dinners and receive compliments as if nothing had happened. O free spirits of our ancestors,—O true Englishmen indeed, who handed down to us your writings and your achievements, and were the original fountains of the blood whose very lees put out the sprightly French fire at Waterloo,—how little did ye dream of the hypocritical and ungrateful uses to which your influences would come!

After all too, who was this FERDINAND? He was and is the son of a living king. He reigned and still reigns only upon the recognition of a popular principle. He reigned only upon the supposition that he would put an end to abuses, which his father was too old and too much in trammels to do. He did not put an end to them; and if the aged exile (for his own father is among his exiles) were to demand the throne, we do not see what is to hinder him from having it, except that there is little choice perhaps betwixt the two. It would long since indeed have ceased to be a doubt whether he ought to continue to reign, even with his legitimate brethren, if in trying to avoid one set of scandals they would not risk tumbling upon another, and remind the world of more histories of princely relationships. His own character is known well enough to save us the annoyance of dwelling upon it. He was quite as time-serving to BONAPARTE as his father, and would gladly have married one of his sisters,—a piece of involuntary good taste, which he lost of course with the necessity for it. During his captivity, he signed papers giving away a throne which he had no right to alienate, and made secret promises of its reformation to the gallant men in whose behalf he has now compelled us to address foreigners and heretics. When he returned from that captivity, the first thing we heard of him, in a panegyric from the pulpit, was his having adorned it by embroidering petticoats for the Virgin Mary. The next was his persecutions of the men that had saved him.—What a state of things that can force us to talk of two such different descriptions of men together, and that shews the one in possession of power and the other trampled upon! It is like an incoherent dream, made up of the shocking and ludicrous,—gallant men driven by a storm from about a throne, the mist rolling asunder, and a feeble animal discovered grinning upon it in a human dress.

Let the reader, who really admires what every body pretends to admire, the Revolution of 1688; suppose King WILLIAM driven awhile from his throne, restored by the exertions of those who first called him to it, and then proscribing these very men and reducing some of them to beg their very bread in exile; and he will have but a faint idea of the claims which the Spanish Patriots have upon FERDINAND and of the treatment they have received. The comparison is as feeble; as FERDINAND is inferior to WILLIAM. Let him suppose (to bring the similitude closer to our own times) that the PRINCE REGENT had been ousted from the throne of these realms by BONAPARTE, that the real lovers of the Constitution, stipulating for its reform, had triumphantly fought for him, ousted the French, and brought him back from a French Brighton; and then let them suppose him forgetting all his promises immediately, entrenching himself with the old courtiers and borough-mongers, most of whom had turned against him, and sending his preservers into dungeons, exiles, and graves; let them suppose such men as the venerable BENTHAM shut up in solitary imprisonment, such men as Lord HOLLAND, ROMILLY, and HENRY BENNET, driven to seek a charitable asylum in America, and such men as CARTWRIGHT, FERGUSON, and WILSON, hung in their uniforms on a gallows, and he will have a truer idea of what a JOVELLANOS, an ARGUELLES, and a MISA, have actually suffered. We say no more at present. What an Englishman, such as he ought to be, gives to a Spaniard, such as these are, he does not give; but pays; and we think we cannot tell either party a more welcome truth.

PUBLIC OPINION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR—Amid all the eulogiums on the stability and purity of our glorious Constitution, which are daily poured forth by the borough-mongering press, they never advert to its greatest excellence, which I take to be its capability of yielding to public opinion. They are either blind themselves, or they wish to keep others so, to the radical though silent change which public opinion has effected. That all-powerful and ever acting engine, although it has produced no ostensible change in the form, has made a dreadful inroad into the practice of the Constitution.

The great diffusion of knowledge, and the example of the American United States, have created in the middle ranks of society a great longing for a share of political power, and a great predilection for that part of our Constitution, which is understood to be the representative of the people. This state of opinion has gradually produced the effect of throwing the whole political power of the State into the hands of the House of Commons; and it has been with great fairness urged by the advocates of the privileged orders, in vindication of the interference of Peers in elections, that if they were not represented in the House of Commons, their power and privileges would soon cease to exist.

The friends of liberty have, as I take it, been very unreasonably dissatisfied with the present state of things. What can be more favourable to the cause of liberty, than that all ranks and orders of the State should delegate Members to one representative assembly, in which the whole political power of the State should be vested: only do not let the people be any longer humbugged by supposing the whole of that assembly to consist of their representatives.

In fact, their representatives do not constitute a fourth part of it. There are three other orders in the State, each of whom has probably as many representatives in the great assembly, the Crown, the Peers, and the Borough-mongers who are not Peers.

Let the people have a correct list of their own representatives. On any question affecting popular rights, let them know the conduct of their representatives. When the public prints state the divisions on each question before the House, let them not trouble themselves with the names of the other orders, but state generally so many representatives of the Crown, so many of Peers, so many of Borough-mongers, but give each name of the popular representatives, whether present or absent.

This will tend to create a mutual confidence between the people and their real representatives, and the expression of the public opinion through them will be irresistible.

Hoping that you will favour the public with your sentiments on this subject, I am, Sir, your constant reader,

BONAPARTE.

LETTER FROM COUNT BERTRAND TO SIR HUDSON LOWE, ON THE REMOVAL OF DR. O'MEARA.

Longwood, April 24.

TO THE GOVERNOR.

SIR,—When on the 12th April I was informed by Dr. O'Meara that he should discontinue the exercise of his functions as physician to the Emperor Napoleon, I hastened to send a message to Major Gorrequer, begging him to favour me with a call, having some communications to make to him of the very highest importance.

I told this officer that I had intended to apprise him of our great regret at Balacombe's house being deprived of supplying the provisions; that the journey of the principal of that house to London could not be a reason for depriving him of his business, since the service had always been performed by his partners, Messrs. Fowler and Cole, and Mr. Balacombe had never directly interfered therewith: but that the communication I had just received from Dr. O'Meara was vastly more important, and that the Emperor could not rest a single day without the aid of Dr. O'Meara.

The next day, the 13th, I had the honour to write to you to the same effect. I had hoped to have an answer in the course even of that day; but this is the 24th, and I am still without any reply. Thus, for 12 days, has the Emperor been deprived of all medical assistance. In the month of October he was 15 days without seeing Dr. O'Meara, at the time you assumed the astonishing right of imposing upon him the obligation to issue his bulletins only under your dictation, without their being first submitted to the Emperor, or the original being left in his hands. Then, however, his disorder was in its infancy, now it has made some considerable progress. Count Montholon, who lodges in the same part of the building as the Emperor, informs me, that on the 18th, and to-day, the 24th, he was awakened at 2 o'clock in the morning by the Emperor's valet-de-chambre, and remained at that Prince's bedside from 2 o'clock in the morning till 5, witnessing the sufferings he endured, and utterly unable to alleviate them. Your restrictions upon Longwood, of the 10th of April, have thus already had the saddest effect.

I beg, therefore, to repeat my request, that you would restore Dr. O'Meara to the exercise of his functions, and discontinue to annoy him, and make him feel the effects of such ill treatment, by removing the restrictions you, so contrary to what have been in force for three years, have imposed upon him by your letter of the 10th April, to which he neither will nor can submit, without dishonouring himself.

In short, Sir, whatever reasons you may be able to allege, reflect upon the consequences of continuing things in their present state, and of depriving the Emperor of the physician of his choice, without having substituted another, conformable to my letter of the 13th of April. If you still persist in this line of conduct, this arbitrary act will be duly appreciated by Europe, by your own country, and even by your Ministers.—I have the honour to be, &c.

COUNT BERTRAND.

To Lieut.-General Sir Hudson Lowe.

[The Morning Chronicle has published more of the correspondence between Mr. O'Meara and Sir H. Lowe. The facts we collect from it are these:—That Mr. O'Meara on accepting the situation of surgeon to Napoleon, refused to receive any recompence for his services, in order that he might preserve the privileges of a British officer. But when it was attempted to place him in the same situation as the French there, by forbidding him to leave Longwood without the Governor's permission, when he was desired to report conversations between the Emperor and himself, and to act as a sort of spy upon him, he gave in his resignation.]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, AUG. 15.—Yesterday, at 40 minutes after one o'clock, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Orleans was delivered at the chateau of Neuilly of a Prince, a third son, who will be called Francois-Ferdinand-Philippe-Louis-Marie, Prince de Joinville.

AUG. 17.—It is asserted that the opening of the Congress at Aix-la-chapelle is deferred, and definitively fixed for the 27th of September next. It is conjectured that the Sovereigns who will assemble in that town will remain there two or three months.

BOULOGNE, AUG. 17.—Lord Cochrane embarked on Saturday morning on board a fine new frigate, which arrived the preceding day from England. He certainly goes to South America—they say Lima.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, AUG. 13.—A very severe ordinance has just been issued at Milan, relative to the press. The following are the principal articles:—No book can appear without the permission of the Censure; even catalogues must be examined; a special commission must be obtained to reprint books already published in the Austrian Monarchy. Dedications cannot be admitted to the Censure unless they are provided with the authorization of the persons to whom the books are dedicated. No subject of his Majesty the Emperor and King can have a book printed in a foreign country, without having submitted it to the Austrian Censure.

SPAIN.

IRUN, JULY 27.—It is confidently asserted that one of our most celebrated diplomatists, accompanied by a pretty numerous suite, is to proceed immediately to the Congress of Sovereigns, which is going to assemble at Aix-la-Chapelle. The choice the King has made to fill this important mission is not yet publicly known, but every thing leads us to believe that it will be confided to one of his Majesty's Ministers. Spain has great interests to treat of at this moment, and she is resolved to demand, with energy, the mediation of some of the great Powers. On one side, the United States of America have taken an attitude so horrible with respect to her, that one cannot yet foresee the issue of the differences with that power; they are such, that we are assured our Envoy has been recalled.

MADRID, AUG. 5.—The expedition for America, which sailed from Cadiz on the 20th May last, under convoy of the frigate La Marie Isabelle, was obliged to put into St. Croix, at Teneriffe, to water, their supply being all expended, and to take out some troops which were on board a ship in a leaky state. They again departed on the 7th June for their destination. The news of their arrival is daily expected.

EAST INDIES.

Letters and papers have arrived from India, to a date much more recent than that of any former intelligence. The most interesting portion of the news respects the operations against the Peishwa's remaining force, under the Generals Smith and Pritzer, who alone continue in the field. In all parts of India but towards the south-east, the war was at an end, and the armies had retired. The general orders of the Marquis of Hastings are dated February 21, when his Lordship took leave of the several divisions, and warmly thanked the officers who had commanded them. The Pindarrees were utterly annihilated as a power, and many of their Chiefs had accepted lands from the British Government, as their only means of subsistence. The army of Sir Thomas Hislop was to break up on the 31st of March.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

LANCASTER, AUG. 17.—Joseph Doyle, aged 44, was charged with maliciously cutting and stabbing John Smith, with intent to murder, or to do some bodily harm.

John Smith was acquainted with the prisoner two years. The prisoner kept a public-house in Thomas-street, Liverpool. Witness lodged with him for five months; the prisoner had been all that time in the borough gaol, for debt, except the last two or three weeks. He had never had any quarrel with him. In the room in which he slept there were two beds; Mrs. Doyle's father and he slept in one of them—Mrs. Doyle and the children in the other. On the 14th of July he went to bed between nine and ten o'clock. Mrs. Doyle's father did not sleep with him that night. He awoke by a noise at the door, which was locked, and he saw the prisoner taking hold of his wife. She shouted "Murder!" He got up and caught him round the neck, and said, "Are you going to murder your wife?" Prisoner then struck her three times, and she fell. He told her to get up and to get a light. Prisoner turned round to follow her down stairs. Witness put his hand gently to his breast to prevent him from following her. Prisoner came forward, and hit him twice, and the witness felt the blood gushing. Witness struck him, and put him on his knees. The prisoner got up, pulled witness's shirt over his head, and gave him three stabs on the naked side. A watchman came and secured the prisoner. He was not in bed with the woman. The prisoner was jealous of her with another man.

Evidence was called to prove these facts, and the knife was produced. It was a large clasp knife and encrusted with blood. The prisoner was seen to throw it away.

In his defence, the prisoner said that he found his wife and Smith in bed together, and would have run them both through, if he had had a bayonet. He called no witnesses.

Mr. Baron Wood explained the act under which this prosecution was brought. If it would have been murder had death ensued, then this was a capital offence; if it would have been only manslaughter, then they must acquit the prisoner. He was of opinion that most undoubtedly death in this case would only have been manslaughter. Adultery was laid down in the books as that kind of provocation which made killing manslaughter, and of the most justifiable kind. If they did not believe the prisoner's story, yet Smith himself admitted that he had first struck the prisoner, and that the door had been locked.—Not Guilty.

COMBERLAND.—On entering the Court on Saturday week, Mr. Justice BAYLEY made some observations on the weight of business which was to come before the Court. He understood that much dissatisfaction existed respecting the shortness of time allowed for the present Assizes. When the Judges met together, and arranged the Circuits, it was thought that recent events (the Election) in this and a neighbouring county would much reduce the business. This supposition was ill founded as it respected Cumberland; and he was anxious to do all in his power to remedy the defect. He was willing to sit in Carlisle, and try the Civil causes, while Baron Wood proceeded to Appleby alone, and executed the Commission there, if this course should prove agreeable to Counsel; or he would return to Carlisle, after the business at Lancaster had closed.

Several gentlemen of the Bar said, that returning from Lancaster to Carlisle was out of the question—they could do no such thing—and they hoped that the business would be gone through by Wednesday evening.

Mr. Baron Wood finished the business of the Crown Court on Monday night, and sentenced the prisoners on Tuesday morning. He occupied the remainder of the day in trying Nisi Prius causes, sent from the other Court. On Wednesday morning he set off for Appleby, where he opened the Commission in the evening.

Wednesday evening, at the rising of Mr. Justice BAYLEY, there still remained some Special Jury causes for trial. The leading Counsel declared that they would not remain, their presence being required at Appleby; and on Thursday morning, when the Court was opened, the Counsel did not attend. Mr. Justice Bayley therefore left Carlisle for Appleby.

A great number of witnesses had been waiting in the town from the commencement of the assizes, at an enormous expense, independent of the inconvenience and cost of prolonging the litigation. Fifty-six causes were entered for trial, seven of which were Special Jury causes; and two of these are removed to Lancaster. A meeting of solicitors took place at the Bush-inn, at which it was agreed that a deputation should wait upon the Grand Jury, to express to them their opinion, that the assizes ought to be held in this county twice a year. The Grand Jury unanimously came to a resolution in favour of a Spring assize. The Grand Juries of Northumberland and Durham, at the assizes held in those counties, came to similar resolutions.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, AUGUST 23.

THERE is little news from Paris this week. A number of half-pay Officers have repaired thither, and the consequence is that the Minister at War has written to the Commanders of Military Divisions, directing that except in very urgent cases, leave to this effect is not to be granted, nor the order to be transgressed on penalty of forfeiting the half-pay. "A brain fertile of conspiracies and plots," says the Courier, "might invent a very charming one out of this circumstance, especially if it happened to remember, that just before the escape of BONAPARTE from Elba, a precisely similar occurrence took place."—Nor we do not know what brains fertile in plots may think; but it seems that the unfertile brains of the Courier think there may be something in the matter, to say nothing of the more fertile brains of the Minister at War. The approaching departure of the Allied Troops (if they do depart) must naturally cause strong sensations in all parties.

The disputes between Spain and Portugal, it is now said, are to be settled by the mediation of the Allies; that is to say, the Allies are to tell them that none of the Legitimate can afford to go to war just now, especially FERDINAND the Grateful and JOHN the Immoveable. Money-matters, in fact, would alone be enough to prevent the combat of these two mighty nulligents, particularly on the side of the Spaniard. The Cabinet of Madrid are perplexed to know how to raise money even for the King's expenses. There is a passage in the works of QUEVEDO, which has struck us as curiously applicable not only to the present state of Spanish finance, but to that of finance in other countries, and of a certain island among them. It is as follows; and though somewhat long, the reader will be happy to let the dullness of the modern allied history give way to a piece of ancient wit:—

There is a small island on the coast of Denmark, in which there are five towns. The lord of this place was very poor, rather because he coveted much, than that he wanted for any thing. God had afflicted the inhabitants with a general inclination in them all to be projectors, so that the land seemed to be infested with as many monsters as there were men. All the neighbouring people stunned these islanders as they would the plague, for the very air that came from them was so contagious, it consumed their stocks, blasted their fields, wasted their treasure, and ruined their trade. So prodigious was the natural proneness to projecting in that country, that the very sucking babes, instead of daddy and mammy, cried out nothing but Project. The whole island was a confused chaos, for man and wife, father and son, neighbour and neighbour, were ever jangling and hawling about their projects; and they were as intoxicated with them, as if they had been drunk with wine. The lord of this place (avarice, which is one of the worst devils that distracts the world, having gained the ascendant over him) ordered a general gathering of projects. Legions of projectors assembled before his palace, with scrips and scrolls of paper stuck in their girdles, and run through their button-holes, and peeping out of their pockets. The lord having made known his wants, demanded their assistance, and they all at once laying hold of their papers, and crowding till they had almost sifted one another, in an instant heaped up four tables with their memoirs. The hurry being somewhat over, he began to look over them. The first paper he opened was entitled to this effect, "A project for getting an infinite quantity of silver and gold, without asking it, or taking it from any body." A difficult proposition in my mind, says the lord. The second, "How to gather unmeasurable treasure by taking it from all men, and enriching them by taking it away." The first, quoth the lord, of taking from all men, I like; but as to the second, which is to enrich them by taking it from them, I am dubious, yet let them look to that. The third, "An easy, pleasing, and just project for amassing of many millions, in such manner, that they who are to pay them shall not miss them, but rather think they are bestowed on them." This I approve of, leaving the persuasive part to the projector. The fourth project undertakes to make what is deficient to superabound, without adding any thing, or taking away, and without giving any body cause of complaint. A project so inoffensive can have nothing of truth in it. The fifth, which offers to furnish all that shall be desired, directs to take by fair and foul means, and to ask of all men, and they will give themselves to the devil. This project, having to do with the devil, seemed practicable. The author encouraged by this approbation, added, "And I propose, that those who levy it, shall be a comfort to them who suffer by it." The devil put it into his head to let slip that word, furies possess the projectors, who thunder out reproaches against him, calling him sot and dog, and crying, "Thou scoundrel, hell itself could never have proposed a comfort in tax-gatherers, they themselves being the greatest of grievances."

We are anxious to hear accounts from the American Government, and explanations of the affairs of Ambrister and Florida. If it is in the wrong, and has condescended to the vulgar ambition, passions, and bad example of the monarchical Governments, it is certainly not worse than they; but we hope, and still hope, better things of our independent kinsmen. Political common-place on their parts would be a dreadful thing just now, when the old and the new despotisms are so committing themselves; and would leap for joy at being countenanced by a republic.

The war in India is, it appears, nearly brought to a close, and the exultations of the Government papers show that the issue of it was not at first considered at all certain. The difference between their assertions at the commencement of the war, and their present ones, is remarkable. Then we were told that there was nothing to fear—that the Pindarries were an insignificant set of people, and every trifling advantage was magnified, in order to quiet the apprehensions of the moneyed men, and to keep up the funds. But now the danger is over, they take occasion to praise the skill and prudence of the Governor-General by proclaiming the magnitude of the confederacy against the British power. We have thus added more territory to our present enormous Indian territories; but we have not made them a jot more secure. If ever the English are ejected from India, it will not be by any nation on the borders of our possessions, but by a general rising of the people in those parts, where we have allowed the Native Princes to retain power enough to oppress and extort money from their subjects, in order to satisfy our demands, and support their own luxury, and have reserved the supreme authority in our own hands. It is proved from all experience, that those who hold this sort of intermediate power are always more tyrannical and arbitrary in their conduct to the people under them, than independent princes. To mention only one example,—the insurrection of those South American States, who are now contending for their rights, was owing, in a great measure, to the Viceroys sent out by Old Spain.

The accounts received from Ceylon, state that disturbances had broken out in two other provinces of that island, and that martial law was in consequence proclaimed. Several skirmishes had taken place, and the rebels are allowed to be numerous. Whatever may have been the conduct of the late King there, it is very evident, that his subjects do not choose to have him put down by foreigners; and it certainly was a most bare-faced inconsistency in our Government, when making such a hubbub in Europe about legitimacy. When we recollect that these accounts are official, and that we have for some time known of the insurrection, appearances are very much against us, and we may expect to hear shortly of the total loss of the place. Such a discomfiture would be useful, and might teach the great men in India to be a little more cautious how they outrage the feelings of whole nations.

ADMIRALTY DROITS.—It appears, from accounts of the Droits of the Crown and of the Admiralty, printed by order of the House of Commons, that the sum total received amounts to eight millions six hundred and sixty-six thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds, of which the following extra items have been paid, besides the sums appropriated to the public service:—

To his Majesty's Physicians	£10,679	10	0
To different branches of the Royal Family	209,843	15	9
To Building and Alterations at the Pavilion, Brighton, and for Furniture	58,360	10	1
To Expenses in different departments of the Royal Household, occasioned by the visits of Foreign Princes to England	14,579	2	4
To the Prince Regent's Donation to the Poor of Spitalfields	5,000	0	0
To the Lord Chamberlain and others, on account of Expenses incurred in that department for the Archduke of Austria and the Prince of the Brazils	14,030	18	10

It may be recollected that one of the arguments for keeping up the large Windsor establishment was the great sums of money paid to his Majesty's Physicians, but it now appears that they are partly remunerated in this convenient way. The PRINCE REGENT's munificence, in giving to the poor of Spitalfields what had been obtained by the courage and exertions of another suffering part of the community, is also very remarkable.

YOUNG NAPOLEON, by letters patent from his grandfather, is to be entitled Duke of REICHSSTADT, and to rank immediately after the Princes of the Imperial House.

MANCHESTER COTTON-SPINNERS.—For several weeks past, these people have been out of employment, on account of the refusal of their masters to give them an advance of wages, which they demanded. They have now put forth a statement of their reasons for striking, which are the low price of labour, borne, they say, only on account of the general depression in 1816 and part of 1817, and on the promise of their employers that their wages would be augmented as soon as prosperity returned; which (they go on to say) was the case about ten months back, when the markets would have allowed their masters to fulfil their promise; but some were unwilling, some pleaded their inability, and most, though willing, disliked to begin, and that, after eight months petitioning, they resolved to try some other means. The price of labour is stated by them to have been, in 1816, 24s. a-week, and then to have been reduced 20 or 25 per cent. making it at present about 19s. This is the disputed point, and one that is perhaps rather difficult to clear up. It has been asserted in the Courier that they were paid 31s., a great deal more than the men contend for, who want only a return to the former prices. Now the men would hardly be foolish enough to be crying out for wages which they already obtain, since the fact can surely be ascertained, if the masters choose. This circumstance is therefore in favour of the journeymen, as is also the price they demand, which, considering what they truly bring forward concerning the dreadful unhealthiness of their employment and the length of their working hours, (from five in the morning to seven in the evening, in bad air) is moderate. The chief question seems to be, whether they have or not a right to combine. All combinations are injurious to the public and productive of mischief to the parties; but are not the masters allowed to meet and regulate the wages? Why not then the men, as a mere measure of self defence? Indeed it would be a less evil that the masters should suffer by an increase, than the men by a decrease, of prices; as the former are better able to bear it. It is always dangerous to interfere in these matters, and it is unjust to interfere only against one side.

It is announced by letters received from Manchester on Friday, that one of the master cotton-spinners has yielded to the terms demanded by the journeymen, but that no others have followed his example.

The operation undergone by her MAJESTY is not that which is common in cases of dropsy. Incisions, we understand, have been made in her MAJESTY'S arms, which are treated in a way well-known; and by these she has been relieved.—Morning paper.

According to the accounts in the daily papers, her MAJESTY has been gradually improving in health all the week, but she has not yet quitted Kew.

Drury-lane Theatre seems about to expire of a complication of disorders, the principal of which are, its size and magnificence, which have produced a kind of tympany, that has ended in utter exhaustion.—N.B. 'Too many Doctors and Nurses.—Chester Guardian.

The Sub-Committee of New Drury have determined, it seems at all hazards, to re-open the Theatre for the winter campaign. Mr. STEPHEN KEMBLE is actively preparing his troops to take the field in great dramatic force. The Theatre will be opened on the 7th of next month. Immediately after the injunction had been dissolved by the LORD CHANCELLOR, notices to such effect were sent to the several performers.—Evening Paper.

It is reported that one of the intended arrangements for the ensuing season at Drury-Lane Theatre, is the reduction of the price of admission to the old standard, viz. 5s. to the boxes, &c. The other Theatre will, of course, be obliged to do the same; and the measure will, we doubt not, be advantageous to both.—Evening Paper.

BOROUGH OF ABERDEEN.—The Town Council of this City were dismissed at the last election by the Court of Session, on the ground of their having brought the borough into a state of bankruptcy and ruin; and the PRINCE REGENT was applied to, as there was then no regular magistracy, to decide in what manner the Council should be chosen. Now the usual mode of (what is called) election was, for the old Council to nominate the members of the new one; and a small portion of the inhabitants petitioned the REGENT that that course might be adopted; but the majority wished that they might be chosen by the Burgesses at large, very reasonably desiring to have some controul in the management of their own affairs. The REGENT however thought otherwise, and accordingly, "by and with the advice of the Privy Council," (who were horrified, we suppose, at the mention of Reform), ordered his warrant to be issued to empower the old set to elect their successors! On this subject the Sootsman makes these judicious remarks:—"In whatever point of view this transaction is considered, it appears alike unconstitutional and improper. We do think, that where the inhabitants are nearly unanimous, and where the borough is disfranchised, the Privy Council has the undoubted right, and is bound, when called upon, to make an improvement on the set. But the restoration of the old set, without any amendment whatever, is not the most disgusting feature in this transaction: it is the vesting of the right to elect the new Magistrates, not in the inhabitants at large, but in the remnant of the old junto. This is a proceeding which we conceive violates every principle of constitutional law; and we trust the Burgesses of Aberdeen will bring an action, in which we should think they must succeed, to have it reduced and set aside. This precious remnant, who are thus to be enabled to lord it over their fellow citizens, were no longer magistrates,—they had no political privileges except what they enjoyed in common with every other citizen,—they had been divested of all authority, and were become mere private individuals; and it would have been just as legal, and, we believe, much more acceptable to the inhabitants, had the Privy Council ordered the scavengers to meet and elect the new Magistrates."

We see by an advertisement that the Anniversary Meeting of the National Benevolent Institution will take place next Friday, at the Freemason's Tavern, at which the Duke of Kent will preside. We have before drawn the attention of our readers to this excellent Institution. Its principal object is to afford relief to respectable, though distressed, females in the decline of life, and certainly there is no class of people who need more the assistance of the charitable. At the Meeting, an account will be laid before the subscribers of the progress of the Institution, with some particular cases, and it is intended also to show the good effect of bestowing sums on industrious and unfortunate tradesmen, in order to prevent the ruin of their families.

Some doubts having been expressed as to the truth of the reports of the Discovery Ships not having found a passage to the northward practicable, we can now state, that this is placed beyond a doubt, by a letter from Capt. NAIRN, of the whale-fishing ship Princess of Wales.—Capt. NAIRN writes, of date the 7th ult. that on the 10th of June, in lat. 80. 2. he spoke the Discovery Ships, and was informed, that the highest latitude they had reached was 89. 22.; that he then went on board, and learned, that they could find no passage farther to the northward on the west side of Spitzbergen.—Chronicle.

Our Readers will see that the LORD CHANCELLOR has decided against the Jews, in the main point at least. Our first article next week will consist of observations on this subject.

The Law of Libel has been very triumphantly illustrated, by the pleading of a Sister Journalist in Cornwall. We think the fair pleader should, as the phrase is, be admitted before the Bar, and honoured with a silk gown immediately.—The Judge was legal, the Jury gallant.—Chester Guardian.

MR. KEAN and his fellow-traveller were nearly dashed to atoms on their way to Geneva, by the breaking down of their carriage on the Jura Mountains, about two o'clock in the morning, but they had the good fortune to reach a village about two miles from the spot where the accident took place, and where they obtained a temporary shelter. KEAN was not only magnificently treated in France by TALMA and other Performers, but received a superb snuff-box from the Manager of the Theatre Français.

DR. FRANKLIN recommends, that a person when he is seized with the cramp in swimming, should turn upon his back, and give the limb affected a sudden, vigorous, and violent shock in the air. By attending to this simple direction, the cramp, he says, may be driven away and many lives saved.

FANATICISM.—A German paper mentions, that a horrible murder has been committed by some religious fanatics in the circle of Leissnig, in Saxony. It is said, that an artisan, of the name of Kloos, has lately formed a pretty numerous sect in that part of Germany, who have adopted the belief that they are bound to sacrifice not only brute animals, but human beings, to the Devil. The German paper asserts, that several attempts which had been made to procure victims had failed, but at length a poor man, who was not a member of the sect, has been murdered in the most atrocious manner. The whole country about Leissnig, Colditz, Grimma, Oschatz, &c. is in no little alarm at the extensive ramifications of this sect.

GENUINE ORTHOGRAPHY.—The following is a literal copy of a notice recently given by the clerk in a parish church in Devonshire:—"This is to gee notis, here's narra Sunday here next Sunday; keas why, measter is gwaing to Daalish to preach."

A Paris Paper says, "A Mayor of the Commune of La Vendee is found to be the possessor of a great number of letters and of several manuscripts of VOLTAIRE, which he has received from THIRIOT, one of the most active correspondents of Ferney. Among these manuscripts is a very curious one; it is a dedication, in verse, of the Henriade, addressed to Louis XV."

IMPORTANT RECIPE.—(From an American Paper.)—A man in Oliver-street, New-York, after imprudently drinking cold water, was seized with very alarming symptoms, from which he was relieved by Dr. JOHN DE ALTON WHITE, who dissolved half an ounce of camphor in a gill of brandy; of this, three parts were made and given at intervals of three minutes, which soon gave the patient relief.

A human skeleton, of almost Herculean dimensions, was lately found in a garden belonging to R. HARRISON, Esq., of Hill-house, near Gainford. It is supposed the body has lain there a great number of years, and had, in all probability, been interred naked, as no vestige of a coffin, &c. was remaining. According to a legendary tale, Hill-house was about a century and a half ago a rendezvous of the celebrated Sir W. Brown and his followers, highwaymen of that time.—Durham Advertiser.

A YORKSHIRE BRIEF.—A cause came on before a few Circuits back, at York Assizes, in which the defendant had nothing to say against a verdict in favour of the plaintiff. The Attorney, however, was to be paid, and the Counsel to be feed, but to neither could the full quantum be due without a Brief. A Brief was accordingly drawn and presented to the Counsel, worded as follows:—"We have no defence to this action, but please to abuse the Attorney on the opposite side."

ANECDOTE OF CARDINAL MAZARIN.—The most horrible books were continually written against Cardinal Mazarin. He used to pretend great anger, but cared in reality very little about them. One day he ordered that all the copies that it was possible to find or collect of these odious libels should be brought to him, in order, as he said, "that he might burn them." A great number were accordingly seized, and as soon as he got them into his possession, he with the utmost coolness privately resold them, by which he gained ten thousand crowns! He afterwards laughed heartily. "The French people," he used to say, "are extremely good-natured:—I let them write and sing, and they let me do what I please."

THE NIGHTINGALE IN SCOTLAND!—Ornithologists say, that in this country, the Nightingale never emigrates north of the Trent—but in the memorabilia of the present fine summer, it will be recorded, that two of these much-famed musicians have actually been chanting their verses on the Banks of the Forth!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

LINES.

ON THE DEATH OF M—E DE C—LLI.

WHEN Heaven recalls the Friends it gave—
Through time and trial dear—
Our hopes go with them to the grave,
And all is darkened here.
Yet, sure 'twere better Heaven should part,
Than live by fortune parted;
For Heaven recalls to heal their heart
Whom Earth made broken-hearted.
Then 'tis a wayward grief to weep,
That they have slept the quiet sleep.

And when our friends are far away,
Beside their loss we bear
The painful thought where'er they stray,
Their griefs will haunt them there:
But when the virtuous die, we know
They leave us to be blest;
For we are taught that where they go
The weary are at rest.
Oh, this should make us wish, not weep,
To sleep like them the quiet sleep.

But not for them the tear is rife—
But not for them the woe;
The living weep to find that life
Is worthless when they go!
Yet, who would even this grief gainsay?
'Twere most unfit in me—
For I have mourn'd the fatal day
Thou died'st DE C—LLI!
And many an eye hath cause to weep
That thou hast slept the quiet sleep.

Oh! they who boast few friends below,
May well indeed repine;
Nor be it deem'd presumption, tho'
I say that thou wast mine.
No lukewarm, no lip fervent one,
As many might confess,
Whose welfare blossom'd in the sun
Of thy kind-heartedness.
And they and I have cause to weep
That thou hast slept the quiet sleep.

London, August, 1813.

"A POEM

BY THE LATE WILLIAM COWPER, ESQ.

Not published in his Works."

[The following lines are evidently believed by the Editor of the Chronicle to be authentic, as he has given them for such; neither is there any internal evidence to contradict his assertion. But they are of no value except as coming from the pen of the celebrated and unfortunate author, and adding another testimony to the melancholy effects which Methodism did or was to produce on his over-delicate organization.—Exam.]

Doom'd as I am in solitude to waste:
The present moments, and regret the past;
Depriv'd of ev'ry joy I valu'd most,
My friend torn from me, and my mistress lost;
Call not this gloom I wear, this anxious mien,
The dull effect of humour or of spleen!
Still, still I mourn, with each returning day,
Him snatch'd by fate, in early youth away;
And her, through tedious years of doubt and pain
Fix'd in her choice and faithful—but in vain!—
O prone to play, generous and sincere,
Whose eye ne'er yet retir'd the wretch a tear;
Whose heart the real claim of friendship knows,
Nor thinks a lover's are but fancied woes;
See me, ere yet my destin'd course half done,
Cast forth a wand'r'er on a world unknown!
See me neglected on the world's rude coast,
Each dear companion of my voyage lost!
Nor ask why clouds of sorrow shade my brow,
And ready tears wait only leave to flow!
Why all that soothes a heart from anguish free,
All that delights the happy—palls on me.

CRIMINAL CONFESSIONS.

We intended to have made some remarks on the mischievous consequences of extracting confessions from public delinquents when they are about to forfeit their lives; but this is now unnecessary, as the following article from the Chester Guardian contains our own sentiments on the subject:—

"Possibly the detailed conduct of this man, (Hussey) affords us as good an opportunity as we shall ever find, to protest against a conduct pursued (doubtless with the best intention) towards criminals of this desperate class, on the subject of the confession of their guilt; as also against the practice which Journalists have fallen into, of describing with something too much parade and complacency, the strength of their new found religious feelings. The old brief way of recording that their behaviour became their unhappy situation was, in our opinion, infinitely preferable to the more eloquent detail of modern times. However paradoxical it may appear, the most depraved of mankind are seldom entirely destitute of religious apprehension when the subject can be brought home to their minds; but we know no better way to keep them easy on that head, than the prevalent laboured mode of describing the religious confidence of enormous criminals in their approaching eternal bliss. We have read the account of the deportment and satisfaction of atrocious offenders after sentence which more resembled the fervid assurance of a Christian Martyr under Nero or Dioclesian, than that of a being sprinkled with the blood of his fellow creatures, and suffering under the condemnation of his country. We would not be mistaken; we by no means dispute the propriety of the religious attention which is paid to these miserable men; but we cannot reconcile ourselves to the language so often put into their mouths, which seems to inform those who are most like themselves, that a month's endurance and penitence will, at all events, ensure Heaven. And then as to the extreme anxiety for confession which is so usual: except when suspicion may hang over innocence, or equal guilt have a chance of escape, it is surely misplaced, more especially in cases, where, as in that of Hussey, the weight of circumstance puts doubt out of the question. A few emphatic enquiries in the course of attendance, and a very earnest one at the moment when hope can be no longer indulged, are certainly sufficient. The very anxiety on this score often suggests to the criminal, and sometimes to other people, that his guilt is doubted; and who, under such circumstances, can twist hope from the human bosom? Moreover, it has another baleful consequence—it almost involuntarily mixes falsehood and a spice of hypocrisy in the devotion, which is so called for by situation; the great Being who is fervently appealed to as a fountain of mercy in one moment, being not unfrequently called upon to witness to an untruth in the next. It cannot be denied, that in circumstantial conviction, confession is exceedingly desirable; but we think that of Hussey, and others resembling it, bears us out in our opinion, that it is often sought for with an earnestness that defeats its own purpose, by raising all the temptation of erring nature in the criminal, to the sad destruction of the state of simple sincerity which befits his miserable condition; and finally, that it too often disseminates the very doubt it is intended to remove."

ENGLISH OPERA.

THE new little Opera, called Jealous on all Sides, or the Landlord in Jeopardy, which was produced here on Wednesday, is worth little; and what little there is, good or bad, is not very clear. The story is after the fashion of the minor Spanish novels, in which lovers, brothers, mistresses, and sisters, get playing at cross-purposes. Two lovers (PEARMAN and WRENCH) happen to bring to the same inn their two mistresses (Miss CAREW and Miss LOVE); and the perplexities arise partly from their wish to conceal themselves, partly from the lies of the landlord (HARLEY), who is in the pay of both, and partly from the blunders of his stupid servant (WILKINSON). A father comes in, as usual, at the end, and settles all that he had unsettled. We cannot undertake to describe the matter further. All we can say is, that the perplexities, at any rate, are very successful, for we are not in the secret of them yet. Mr. WRENCH wants opportunities for his usual pleasantries. HARLEY snaps, and nods, and drops his jaw, and throws up his eye, and makes one laugh a little; but our laugh is intercepted by a yawn. Mr. WILKINSON, an actor not without humour, is assisted in these stupid characters by occasional twinges of real awkwardness. Mr. PEARMAN sings with his usual delicacy and sweetness; and Miss CAREW would give twice as much effect to very nice singing on her own part, if she did not get herself so studiously to imitate Miss STEPHENS, with arms pressed upwards against her bosom, and a head of sidelong resignation. To complete the imitation, perhaps she twists up her mouth fantastically, which Miss STEPHENS certainly does not; and which we hold to be a great fault in a pretty singer, which Miss CAREW certainly is both in voice and face. This sort of management never helps the expression of a bad feature, and always hurts that of a good one. The music of Jealous on all Sides, by a Mr. JOLLY, partakes of the general improvement of the age in science and harmony, which has been produced by the popularity of the German school. One of the songs, Ah, where shall I fly? is very pleasing both in harmony and air; and there is vigour in the Trio which follows it, though HARLEY scarcely seems to know what to be at with the base. The rest, for the most part, is of the old species of common place, especially the Finale. As to the poetry, there is some pleasantry in the burden of the first song, If he can; but the others are beneath criticism. We may here observe, that we have noticed a tendency of late in the compositions of this theatre to a certain coarseness, which deals in the most vulgar associations. We are no pruders, and can allow some latitude of allusion to love-matters, because they contain in them a principle of grace and kindness; but the least approach to coarseness like Swift's we abominate; and if it come in contact with women, execrate. Its alleged harmlessness, upon which ground it has sometimes been defended, is ridiculous. We are persuaded it is the most pernicious, as well as most disgusting, of all coarseness; for it tends to degrade human nature itself; and Swift felt as much, when in his bitter grinning he indulged in it.

HAYMARKET-THEATRE.

This merry little theatre keeps up its promise of making the most of a short season; and now that the east wind has come to remind us of our in-door enjoyments, the giggling spectators pack up in it more snugly than ever. We unfortunately missed the new comedy of Possession, which vanished all of a sudden we know not how; but we can make the reader ample amends by advising him to go and see the Green Man with his whole prism of satirical reflections, Major Dumpling in red, Major Bibber in blue, Mr. Fungus in mushroom-colour, and Beau Crackley in pepper and salt.

This new comedy, which was produced yesterday week, is taken from a popular French play called L'Homme Gris, the Grey Man; but Mr. Jones, to whom we are indebted for its adaptation to the English stage, and who himself performs the part of the Beau in it, has with an instinctive good judgment altered his hero's colour to that of the Green, a Grey Man being connected with some grim associations in our language, and there once having been an eccentric character known by this very title from the same fondness for green clothes. The story of the piece is very simple, clear, and interesting, forming at once an excellent vehicle for the satire of the arrogant misanthrope, and carrying along with it a domestic history. Sir George Squander (Mr. BARNARD) has married a very amiable and sensible young lady (Mrs. GLOVER), but who unfortunately for her interest with his proud uncle Lord Rowcroft (Mr. FOOTE) happens to have had no greater personage for her father than a respectable gentleman,—in the shape of a village apothecary. Sir George is not deficient in head or heart, but thoughtless and proud of making a shew among his country neighbours,—a folly, to which no less a man than FRISKING condescended, and which was his ruin. He accordingly becomes hampered with money-lenders and knavish servants; and his uncle, instead of relieving him and giving him good advice, takes advantage of his distress to league with them and entice him into more, in order that he may ultimately compel him to obtain a liquidation of his debts at the expense of a separation from his wife. The piece opens at this crisis, with visitors and money-lenders at Sir George's seat, the servants conspiring and the visitor eating, drinking and gaming. One of the latter is Major Bibber, a Commissary (Mr. COGNOR), who enters before dinner, tasting the wine; another is Major Dumpling (TOKELY) an Officer in "the Local," who enters tasting the soup; a third is Mr. Crackley (JONES), a young man fresh from Parisian improvement, which he has been cultivating, in order to recommend himself to Lady Squander's amiable sister (Miss BLANCHARD); and a fourth, who becomes the terror of them all, servants included, is the awful and mysterious personage, the Green Man (Mr. TERRY), who knew Lady Squander's father, and comes to see after the family interests. The principal part of the Comedy is occupied with the quiet and contemptuous sarcasms which this gentleman bestows on his fellow-visitors, not excepting Mr. Close-fist the usurer (WILKINSON); Mr. Fungus the polished valet (RUSSELL), and Mrs. Tuckit the lady's maid (Mrs. GIBBS), who on one occasion falling into a genteel fainting fit, is roused to sudden and screaming recollection, by his calmly taking out a lancet, and proposing to bleed in the jugular vein. In the mean while, he sees through the scheme of Lord Rowcroft and the servants, lets it go its whole length, till Sir George is arrested, apparently withstands the applications made to him by the two suffering Ladies, but finally overthrows it all, brings his Lordship to reason by shewing that he was privy to an alarming secret about a will, makes him, after his pompous blustering do all that he proposes to the great astonishment of the family, and dictates to him a promissory note for 40,000 pounds to be paid to Lady Squander, which her Ladyship with a generous and forgiving delicacy returning to the proud but humbled nobleman, the latter takes her to his arms in a fit of repentant admiration, and is accordingly forgiven by his alarming task-master. The Green Man then turns out to have been the secretary of the late Lord, a maternal kinsman of Sir George's (we were afraid he was going to be his father), and privy to the machinations by which the present Peer had got his own brother Sir George's father cut off from an inheritance of 40,000. The two Majors who were loitering to see if they could get the money they had just won from their host, had been almost kicked out of the house by the indignant Crackley, who notwithstanding his fopperies is found to be a good-hearted generous fellow, and wins the good opinion of the Green Man and the hand of their fair favourite.

This is altogether the pleasantest and completest piece we have witnessed on the stage for a long time. Its didactic air is more than relieved by the incidents, and persons, and its own humour; its language is lively, pithy, and well-bred; its situations are well managed; its characters as strongly contrasted and more naturally brought together than those in L'Ami du Peuple; its general spirit deeper than appears at first sight, and full of humanity. Though adapted to the stage by an actor, there is not that mere contrast in it, nor even that sacrifice of every thing to some predominant character, upon which such plots and dramatists are apt to stumble. The two women, for instance, are in admirable unpretending harmony, natural and kind; without any of the preaching which is so mistaken for sentiment; and the Green Man himself, whose keen integrity pierces so sharply through the vices of others, is not suffered to depart without discovering that he had been mistaken in the foppish but good-hearted Crackley,—a good caution against egotism in virtue. If Mr. Jones is only the translator and adapter of this piece, he has done his task with great spirit and gracefulness;—if he has a hand also in what we have been speaking of, he has a claim both upon our respect and regard.

The acting was worthy of the piece, with one exception which it would disturb our pleasure to mention. The ladies were represented in a nice style of simplicity by Mrs. GLOVER and Miss BLANCHARD. RUSSELL and Mrs. GIBBS made capital valet and lady's maid, the former's power to look foolish being quite as well suited to knavery as to any other stupidity. We never saw Mr. JONES's vivacity to better advantage, being naturally heightened perhaps by the great success of his play. TERRY is exceedingly effective in the Green Man, his face and manner assuming when it pleases a sort of iron quietness, and his voice issuing forth with a kindred austerity. He manages also to keep down the assumed eccentricity of his green clothes in a very judicious manner, so that the air of the gentleman shall not be hurt. They are dark, and not at all prominent. Lastly, the part of Major Dumpling in TOKELY's hands must be added to the list of the most genuine pieces of comic acting in stage history. We have not laughed so much at a performance, since our young ribs used to grow sore at the Wags of Windsor. Thick set, corpulent, in lax regimentals, feverish looking, mandlin, fat-voiced, waddling about with a stick, and yet affecting a jaunty self-possession, we never saw a completer picture of habitual feeding and frustration. The affectation of a sort of after-dinner ease and polish, vouching itself in strange self-satisfied smirks and half-uttered slippery sentences, completed a miscellany of train-bird captain, lounger, eater, drinker, and common-place Filstaff, infinitely entertaining. It was beef and wine together,—the aggregated excess of a messroom,—a gastric personification,—a flustered indigestion in regimentals. We must as infallibly see this piece again, as encore the laughing Trio in MOZART. It is impossible to do otherwise.

We ought not to forget the very pleasing manner in which Crackley's mistress is made to acknowledge her love for him after his generous conduct, and to call out voluntarily "Again," after she has given him her hand to kiss once. We must also indulge ourselves in telling a French joke, of which the Green Man reminded us, though perhaps it is old to the reader. There is a sign in London, called the Green Man and Still, meaning a distiller of plants. Crackley in the play seems to allude to it, when he says "Come now, Green Man, be still." A Frenchman giving a direction is said to have translated the sign into L'Homme verd et tranquille—The Man, green and tranquil.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 5.—THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

It is an office of most high import,
And asks high talents to discharge its duties;
His spirit is too like a deep lake * * *
It needs a heart and head firm, ready, bold;
A watchful eye and tongue of rich persuasion;
Yet these are not enough—

G. Chapman.

Of all offices in the gift of the Crown that of Attorney-General is perhaps least to be coveted; for whether the Government be popular or unpopular, the person filling that place can scarcely avoid being the object of general dislike: the rank is only fourth or fifth rate, and the manner in which it has been attained is always suspected, though sometimes unjustly: he is pretty sure to be charged with having ascended by the usual steps of political fawning and judicial servility, and after all he is only to be considered as the servant of servants—the curse of the Israelites. Lord BACON says, that men in high stations are thrice servants—of the King, of the State, and of the time—but the Attorney-General is obliged to submit to a quadruple servitude; or at least he must endure the charge of submitting to it, though it may be less in fact than in appearance. But this, to a Barrister who has been under a sort of submissive pupilage all his life, one may suppose to be the least part of the irksomeness of his situation, though the present Attorney-General, Sir SAMUEL SHEP-HERD, seemed to feel very acutely upon the subject on one or two occasions*.

The most unpleasant consequence of all however appears to be, that the nation at large must look upon the Attorney-General as a sort of ministerial spy—an informer of rather a higher rank than those who have recently become notorious; whose business it is to ferret out and

* WOOLER, in the course of his trials on two ex-officio informations for libels, asserted that the Attorney-General had been obliged to obey the orders of Ministers, his Masters; but Sir S.
SHEPHERD interrupted him not only once or twice with the words—"Sir, I have no Masters."—If I recollect rightly, the same sort of thing happened when HONE was before the Court of King's Bench.

prosecute all who, either by their actions or writings, are endeavouring to displace the personages to whom he is indebted for his situation, or who are attempting to promote any reform in the system they support. Most of the Ministry are engaged in great questions of foreign policy (or, at all events, affect to be so), in establishing dynasties and settling transferences of territory and subjects, and they leave the Attorney-General to bear the brunt at home: his hand may be said to be against every body, and every body's hand against him: he must fight all their domestic battles, and repel and punish all attacks whether political or personal: he must revenge all the little party quarrels;

Of those great men who clothe their private hate
In the fair colours of the public good,
And to effect their ends pretend the State,
As if the State by their affections stood.

S. Daniels's Philotas, A. 3.

Thus the responsibility of the Attorney-General is not only weighty but peculiar. A Minister, if he fail in any undertaking, excites the national displeasure, but contrives to keep his place: he throws the blame upon his agents and underlings; or if he cannot do that, the public disapprobation is easily borne; it is too broad to press severely from any particular quarter, and "enough for virtue is her own applause!" Not so with the Attorney-General—if he fail in any prosecution, he incurs first the displeasure of his employers (Masters I will not call them out of delicacy to the feelings of Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD); then the particular hostility of the individuals proceeded against; next he loses the confidence of the friends of Ministers; and lastly he gains the contempt and ridicule of their enemies.

With such imminent hazards, it seems singular at first sight that any man can be induced to accept such a situation: the temptation is, that it often leads to the highest honours of the profession, not improbably to a peerage;
but even then few but lawyers, who all their lives, as it were, have run the gamut of difficulties and dilemmas, with the sole purpose of gaining money and gratifying ambition, could be found to undertake its burdensome duties.
It seems however of late, as if the temptation had been less and the hazards greater; for we have seen instances where Attornies-General have gained nothing, or less than nothing, by all their exertions in favour of their patrons:
witness the individual who was recently compelled to forsake a business of scarcely less than 15,000*l.* a-year, and to withdraw into what has been called "an honourable retirement," as one of the pious or puny Barons of the Exchequer*.

Perhaps there never was a more unfortunate Attorney-General than Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD: he has proceeded against libellers personal and official—against parodists of the sacred ritual of the Church—and against persons accused of the heinous crime of treason: his attempts have had great variety in their object and great uniformity in their result: I do not recollect that he has obtained a single conviction in London; yet his failures have not arisen from want of zealous exertion on his part, or from superiority of talent on the part of the defendants: they frequently pleaded their own causes, and though one of these shop-orators (as they are vulgarly termed) was tolerable

* The motto he has chosen on his elevation to the Bench seems singularly inappropriate—Concussus Surgo: it is almost like a satire upon himself and his fallen fortunes; perhaps some good-natured friend when consulted mis-translated the words to him.—
Providentia me Committit is the inscription under the arms of another learned Judge, who has made himself notorious on the Western Circuit: his friends recommend him to attend to his pious motto and trust to heaven; for assuredly he ought not to trust to himself, if there be any truth in the stories lately told of him.

in point of fluency; he was execrable in point of style, and betrayed his ignorance and want of education in every sentence.* True it is that the Attorney-General succeeded in procuring the execution of some of the Derby rioters: but this is almost the only instance in which he has prevailed in the country, and the last and most signal discomfiture was very recently achieved by a female antagonist in Cornwall†

Yet notwithstanding these defeats—notwithstanding the frequent occasions on which he has “made a scare-crow of the regal name,” and himself in some sort “a fool for public use,” Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD is still respected by most of his friends in office, and perhaps there never was a man who had to fulfil the ungrateful duties of Attorney-General who had fewer enemies, both personal and political. But though his patrons may respect him, they feel no great warmth of attachment, for services rendered or expected (the only bonds of men in office), and shew no strong desire further to advance him. His deafness is undoubtedly a considerable impediment, but he is probably soon destined for some other “honourable retirement,” to make room for a new ambitionist, who may promise more and cannot well perform less; for some aspiring apostate, who having been professionally educated how to take any side in the Court, has been ministerially instructed how to take any side in the House. For such a one it will most likely be found that Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD will vacate his office: if he filled it without success, he obtained it without tergiversation.‡ He has however been unfortunate, not merely because he could not procure verdicts against WOOLER or HONE, but because he was compelled to bring these cases and others into Court: the informations were not filed by him, but by his predecessor Sir W. GARROW; they were almost the last efforts of the puny Baron of the Exchequer to merit a continuance of the favour of his patrons, and of course at such a time, when threatened with expulsion, he would be doubly anxious to give extraordinary proofs of his zeal towards them, and of his hostility towards their enemies. Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD found these and more in his office when he entered it, and he could not turn them out without bringing them to trial, whether he considered the respect due to his precursor, or the avowed wishes of those who had just bestowed their smiles upon him. It is felt therefore by one party, that the ill-success is not entirely attributable to him, and by the other, that had he been Attorney-General at an earlier date the informations would probably not have been filed. The good-natured public recollect too, that though he prosecuted and advised the prosecution of those mischievous but contemptible semi-idiots PRESTON, WATSON, and others, the plot was not of his brewing: it had been doctored in

* I mean Mr. WOOLER, of whom I know nothing, and wish to know nothing, beyond what I saw of him on his trials: his speeches have been much and undeservedly praised: for his fame he is chiefly indebted to the Reporters of the newspapers, and for his liberty to the blunders of the Jury. Mr. HONE is I believe a respectable book-seller, without pretensions, and in my judgment is not only a better informed man, but in most essentials a better speaker than Mr. WOOLER.

† He did not conduct this prosecution in person, nor was it I believe by information ex-officio: it was an indictment for a libel upon a Ministerial Deputy, the Vice Warden of the Stannary Court.

‡ It is reported at the Bar, and believed, that Sir S. SHEPHERD is to be made Accountant-General at the death of Mr. SMITH, who, probably much to the dissatisfaction of Ministers, continues hale and hearty, and eats his dinners in Middle Temple Hall with a good appetite. It is known that Mr. Serjeant COPLEY has very recently been brought into Parliament by Ministers. It is advised that he should take down the sturdy portrait of Fox that has long hung in his chambers, and substitute that of Lord CASTLEREAGH, by LAWRENCE, which has been admired as a most exact likeness, with the true air and appearance of a man-of-war.

another quarter, and his aid was not required until it had probably been so worked up that he could not easily discover the substance on account of the froth.* It is proper also to add, in this place, that very few ex-officio proceedings indeed have been instituted by Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD since he was entrusted with this onerous discretion.

The foregoing remarks, not indeed purely political, have been made for the purpose of exemplifying the real character of the individual whose conduct and talents are the subject of the present article, and of shewing why he is in some degree an exception to the position with which I set out, that an Attorney-General could scarcely avoid becoming an object of public dislike. If it be said that I am travelling out of my course in touching upon political topics, which hitherto have been carefully avoided, my answer is short and plain—that the Attorney and Solicitor-General are to be contemplated not merely as Advocates, but as Government Advocates, and that their conduct in office cannot be separated from the view of their qualifications for the stations they occupy: in forming an estimate of their talents and learning, the sphere in which they have been employed cannot possibly be disregarded. I will now however take leave for the present of the public capacity of Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD with one observation, which applies in some degree to his private character, and affords an additional reason why he is still widely respected and esteemed. In all his thoughts and actions he seems to be perfectly a gentleman: in all the prosecutions he has conducted, he has behaved towards the parties with fairness and liberality: he has displayed sometimes a degree of candour quite unusual and unexpected, and has made admissions that did him credit but his cause injury. If a Defendant stood on the floor to vindicate himself, I do not think it can be truly said of Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD that he ever attempted to avail himself unduly of the power and influence of his station, either with the Jury or the Court: he never assumed any authoritative and overbearing deportment, or attempted to dictate, as his predecessors have been allowed to do, the course of proceeding. Yet his temper sustained many severe trials, and as far as I witnessed it, his conduct set an example of forbearance not always followed by the Court.

Of the Attorney-General's talents I do not think so highly, whether he exercise them as an Advocate in or out of Parliament. His practice in Courts of Law within the last two or three years has much declined, partly because his official duties interfered, and partly on account of the infirmity with which he is afflicted, and which was before mentioned: his deafness has much increased upon him within the memory of several of the younger Serjeants who have profited by it. It has been of long continuance, but it is the opinion of those who remember Sir S. SHEPHERD in his younger days, that he was an able advocate and an eloquent speaker: my acquaintance with Courts of Justice does not go quite so far back, but I well recollect him when his deafness was comparatively slight and temporary; and though I might then consider him shrewd and sensible, I never once imagined that he was eloquent. I have seen him in very nearly all the Government prosecutions he has conducted or aided since he obtained his appointments, as Solicitor and afterwards as Attorney-General, and I am very positive that my first impression was correct. His defect of hearing, and the quantity of snuff he takes, have undoubtedly injured his voice, which was once clear, though not musical or round in its tones: but had he ever been eloquent, it could but little, if at all, impede the impetuous current of his thoughts and words: the flow, when it amounts to a continued stream, is uniformly meagre and generally irregular: it has neither force, fulness, depth, nor dignity: when he strives to appear impassioned, he is only inflated, and all his exertions to be eloquent are more or less vapid and unsubstantial. This remark applies to the attempts at declamation, which he feels it necessary to make when he is managing an important public prosecution. Cum omnis arrogantia odiosa est, tum illa ingenii et eloquentiæ multò molestissima. and if he have not precisely what we mean by the arrogance, he has at least a good deal of the pretence of eloquence. To give him his proper character, he is a clear-headed, straight-forward gentlemanly speaker, and if he is occasionally impressive, particularly in his manner, he most commonly injudiciously wastes his energy and emphasis upon matters that require them least. His sentences are not confused, but they are shapeless, and often turgid and laborious.

* If I remember rightly, he confessed in Parliament after the trials, that Ministers had not let him into the secret of the real character of the celebrated witness Mr. Castles.

His action is unusually vehement upon all occasions, whether it is or is not required: he resorts to the ordinary expedient of making up for the weakness of his language, by the strength of his corporeal exertions. I do not mean that he throws about his figure in all directions, as Mr. MARRYAT does, like a porpoise in a storm, for he keeps that uncommonly erect: the motion is confined principally to his arms and feet. His deafness prevents him from properly regulating his voice, and fearing when he is strenuously endeavouring to enforce a particular point, that he shall speak too loud, his words become almost inaudible, while his arms and hands are employed in striking the desk or table with so much violence, that the whole Court resounds. The effect is rendered still more ludicrous by his rising upon his toes to give his small person importance, and beating time with his heels upon the floor. I well remember during HONE's trial, upon one occasion in particular, when the Attorney-General was endeavouring to declaim against profanation, the proceeding was interrupted by the indecorous laughter of the spectators, and commitments were properly threatened in consequence by the Judge: but the laughter was not occasioned by what was said, but by the manner of saying it. This I mention merely as an illustration, for the defect is chiefly, if not altogether, to be attributed to the infirmity under which Sir SAMUEL SHEPHERD has unfortunately so long laboured.

Few men have obtained much business in the profession of the Law without possessing a share of talent of some kind, or some information beyond their competitors; and I am inclined to think that Sir S. SHEPHERD, when young, combined considerable acuteness with great industry and discretion: it is certain that his practice in the Common Pleas was once as extensive, or more extensive, than that of any of his rivals; and he was often employed in causes, which such men as Mr. Sergeant BEST or Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN could have no pretensions to touch—I mean those where legal research and learning were required. The Attorney-General bears the reputation of being a very well-read man in the higher departments of his pursuit; and as far as I am able to judge he deserves the character. This qualification probably recommended him first to the notice of Ministers as Solicitor General, at a time when they had an Attorney-General, who throughout his life had substituted a profound knowledge of human nature in its depravity, for a knowledge of the most ordinary books. It is thought, notwithstanding, by some lawyers, that Sir S. SHEPHERD, as opposed to Sir V. GIBBS, failed in the great legal contest between Sir F. BURDETT and the SPEAKER of the House of Commons. In point of law, however, I am afraid he had the worst side of the argument.

It would be extremely unfair to form any judgment of his capability to examine an adverse witness, from any attempt he may at present make: in fact, he loses half the important parts of the testimony—the little niceties on which credit depends, and which, if seized and pressed home, would shew that the person in the box was unworthy of belief. Judging as well as I can from recollection, from the report of those who have known the Bar longer, and from the partial success of some of his more recent exertions of this kind, I should be inclined to think that he acquired a portion of his former eminence by his talent in this department of the province of an advocate.

Of his abilities as a parliamentary debater, little notion can be formed by those in the gallery of the House of Commons but from inference; for, he, is seldom audible beyond the benches surrounding him. He is not required to speak but upon legal questions, which have been more numerous than usual within the last two, or three Sessions. His addresses are very inefficient, and draw but few cheers even from those who are most interested in encouraging him. Sir W. GARROW generally obtained his greatest applause from his antagonists, who of course received with shouts the sentences in which he committed himself, and destroyed his own positions. This is an error into which the present Attorney-General is too prudent to be likely to fall; but if he did, the smallness of his voice would frequently enable him to do it with impunity. AMICUS CURLE.

[Sir ARTHUR PIGGOT will be the subject of No. 6.]

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

MR. EXAMINER,—In common with many others, I was extremely surprised at seeing a letter in the Salisbury Gazette, written by Sir Francis Burdett, stating his sorrow at not being able to attend Mr. Long Wellesley's dinner at Marlborough. Now, Mr. Examiner, this Mr. Long Wellesley has been lately returned for Wiltshire, after a very spirited contest, and the dinner was to celebrate this return. When he first started, he stated two reasons, and two reasons alone, why he thought himself entitled to represent the county. The first was a very cogent one truly, because the ancestors of his wife had represented it; and the second, perhaps, still more sapient, because he was nephew to the Duke of Wellington. I blush for the county when I tell you he succeeded, yet it is but fair to state that he was well backed by Treasury influence, a heavy purse, and, of course, almost all the parsons in the county, together with an impudent dandy kind of oratory, much more suited to a party of modern fashionable belles than an assembly of Englishmen. Upwards of ninety thousand pounds have seated him in the house for Wiltshire instead of St. Ives. Perhaps Sir Francis knew not the means by which he secured his election; but did he not know that Wellesley has been tried, that he has been in Parliament, that he has been a thorough-paced Ministerialist, a mere tool to the most imbecile Administration that ever presided over affairs in this country, and that his family, deep in the Red Book, have been and still are living luxuriously at the expense of the famishing mechanic?

If a letter of congratulation on the choice of such a man had come from almost any one else, it would most likely have been unnoticed; but Burdett's character stands high, —Burdett, than whom I firmly believe there was not a more well-meaning and conscientious Senator in the Commons House, nor one who, upon the whole, has a better claim to the appellation of the "Man of the People."

We are here utterly at a loss to conceive how Sir Francis could support a man acting diametrically opposite to the Hon. Baronet's own principles; for it is allowed, I believe, Wellesley never gave a vote in favour of the people except in the single instance of the Income Tax, and by that vote put more than 3000*l.* a-year into his own pocket; and the Wiltshire people anxiously wait till the Hon. Baronet or some of his friends explain the reason for such support.

A CONSTANT READER.

MEETING OF MAJOR CARTWRIGHT'S FRIENDS.

On Tuesday a meeting was held at the Horns Tavern, Kensington, of "the friends of Radical Reform, and its advocate Major Cartwright." At five o'clock about 400 persons sat down to dinner, the Hon. Douglas Kinnaird in the chair. After dinner the first toasts were—"The People, the only source of legitimate power;" "The King and Constitution, and a speedy recovery to both;" "A real representation of the People in Parliament, by which both the King and nation may be freed from the usurpation of a Borough-mongering oligarchy."

Mr. KINNAIRD rose to propose a name intimately connected with Reform. He alluded to him who had so long and so ably advocated that cause. There was no other Englishman to whose lot it had fallen to manifest so long and so consistent a support of the public cause. That life however which had been spent in the service of the country, was now attacked by indisposition. The worthy Major had sent a letter, containing a statement of his sentiments, which he was only able to sign. [Here Mr. Kinnaird read a letter from Major Cartwright. It expressed his regret at not being able to attend the meeting, and requested that Mr. Cleary might be permitted to read a paper containing what he wished to address to the meeting.] The title of the Major to the approbation of the friends of reform was enhanced by his having been made the object of malignant abuse and misrepresentation. Among his calumniators, a professional Gentleman had charged him with making big blunders, and proposing little nostrums. In both houses of Parliament it was asserted that Annual Parliaments were unknown to our history; and yet, in the recently published manifesto of the party that made this assertion, it was admitted that Parliaments had been sessional, and that there had often been several Parliaments even in the course of one year. But it was singular, that he who proposed radical reform should be the person accused of applying little nostrums to the Constitution. The quack doctors might justly be charged with dealing in nostrums, but such inefficient applications never were proposed by the wise physician who was desirous of producing a radical cure. Mr. Kinnaird concluded with proposing the following toast:—"The venerable Major Cartwright, the father of reform, and may he live to see a death-blow given to corruption."

Mr. CLEARY stated, that he had seen Major Cartwright in the morning, who had sent an address which he hoped the company would permit him to read. [The manuscript, which was of considerable length, was read by Mr. Cleary. It insisted on the necessity of radical reform, and recommended the introduction of a Bill for that object into Parliament by Sir Francis Burdett. If Sir Francis Burdett should bring forward a Bill, an object would be distinctly presented to the consideration of the public, and there would soon be a general cry of "The Bill—the Bill—Burdett's Bill. We will have Burdett's Bill." The address concluded with proposing the following sentiment to be drunk by the company as a toast:—"Take your choice, a civil Government or a military despotism; in other words, Burdett's Bill or Castlereagh's Bayonet."]

The next toast was,—"Sir Francis Burdett and the Reformers of England."

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT believed that, after the able speech which had been delivered from the chair, in every word of which, and in particular in the approbation bestowed on the Major, he concurred, and after the discourse just read to them by Mr. Cleary, it would not be necessary for him to say much on the object of the meeting. Major Cartwright had been too long known to all present, to render it necessary for him to descant on his merits. It could not be superfluous, however, to notice the unfounded aspersions which had been cast on that venerable character, and in that respect the worthy Chairman had relieved him from much of the task. But one topic had been left untouched, which he thought ought not to be omitted. Since it was found that Major Cartwright's life was spotless, it had been given out by his adversaries, the adversaries of reform, that his faculties had failed him, and that he was in fact an old woman. How far this was from the truth the paper which had just been read would suffice to show. The author of that paper was now fast advancing to eighty years of age, and he wrote with a force and spirit which might induce those who heard it rather to suppose that it came from the pen of one not yet twenty. He should be happy to see young men manifest an equal degree of energy in the cause of liberty. Whether the Major's views were too extensive, too liberal, or too bold, his opponents had not endeavoured to demonstrate by any thing like argument; but, whatever opinion might be held upon them, surely nobody, who fairly considered them, could honestly call them old womanish. They were peculiarly the feelings and sentiments of a true born Englishman. His prescription was not a little but a big nostrum. It could never be described in terms of contempt, though in some pusillanimous minds it might excite apprehension. He was however happy to state, that a great change had been operated in public opinion on the subject of reform. There was now, he believed, scarcely an honest man in any part of the country, of sound mind, who was not sensible of the extent of public corruption, and perfectly convinced of the necessity of a remedy. But with respect to reform, it was to be expected that men's judgments should be different. There were various shades of opinion, and no one had a right to hold out that his plan, and his plan only, should be adopted. This was a sort of dictation to which no public man could submit. The resolutions which he had moved in the last Session of Parliament had not been proposed by him without due consideration. On them he was willing to place all pretensions to future character. If he should ever depart from them, he begged that he might not be allowed to say that he had grown wiser. He should never have the hardihood to look Englishmen in the face, and on abandoning his principles, to tell them that he was wiser to-day than he had been a few years ago. Various measures, it was probable, would be proposed to the public as the means of reform. It was possible, however, that some measure, short of that which he might think right, would be proposed in Parliament. If that should be the case, he should think it no impeachment of his consistency to support such a measure; for something must be sacrificed to the opinions or even the prejudices of others. Whatever might become of abstract principles, the great object was to obtain the advantages of practical reform. He had always maintained that every person ought to have a vote in the making of the laws which dispose of his liberty and his property; and he could not see how elections founded on that principle should lead to anarchy. Suppose the country divided into sections for voting, however large the population, he could not understand how there should be more confusion in all voting, than there would be in any single parish or district. Could there be greater anarchy than on the present system of election, which every seven years disclosed such horrid scenes of bribery, perjury, and every vice? It had been said that he objected that the term "Universal Suffrage" was not sufficiently definite. His objection, however, was not to the term; it was, that those who used it, with the exception of Mr. Bentham, really did not mean Universal Suffrage. What he wished was, that universal interests should be represented, and that, he thought, would be sufficiently accomplished if the heads of families were to vote. He had been charged with inconsistency, because he had declared that he took his opinions from Milton, Locke, and Machiavel. It had been observed on this, "that Milton was a Republican, Locke, a Constitutional Monarchist, and that Machiavel had become the Minister of a wily Prince," and it was inferred that he might pass through all these stages. The principles of these men, however, were essentially the same, though apparently differing from the situations in which they were placed. They were all friends of freedom: but it had been insinuated that he would act the part of each, that after being a Republican with Milton, he had become a constitutional monarchist with Locke, and would terminate by being the Minister of some wily Prince. He wondered what wily Prince in Europe would wish to make him his Minister. But the fact was, that England was not a monarchy; for that meant the government of one individual, a government vested in a particular family for its interests. The Government of the constitution of England had an hereditary King, but that power was balanced by a representation of the people. He was always willing to support the Crown and the Aristocracy, provided they were not opposed to the right of the people to choose their representatives. Those who were pleased to endeavour to find out his inconsistencies had reminded him of Mr. Burke, who said that, wishing his whiggism to stick by him, he had taken it very low at first. Mr. Burke, he believed, did take his whiggism low enough; but however low he took it, he certainly left it lower than he found it; but he trusted he should never leave the principles of English liberty lower than he found them.

The memory of Dr. Jebb, Sir William Jones, and Grenville Sharpe, and the healths of Mr. Kinloch, of Kinloch, and Mr. Kinnaird, who respectively returned thanks, were then drunk, after which the meeting broke up.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Saturday, Aug. 15.

BEDFORD CHARITY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR addressed himself to Sir S. Romilly in these words:—"In the matter of the Bedford Charity I wish to mention, that I am of opinion that Jew boys cannot be admitted into the school; but whether persons of the Jewish persuasion may be entitled to any other of the benefits of the Institution, is a question upon which I have not yet made up my mind, but I will communicate what occurs to me as soon as I have."

Tuesday, Aug. 18.

WHITE v. AMBROSE.

This case respected the right of certain creditors to take the property of a clergyman in satisfaction for their debts.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, when called upon this day to give his judgment upon the case, observed, that he had already stated his opinion on more occasions than one, though Counsel had probably not heard him. There was no doubt that a rector, after judgment and sequestration, was in the situation of any other debtor; his property might be taken in execution, but of course with a proviso that no person claimed it who had a previous estate in it. The present was only one out of eight or ten different briefs that had been handed up to him, on which he had been requested to give judgment two, three, and even four times over, because Counsel did not attend him at the time he first pronounced his opinion. It was a law-maxim that ubiquity only belonged to the King; but the practice of this Court seemed to show, that it belonged to the Counsel in Chancery, who were before the Vice-Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, himself, and elsewhere, at the same time.

PRACTICE OF BARRISTERS IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR took an opportunity in the course of the morning of stating, that he had given directions that an order should be framed so strict in its terms, as to put an end to the inconvenience of which he had lately so much reason to complain, viz. that Counsel did not attend him because they liked better to go before the Vice-Chancellor. That he might not be accused of discourtesy, he had given this notice of the rule, which would commence operation in Michaelmas term. He was resolved that this part of the business of the Court should be put upon the same footing as the other.

The Barristers present bowed their assent.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

EX PARTE HOLDING IN THE MATTER OF MADSON, A BANKRUPT.

SIR,—The report in your paper of yesterday, of what passed on the hearing of the above Petition, contains several very material errors. I request therefore, that with your usual impartiality, you will correct those errors by inserting this letter. The facts were, that Holding, who stated himself to be a creditor of the Bankrupt, petitioned the Court to supersede the Commission on the ground of a concerted act of bankruptcy. The petitioner's Counsel stated the petitioner's case, in which he alleged the concert, but there were two material preliminary facts, which, before he was entitled to be heard upon such a petition, it was necessary to advert to, first that it was denied by the respondents that he, the petitioner, was a creditor, and secondly that the bankrupt being in Newgate, under a commitment by the Commissioners, it was alleged by the respondents that the petitioner was in concert with him, and that in fact it was the bankrupt's petition. Both these facts were expressly mentioned to the Court by the Counsel for the respondents, and the petitioner's Counsel feeling the weight of them (for they were in the affidavits) procured the petition to stand over after it had been called on a previous day, and in the mean time affidavits were filed of so extraordinary a nature, that it became desirable for the respondents to answer them, and as there was no time for that purpose, the Court directed the petition to stand over until the next day of petitions, to enable the respondents to answer such affidavits. It is necessary also to state, that as the respondents conceive and are advised, supposing the question shall ever be argued, they have a complete answer to the case made by the petitioner relating to the act of bankruptcy. That part of your report which professes to state what was said by his Honour the Vice Chancellor, but which he never did say, any person must know, if he reflects for a moment, cannot be true, as the bankrupt was committed to prison by the Commissioners for his misconduct under the Commission, and the Assignees or their Solicitor had no means of getting him committed to Newgate, except it was by endeavouring to investigate his accounts and ascertain what he had done with his property in the course of their duty. You will readily perceive how necessary it is, for the character of the respondents and their Solicitor, that the report in your paper should not go uncontradicted, and that the public should suspend their judgment until the final hearing.—I am your obedient servant,

D. SHUTER,
Solicitor to the Assignees.

Millbank-street, August 17, 1818.

ARCHES COURT.

BURGESS v. BURGESS.

Sir JOHN NICHOLL.—This is an Appeal from a Sentence pronounced by the Judge of the Consistory Court of London. The suit commenced in that Court on the part of Mrs. Burgess, who called upon her husband for a restitution of conjugal rights, and was replied to on the part of Mr. Burgess, by a charge of adultery. Mr. Burgess obtained a sentence of Divorce, which this Court is now called on to review. It is not necessary, in point of law, when a fact of adultery is pleaded, that it should be proved to have taken place at a certain time, or in any particular place, but it is quite sufficient to establish that the crime has been committed to entitle the party complaining to his legal remedy. I am well aware that the confession alone of parties cannot be received as sufficient proof of the fact; but it is the strongest possible proof, when supported by the circumstantial evidence of the case. The marriage between the parties took place in 1802, and they cohabited together until 1814: they have two daughters living; one nearly nine, and the other about three years of age. In 1814, Mr. Burgess became intimate with a young man named Lane; he received him at his house at Clapham, and took him to his friends' houses. At these places the intimacy of Mr. Lane and Mrs. Burgess attracted much attention. They always were walking together, and always sat next to each other during the time of meals; and Mrs. Burgess took every opportunity of making advances to Mr. Lane. Their conduct was so remarkable, that Mr. Lane's father remonstrated with his son on the impropriety of such familiar intercourse. On the 23d of December Mr. and Mrs. Burgess, and Mr. Lane, went on a visit to Mr. Chamberlain at Rics, in Essex. Here the intercourse became more remarkable. They never mixed with the company, but their conduct seemed like that of young persons engaged to each other on the brink of matrimony. In the middle of the day they contrive to remain separate from the rest of the party for a considerable time. After dinner, Mrs. Burgess leaves the ladies to go up stairs, and Mr. Lane quits the gentlemen's company almost immediately after the ladies had retired. The only question will be, did they retire to separate apartments or to the same? It is proved that Mr. Lane went to his own bed-room. It might be supposed that Mrs. Burgess went up stairs for the purpose of putting her children to bed, but that is negatived. She did not sit down to work in her own room. Her apartment was contiguous to that of Mr. Lane, and she was at other times seen to come out of his room. These circumstances taken together lead to a violent suspicion of criminality. On the 26th of December her conduct is still less equivocal. In the evening she refused to play at cards, although much pressed to do so by her husband, and as soon as he was engaged went up stairs. Mr. Lane had previously retired to his bed-room upon a suggestion which turns out to be false, that his coat wanted mending. After some time both returned to the company much flurried, and Mrs. Burgess played on the pianoforte in a very agitated manner. Coupling this with her subsequent confession, I can come to no other conclusion than that at this time they had committed adultery.—There is no reason to suppose that the husband was at all conversant of the fact. He is the last person generally made acquainted with his own dishonour. Upon the whole case I see no reason to differ from the learned Judge of the Consistory Court, and therefore shall pronounce against the appeal, and remit the cause.

POLICE.

QUEEN-SQUARE.

A female was charged by Mrs. Martha Somerville, of Luke's-court, Peter-street, Westminster, with stealing her infant, and also a pair of sheets, blankets, &c. her property. Mrs. Somerville stated, that about nine weeks ago the prisoner came to her house and took lodgings for herself and a gentleman whom she stated to be her husband. On Monday the prisoner told her she had accidentally met her uncle, who is Colonel of a regiment, and he promised to assist her. Tuesday they both went to the uncle's house, in Cliff-street, when prisoner told her to leave the child with her whilst she inquired whether he was at home, and instructed her to say it was his niece, the Spanish lady, who wanted him. She knocked at the door, and was told by the footman his master had no niece, and she was an impostor. She returned to where she had left the prisoner, but could not find her nor the child. She gave information at Marlborough-street, and the child was afterwards found with a fruit woman in Bond-street. Tuesday evening Mr. Sommerville met the prisoner and her maid near Westminster-bridge, and he sent them to the watchhouse. Green, the officer, searched the prisoner, and found a pair of sheets, the property of Mrs. Sommerville, wrapped round her body inside her dress. The prisoner being called upon to give an account of herself, burst into tears, and said her name was Emma Elliott, that she was born of English parents, but begged to be excused saying in what country. Her uncle, a gentleman of independent fortune, promised to relieve her. She was only 18 years of age, and had formed a connection with a young man who had not means to support her. The Magistrate addressed her in the Spanish language, but she still declined divulging any part of the mysterious account she gave of herself. She was committed for re-examination.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

A young man, about 25 years of age, dressed in the style of the most exquisite dandyism, and who described himself to be Geoffrey Nottingham, a Lieutenant of the Grenadier-guards, and son of Lady Nightingale, was placed at the bar, to answer to a charge preferred against him by Mr. Dennison, of Duke-street, Manchester-square. Mr. Dennison deposed, that he and his family, with a few friends, were seated at a table in the drawing-room of his house, about half-past eleven o'clock, when they were alarmed by a violent concussion, proceeding from the window next to which the ladies were seated. A stone was found on the carpet, beneath the window; the stone had struck obliquely one of the division bars, which it had nearly broken away with the surrounding panes of glass, pieces of which were impelled, in all directions, to the further parts of the room. The watchman seized the prisoner in his flight. It was further stated in evidence, that there are three windows to the apartment, all of which were unclosed; it was well lighted up; the company were seated together at one end of the room, close to the window; and their persons might easily be seen from the street; from which circumstance it was presumed that the stone was intended to strike some individual. The prisoner said that he was in company with another gentleman, very much intoxicated; that upon observing the party at Mr. Dennison's, his companion threw the stone, and they fled in different directions, and he was stopped by the watchman: his drunken friend had, however, escaped, and he did not choose to declare his name. He was willing to pay for the damage which had been sustained. The prisoner was ordered to find bail for his appearance at the Sessions, as he was an accessory upon his own confession.

HATTON-GARDEN.

On Wednesday, Elizabeth Reardon, a poor simple Irish woman, was brought up, charged by a respectable merchant in the City, who has a house in Pentonville, with breaking six panes of glass in one of the windows of his counting-house in the City, following him in the streets, and collecting a mob round him; and with coming to his house in Pentonville, and collecting a mob round it, to the annoyance of the neighbourhood. The substance of the case was as follows:—The prisoner some years ago lived servant in the complainant's family, and was delivered of a daughter, whom she swore to him; he then gave her 20*l.* to go to Ireland and nurse the child, allowing her 25*l.* a year, and promising, when the child was of a fit age, to take it under his own care. When the child was six years old, the prisoner returned, and delivered her to the complainant, he giving her 20*l.* to go back to Ireland, where she was to receive her annuity, on condition of her remaining there. The complainant sent the child to a boarding-school, and had her brought up as his daughter. She is now 14 years of age, and an only child, the complainant, who is now about 50 years of age, having never married; this fine girl being given to understand that she is the complainant's daughter, by a wife who died in Ireland. Twelve months ago the prisoner came to England, insisted on seeing her child, and on being refused by the complainant, annoyed him in the way described. She was sent to Liverpool, but returned to town, when she was taken before the Lord Mayor, and an officer sent with her to see her embarked for Ireland. She, however, had returned again, and had annoyed the complainant. On being asked why she did so, she said, she only wanted one sight of her child, and she would return, and die contented. This request the complainant thought prudent to refuse. The prisoner, in the most frantic manner, exclaimed, "She is my child! she is not yours! I must and will have my child; you are not her father!"—The prisoner was committed to the House of Correction, for want of bail.

WORSHIP-STREET.

Monday, Henry Nash, charged with killing Catherine Nash his wife, by beating her with such violence that she died in consequence, was brought up for final examination. The prisoner was informed that the Coroner's Jury had returned a verdict of Manslaughter against him, but if he could produce undeniable bail, he would be allowed his liberty till the Sessions. The prisoner not being provided with bail was committed.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MURDER AT ERSOM.—Saturday week, Thomas Osborne was finally examined on the charge of being concerned in the murder of Ely Cox. The circumstances of suspicion were these:—Near the fatal spot, the inside sock of a shoe was found which fitted the prisoner's shoe; and one of those he had on had the appearance of being newer than the other; an apron, a waistcoat, a torn shirt, a hat and a pair of grey trousers much faded and torn were found at the prisoner's cottage, stained with blood; and the prisoner, when in confinement, had described the trousers he wore on the day of the murder as such; there were traces of blood from the place of the murder towards the house of Osborne; he had been seen with a knife similar to the one found near the body, but it was not sworn to be the same. He was committed for trial.

SUICIDE THROUGH FEAR.—Thursday week, Mr. Abbot, bricklayer, in Leather-lane, had a 10*l.* four 12*l.* Bank-notes, and a sixteenth of a Lottery Ticket, stolen out of his desk; and suspicion falling on Mary Morgan, his maid-servant, about 33 years of age, and her taken into custody. Her boxes were searched, but nothing was found leading to a discovery, and he was satisfied by turning her out of his service, threatening if he could trace the note to her possession to prosecute her. Mr. Abbot had the 10*l.* note stopped at the Bank, and on Monday the note was tendered there for payment, of which he received notice. This coming to the unfortunate woman's hearing, it had such an effect on her, through apprehension of being detected, that she was observed by the persons with whom she lodged to be as if deranged. She got up about six o'clock on Tuesday morning, and went down stairs, and a little after seven was found in the back kitchen hanging by a rope from the top of the door. She seemed to have been dead some time. The inquest held on the body of the deceased returned a verdict of—Insanity.

Last Monday night an Inquest was held in Nelson-street, City-road, on the body of George Renvaige, aged 39, who hung himself at his house in Waterloo-street, on Saturday week. The deceased, it appeared, had been labouring under a complaint for about four years, by which he was dreadfully tortured. Saturday week, he sent out his daughter to purchase some cakes for breakfast; when she returned she found his bed-room door locked; she gave an alarm, the door was burst open, and the deceased found suspended from the bed-post; he was instantly cut down, and a surgeon sent for; but the vital spark was quite extinct. The deceased was by trade a watchmaker, and has left a wife and five children to lament his loss. Verdict—Insanity.

An Inquisition was taken on Thursday, at Pimlico, on the body of Mrs. Mary Banilay, of Palace-street. Sarah Garner was servant to the deceased. On Tuesday week, about one o'clock, she heard a violent knocking at the street door; she opened her window, and saw two watchmen, who called out that there were thieves in the house. The deceased called to know what was the matter; she told her, and the deceased went in an apparent fright to her chamber. The watchman searched, but could find no one. Witness returned up stairs, and the deceased seemed greatly frightened. She endeavoured to pacify her, but her terror was so great, that she fell on the floor and soon became senseless. She died in three hours after. Mr. Clarke, surgeon, Pimlico, was called to attend the deceased, and found her lying in a senseless state. She died at five o'clock the same morning. The death of the deceased might have been produced by excessive terror. The black marks found round the throat were produced by the strings of the deceased's cap being tied tight, and the blackness of the shoulder was from putrefaction.—Verdict—"The death of the deceased was produced by excessive fright."

On Monday evening, as some cockney sportsmen were amusing themselves by firing at sparrows, from a trap in the Target-ground belonging to the City Light Horse, near Bagnigge-wells, a fine boy, named Walter Mapperley, who was at play with some other boys in an adjoining field, was shot in the head; he was immediately carried to Bartholomew's hospital. He had received two shots in the throat, one over the right eye, and nine more in the face and neck; he now lies in a dangerous state. This is the third accident of a similar kind that has happened in the same place within three weeks. On Wednesday week a boy had his cheek laid open by a musket ball; and a few days before, other boys received several small shots in the legs.

Wednesday evening a shocking accident happened in Furnival's-inn-court, Holborn. A great number of children were playing in the court, when a wall, which the workmen were taking down, suddenly gave way. Several of the children were buried in the mass of bricks and rubbish; two of them were killed. The wall fell with such force as to break into the parlour windows of the house of Mrs. Jane Mayton, of No. 7; and Mrs. Mayton, who was sitting near the window with her daughter, at needle-work, were buried in the ruins, and remained under them for some time: when taken out, Mrs. M. was insensible, and was conveyed to Mr. Davis, a surgeon, in Holborn; her skull was fractured, and she received other serious injury. She now lies in a dangerous condition.—The Coroner's Jury, who sat on the bodies of the two children, returned a verdict of—Killed by the falling of a wall.

On Thursday afternoon, a large quantity of gun-powder and combustibles, compounded into fire-works for Vauxhall-garden, exploded in a work-shop in Mead-place, near the Asylum. The first alarm was produced by a most violent shock, which shattered the glass in the houses contiguous. A few seconds after a boy and three men came out torn and blackened by the explosion. They were taken instantly to the Hospital. A second explosion blew off the roof, and rockets, salpêtre, and fire-works, continued blazing and bursting. The rockets darted horizontally, and kept the spectators at a considerable distance. A monkey had been secured to the roof by a chain, and was seen struggling to escape from the approaching flames, until the timber on which he stood being burnt, he fell into the devouring element. The shed was detached, fortunately, from the row of houses in Mead-place. The conflagration was suffered to burn out, as no person could venture to go near the shed. The fire-works, of which there was a large quantity in a chest, kept up a continued discharge.

INCENDIARIES.—A short time since a number of fires broke out in the village of Exning, about two miles from Newmarket: there were no less than five in a month. There was very strong suspicion that the fires did not happen by accident. An investigation took place, and a man and his wife, of the name of Webb, were committed to prison. In a few days after, John Webb, the son of the prisoners, was also apprehended, and confessed that he set fire to the premises with a candle, by desire of his mother. Another son of the prisoners, only 13 years of age, confirmed the confession of his brother, and said he saw him set fire to the premises, and he did it by desire of his mother. No evidence appearing against Webb sen. he was discharged, and Mrs. Webb and her son John were committed for trial.—The first fire broke out on Sunday afternoon, June 28, between one and two, in a barn belonging to Mr. G. Brooks, a farmer, laying waste several cottages, barns, stables, &c. and burnt out no less than seven families, who saved very little. The second broke out on the 30th of June, between seven and eight, in some stables belonging to Mr. Martin, and consumed several buildings. A third fire broke out at Exning, on the 17th of July, which was discovered at the house of Mr. Charles Webb, a butcher, but an alarm being given, the fire was soon extinguished; the incendiaries, however, were so determined, that they actually attempted to set fire again to the same premises on the following night.

In our last, we stated that a man had given himself up in this town, as the murderer of the young woman found some time since in the Medway, and that he subsequently denied being guilty. In that denial he still persists, and we believe that notwithstanding the most active exertions made by the Magistrates, no positive evidence against him, except his own confession, has been yet obtained.—Maidstone-Gazette.

A most melancholy catastrophe occurred in this town on Monday last. Between two and three o'clock in the morning, a fire was discovered in the premises of Captain Brett. An alarm was instantly sounded. In a few minutes Mrs. Brett threw up the window of her chamber, and with piercing shrieks, implored assistance. A ladder was instantly procured; but was found to be too short to rescue her from her perilous situation. Another ladder was sent for, but came too late. The unhappy woman, enveloped by the flames, disappeared. The servant-maid appeared at a lofty side window, and precipitated herself into the street: hopes are however entertained of her recovery. The fire was not extinguished till it had destroyed the whole interior of the premises. Happily the flames did not communicate to the adjoining houses. The body of Mrs. Brett was found about half past five o'clock, burnt to a cinder. Captain Brett had sailed on Sunday morning for Dublin.—Liverpool Courier.

He has not unfrequently accepted employment on the turnpike-roads, in the breaking of stones, &c.; and the coat which he wore up to the time of his death was so patched, that scarcely a particle of the cloth of which it was originally composed could be discovered amongst the "shreds and patches" which it exhibited.

TREATMENT OF NAPOLEON.

WE have so lately, as well as so often noticed the petty treatment experienced by this fallen conqueror, that it is not necessary for us to re-enter either into the particulars or the spirit of it*. We notice it again however agreeably to our promise to do so whenever it is brought forward; and it is sure to suggest a reflection or two worth the attention of those, who see beyond the great formal puppet-shew of the present times.

We mentioned in our last paper the substance of a long Correspondence which has lately appeared in the Chronicle, and which it is not necessary to lay before our readers. We give, however, one or two of the most interesting documents in our present number. The amount of it seems to be this,—that Sir HUDSON LOWE, the person who commands at St. Helena, wished either to oust BONAPARTE's surgeon, Mr. O'MEARA, from his situation and substitute another, or to make him report every thing he saw and heard at the Emperor's residence like a spy. Mr. O'MEARA refused to do so; and the result was, that Sir HUDSON got himself into an awkward dilemma and a long correspondence, neither of which he knew how to manage. He had even so much the worst of it with that Gentleman, that he fell into a great passion and a very small artifice, loading his subordinate Officer with personal abuse,—making gestures (according to his account) as if he would even strike him,—and pretending, because he had forced him into the alternative of resigning, to call for his resignation as a voluntary as well as inevitable thing.

It was easy to see what the Government really thought of this business from the first, by the tone which its hirelings adopted. The Courier found it so awkward a one, that with its usual half-wittedness, it sneered at the good case Mr. O'MEARA "had made out for himself." We believe these were the words. We are sure they are the spirit of them. Afterwards, however, it found itself under the necessity of using a more guarded affectation; and gave it as its opinion, that Mr. O'MEARA had acted foolishly, if not culpably,—adding, with its return of the old fit, that the alledged treatment experienced by that Gentleman could not be true, or as a British Officer, he must have challenged him! Such at least, was the amount of a very unequivocal insinuation. Now only imagine that Mr. O'MEARA the Surgeon had challenged Sir HUDSON the Governor:—what a sudden cry-out, and lift of the hands and eyes, there would have been against such dreadful insolence and insubordination! What calls for instant dismissal, punishment, and signal example, interspersed with shakes of the head and nasal mouthings, about British navy—true discipline—awful rule—peace of the world, &c. &c. as solemn and as sincere as any of FAWCETT's in a comedy! The other day, when Mr. BROUGHAM was said to have challenged a man who had a family, he was accused of challenging one who could not fight. Now, a Gentleman on service is to be accused,—not, mind, for refusing a challenge,—but for not even sending one to his superior Officer;—a proceeding, which would have exposed him to ruin itself,—at least in a service which he appears to value. Truly, Messrs. Periodical Hirelings, you are a very shallow set; and it is but fair in one who is opposed to you, to own it.

It is said that Sir HUDSON LOWE's situation is of necessity a very unpleasant one. It is; and something else may be said as truly,—that no very pleasant people are chosen for such situations. There are circumstances about the detention of BONAPARTE, especially in the particulars of his personal treatment, that a mind of delicacy and real strength would instinctively shrink from. We need not point them out to our readers. They are obvious to every one, who is unblinded by political fury, and loves open dealing and generosity. Men of the jailer sort (and this is nothing but a more splendid jailership) have usually great power with much impotence of mind; and not only do they resent the natural impatience of those subjected to it, but their very patience, or scorn, will sometimes be more provoking; and they will just get sense enough of the magnanimity to be angry at wanting it themselves, and even to be jealous of those whom it notices. It is not therefore the jailer who is so much to be deprecated on these occasions, as the spirit that employs him; and the unequivocal meanness of this, in the present instance, is betrayed more and more every day. If any fresh circumstance were wanting to shew us the infinite pettiness of the Ministers' minds in their treatment of NAPOLEON, it is one which has escaped during this correspondence,—the curious fact, that Sir HUDSON LOWE is neither more nor less than the identical commandant of the Corsican Rangers, who fought against their brother-Corsican and their own country for a nation which had abandoned it to regal France! And upon the back of this precious specimen of wit and sensibility, like one oyster on another, comes another little illustrative circumstance; namely, that the surgeon whom Sir HUDSON so anxiously wished to put in Mr. O'MEARA's place, and for whom, notwithstanding "his high rank in his profession," BONAPARTE expressed "an invincible repugnance," was no less or high a man than the Knight's Surgeon-Major in the same battalion! We do not mean a pun; but really this is low indeed!

The following passages relative to NAPOLEON are from a book lately published entitled "Memoirs of the Count DE LAS CASAS," &c. They are in a letter addressed by the Count to Prince LUCIEN:—

OF NAPOLEON'S EXERCISE.

"On arriving at Longwood the Emperor endeavoured to take exercise on horseback; the extraordinary activity of his early life rendered every interruption of it dangerous for him, and you know perhaps already that Corvisart recommended this species of exercise to him, by way of preventive of a disease with which he is threatened. The boundaries within which we could range, without being superintended by strangers, were pretty limited. The Emperor, it is well known, is accustomed to long and violent riding; but here the limited space, the uniformity of the place, the constant unvaried path, which gave his rides in some measure the appearance of a manège lesson, filled him with disgust, and he was soon induced to renounce that pleasure altogether; and neither our exhortations nor our urgent entreaties could ever afterwards induce him to alter his resolution. "It is impossible for me," he would say, "to turn myself in so confined a circle: when I have a horse under me, I feel a constant desire to give it the rein; and this is a desire which I cannot gratify here; it is a torture which I cannot bear." The island is from 25 to 30 miles in circumference. The Emperor was allowed to ride over every part of it under the superintendence of an English officer: but this is a constraint to which he could never subject himself.

"Neither the difference in the colour of the cloth, nor his being surrounded by men of a different nation, is an annoyance to the Emperor; 'for,' says he, 'whoever has received the baptism of fire is, in my eyes, of the same religion;' but he never wished to go into the open air except for recreation: on such an occasion he might have been desirous of opening his heart to us without reserve, but the presence of a stranger would have rendered this impossible: he might have been disposed for a moment to forget his unfortunate situation, but the presence of his gaoler would have perpetually recalled it to his remembrance. 'Every thing in human life,' he said, 'is subject to calculation, and evil and good must be balanced: the good which would accrue to my body is by no means equal to the injury which my mind must thereby necessarily suffer.'

"One day Admiral Cockburn, with much courtesy, expressed a willingness to allow greater liberty to the Emperor when he rode out; but this was but for a single day, for the following morning, whether he repented of what he had done, or had some other reason, it was pretended that there had been a misunderstanding, and so the matter was dropped."

OF HIS MODE OF SPENDING HIS TIME.

"The principal occupation of the Emperor consists in reading in his apartment, or in dictating to one of us the chief events of his life. The time spent in St. Helena will not be altogether lost for history and the glory of France. The campaigns of Italy and Egypt are already written; this is a work worthy of the great subject of it; it belonged to him who performed these wonders to describe them.

"The Emperor has acquired the English language, and to me the fame is due of having instructed him in it: in less than thirty lessons he was able to understand the English journals; he now reads already every English work. * * * * *

"The openness and honesty of Admiral Malcolm in particular, deserve to be mentioned in high terms of praise; our irritability in our misery, as well as the peculiarity of his official situation, have alone prevented us from giving expression to the feelings which he and Lady Malcolm, for whose character we have the most cordial regard, have excited in our breasts.

"One day this Admiral, in a conversation with us, happened accidentally to discover that we had no shade, and that we had it in contemplation to procure a tent for the Emperor under which he might occasionally pass the day. Not long after this conversation, the Emperor was enabled to take his breakfast in a spacious tent rapidly constructed out of the sails of the frigate. This was a piece of European politeness which was here quite unexpected by us, and it could not fail, therefore, to produce on us a deep impression. The Emperor has often used, and still uses this tent, but not always without interruption. How often on the approach of a troublesome enemy has he been obliged to break off in the middle of his conversation or dictation! He would then say, 'let us return to our hut; they grudge me even the fresh air which I here breathe.'

"Every thing, even down to the most petty details, betrays the personal character and disposition of our gaoler; he puts into our hands the journals in which we are harshly treated, and keeps from us those in which we are spoken of in less hostile terms; he retains the works which are favourable to us, under the pretext that they did not come through the hands of the Ministry, and he displays the utmost zeal in furnishing us with every libel against us from his own private library.

"Your exalted brother remains the same under all circumstances, and we who have enjoyed the felicity of living with him have daily opportunities of convincing ourselves of the truth of what has been called in question in the common proverb, namely, that a great man may remain great and even appear still greater in the eyes of those who see him undressed, and who do not quit his bedside night or day.

"The Emperor sleeps very little; he goes early to bed; and as he knows that I am also a bad sleeper, he frequently sends for me to bear him company till he falls asleep; he wakes pretty regularly about three o'clock, when a light is brought him, and he works till six or seven: he then lays himself down again to endeavour to sleep a second time: about nine o'clock breakfast is served to him on a small round table, a sort of gueridon beside his couch; here he frequently sends for one of us; he then reads, works or slumbers during the oppressive heat of the day; he afterwards dictates to us. For a long time he used, about four o'clock in the afternoon, to take us all out with him in the caleche, but at last he got tired of this, as he before did of riding; he now continues to walk till the humidity of the air compels him to return to the house. If he remains out after four o'clock in the open air, he is certain of being seized in the evening with rheumatic pains in the head, a pretty severe cough, and violent toothache. On his return he dictates till about eight o'clock; he then repairs to the dining-room, and plays a game at chess before dinner. During the desert, when the servants have withdrawn, he usually reads to us some passages from our best poets or from some other books of importance. These are the most minute details of the manner in which the Emperor at present lives; he would esteem himself happy in his distance from the rest of the world, were it permitted him, amidst our pious and careful attentions, forgotten by men, to live for a few hours only free from suffering; but since the arrival of the new Governor, neither a day, nor an hour, nor a moment passes, in which he does not receive fresh wounds; a sting may be said to be in constant operation to tear open the wounds, the pain of which a short slumber might have somewhat deadened."

OF SIR HUDSON LOWE.

"The noble-minded English beside us," says the Count, "as well as those who merely visited the island," used to say that our treatment would experience a great and blessed change when the new Governor appeared, &c. &c. "This new Messiah at length came; but, gracious God! the word escapes involuntarily from my pen; it was an executioner, a gens-d'arme whom they had sent. On his appearance every thing assumed a dark and gloomy aspect; every appearance of external respect, and all the forms prescribed by a due regard to decency, which had hitherto been observed, at once disappeared; every day since has been to us a day of greater pain and more insulting treatment; he has narrowed still farther the boundaries prescribed to us, and even endeavoured to interfere with our domestic economy; he has strictly interdicted all intercourse with the natives, and even prohibited all society with officers of his own nation; he has ordered our residence to be surrounded with ditches and palisades; he has increased the number of soldiers, and endeavoured to make prisons within prisons; he has surrounded us with objects of affright, and reduced us to close custody. The Emperor remains almost always in his prison, and no longer leaves his apartment. The few audiences which he has given to that officer, have been highly disagreeable and oppressive to him: he has put an end to them and determined not to see the Governor any more. 'I had just grounds,' he observed, 'to complain of the Admiral, though he had at least a heart; but this man has not even a vestige of the character of an Englishman; he is nothing but a low Sicilian shirro.'

"Sir Hudson Lowe pleads the instructions of his Minister in justification of himself, with respect to all these complaints; if this justification is well founded, his instructions are most barbarous; but he can bear witness at the same time, that he endeavours to carry them into execution in a barbarous manner."

[FROM THE MORNING CHRONICLE.]

Plantation-house, April 21.

SIR,—Although by an instruction from my Government I am dispensed from entering into any personal correspondence with you, and that the insinuations conveyed in your letter of the 13th inst., preceded by a verbal communication to an officer of my staff, couched in such highly offensive terms, as caused him to withdraw from your house, furnish me with an additional motive to act according to the letter of that instruction; yet I shall not derive a motive from such circumstance to omit communicating to you for the information of Napoleon Bonaparte, the following remarks on the leading subject of your letter.

Mr. O'Meara's intention to quit Longwood was known in England so far back as the month of August, 1817, as will appear by the extract of a letter annexed No 1.

I enclose also a copy of the only stipulation he has made known to me.

Your letter states, that Napoleon Bonaparte has been sick these seven months past "d'une maladie chronique du foie." To a question put to Mr. O'Meara on the 25th of March, that is one month past, he replied, after a great deal of hesitation and unwillingness to name any specific disorder, saying at first a derangement of the biliary system; that if called upon to give it a name, he should call it an incipient hepatitis: and that even this might have been wholly avoided by taking exercise, as had been recommended. When asked if he knew of any obstacle to Napoleon Bonaparte taking exercise, he replied, he knew of none, except what might be occasioned by the state of the weather.

You cannot, Sir, dispute the propriety of my having desired to have other medical opinion called in, where such a pointed difference exists between your statement and this of Mr. O'Meara, as the words "chronic" and "incipient" convey.

You observe, "que depuis deux-ans vous avez voulu chasser Mr. O'Meara pour le remplacer par Mr. Baxter." The extract, No. 1, of Lord Bathurst's letter, above referred to, proves this to be unfounded. I do not, however, build upon this letter alone; no such intention has ever been entertained by me. No proposition has ever been made from or to Mr. Baxter to occupy Mr. O'Meara's situation at Longwood; nor, if Mr. O'Meara was to quit this island, should I approve that Mr. Baxter, with the other important duties he has to exercise, should be attached to the establishment at Longwood alone.

As a gentleman of high professional abilities, and of a high rank in his profession, he came out to this island, that he might be at hand, if required, to be called upon in any case of serious malady; but he did not come out here with any view, design, or intention whatever, of entering into the situation held by Mr. O'Meara.

The most remarkable part, however, Sir, of your letter, is that where you speak of the invincible repugnance entertained against him. I shall no further comment on the terms or spirit of this uncalled-for and unprovoked expression, than to state, that, on the late occasion of your seeing Mr. Baxter, which was in November last, you were most solicitous to impress on his mind, that the objection of Napoleon Bonaparte to see him did not spring from any personal motives. You dwelt upon the confidence, on the respect entertained as well for his personal as for his professional qualities; the eulogium was so strong, that I have never been able to obtain from Mr. Baxter the repetition of all you said to him. Mr. O'Meara has confirmed to him the same favourable sentiments on the part of Napoleon Bonaparte; the repugnance you at present state, it was therefore impossible for me to know or foresee; I shall not fail to make known to my Government the desire expressed for a French or Italian physician.

In reply to the two points which you are charged to make known to me, and which are the only parts of your letter, I can consider as coming from Napoleon Bonaparte himself, I beg leave to observe,

Firstly, That the communication, "que le Docteur O'Meara est le seul Médecin de ceux qui sont sur ce rocher en qui le malade ait confiance," was not made known until Mr. O'Meara himself had actually tendered his resignation.

Secondly, Where you protest "contre son renvoi de quelques prétextes qu'on cherche à colorer à moins que ce ne soit la conséquence d'un jugement légal," that Mr. O'Meara being an officer in the King's service, and employed under Government, no civil process is necessary to effect his removal.

His resignation has been tendered, and if his removal has not already taken place, it has been solely from a consideration to the arguments expressed in your letter, and the difficulty of supplying his place by any other person on this island not objectionable to Napoleon Bonaparte himself.

I enclose a copy of my decision, in reply to the tender of Mr. O'Meara's resignation, begging leave at the same time to express my sincere desire, however this assurance may be received, to conciliate the departure of Mr. O'Meara, whenever it may take place, with ever possible regard in my power to the considerations your letter has presented to me.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

(Signed)

H. Lowe, Lieut.-Gen.

To Lieut.-General Count Bertrand.

NOTES.

1. To detail minutely Sir Hudson Lowe's conduct since his arrival in the island, and during 1816 and 1817, would be too long, and the question has already been the subject of disquisition in the observations upon Lord Bathurst's speech; during the first four months of 1818, his conduct has become still worse; the ship Cambridge, laden with different kinds of merchandise for the colony, arrived from England, and anchored in the roads on the 3d of February. One of the officers belonging to her had purchased in some of the London print-shops, two striking likenesses of young Napoleon. Sir Hudson Lowe caused them to be brought to him, as he pretended, to offer them himself to the father, but in reality to deprive him of them, well knowing that the officer's intentions were to sell them at Longwood. No law takes cognizance of this action, nor is there any punishment ordained for it in the laws enacted against crimes, because it comes under the jurisdiction of opinion, but such conduct must be reprobated by every upright man.

2. The English Government confided the furnishing of provisions to Mr. Balcombe, whose family was the only one who occasionally visited the French, and in whom they had confidence. Sir Hudson Lowe deprived Mr. Balcombe of the purveyorship on the 1st of April, 1818, availing himself of the temporary departure of the head of the concern for London. The purveyorship has been since given to Mr. Ibbetson, Commissary-General, a man of honour; but his nomination is evidently titular, as he is too much occupied with his other duties to attend to the minute details of the service, which will fall into the hands of disreputable persons, void of credit or reputation.

3. Napoleon has been afflicted with chronic hepatitis since the month of September, 1817. Sir Hudson Lowe has persecuted his surgeon, and obliged him to give in his resignation, and consequently the treatment which was put in practice to subdue the malady must have ceased. This day, 1st of May, the patient has been days unassisted by his surgeon, such conduct must be

4. Since October, 1817, Mr. O'Meara discontinued writing bulletins, because he engaged, if any were made, to leave the original in Count Bertrand's hands, which would render any falsification of them impossible. Sir Hudson Lowe employed Mr. Baxter to make bulletins without his having ever seen the patient. These bulletins are only fit to conceal projects

5. See the annexed certificate, marked L. of Mr. O'Meara, in which that gentleman declares that it never was his intention to quit Longwood. In his letter of the 12th of April, he gave a conditional resignation—"I could prefer giving in my resignation to submitting to any such restrictions, as no pecuniary advantages are sufficiently powerful to induce me to give up my rights as a British subject, and to sully the uniform which I have the honour to wear." But if it were true, that this officer wished to give in his resignation, what necessity would there be to force him to do so? If he had resigned voluntarily, every thing would have been regular; but it appears that, because he wished to give in his resignation, Sir Hudson Lowe forces him to do so; what a pitiful argument!

6. What! Sir Hudson Lowe did not know that Mr. O'Meara was Napoleon's surgeon! He did not know that the English Government, in August, 1815, had accorded to Napoleon permission to take with him his surgeon, three of his officers, and twelve servants, and that Mr. O'Meara was that surgeon? This is truly absurd.

7. This paragraph contains three falsehoods:—1st. That Sir Hudson did not know that Napoleon had been ill for seven months of a liver complaint. See Sir Hudson Lowe's letters of 2d October, 6th and 26th of ditto, and 18th of November, 1817; and Count Bertrand's letters to Sir Hudson of the 10th September, 2d, 7th, and 27th of October, 20th of November, 1817, and Mr. O'Meara's bulletin of the 1st and 5th of October (the originals of which were delivered to Sir Hudson the day they were written), especially that part which states, "as he has not since the Report been entirely free from pain, it is most probable that the complaint is chronic hepatitis." 2d. That Mr. O'Meara said on the 25th of March, 1818, that he did not know what his patient's complaint was (see the Certificate annexed, marked L, in which this assertion is declared to be a falsehood.) Without doubt, such an assertion is to be found in the Bulletins, which were fabricated * * * 3d. That he did not know why Napoleon did not go out, and that it was caused by the badness of the weather. This bad weather has lasted for twenty months; that is to say, since the day Sir Hudson Lowe took upon himself the right of making such restrictions as those of the 9th

October, 1816. (See Sir Hudson Lowe's letters of the 26th of December, 1816, of the 14th of March, 2d, 4th, 6th, and 9th of October, 1817; and, in general, all the letter quoted in the 7th note, in which there is at the same time question of Napoleon's health, and the obstacles which prevented him from going out.) It is difficult to divine what can be this officer's object in advancing such falsehoods, which are belied by public notoriety, by the evidence of the very persons he cites, and by a series of letters. Probably it is, because he is of opinion that * * *

This results, 1st, from the communication which he made himself in the third audience which he had in May, 1816; a proposition which Napoleon rejected with anger: 2d, from his correspondence. See the letters on the 6th of October, 28th of November, 1817, and the 10th of April, 1818. 3d, He has, in fact, invested Mr. Baxter with the principal functions of surgeon at Longwood, by causing him to make bulletins of Napoleon's health, although he never saw him.

9. The invincible repugnance which the Emperor Napoleon had for Mr. Baxter was known to Sir Hudson Lowe; and the conversation which he quotes is another and a new proof of it.—This conversation is entirely perverted in his letter. Mr. Baxter declared one day, that want of exercise was mortal in this climate. Count Bertrand replied, that Napoleon did not stir out of his house, in order to shelter himself from Sir Hudson Lowe's outrages. From thence the conversation turned upon the repugnance which Napoleon appeared to have to receive Mr. Baxter's advice; and Count Bertrand said to him, that it was probable such repugnance was caused by Sir H. Lowe's requiring every person who was received at Longwood to report to him every thing which he said, saw, or heard there (which he had recently required even from Mr. O'Meara): that, perhaps, if he (Mr. Baxter) would declare, that if he were called in consultation at Longwood, he would give beforehand his word of honour not to profit by it, so as to convert it into means of espionage, it was probable the greatest obstacle would be removed; the conversation terminated with mutual compliments; and in the evening when Count Bertrand spoke of it to the Emperor, he found fault with him, and said, "que sa repugnance étoit invincible, contre ce medecin qui a été Chirurgien-Major du bataillon de deserteurs Corses au service de l'Angleterre, dont Sir Lowe étoit Commandant."

10. First, Mr. O'Meara being Napoleon's surgeon, and by his choice, Sir Hudson had no right to remove him, or to impose another upon Napoleon.

Second, Mr. O'Meara is not employed at Longwood as officer in his Britannic Majesty's service, but as Napoleon's surgeon, and consequently his person ought to be sacred, and no attempt should have been made upon him until after having made known to him the crime of which he was culpable, or by bringing him to trial before a competent tribunal.

Even the British Government cannot change Mr. O'Meara without first revoking its decision in August, 1815, which grants to Napoleon his surgeon.

It results from this tissue of falsehoods that Sir Hudson Lowe * * * has deprived Napoleon of his surgeon, or wishes to impose another upon him.

During seven months, Napoleon's malady has suffered two interruptions of treatment—one of 15 days, in October, 1817; and the one which actually exists since the 10th of April.

A NEW CATECHISM

FOR THE USE OF THE NATIVES OF HAMPSHIRE;
NECESSARY TO BE MADE IN ALL STIES.

"Grundibat graviter pecus suillum."
Claudius; Annalium 15, apud Diomedem.

BY THE LATE PROFESSOR PORSON.

Q. What is your name?—A. Hog or Swine.

Did God make you a hog?—No! God made me man in his own image; the Right Honourable SUBLIME and BEAUTIFUL made me a swine*.

How did he make you a swine?—By muttering uncouth words and dark spells: he is a dealer in the black art.

Who feeds you?—Our drivers, the only real men in the COUNTY.

* Reflections.—P. 117. Ed. I.

How many hogs are you in all?—Seven or eight millions.

How many drivers?—Two or three hundred thousand.

With what do they feed you?—Generally with husks, swill, draft, malt-grains; now and then with a few potatoes; and when they have too much butter-milk for themselves, they spare us some.

What are your occupations?—To be yoked to the plough; to do all hard work; for which purpose we still, as you see, retain enough of our original form, speech, and reason, to carry our drivers on our shoulders, or draw them in carriages.

Are your drivers independent on each other?—No; our immediate drivers are driven by a smaller number; and that number by a still smaller; and so on, till at last you come to the CHIEF HOG DRIVER.

Has your chief driver any marks of his office?—A brass helmet on his head, and an iron poker in his hand.

By what title does he wear his helmet?—In contempt of the choice of the hogs.

Do the drivers wear badges of distinction?—Many; some have particular frocks and slops; others garter below the knee; some have a red rag across their jacket, and some carry sticks and poles.

How do they look in their trappings?—Like a sow on a side-saddle.

What is the use of that iron ring in your snout?—To hinder us from rooting in our driver's garden.

What is the use of that wooden yoke on your neck?—To keep us from breaking through our driver's fences; but both ring and yoke are principally intended to diminish our strength and spirits, and to prevent our resistance, if at any time we fancy we have too little victuals or too much whipping.

What is the use of those whips and cudgels that some of your drivers bear?—To beat us when we grunt too loud for the slumbers of the upper driver.

Do your drivers ever meet to transact business?—Yes; formerly their meetings continued only three weeks, but of late they have been prolonged to seven.

What do they do at these meetings?—They sell us.

You seem to me too lean to be very profitable?—The greatest profit to our drivers lies in our work; besides, most of them agree at the meeting, that we enjoy an unexampled degree of fatness, plumpness, and sleekness, and that methods should be taken rather to starve than pamper us, lest we should grow fat and kick.

Where do they meet?—In a rotten house. The nominal president is the chief hog driver, otherwise called FATHER OF THE HOGS; but the true president, alias the Step-father of the Hogs, is the governor of the sub-meeting. Every thing is done by the latter and attributed to the former. The latter raises and lowers the price of pork at his pleasure.

Truly the gentleman seems to have brought his hogs to a fair market. But you mentioned the sub-meeting?—Yes; there is also an upper meeting.

Are the members of it skillful in pork?—They are born (or created) skillful in all branches of butchery.

Of whom consists the sub-meeting?—Of middle drivers chosen by us, and sent on behalf of the poor herd of swine; to take care that they be not starved to death, but only kept as lean as possible; to see that no undue cruelty is used, but only that they be whipped within an inch of their lives.

Do you choose and send agents that can make no better terms for you than these?—We did not choose and send them.

Why you said even now that they were chosen and sent by you?—They are chosen and not chosen.

A paradox! Try to explain.—You know that the county of Hampshire is parceled out into farms, some over-stocked with hogs, and some almost empty. Some of these hogs have a bit of potatoe ground allowed them by their drivers, and others have none. Now, only the potatoed hogs are entitled to nominate an agent for the meeting. Every farm sends one agent, and consequently all the agents may be sent by a very few hogs.

Where the herd is small, the driver will make himself agent by threatening to starve you, or will otherwise win you to his purpose; but how do they manage you when you are numerous?—They praise our beauty, good sense, good-nature, gentleness, and great superiority to all other hogs; they kiss the old sows and the young pigs; they give us our belly full of new beer, till we are as drunk as David's sow, and wallow in the mire. In this condition they make us choose them, while we really know nothing at all of the matter.

Do they promise beforehand to take care of you?—Yes; and forget to perform it afterwards.

But you choose another agent when one has betrayed you?—Very often we cannot. Nay one of the drivers the other day told the hogs on his farm, that he had bought them, and would sell them.

What is the advantage of being an agent?—Some court the office merely for the honour, but all the knowing ones are hired by the governors to say that none of them are hired, and that they are all chosen by the free sense of the swinish multitude.

How many are hired?—A majority.

How much is reckoned decent wages?—Nothing under the price of several hundred hogs.

Do they ever graciously condescend to inform you of their resolutions?—They write copies of them and send them about.

Gratis of course?—No; but they will let us have a copy for a few dozens of potatoes.

The resolutions however are easy to read?—Scarcely one of us in twenty can read at all, for we are told by our drivers that we ought to be ignorant.

Are they sincere in this?—Very sincere; for they are constantly rewarded in proportion to their own ignorance. But alas! if we could read, it would be nothing, for the resolutions are not written in English.

No; they are written I know in Hog Latin, but that I took for granted you understand.—Shameful aspersion on the hogs! the most inarticulate grunting of our tribe is sense and harmony compared to such jargon.

Do not your drivers then appoint interpreters for you?—Yes; that they would call in their own case buying a pig in a poke.

What are the interpreters called?—THE BLACK LETTER SISTERHOOD.

Why do they give the office to women?—Because they have a fluent tongue and a knack at scolding.

How are they dressed?—In gowns and false hair.

What are the principal orders?—Three; Writers, Talkers, and Hearers; which last, are likewise called Deciders.

What is their general business?—To discuss the mutual quarrels of the hogs, and to punish affronts to any or all of the drivers.

How can one hog affront all the drivers?—By speaking the truth.

What is the truth?—What is that to you?

If two hogs quarrel, how do they apply to the sisterhood?—Each hog goes separately to a writer.

What does the writer?—She goes to a talker.

What does the talker?—She goes to a hearer or decider.

What does the hearer decide?—What she pleases.

If a hog is decided to be in the right, what is the consequence?—He is almost ruined.

If in the wrong?—He is quite ruined.

What is the true reason of this practice?—The ease and interest of the sisterhood. If it were otherwise, they would have more work and less wages.

What is the pretended reason?—That they are afraid we should never have done quarreling if they could easily settle our disputes.

That is, they pull out your tusks that you may not bite each other. Is not this reason mockery as well as oppression?—No; they tell us that what has been done ought to be done again.

Do none of the drivers take compassion on you, when they see you thus "grunt and sweat under a weary life?"—Several agents in the sub-meeting have proposed schemes for our relief, but have always been overpowered by a great majority.

Could that majority give any reasons for their behaviour?—Nine.

Name the first.—They said for their parts they were very well contented as they were.

The second?—They believed the present system of hog-driving would last out their time.

The third?—The chief hog-driver had published an advertisement against giving the hogs any relief.

The fourth?—The hogs were very desirous to have some relief.

The fifth?—The hogs were in perfect tranquillity at present.

The sixth?—The hogs were in a violent ferment at present.

The seventh?—The hogs were too good to need relief.

The eighth?—The hogs were too bad to deserve relief.

The ninth?—If they gave us what was right, they could not help giving us what was wrong.

How do you look when you hear such a mass of lies and nonsense?—We stare like stuck pigs.

But you are vastly superior in numbers and strength, how are you kept quiet under such complicated injuries?—By force and by art.

By what force?—By twenty thousand hogs in armour.

By what art?—By sowing the seeds of discord among us.

Whom do they employ to sow the seeds of discord?—The ministers of peace.

How do these ministers execute their commission?—

They tell the simpler hogs that their brethren mean to cut the throats of their drivers, and then to turn drivers themselves.

How do these hogs treat the obnoxious swine?—They burn down their sties and eat up their meal and potatoes.

Have the ministers of peace, as you call them, any other employment?—Yes; they tell us from time to time that unless we believe all that they say, and do all that our drivers bid us, we shall infallibly go to the devil.

Do they themselves believe what they teach you? (Hog shakes his head.) Why do yo hesitate? Do they themselves believe what they teach you?—They believe—that it is for their own interest that we should believe it.

How are the peace-makers rewarded?—With our potatoes.

What with all?—Ten per cent only.

Then you have still ninety left in the hundred?—No; we have only forty left.

What becomes of the odd fifty?—The drivers take them, partly as a small recompence for their trouble in protecting us, and partly to make money of them for the prosecution of law suits with the neighbouring farmers.

Do they not reserve for their own use ten times as many as they want?—They eat till they are full, and pelt each other with the remainder.

You talk very sensibly for a hog; whence had you your information?—From a learned pig.

* Instead of groan, Mr. Malou has restored grunt from the old copies.

Are there many learned pigs in Hampshire?—Many, and the number daily increases.

What say they of the treatment which you suffer?—That it is shameful, and ought instantly to be redressed.

What do the drivers say to these pigs?—That the devil is in them.

It is a devil of their own conjuring: but what do the drivers do to these pigs?—They knock them down.

Do all the learned pigs make the same complaint?—All; for the instant a pig defends the contrary opinion, he resumes his old form, and becomes a real man master and tormentor general of innocent animals.

Are there any other methods of recovering the human shape?—None, but a promise to treat the herd we have left with exemplary severity.

Who disenchant you?—The governor of the sub-meeting must always consent, but the ceremonies of transformation vary.

Give me an instance of a ceremony.—The hog that is going to be disenchanted grovels before the chief driver, who holds an iron skewer over him, and gives him a smart blow on the shoulder, in token of former subjection and future submission. Immediately he starts up, like the devil from Ithuriel's spear, in his proper shape, and ever after goes about with a nick name. He then beats his hogs without mercy; and when they implore his compassion, and beg him to recollect that he was once their fellow-swine, he denies that ever he was a hog.

What are the rights of a hog?—To be whipt and bled by men.

What are the duties of a man?—To whip and bleed hogs.

Do they ever whip and bleed you to death?—Not always; the common method is to bleed us by intervals.

How many ounces do they take at a time?—That depends upon the state of the patient. As soon as he faints, they bind up the wound; but they open his veins afresh when he has a little recovered his loss: hence comes the proverb to bleed like a pig.

What is the liberty of a hog?—To choose between half starving and whole starving.

What is the property of a hog?—A wooden trough, food and drink just enough to keep in life; and a truss of musty straw, on which ten or a dozen of us pig together.

What dish is most delicious to a driver's palate?—A hog's pudding.

What music is sweetest to a driver's ear?—Our shrieks in bleeding.

What is a driver's favourite diversion?—To set his dogs upon us.

What is the general wish of the hogs at present?—To save their bacon.

CHORUS OF HOGS.—AMEN.

FRANCE.

PARIS, AUG. 23.—We are assured that the Duke of Wellington, since his last visit to England, has definitively regulated every thing that has a relation to the evacuation of the English troops, the review of which is fixed for the beginning of September.—Journal de la Belgique.

AUG. 24.—A frightful crime was committed at Thoulouse on the 14th of this month, by a young woman, on the person of her brother. Mazas, a married woman, whose maiden name was Garry, had, it is said, gone security for her brother in the sum of 1,300 francs. Before the time of payment, the husband went to Moissac, to demand the amount of the engagement; but he only received from his brother-in-law an evasive and unsatisfactory answer; he merely informed him that he would shortly go to Thoulouse. Mazas, on his return, acquaints his wife with the manner in which he had been received, and she, furious at such conduct, thinks no more but on the means of vengeance. On the arrival of her brother, she went and purchased a cutlass, and communicated to more than one person her horrible project. In vain the most prudent considerations were addressed to her; she persists in her frightful design, and at two o'clock having met her brother, whom she had sought the whole morning, she conducted him into a passage of the Sieur Assalit's house, and after having poured the most violent reproaches on him, she plunges the poniard into his bosom. The unfortunate Garry totters, and falls lifeless, without the power to call assistance. The assassin instantly comes out without showing the least emotion, and retires to her own house, where she changes her dress. Immediately after arrested, and interrogated at first by the police, and a little after by the Judge of Instruction, the woman Mazas answers coldly, that if she had shed her brother's blood she doubtless had powerful motives for it, and that the singular bad faith of her victim had elevated her head, and guided her fury.

GERMANY.

BAMBERG, AUG. 6.—We have received circumstantial details of the new sect which was formed some time ago in Saxony, the fanaticism of which occasioned lately a frightful assassination. This sect is established principally in the circles of Leipsic and Misnia; it pretends to observe with the greatest rigour all the doctrines of the Old Testament, to reject the New, to destroy all those who do not follow the same system, and to proclaim the regeneration of the whole human race. It teaches and adopts a great number of superstitious tenets, and among others, thinks that it merits the favour of God by inflicting tortures on men and animals. The principal leader of the sect is one Kloos, a tailor, who has been continually going about near Leipsic, preaching his dangerous doctrines. He held numerous meetings in the open air; he then preached in the villages, and inspired his fanaticism into a great multitude of persons. The miller, Fescher, of Beyersdorff, and his wife, committed a murder under horrible circumstances. Kloos had been instilling his principles into them for several days. They were before persons of excellent character; but after remaining for some days on their knees in the open air, without taking any nourishment but a few roots, they believed themselves called upon to make sacrifices. They declared that they received a commission to bury some children alive; but happily they were unable to execute this frightful project. A servant, called Flor, arrived at their mill, at the instant when the fury of Fescher and his wife was in a state of the most perfect exaltation. They looked upon him as a victim whose sacrifice would be agreeable to God. They assassinated him in a horrible manner, cutting off his hands and feet, and then beginning immediately to sing and pray. A young miller for whom they had reserved the same fate escaped from their hands by flight. He described what passed—the miller and his wife were arrested—they boasted of the deed they had committed, and declared to the Judge appointed to draw up their indictment, that God had given them a commission to exterminate all those who would not profess their doctrines, because they were children of the Devil. It will be observed that these principles bear a near resemblance to those which the famous Foeschl professed the last year in Austria. It is likewise known that other fanatics of the same sect projected fresh assassinations. As soon as the report of this event was carried to Dresden, the Government took measures adapted to the circumstances. Troops were despatched to take military possession of all the villages where the fanatics were established. Informations were taken against those who excited Kloos, for it is said he received his instructions from persons who belonged to a better class of society. As soon as Kloos heard they were in search of him, he took to flight, but he was seized in the city of Meissen, and has been for some days in prison.

MANHEIM, AUG. 12.—It appears that the result of the disturbances at Göttingen was, that 14 students and 12 hussars were more or less wounded; one of the students (a Swiss) and one hussar have died of their wounds.

DRESDEN, AUG. 12.—According to an annual ordinance, the execution of which has lately been desired by the merchants of Leipzig, the Jewish merchants frequenting the fairs were prohibited from having open warehouses in the principal streets and quarters of the city. The revival of this ordinance having excited complaints, the King ordered the superior Chamber of Commerce to inquire into this subject. The result has been a decision of his Majesty to suppress this ancient ordinance, as not suitable to the present state of things, so that the Jewish merchants frequenting the fairs at Leipzig shall henceforward be allowed to hire and keep warehouses in whatever part of the city they shall think fit, and to sell there during the fairs, both wholesale and retail.

FRANKFORT, AUG. 16.—Letters from Riga state, that by an unanimous resolution of the Nobility of Livonia, the servitude of the peasants is abolished in that province, after the example previously given by the Nobility of Esthonia and Courland. This resolution will be laid before the Emperor Alexander for his approbation.

EAST INDIES.

Dispatches have been received from the Bombay Government, under date the 11th of April, enclosing a long series of official documents from Sir Thomas Hislop, Sir John Malcolm, and other officers engaged in operations against the Pindarees and the Peishwa, from the 23d of January to the end of March inclusive. The great body of our enemies has been dispersed and subdued. Amongst the despatches is a narrative, by Sir Thomas Hislop, of an attack upon the fortress of Talneir, the Killedar of which had set himself in rebellion against the British Government. An attack upon the fort was therefore made. Seeing the effect of our batteries on his works, the Killedar solicited terms, and came forward to surrender himself at discretion to our Adjutant-General. Some of our officers, with a dozen grenadiers of the Royal Scots, having entered one of the interior gates, which was opened from within, were treacherously attacked by the Arabs in garrison, who butchered them with spears and arrows before any assistance could be sent to them. Major Gordon and Capt. Mac Gregor were killed; and Lieut.-Colonel M. Murray, ere he could draw his sword, was desperately wounded by the daggers of these perfidious people. Their success, however, was short. The other gates were blown open by cannon; the place was instantly stormed; the garrison, consisting of 300 Arabs and others, was put to the sword; and the Killedar himself hanged by order of Sir T. Hislop. Cheetoo, it appears, had withdrawn himself from our custody and run off, but was pursued by a division of the British army.

LANCASTER, AUG. 20.—RAPE.—Charles Mawdesley, aged 25, a tall athletic man, was put upon his trial for ravishing Betty Clitheroe, wife of John Clitheroe, at Upholland.

Betty Clitheroe, a modest simple-looking woman, stated, that she had been six years married, had three children, and was then very near her time. On the 11th of June, in the evening, she went to see her mother at Orrill, about a mile from Upholland. She left her mother's house at nine, carrying a basket with coffee, and bread, and took the path through the fields towards her own house; she met the prisoner in the fields, and they passed without speaking a word; she had never seen him before: it was quite light, so as to distinguish his features quite well. She afterwards met Thomas Goss, and they passed without speaking. When she had gone about a quarter of a mile she heard steps behind her. It was a remote, solitary place. She turned round, and saw the prisoner reaching his hand towards her shoulder. He knocked the basket off her head and took most indecent liberties with her, which she resisted with both her hands and screamed out. He said if she would not hush he would kill her. She said, "Do good man, have mercy, for I am with child." After the most brutal outrages he effected his purpose, and ran towards Orrill. She had been 20 minutes or half an hour struggling with the prisoner: he skinned the inside of one of her knees.

John Clitheroe stated, that the day after he saw some coats scattered at the place.

Thomas Goss had on a Thursday met a woman in the path; he had no words with her; a man had gone before him, and he saw him crouching down in a ditch bottom. He believed it was Charles Mawdesley, but was not positive. He had formerly known Mrs. Clitheroe by sight, but did not know that the woman he saw passing with the basket was she.

Two other witnesses remembered hearing shrieks which appeared to come from the path over the fields.

The prisoner denied being guilty. Some witnesses were called for him, but the only one of any consequence was Henry Fairman, who said that he saw the prisoner several times at work between nine and ten by his clock, which he affirmed to be correct. He admitted however that the only way of ascertaining its correctness was by bringing an account of the time from a place two miles off.

The Jury consulted for three quarters of an hour and returned a verdict of Guilty, but recommended the prisoner to mercy.

We have not taken up the promised subject of the Bedford Charity this week, because on looking again at the subject, we are convinced that the letter of the Charter is against the admission of Jewish Children, and it is a very dangerous precedent to meddle with the letter of Charters,—as we all have reason to know. We shall take an early opportunity, however, of making an article on the general treatment experienced by the Jews.

Attention will be paid to the interesting Communication of an Impartial Observer.

The Literary Notices were not resumed, because the book-season, as it is called, had passed, and it was found that they would have been of little comparative use. They will appear towards winter.

The Letter of "WARBURTON" is deferred till next week, when it will certainly appear.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, AUGUST 31.

THE Paris papers are chiefly occupied with accounts of the festival of St. Louis, on the eve of which, last Monday, there was a splendid court. This day is to the French court what a birth-day is with us,—the name-day, as it is called, being kept in France instead of the other. The King, with a laudable union of policy and humanity, and agreeably to a former ordonnance which held out the expectation of pardon to prisoners who well conducted themselves, granted it to 490 individuals, among whom were no less than "127 condemned for political offences." By this we may judge of the number that are arrested. It is stated, that an additional interest was to be conferred on the day by the announcement of the pregnancy of the Duchess of Berry. The Courier, in praising his Majesty's benevolence, says that a better day could not have been selected for its exercise "than the festival of St. Louis, of a Prince, whose love of justice rendered his name peculiarly venerable." Our Ministerial friend is always blundering. When he cannot blunder outright, he will do it by implication. St. Louis the 9th might have loved justice abstractedly; but such is the pernicious effect of religious bigotry, even upon naturally good dispositions, that the same lover of justice, St. Louis, left Europe with great armies, to go and cut up thousands of better men, because they differed with him in faith. He got himself into an awkward dilemma with his intended dead men; for he was taken prisoner with his nobles, and obliged to ransom himself at a great price;—a very natural termination of such proceedings and all that resemble them, when the adversary, as the Saracens at that time were, is a wiser head than the assailant.

But this is nothing to the vagaries which "this cunning Isaac" of a writer has been playing during the rest of the week. We usually let his sapience and the news go hand in hand, for then the reader has the events of the time and the intellectual spirit of some of its rulers at once. We have noticed one or two of them in our first article. The delicious FERDINAND of Spain, after all his affected airs of proud confidence, and after all the assertions of the Courier that the South American Independents were in a wretched condition, has been obliged to make application to the British Power for interference. It is said that the subject will be matter of earnest discussion at Aix-la-Chapelle; and the Courier insinuates a hope, that if arbitration should be of no use, the Allies will assist with their armies. We need not point out to our readers the luckless absurdity of such a proceeding, if it could possibly take place; for if the Allies, by dint of making promises which they have never kept, and in spite of the bad character which kings had been acquiring for many years, could resist a power like BONAPARTE's upon the mere strength of a popular feeling, what could they reasonably expect but to be cut down like boobies (man or bird), if they dared to make a crusade of this sort? What! To say nothing of our kinsmen of the United States, is the Courier so blind to the best and most shining pages of his own country's history, as to lose sight of our glorious Revolution, and what it did against JAMES the 2d and Louis the 14th? What would have been the outcry then, and the indignation felt by English posterity to this day, had all the chief European Kings leagued to trample down the spirit of Independence among us, and insisted upon our putting up with a bigotted and arbitrary King! We would have beaten them all, as the French themselves the other day beat their invaders at first, and might have made terms with them had BONAPARTE chosen,—a fact that ought not to be forgotten. How much the more absurd would a set of men be, who having enough in their hands already to keep down the indignation of Europe, should go three thousand miles over the water to conquer the revolters against a distant and despicable brother promise-breaker! "Spain is too weak," says the Courier, "to curb the evil herself; but because she is weak, is she therefore forbidden to solicit aid? There are common principles of action alike applicable to nations and individuals; and who would be foolish enough to tell a man, debilitated by previous exertion, that he must not expect his friends to assist him in repelling an assault, because he was too weak to defend himself?" O the candid and blissful logician! Who indeed? But suppose this debilitated person had been just put in jeopardy for his own freedom, had ill-used for a series of years a servant whom he had no original right to, and then in the untaught and unblushing impudence of his feebleness, applied to others to catch and manacle this servant for him, because he had chosen to be his own master. Who would be vicious enough to do that?

The Secret-service men of the Quarterly Review have long been supposed to be connected with the Courier and other publications. They seem trying whether they can venture to peep a little. (Hush! Let them.) But one would really suppose that no greater an intelligence than Master Murrain himself had been busy with the past week's papers. The Chronicle having objected to the Commissioners appointed to examine into the state of Charitable Foundations, because two Bishops among them and "certain gentlemen" not named "are known to have been hostile to the whole Bill," the Courier says directly, in all the temper of Orator HENLEY's argumentation, "then they are precisely the fittest persons to be appointed, because they will enter upon the investigation without a predetermined conviction of abuses, and without a predilection for finding them!" That is to say, because they have already predetermined that there are none!

Some extracts have been made in the Times from a work entitled, "Manuscrit de l'Isle d'Elbe," which the writer says was dictated to him by NAPOLEON at Elba, and left in his hands in the confusion of the departure for France. The object is to prove that NAPOLEON held the Crown of France by a legitimate title. It cites the accession of HUGH CAPET as a good precedent. The treaties by which the Republic of France was acknowledged are also enumerated; and the conclusion drawn from this circumstance is, that the fourth (NAPOLEON'S) dynasty, "raised in order to consolidate the new interests," was regular and lawful. The Times, in its remarks on this subject, says, that the acknowledgment was no reason why the dynasty should continue; nor do we think it was. But whatever answer may be made to the writer's reasoning on liberal principles, we do not see what the advocates of the BOURBONS can say to it. They cannot plead the choice of the people, and must either confess that the ancestor of the BOURBONS was an usurper, or that they themselves reign only by the aid of foreign force. These discussions serve however to make it more evident that all departure from the broad and plain principle of the choice of the people leads to endless disputes, and puts those who depart from it into all sorts of awkward dilemmas. We observe the Courier has said nothing about it.

It is stated in private letters from St. Kitts, of date the 20th of July, that the United States have at length solemnly recognized the independence of the States of South America, and that Admiral BRION was about to proceed for New York, to take possession of a frigate which has been lately built there, for the purpose of being presented to the Admiral.

Private letters have been received from the Northern Expedition, under Captain BLOSS, dated the 5th of July, in lat. 74. The two ships were then off a remarkable point of land, called by BLOSS the Devil's Thumb; but the letters state no other particulars than that all was well, and that they were at the moment of being impeded in their progress by the ice. We understand that the other expedition, under Captain BUCHAN, was seen by a whaler on the 8th of July, fast to the ice, in a latitude short of 80. We understand the name of the whaler is the Vigilant, of London; but we have not heard any further particulars.—Courier.

According to the Court Circulars issued during the week, the Queen's health has been varying very much. The account yesterday morning was—"Her MAJESTY has had a good night, and continues the same."

It is now publicly announced, by advertisement, that Drury-lane Theatre is to open at the old prices of admission, namely, five shillings to the boxes, and three shillings the pit. Half-price to the former, three shillings, to the latter, two.

It is the intention of Mr. HALL, we understand, to indict Lord RANELAGH at the next Clerkenwell Sessions, for his conduct to his son and some other gentlemen, who had taken shelter under a tree on his Lordship's premises at Fulham.

It is stated, that the number of English, Irish, and Scots, in France, appears on the Police-books to amount to 62,000, every one of whom is registered as to name, residence, &c. and could be arrested in 24 hours. The evacuation of the country by the Army of Occupation will be the signal for the return of a great population of this emigrant population. It is estimated that their expenditure amounts to 50,000*l.*, a day!

A Correspondent, suggesting different modes of a fire escape, observes, that if an umbrella could be procured when a person found it necessary to leap out of window, by holding it extended, the violence of the descent would be very considerably checked, and the danger consequently lessened.—Times.

COTTON SPINNERS.—Friday evening the following prisoners were conveyed from Manchester to Lancaster Castle, true bills having been found against them by the Grand Jury, at the assizes now holding there, for conspiring to raise their wages as cotton-spinners, namely, Robert Nicholls, Robert Beswick, Henry Wild, Peter Wakefield, Richard Fairbrother, Wm. Temple, George Webb, George Bancroft, and Charles Cleishe. The trials of these men excite considerable interest amongst the manufacturing class. In the mean time we are pleased to learn, that the Master-Spinners, and many of their confidential servants, have been sworn in special constables, in order to enable them the more effectually to afford protection to such of the operative spinners whose good sense may induce them to leave the combination and return to their duty, from which many of them have been kept by violence. Yesterday, (Monday), several availed themselves of this protection, and returned to their employment, not a little happy, it is natural to conclude, on once more resuming the sober habits of industry.—Manchester Herald, Aug. 25.

Accounts from Stockport state, that on Tuesday last the town was in a state of tranquillity. Hundreds of the spinners had returned to their work, and seem very sorry for what has happened. There are many who still refuse employment; but as the most refractory of them have been taken up and committed to prison, it is expected the rest will soon resume their former employment. At Manchester, however, although some journeymen have returned to work, particularly at the mills of a Mr. GRAY, yet the workmen come in but slowly.—Courier.

The expected meeting of Colliers was held in the neighbourhood of Manchester on Monday. The workmen at some of the Colliers have struck, but this measure is by no means general, so that no impediment will be felt by the trade worked by steam, which was intended by the authors of this meeting. On the same day the notorious BAGULEY attempted to convert a meeting of weavers at Stockport into a meeting of Reformers, but was hustled by the populace. The Weavers confined themselves to their object, and resolved to strike next week, unless an advance of 35 per cent. is made in their wages.—Evening paper.

THE SWORD OF ROBERT BRUCE.

MR. EDITOR,—Some time ago it appeared in the public prints, that when the Grand Duke Michael of Russia was at Drummond Castle, in Scotland, "he was presented with the sword of King Robert Bruce."—As this sentence may admit of two different acceptations, it would be very desirable to ascertain, whether the sword had been presented to his Highness as a gift; or, if it was merely exhibited to him, it being the sword of so great a champion of liberty—as the sword of a King!—whose patriotic zeal, able generalship, and daring valour, had plucked his fallen country out of the grasp of tyranny and oppression; when the ambitious Edward, at the head of the greatest army that ever a King of England brought into the field, attempted to rob Scotland of her freedom, of her rights, and of her independence. If the Honourable P. Drummond Burrell has taken upon him the former, although I would be the last to find fault with a man for being generous with his own property, yet I would be the first (were it in my power) to check a man who would attempt to dispose of such a relic as that in question, and to a foreigner too. I maintain Mr. D. Burrell had no right to do so, he being only entrusted with the keeping of it, by a country to which he has no claim but by affinity. The sword that had been so often wielded in the cause of liberty and justice ought never to be put in the hands of a person the most likely to draw it in the cause of a despot.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

HAYMARKET-THEATRE.

WE saw our "verdant friend" the Green Man again on Tuesday, and were happy to find a crowded house who enjoyed him exceedingly. His pepper was in full flavour: and so was that soup-and-bouillè in epaulets, Major Dumpling.—the sauce piquante of Mr. Fungus and Mrs. Tuckit.—and the finishing sweetness of the two female characters by Miss BLANCHARD and Mrs. GLOVER, who come in together like a slice of citron by the side of a melon.

The play was preceded by an entertaining little piece of O'KEEFE's, called the Rival Soldiers, in which MUNDEN used to excite so much laughter as the drunken vagabond Nipperkin. Mr. TOKELY therefore, whose power lies more in some special sort of character than in taking up a piece of sketchy buffoonery, and making, as it were, extempore comments upon it, had a disadvantageous comparison to contend with; but he was very amusing. An actor of real genius can never be common-place, even in those parts that do not especially suit him: and indeed if MUNDEN had not powdered these sort of characters with a superabundance of rich grins and gratuitous relishes, nothing would have been thought wanting to Nipperkin as presented us by Mr. TOKELY.—Some of the music, by the late Dr. ARNOLD, is very pretty; but music in England, like every thing in China, seems to stop at a certain middling pitch, and never get farther:—at least we have not hitherto taken the inoculation of foreign music very kindly; nor with all the example of the Italian and German schools, and the efforts of individuals here and there to emulate them or excite emulation, can we reckon ourselves such a musical people as in times when there were no great schools at all. In the days of SHAKESPEARE, for instance, music was well understood as a science:—her Majesty's lute-book, we believe, was found absolutely appalling in point of learned difficulty; and what is better, it was accounted a want of common taste and good-breeding not to be able to take a part in a song. This has been held a great mystery, especially as the Germans, who are reckoned a sort of kinsmen of England, have latterly so excelled in music; but we believe it to be wholly attributable to the national want of animal spirits, occasionally caused by climate, but chiefly by dull modes of living and habits of money-getting. If the Germans have been accounted a dull people even in point of intellect, it is to be recollected that they have been latterly so much mixed with sprightlier nations and shaken up by political events, that they have thrown off their old character, especially in Saxony, which is the German Attica. And the Saxons and we are of the same stock. So let us hope that sprightlier theories in general, and a renewal of the love of nature, may ere long add a reputation for music to the rest of our fame. In proportion as a musician cultivates these, and does not button himself up in the mere common-places about him, he will be likely to make a figure in his art. The best composer this country has seen for a long while, and who is now living (Mr. SHIELD), is evidently of an enthusiastic and cheerful tendency, out of his profession as well as in it.

The Rival Soldiers is a pleasing specimen, in little, of Mr. O'KEEFE's dramatic spirit, which unites broad humour with amiable morals more than any other writer of the same class. He makes the coarse, selfish, and degrading vices the reverse of tempting, and yet very ludicrous; while there is a constant and happy effort to elevate the social feelings of love and friendship. The Rival Soldiers (DURUSET and BARNARD) are two young men in love with the same woman, (Miss MATTHEWS) to whom they refer frankly, and with mutual promises not to be angry, for the final choice of one of them. She laughs and hesitates a little, under a pretence of joking, but really out of a regard for both, but at length chuses the former. The latter, adhering to his friendship, but unable to bear a situation, for which Cardinal BEMBO's remedy, though a churchman's, has been reckoned more than unorthodox, takes occasion of Nipperkin's drunkenness to make him change clothes, and deserts. He is taken however, and threatened with punishment; but the commandant on hearing the story forgives and presents him with a purse; the generous friend presents it to the young couple to begin life with; and Nipperkin, who knew the history of his birth, and had been commissioned by his father an old officer, to find him out, informs the old gentleman, who is on the spot, of the presence of his son. We have given this account of an old piece, because it pleases us. It is the production of a kind-hearted and cheerful man, who believes in the virtues he writes about, and who realizes them because he believes—the great secret to be discovered by those, who are always complaining of the vices instead of the follies of mankind. Every man who has real goodness in himself, is hopeful of it in others, and know that it exists at any rate.

ENGLISH OPERA.

There are some revivals, more or less interesting, at this theatre,—the Blind Boy, the pantomimes of La Perouse and Captain Cook,—and the Privateer, an abridgment of CUMBERLAND's comedy of the Brothers. The Blind Boy is very interesting, in spite of the general common-place of its dialogue, and the strange inconsistency of its manners and mythology,—the heathen religion of old Sarmatia being mixed up with the modes and religious ceremonies of christian Poland. Setting aside even the acting of Miss KELLY, who performs the part of the defrauded and blind young heir to the throne, there is something irresistibly touching in the loss of sight, especially at an early age. Youth seems to have so much right to gaiety, that we cannot see this great inlet of it eclipsed, without feeling doubly for the privation, and yearning to make up for it with all our sympathy. The stiff and cautious movements of a blind youth, his patient eyeless face, melancholy in its very cheerfulness, his perpetual need of assistance, his consequent trusting acquiescence, nay, the very acuteness of his other senses, which seem to shew what a loss they endeavour to supply,—all make appeals to our own superiority, such as to call forth its attentions without exciting its pride. Blindness in tears is above measure pathetic. The eyes seem to say,—Sorrow can come from us, though not sight.

The pantomime of the Death of Captain Cook has some interesting passages, and is most excellently acted; but it is inferior to La Perouse, which affords a constant succession of them. The former has too much love-making in it to suit with the general feeling: one has about Captain Cook. Not that he does more perhaps in this instance than protect a woman already in love from the fury of a man whom she had rejected; but though he must have witnessed a good deal of love-making in others, and was a very kind man at heart, he always presents himself to one's mind as an austere and controlling rather than a sympathizing character,—as the officer and discoverer, with a stern sense of particular duties upon him. After Perouse too, this piece has so much resemblance to it in some of the incidents, and in all the persons performing, as to look like an imitation. We must also protest against the over-savage mode in which Captain Cook's assassin is made to insert and absolutely work the dagger into his back, where it is left sticking. It is overdone in every respect; for the shuddering spectator is relieved at last by reflecting, that the stage-savage must be cautious enough, in the midst of his rage, to insert the knife with ingenious benevolence between the Captain's skin and coat;—so that the first sensation is shocking, and the next cold and ludicrous.

La Perouse has none of these drawbacks; and is without doubt the most interesting piece of the kind on the stage. The Captain here is a Frenchman, so that there may be as much love as the author pleases. Our own attention, we confess, was rivetted when we saw it. Every scene has its novelty, and we may add, its sentiment. There is the never-failing courage of the shipwrecked and solitary Perouse, ingenious at resources; there is the savage bear, whose cave he had taken possession of, and whose growls, in returning home, brought to us all the imaginations of our boyhood in reading fearful fables; there are the savages with their wild manners, loves, and jealousies; there is the female savage, who in the person of an intelligent and kind human being, sees love in a more loveable shape than she ever witnessed before; there is the object of it, in spite of all her caresses, drawing forth the miniature of the absent wife of his heart; there is this wife at last come over the great seas with their little boy to look for her husband; there are the agitations and dangers they all undergo when united, the attempts on the boy's life, and their own threatened sacrifice; and above all, there is the little semi-human creature, the monkey, who becomes attached to him and performs so many interesting services, so as to do away all unpleasant feelings arising from the difference or the more shocking resemblance of shame, and to shew us how beautiful in any shape are the feelings of attachment and of common wants.

It is a very melancholy thing to reflect at the close of the piece that La Perouse really never returned home, as it leaves us to imagine. Our readers are aware that he has never been heard of. There is the same feeling in reading the conclusion of FALCONER'S Shipwreck, the author of which was after all lost at sea in another voyage.

As far as the nature of such a piece allows, we cannot bestow too much praise either on the performance or performers. Mr. T. P. COOKE, an actor with his senses about him, and tall commanding figure, is a very good representative both of his illustrious namesake and the gallant Frenchman, altering his appearance with much judgment, so as to personate the two different men, as much as possible. The pantomime of this performer has a much more genuine effect than what is usually witnessed, which like Mr. GIFFARD'S precursor, the poor furious critic mentioned by POPE, makes a point of being prodigiously fierce and awful, and

Stares tremendous with a threatening eye,
Like some fierce tyrant in old tapestry.

This extravagance, on the other hand, suits the jealous savage performed by Mr. SALTER. He is the completest actor in this way we have ever seen, and enters into the real nature of uncivilized passions. A short but stout and active person,—a great power of gesticulation,—a broad face which bursts into raging grins when roused, and puts on a sort of stock-fish though earnest expression when not,—and strips of strait coarse hair tumbling over his eyes and forehead with every barbarous gesture,—complete the externals of his savage. The giving himself up to every vehement emotion,—to warlike ardour, extravagant childish admiration, gnawing jealousy, reckless fury, and a love as fearful as either,—exhibits all the internal. Nothing could be more striking than his passionate emotion at hearing the sound of harmonious music in Captain Cook, endeavouring, as it were, literally to catch it with his ears, and tumbling to the ground to listen there. His rubbing his heart round and round with his hands, when he had completed the assassination, was equally fine. It was as if he had literally quenched his thirst of revenge. Mrs. PINCOTT, who performs the female savage in both pieces, is quite worthy of acting in this company. She gives herself up to her emotions with equal vivacity, allowing for the gentler nature of her sex; and her long dark hair, and fine eyes, together with a tall well-turned figure, are seen to great advantage in consequence. We should desire no better Varico; though it would be doing great injustice to Mr. SALTER'S assumed barbarism, or to any real untaught savage, to say that he would be a good representative of the monster Inkle.

We have not time or room to notice the real American Indians who perform in these pantomimes; nor, to say the truth, with all their shuffling dances and grating shrieks, are they much more than a curiosity. But we shall say a word or two more about them on a future occasion.

It is also as little necessary to criticise the musical abridgment of Mr. CUMBERLAND'S comedy of the Brothers, just revived here under the title of the Privateer. There is some good compiled music in it, and some original not unpleasing; and CHATTERLEY'S and HARLEY'S performances are good in Sir Benjamin Dove and Captain Ironsides. But Sir Benjamin, the chief character, is a husband so exceedingly feeble and hen-pecked, that he almost becomes a physical object of commiseration, like a palsy; and the rest of the piece is very common and tiresome.

Covent-Garden Theatre, during the recess, has been embellished and decorated anew; the ceiling now corresponds in richness of ornament with the other parts of the Theatre, and is formed by panels encircled with gold mouldings, filled with the national emblems of the rose, the thistle, and shamrock, embossed in burnished gold, which terminate in the grand central star. The house has been new painted, and the ground is a warm salmon colour.

Mr. H. JOHNSTON retains his situation as Actor at Drury-lane Theatre; but the chief management is wholly confided to Mr. STEPHEN KEMBLE, under the authority of the Sub-Committee.

On the close of the season at the English Opera House, when Mr. BARTLEY will be released from the stage management, he and Mrs. BARTLEY depart for America.

Dowton, and other performers of the regular Theatres, are engaged by ELLISTON, who is expected to re-open his Olympic Establishment.

SINCLAIR has left Covent-garden Theatre, and is engaged at Drury-lane for the approaching season.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 6.—SIR ARTHUR PIGGOT.

Un style trop égal et toujours uniforme.

Boileau, Art. Poet. C. 1.

It is generally remarked in the profession that the Chancery is the most gentlemanly of all the Courts; this epithet requires explanation;—a learned Court or an impartial Court would be intelligible, but few persons would understand precisely what is intended by a gentlemanly Court of Justice or Equity. Some might suppose that it meant a place where most money is gained by the least labour, and a Barrister consequently soonest acquires the rank and property of a gentleman; the fact however is otherwise: others might fancy that it meant a Court where none but individuals of a certain station in society practise; but this would also be incorrect; while a third party might imagine that it was composed of men, who in the ordinary intercourse of life conducted themselves with greater decorum and propriety. I am not aware however that in this respect the Counsel in one Court have much, if any, advantage over those of another. In Chancery there is certainly not so much low business requiring a knowledge of mean legal artifices, and therefore particular individuals may be excluded; but as a body they are pretty nearly upon an equality, and perhaps in all the Courts some might be pointed out who have resorted to all kinds of despicable expedients and base contrivances to get into the good graces of the Attornies; who have practised the art of hugging with complete success—who have secured business by repeated invitations to dinner—by well-timed presents of fish or game—by hearty and unseemly shakes of the hand in the street, which they dared not have given in Westminster-Hall, and by all those ingenious means, to which men of great talent have before now condescended, and by which men of little talent have sometimes gained considerable fortunes.

The difference however between the Chancery and other Courts consists more in the mode in which the business is transacted than in the nature of the business itself, or the means by which it has been procured; and this distinction is owing less to the Bar than to the Bench. The Court is gentlemanly, because the Judge is a gentleman; for there perhaps never was a man who presided in such a situation with more suavity and urbanity than Lord ELDON—who more effectually endeavoured to fore-shorten the distance between the Bench and the Bar—who listened with more patience to the observations of Counsel on all sides, and whose chief fault arises from a painfully anxious desire to have no fault. Of course I here separate his judicial from his political capacity, for I applaud the first just as highly as I reprobate the last, and on this account my tribute will at least have the merit of sincerity. He is considered, and rightly, one of the ablest Chancellors ever entrusted with the Great Seal, and his natural disposition, as far as an opinion can be formed of it in public, seems to be as kind and amiable as his mind is well instructed in the learning of his profession. He listens with equal patience to the oldest and to the youngest Counsel; and suitors who are unable or unwilling to employ Advocates are never impetuously dismissed unheard. His Lordship, only a few days ago, declared that it was the duty of a Judge to devote his utmost attention to persons in such a predicament; and that he who even needlessly interrupted them, much more repelled them with unfeeling and coarse brutality, was unworthy of the office confided to him*. This mild and tranquil deportment,—this gentlemanly ease,—cannot have been displayed by Lord ELDON, for more than 16 years, without producing a corresponding feeling among the advocates in his Court: business is transacted with all the pleasantness of somewhat restrained private friendship. In Chancery there is little need to impose upon the suitors or the public by any assumed gravity or dignity; and the individual who now presides appears to walk upon the exact line between haughty pomposity and degrading familiarity. This is what is meant by the word gentlemanly, as applied to the Court of Chancery.

It has been before remarked, that low sharp practice, and its followers, are in some measure excluded; and the mode in which matters are brought before the Lord Chancellor contributes to preserve more decorum, both of speech and conduct, than usually prevails in Courts of Law: the proceedings are chiefly conducted in writing by bills, answers, affidavits, &c., so that there are no vide voce examinations, no badgering and bullying of witnesses, and no personal disputes among Counsel as to what has or has not been established; for if a difference of that kind arise, it is here easily settled by an appeal to the instrument itself: this makes Advocates less bold and broad in their assertions, and it is easy to see how in various respects these Literæ Scriptæ, disadvantageous in many other ways, tend to moderate and refine the proceedings of a Court, whose decisions, by its constitution, do not depend upon the personal interrogation of individuals.

It must be obvious notwithstanding that this very gen-

* In the case of THOMAS NIAS, a bankrupt, who put Lord ELDON's resignation to the test, for he made an address to his Lordship which occupied the greater part of two days, and consisted of the most minute details.

tlemanliness, chiefly occasioned by the unassuming unpretending conduct of the Judge, may very materially interfere with the progress and display of anything like eloquence. Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY is almost the only man who has shewn in the Court of Chancery that he possesses it: Mr. FONBLANQUE is a clear and a clever speaker, when his friends afford him an opportunity, and Mr. MONTAGUE can talk loud and long—can refer to a sentence or two from Lord BACON (about the only author I ever heard him quote) and mouth a polysyllable word with most emphatic want of meaning; but he has seldom been thought really eloquent by any body but himself. I am now speaking of eloquence in the ordinary sense in which the word is understood, and in which it is used by one of our best poets, when he speaks of the Power above Powers, heavenly eloquence!

That with the strong reign of commanding words

Doth manage, guide, and master th' eminence

Of men's affections more than all their swords.

S. Daniel's Musophilus.

Some may urge that I have laid too much stress upon it, and seem to hold it a matter of too great importance; they may say that in considering the qualifications of any particular Counsel, I ought not first to ask myself whether he be or be not eloquent; that I ought rather to weigh the solidity of his understanding and sound the depth of his learning: or they may contend that I take eloquence in too restrained a signification; that it has at least two kinds; the declamatory and the argumentative, and that the latter is by far the most useful and valuable. It is true that there are not only two but perhaps twenty other sorts and sub-divisions of eloquence, all excellent in their way, but all secondary to that referred to in the above quotation, as having power to guide and master man's strongest and fiercest passions. OWEN FELTHAM, drawing a distinction between the poet and the orator, says, "that he is the best orator that pleases most;" and admitting the distinction, what species of oratory or eloquence is most generally approved?

I certainly do not bring forward Sir ARTHUR PIGGOT, in the present article, as an individual possessing this highest qualification of an Advocate, but because his general talents and acquirements, and his long standing, as the Senior King's Counsel at the Chancery Bar, seem to entitle him to be first noticed; not indeed that I have considered myself at all bound by this rule; because, for the sake of convenience, contrast, or for the purpose of enforcing some particular point, it has sometimes appeared proper to dispense with it. I do not know any man who practises in the same Court, who has less pretensions to anything approaching the ornaments of rhetoric: his eloquence is entirely of the argumentative kind, and even here he has considerable defects and deficiencies, as will be shewn presently. It is to be remarked, that in equity all that is very important to an Advocate is a knowledge of his business, a distinct mode of detailing facts, and a perspicuous manner of stating arguments founded upon them: eloquence, or any attempts at it beyond a clear uninterrupted flow of words and thoughts, would on most occasions be wasted. The Counsel do not address a Jury of twelve men upon matters with which their individual feelings may be connected, but a single Judge of great experience, who has long learnt to subdue and controul ordinary impulses, and whose principal business it is to determine according to precedent. It has been said that a Judge should be without passions, but whether he ought or ought not to be influenced by them on the Bench, few would suppose that the matters commonly brought before the Lord Chancellor are of a nature likely to excite them. Yet to a certain degree this is a mistake, partly originating perhaps in the satirical attack of the late Mr. WINDHAM: how can it be said that subjects interesting to the feelings do not come before the individual who superintends all the charitable institutions of the country, and upon whose decisions, in lunacy and bankruptcy only, frequently depend the liberties, fortunes, and almost the lives of men. Surely here is a field extensive enough for the employment of all the powers of language; but the gentlemanliness, before referred to, interferes and cramps exertion; besides which it may admit of considerable doubt, whether by a man like Lord Eldon, justice is not more effectually administered, without any effort to mislead his understanding, and pervert his judgment, by rousing his sensibility. The occasions are therefore extremely rare where eloquence is required; and still rarer where it is displayed. The secondary sort of eloquence however, that which consists in argumentative and reasoning powers, is indispensable, and the possession of this faculty, though not perhaps in its perfection, long secured to Sir ARTHUR PIGGOT the leading practice in this Court. Of late his business has somewhat declined, or perhaps he has declined his business, as his advanced age now prevents him from undergoing the fatigues he formerly could endure. He is perhaps the most of any man at this Bar, an exception to the gentlemanliness for which it is celebrated, for his ordinary style of speaking is coarse and rude, sometimes sufficiently strenuous, but hard, blunt, and crude, apparently without the slightest wish to acquire any of the graces of delivery. His voice too corresponds with his style of speaking, for it is harsh and unmusical in its tones, and without modulation or inflexion.

Although Sir ARTHUR PIGGOT's chief excellence consists in his reasoning powers, he is by no means a good arguer of a question: he can enforce a particular topic with considerable vehemence and effect—he can bring to bear upon it all the facts supplied, and he can state those facts with precision and clearness—yet he never seems to contemplate more than this single point: he does not carry on the chain of his reasoning from one thing to another until he has encircled the whole case: he exhausts himself upon a particular part, and when he is obliged to advert to others, he repeats much of what he has before said, and in nearly the same terms as those he before used. He seems to want a logical head which arranges and constructs an argument with the same attention to proportion and relation of parts, as an architect constructs a building. Some men, when they read the most complicated cases, dispose of all the parts in their fit places as they proceed, according to the conclusions at which they are desirous of arriving: in time it becomes almost a mechanical habit with them; but Sir A. PIGGOT, with all his practice, seems never to have acquired any facility of this kind, so that his speeches are often a jumble and confused mass of things excellent in their proper places, and if duly supported, but having little strength or force standing alone and in the situation where they are found: he frequently begins where he ought to end, and ends where he ought to begin, while the middle of his speech is made up of scraps of repetition of arguments, and re-statement of minute details. This defect originated no doubt in the too great abundance of his business at one time, and the absence of the faculty of what may be termed extempore arrangement. It has perhaps increased upon him of late, but I apprehend that it was always more or less prevalent, and, as a most recent instance, his address only a few weeks ago upon the subject of the affairs of Drury-Lane Theatre may be referred to.

It will be easily imagined that a man who takes so little pains about his speaking will take less about his action; he scarcely employs any at all, but most commonly stands quite erect, and delivers his words as Friar Bacon's brazen head would be supposed to have done: he looks more like an automaton than a living creature, and never directs his eyes towards the individual he is addressing, but speaks directly at the Lord Chancellor's insignia of office, as if they only ought to receive his special attention. Yet he seems to see nothing, and never moves his arms, excepting to take up his brief and lay it down again without examination. It is rather astonishing that he never thought it worth while to pay more attention to his appearance, and to make some effort to counteract the unfavourable impression it must excite, for he always reminds those who look at him of SPENSER's description of Malagor—

His body lean and meagre as a rake,
And skin all wither'd like a dried rook.

His extensive knowledge of his profession, the earnestness he usually displays in the cause in which he is engaged, the respect paid by the Bench to his judgment, and the facility he enjoys of dwelling upon and enforcing separate points, and those commonly of the greatest consequence, secured him for a long series of years the first business of the Court.

There is one peculiarity about his style of speaking which I omitted to notice, and which induces me to think that he would have had considerable success as a Nisi Prius Advocate in some of the other Courts. When Attorney-General, he had little to do with public prosecutions, nor do I recollect seeing him conduct any of them; but the shortness of his sentences in speaking, and his colloquial, interrogatory manner, would be better adapted to produce an effect upon a Jury than to convince a Judge: it rather obstructs than aids the course of a legal argument, which does not require any great terseness or sharpness of expression. There is too about the frame of Sir ARTHUR PIGGOT's mind an acuteness and shrewdness that would have enabled him to examine witnesses with success. At the same time, his monotony and want of action might have been injurious; but I am not sure if both have not been occasioned, or at any rate increased, by a fear on his part lest his energy, of which he has a large share, should too far o'erstep the decorum of this Court.

AMICUS CURIE.

[No. 7, Sir ROBERT GIFFORD, the Solicitor-General.]

WILTSHIRE ELECTION.—SIR F. BURDETT.

MR. EXAMINER,—You have inserted in your Paper of Monday last a letter signed "A Constant Reader," which contains an attack on Sir F. Burdett, together with a false and scandalous libel on the Freeholders of Wilts. I shall leave the Hon. Baronet to defend himself; but the calumny against my brother Freeholders I think it right to repel.

The contest for this county having terminated, I would not say a word calculated to revive unpleasant feelings; therefore I will not enter into a comparison of the merits of the opposing Candidates, which might appear invidious, but will content myself with stating, that Mr. L. Wellesley's supporters held him to be an independent honourable man, and preferred him to his opponent. He has never boasted of his relationship to the Duke of Wellington, nor have the Freeholders been influenced by such a consideration; but surely it can be no disparagement to his pretensions, that he happens to be the nephew of that great man. Of the expenditure of the Wellesley family, or of the sources whence they derive their income, I know nothing: it is sufficient for us to know that our Representative is strictly independent, that he has refused a pension, that he has no political connexion with Ministers, and has sometimes opposed even his own father; nor does it require a long acquaintance with him to discover, that he is not of a temperament to permit himself to be a tool of any man or any party.

Your Correspondent says, "It is but fair to state, that he (Mr. L. Wellesley) was well backed by Treasury influence, a heavy purse, and, of course, almost all the parsons in the county, together with an impudent dandy kind of oratory, much more suited to a party of modern fashionable belles than an assembly of Englishmen. Upwards of ninety thousand pounds have seated him in the House for Wiltshire instead of St. Ives." Now, Sir, in the whole of this tirade there is not, I assure you, a word of truth. I believe that Treasury influence has not been used by either of the Candidates, but the families and individuals in the county who may be supposed the most intimately connected with Government, have either remained neuter, or given their support to Mr. W.'s opponent. As to the Clergy of the Established Church, so courteously noticed by your Correspondent, a considerable majority of them voted against Mr. W. as may be seen on referring to the published poll-book. For less than a third of the sum said to be expended by Mr. W. I would gladly guarantee his expences, which even then exceed, by an hundred fold, any sum that I should wish to see so expended; but when the severity of the contest is considered, the protracted canvass, the distance of the great body of voters from the place of polling, and the licence generally taken by persons providing conveyance and accommodation for such numbers at such a period, it may be fairly admitted, that the expense, though heavy, is not greater than has been often incurred under similar circumstances.

The "impudent dandy kind of oratory," suited to modern belles, must be of a description with which I am not acquainted, nor can I believe that impudence of any kind would be tolerated by, much less considered as suitable to, any of my fair countrywomen.

The Freeholders of Wilts do not arrogate to themselves any superiority over those of the neighbouring counties, but they know the value of their independence, and place it far beyond the power of wealth to purchase. If your Correspondent thought fit to question and call to account the Honourable Baronet, he would have displayed a much better taste, by proposing his questions coolly and dispassionately, instead of assailing our Representative with coarse invectives, or of publishing false and scandalous charges against the Freeholders of our independent county. I am, Sir, your constant Reader.

A WILTSHIRE FREEHOLDER.

Wilts, Aug. 26, 1818.

THE BANKRUPT SYSTEM.

CASE OF PAGE.

MR. EXAMINER,—As you have so far thought well of the observations I sent you on the case of Crawley, as to give them insertion in your paper of the 2d instant, I am encouraged to send you a few remarks on the case of Mr. Page, whose Commission was ordered to be superseded, and a new Commission to be issued, which should not go to the former Commissioners, but that the same Solicitor should be employed.

Though a novice in law matters, and happily not much experienced in bankruptcies, the common sense to which I humbly aspire, assures me there is something extremely wrong in the management of these concerns; and the more so, perhaps, because the precarious state of credit, and the increased casualties of trade, since my first acquaintance with it, makes it a matter of a little apprehension lest it may some day be my fate to have my name appear in the Gazette with a "whereas" before it; in which case I might find difficulty in accommodating my natural disposition to the practice of the present day, which my slight observation has shewn me to be very deficient in moral correctness or in the due fulfilment of the law.

But to the case of Page: The Lord Chancellor is reported to have said,—“He made that order, not attaching any blame to the Commissioners, for had he been in their place, he would in all probability have acted as they did, but he thought it would be more agreeable to those Gentlemen to be relieved from opening the new Commission.” The correctness of this report I cannot vouch for, and argue upon it just as I find it. It strikes me as very strange, that a new Commission should be ordered, not to go again to the same Commissioners, without something erroneous had appeared in their conduct under the old Commission; and the best justification thereof would certainly have been in allowing them the opportunity of correcting themselves in the administration of the new one. His Lordship directed that the same Solicitor should be employed in the new Commission! Upon this I have only to remark, that I never before heard of the Lord Chancellor appointing a particular Solicitor to a Commission of Bankrupt; that is generally the province of the petitioning creditor, and the appointment is, I believe, subject to the confirmation or negation of the creditors.

As to the appointment of Commissioners, I have understood, that they are particularly named in every Commission before the sealing of it; consequently they may be said in all cases to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor; and I remember to have read some where, my memory does not enable me to say where, of Commissioners being removed by the Lord Chancellor, and even being committed to prison for corrupt practices. And the case before us seems to confirm the powers of the Chancellor in this respect, for though he does not take the matter out of the Commissioners' hands, a Court of Law having previously done so by pronouncing the Commission bad, his Lordship's ordering specially that the Commissioners should be changed, must surely be taken as declaratory of the Chancellor's power over the conduct of Commissioners in any case, wherein they appear to have acted contrary to law or equity. I cannot therefore but think, that the report which says that “no blame attached to the Commissioners, but that the Lord Chancellor would in all probability have done as they did, had he been in their place,” must be quite erroneous.

In my last, I told you I was once present at a private meeting under a bankruptcy, where a Commissioner said that Commissioners had greater powers than the Lord Chancellor. And I have happened to hear that the list of Commissioners in Mr. Page's case, is the same list in which that declaration was made. As you have given the names of the Commissioners at length in the matter of Crawley, perhaps you will take the trouble to find out the names of the Commissioners in this case, and lay them also before the public; it will be justice to them and to all other Commissioners.

NATIONAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.

On Friday the anniversary of this Institution, founded by Peter Herve, Esq. for the Relief of Distressed Persons in the Middle Ranks of Life, of whatever country or persuasion, was held in Freemason's Hall. The Hall was crowded to excess by a most respectable assembly, the greater part of whom were Ladies. At three o'clock their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Kent came into the Hall, and were received with the loudest and warmest expressions of approbation. Her Royal Highness seemed peculiarly gratified with this demonstration of public feeling, and repeatedly courtied to the audience, appearing highly delighted to witness so numerous an assemblage of beauty and fashion. On taking the Chair, his Royal Highness, as Patron of the Society, shortly addressed the Meeting. He spoke in praise of the design of the Institution; and said that he knew of none more deserving of support from the public. His Royal Highness's address was received throughout with loud applause. The report was then read. After giving an abstract of the rules, it proceeded to state the receipts and expenditure of last year, together with a description of the persons relieved since the last report.

Mr. HERVE next proposed the adoption of the report. He related some interesting cases, in order to show the useful effects of advancing small sums on security to tradesmen. The following is one of the most striking:—A respectable young woman, in Shoemaker-row, London, supported an aged mother and herself, but, through untoward circumstances, found such a diminution of the profits of her business of hosiery, that she was incapacitated from renewing her stock, except upon credit, and at length was threatened with arrests. She remarked to one of the Subscribers, "where shall I hide my head? I shall die with shame if I should be arrested, and my poor mother I must consign to the workhouse." Application was made to the Committee, and a loan of 30*l.* advanced to her on security. She had repaid the whole sum, retains her occupation, and her mother remained with her without expence to the parish. Mr. Herve concluded by thanking the Duke and Duchess of Kent for their patronage of the Institution.

Some other gentlemen then spoke. Resolutions were passed expressing the acknowledgments of the meeting for the presence of their Royal Highnesses, and the Duke of Kent returned thanks. At five o'clock, the meeting broke up. The contributions, which were collected principally by Ladies, exceeded very considerably that of any former Meeting.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

EX PARTE HOLDING IN THE MATTER OF HENRY, A BANKRUPT.

Sir,—I have this instant seen the letter in your paper of last Sunday, signed "D. Shuter," in which an attempt is made to deny the correctness of a report contained in that of Sunday the 16th. As I presume it must be a satisfaction to you to know that you have not made an erroneous statement, I beg leave to inform you, that I have perused the report in question, and that although it is certainly not a full account of all that passed, still, as far as it goes, it is strictly correct, and there can be no pretence for altering or denying a single sentence of it.

Mr. Shuter's letter was evidently written to cheer the drooping spirits of his friends on the Corn Market; and so far,—if they can accept his profound reasoning on probabilities (for he was not present) in the place of fact,—I do not envy his success, but really think it is rather indecent to require you to contradict the truth, merely because he wishes it false.—Your very obedient servant,

HENRY WILLIAMS,
Solicitor to the Petitioner.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

Tuesday, Aug. 25.

Mr. HEATH appeared in support of a rule for allowing Mr. Thomas Hall to be re-heard as to certain creditors, at whose suit he was detained.—This insolvent, generally known at the west end of the town as Captain Hall, applied for his discharge on the 21st last January, and was opposed by Colonel Corry, Thomas Foster, Esq. of Berk-hire, and other creditors, whose debts he agreed on that occasion to except from his discharge. But the Court, after hearing Mr. Foster's statement, that the insolvent obtained from him valuable pictures, at a price payable by bond of 2,500*l.*, which he immediately afterwards sold at a picture gallery for less than a fourth of that sum, and had represented himself as the legitimate son of a gentleman of large landed property near Manchester, whereas, on the contrary, it afterwards appeared he was only the illegitimate son of that gentleman, who merely allowed him a small weekly stipend, ordered that the insolvent should be remanded for gross injustice to his creditors.

Mr. HEATH this day explained to the Court, that the insolvent did not want to get rid of the excepted debts, which nearly amounted to the whole of his imbrincances, but merely to get his discharge from others where no opposition was intended.

The Court said, that the insolvent's remand must still stand, for gross injustice to his creditors, notwithstanding these arrangements; and it was agreed, that he should be discharged from certain debts, on which no opposition was intended, but should still remain detained for the excepted debts.

POLICE.

GENERAL.

A fine young woman, named Lydia Green, was brought up under the following circumstances:—John Davis, shopkeeper to Mr. Dew, hosier of Cheapside, said, that on Tuesday, while he was employed in serving numerous customers, the prisoner rushed into the shop and snatched a bundle of stockings, which lay on the counter; that he jumped over the counter, and followed her into the street, where he found her in the custody of his master, who also witnessed the transaction.—Alderman HEGGATE asked the prisoner whether she had any observation to make upon so extraordinary a charge.—She smiled, and seemed glad at the prospect of being committed; and she answered in the negative to the Magistrate's question.—An inquiry was immediately made by the Magistrate into the condition of this woman, and it was ascertained that her husband had been sent on board the hulks, where it was supposed she had an inclination to visit him.—Davis was bound over to prosecute.—The young woman laughed; and said she was glad at the decision of the Magistrate.

UNION-HALL.

Wednesday, a respectably dressed female was charged with assaulting her husband, Mr. Edwards, of Maid-lane, in a most violent manner. When she was brought into the office she begged the officers not to take her before the Magistrates, as she had never been in such a place before in her life. Her husband not having arrived to prefer his charge, she was locked up in the prison at the back of the office until he arrived. She expressed great horror at being put into a prison, and sighed deeply when the keeper left her. The office being under repair, a painter who was at work near the prison-grate heard a loud groaning; he ran to the spot, and, on looking through, saw Mrs. Edwards hanging from the window bar by a handkerchief which she had tied round her neck. He immediately gave an alarm, and the keeper opening the door of the prison, she was cut down; she was not quite dead, but apparently insensible; in a short time she was recovered, and her husband declining to press his charge against her, the case was discharged, and she went home with him.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

The following instance of courage and humanity is communicated in a private letter from Dublin:—"As Mr. William Magnay, of the house of Magnay, Pickering, and Co. of London, was returning to this city on Saturday, he, observing a crowd at the Royal Canal, just below the bridge, inquired the cause, and learned that a boy, about the age of 14, had been fishing, and slipped into the canal. He immediately pulled off his coat and waistcoat and plunged in for him; unsuccessful the first time, he attempted a second, and pitched with his head upon the boy, which turned him round, and enabled him to lay hold of his leg, and bring him on shore. He was immediately conveyed to a public house; and, with the assistance of a surgeon, in about twenty minutes animation was restored, and hopes entertained of his ultimate recovery. The lad had been in the water about ten minutes."

Tuesday an Inquisition was held, at Clerkenwell workhouse, on the body of Joseph Wells, aged 30. It appeared that the deceased had been observed for about a fortnight before his death, mostly lying among the old wooden water pipes in Spa-fields; his wretched situation at length attracted the notice of some humane passenger, who had observed him lying in the same situation for a considerable time, and who found he had not broke his fast for three days, and was then so feeble for want of food, and exposure to the weather, that he was unable to move, and could with difficulty speak. He was carefully removed to the workhouse, where he was washed and cleaned, and put to bed. All the information that could be obtained from him was his name and age, and that he had been a sailor, and had fought and bled for his country. He lingered until Monday morning, when he expired. The surgeon was of opinion, that the deceased died from want.—Verdict—"Died from want."

On Thursday an Inquisition was taken at Guy's Hospital, on the body of Thomas Cullen, about 40 years of age, who died from the effect of the explosion in Westminster-road. It appeared that the explosion was caused by a boy, named Nash, charging a rocket, which he rammed down with a stick so excessively hard and quick, that the friction produced explosion, which communicated to the powder and fire-works, and set the building on fire.—The Jury returned a verdict of—Accidental Death.

On Thursday, Mr. Robinson, of Bear-lane, hung himself. Not coming down to breakfast at his usual time, the servant maid went up stairs and knocked at his door; but received no answer. She gave an alarm, it was forced open, and the unfortunate man was found suspended by a handkerchief from a clothes-peg.

A boy, aged 15, hanged himself on Friday week, in a fit of despondency brought on by a dread of not procuring a situation. He had been servant to an attorney, but having more knowledge than accorded with his place, entertained higher hopes than he seemed likely to realize. The verdict of a Coroner's Jury was—Insanity.

Tuesday morning, about nine o'clock, Mrs. Mary Gifford, a respectable woman, of Charles-street, Commercial-road, got out of bed and went down stairs to her sister, whom she told to take a walk before breakfast, which she did. On her return home, she found the door locked; an alarm was made, and the door burst open, when they found Mrs. G. suspended from the bed tester. She was quite dead.

About the period of the dissolution of Parliament, a young man, of gentlemanly appearance and elegant manners, travelled in the west of England in a carriage and four, under the assumed name of Harvey, and stated every where that he was going to offer himself for one of the Cornwall boroughs—varying the name as it suited his purpose. He introduced himself to a number of country bankers, to whom he stated his object, observing, that nothing was to be done without plenty of money at borough elections, and producing at the same time letters of credit from bankers in London, with whom they were connected. These letters were forgeries. Many declined crediting this impostor, but with others he was successful. He is reported to have obtained in this way upwards of twenty thousand pounds. The frauds being soon discovered, he was traced to France, where pursuit was made after him, but without effect. He was ultimately discovered at Turin, in the disguise of a servant; and was on his way to England under a proper escort. Property to the amount of 18,000*l.* is said to have been found upon him.—Sunday paper.

The following is a surprising instance of resuscitation. As many deaths no doubt occur from want of a knowledge of the method proper to be used on such occasions, the publication of it is highly useful:—On Monday, 4th May, 1818, James Carney, a boy, aged eleven years, while at play on board a coal lighter, fell into the river Wear. A strong tide forced him under a ship's bottom, where he remained for a short time, but being hurried for nearly half a mile, must have inevitably perished in the sea, as he was but a short distance from the harbour's mouth. Providentially Robert Kirkhouse, being in his boat, saw his hat on the surface of the water, and his arm appearing, he laid hold, and pulled him into his boat, to all appearance lifeless. The period of time from his falling into the water to that of his arrival at the shop of Mr. Marvell, chymist, &c. was a full half hour; but how long he might have been immersed, could not be ascertained. His whole aspect exhibited a state of complete dissolution; his body stiff and inflexible; his face swollen and jaw completely locked. He was immediately stripped, put to bed, enveloped in warm blankets, his head reclined on pillows, bladders of hot water applied to his feet, and friction, with flannels, by four persons, to the whole surface of his body, were used; whilst Mr. M. rubbed the region of the heart; thorax, &c. with vel alkali and camphorated spirits; and on gently pressing it, the air and froth issued from his mouth and nostrils. These methods being persisted in for about twenty minutes longer, his body felt warm, and the limbs became somewhat more flexible, yet a full half hour elapsed before any symptoms of vitality appeared, which was evinced by slight convulsive twitchings of the muscles of the face and under lip, accompanied with a fluttering, a palpitation of the heart, and also a gradual disappearance of the lividness of his face. His jaws being so far relaxed, as to admit a spoon between his teeth, Mr. M. attempted to get down some warm diluted white wine, but this not succeeding, he applied his mouth to that of the patient, and at the same time closing his nostrils, made repeated efforts to inflate the lungs, and using gentle pressure on his chest, he then fetched several convulsive sobs. These exertions were continued one hour longer, and when nearly two hours had elapsed, some spoonfuls of diluted white wine were given with advantage. He began to revive, he screamed loud, and struggled hard, threw about his arms and legs in such a manner that it was found difficult to keep him quiet. The pulse at the wrist was scarcely perceptible till about this period, but it afterwards became stronger. He passed a troublesome night, but towards the morning slept pretty well. Some medicine was prescribed, and the next day he seemed quite recovered. He remains in perfect health.

FIRES.—Mr. Wells, a farmer, near Shoreham, on Saturday week, ordered the stubble in his corn fields to be burnt, for the purpose of manuring the land. The dry state of the stubble caused the flame to spread like wildfire, and it consumed his barns, implements of husbandry, and all his corn. The loss is estimated at between 3 and 4,000*l.*—The dwelling-house of Mrs. Gillingham, at Milford, Hants, was burnt down Sunday se'nnight. Mrs. G. is fully committed to be tried for setting it on fire.

THE LONDON MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, August 31, 1818.

Having a continuance of foreign arrivals of Wheat, and a good supply from Kent and Essex this morning, the sales were heavy at last Monday's prices, although the major part of this day's supply from the above counties consisted of samples of new; but the buyers purchased but sparingly, in consequence of the arrivals from abroad.—A few samples of new Barley appeared, which were speedily disposed of for malting at 70*s.* per quarter, and fresh grinding Barley was in demand at an advance of 2*s.* per quarter.—Old Beans are 2*s.* per quarter cheaper, and heavy sale at that reduction.—The quantity at market being large, Oats are 2*s.* per quarter lower, owing to the magnitude of the supply both of English and Foreign.

SHOCKING CONSEQUENCES OF THE ATTEMPTS OF BIGOTRY TO RE-ESTABLISH ITSELF.

ONE of the consequences of the re-action in favour of sovereigns and old establishments, was a re-action in favour of bigotry of all sorts. Those personages and their servants had so little to do with the spirit of their victory, (which was gained by the popular strength and by the last remaining influence of freer times), that even they themselves were astonished at it; and feeling how little meritorious they were, and how little they again intended to be, began to regard themselves once more as really the privileged favourites of heaven, exempt from their promised earthly responsibilities provided they had a sufficiency of saving grace. This, however they may disguise the truth to themselves, or affect to talk liberally here and there out of worldly trickery or vanity (for we are sick of trying to believe them) is the whole secret of their instantly renewed bigotries, civil and religious,—of the Inquisition and ungrateful persecutions in Spain, of the Emperor of Austria's scornful answer to the Italian Deputies,* of the Popish mummeries in Paris, of the supercilious promise-breaking of the lately whining King of Prussia; and lastly, of the notorious Holy Alliance, which was to keep "the Gospel of Peace," "whose service is perfect freedom," in good bristling condition with bayonets, and put down any Anti-Christian enthusiasts who should really be for freedom or peace hereafter, instead of merely talking about it for a purpose, and loving it only when not to be helped.

The effect was proportionate among all others, who resembled these faithful personages. Shallow men of the world, hypocrites, real bigots, all began unconsciously shewing what they thought of these odd victories, and ostentatiously placing themselves on the side of power for its own sake, whether earthly or heavenly. Then it was that we heard, from the mouths of men of pleasure, of "great moral lessons" given to France. Then it was, that one general eager movement took place among all worldly expectants, civil or clerical, towards the higher powers. Then it was that the atrocious nonsense of Divine Right, which would have been ashamed to utter a word a year before, was preached both in pulpits and newspapers, the former inculcating submission to "NEROS." Then it was that fair ladies admired by Emperors became still more ambitious, and set up for prophetesses. Then it was that metaphysical poets, tired of saying every thing and concluding nothing,—but we suppress this memo-random for the sake of other poets. Lastly, then it was that the lower and more ignorant order of bigots, not being able to illustrate their notions of the DIVINE BEING by Inquisitions, began to muster up all the horrible sacrifices in their power, of feeling, of liberty, of each other's comforts, of all the sweets of a natural and cheerful devotion, of all the attributes of mercy and benevolence (though still talking of them, as usual, in words), nay, at last, of the very bodies and lives of their fellow-creatures.

Yes; even this climax,—this funeral apex, has not been wanting to the re-edification of the temple of despotism. The reader may remember, that we had occasion last year to notice the appearance of a new sect in Austria, founded by one POESCHEL on the principle of vicarious atonement.* Among the extracts from domestic and foreign papers which we made on that subject, there was a short one from the Courier, which we shall repeat. "We have now" says the writer "to record an atrocity that would have disgraced the most barbarous annals of the most barbarous nation. A sect has lately been founded in Austria under the name of Petzelians, from the name of the founder PETZEL, a priest of Brannau. In imitation of the Spenceans," (mark this) "he preached equality and community in property; but" (mark this too) "he preached also the purification by blood, and enforced the HORRIBLE DOCTRINE of sacrificing men for the purpose of purifying others from their sins." During Passion Week several men were sacrificed, and on Good Friday a virgin of 13 years of age was put to death. Fortunately the career of this sect was as short as it was bloody. The founder and eighty-six of his followers have been taken up, and are to be brought to trial forthwith."—The result of this trial was that POESCHEL was pronounced insane, and placed in a hospital.

Madness however, or even the imputation of it, is no hindrance to the growth of bigotry. The first causes of it are in the madness of bigotry itself, and of those, high or low, who perpetuate it. We have now to record another melancholy instance of a sect, which is naturally supposed to be a child of the same father's and worse than he, as might be expected from it's folly. Nerone ipso Neroneior. We think it our duty to give all the passages on the subject that have come to hand. The first is as follows:—

"FANATICISM.—A German paper mentions, that a horrible murder has been committed by some religious fanatics in the circle of Leissnig in Saxony. It is said that an artisan, of the name of Kloos, has lately formed a pretty numerous sect in that part of Germany, who have adopted the belief that they are bound to sacrifice not only brute animals, but human beings to the Deity. The German paper asserts, that several attempts which had been made to procure victims had failed, but at length a poor man, who was not a member of the sect, has been murdered in the most atrocious manner. The whole country about Leissnig, Colditz, Grimma, Oschatz, &c. is in no little alarm at the extensive ramifications of this sect."

Account the second:—

"DREADFUL FANATICISM.—An article in the foreign journals, from Bamberg, contains some curious accounts of the effects o

* Examiner, No. 410, May 15.

fanaticism. It mentions, that circumstantial details had been received concerning the new sect lately formed in Saxony, and which has led to a horrid assassination. The sect is established chiefly in the circles of Leipsic and Misnia. It professes the most rigorous observation of the doctrines of the Old Testament, but they reject the new; they would destroy all who do not follow their system, and they proclaim the regeneration of mankind. They teach and practice a mass of superstitious doctrines, and think it a service acceptable to God to torment men, and lower animals. Their chief leader is a tailor, named Kloos, who has been for some time constantly travelling about the country between Leipsic and the Elbe, promulgating his dangerous doctrines. He has collected numerous meetings in the open air, and afterwards preached in the villages, and made converts of great numbers to his fanaticism. This sect, perhaps, would not have so greatly fixed the public attention, if one of its partizans, Fischer de Beyersdorff (a miller) and his wife, had not, through the influence of fanaticism, committed a murder, accompanied by the most horrible circumstances. Kloos, the leader, had been instructing them for several days. These people themselves were comfortable, and bore a very good character. After having passed some days in the open air, in prayer to God, upon their knees, and partaking of no nutriment except a few roots, they thought themselves called upon to make sacrifices. They had, as they said, a call to bury some young children alive, but fortunately they were unable to execute this dreadful project. A man of the name of Flor came to the mill just at the time when Fischer and his wife were in the height of their superstitious delirium. They looked upon him as a victim whose death would be acceptable to the Almighty. They therefore assassinated him in the most horrible manner. They cut off his hands and feet, and immediately afterwards fell to singing and praying. A miller boy, for whom they had reserved the same fate, found his safety in flight; he made a declaration of what had occurred, and the miller and his wife were apprehended. They boasted, on their examination before the Magistrate, of what they had done, and alleged that God had prescribed to them the extermination of all those who did not profess their doctrines, because such persons ought to be regarded as the children of the devil. Their doctrines appear to resemble considerably those of the famous Pöschel, which were promulgated during the last year in Austria. Information has been communicated that other fanatics of the same sort are projecting new assassinations. As soon as this dreadful business was known at Dresden, the Government took measures suited to the circumstances. Troops were detached to take military occupation of all the communes in which the fanatics had established themselves. Methods were taken to learn who had excited Kloos, the leader of them; for it is said that they receive instructions from persons of a more elevated rank in society. When Kloos learned that it was intended to apprehend him, he absconded, but he was discovered in the town of Meissen, and had been for several days past confined in prison."

Third and latest account:—

"Since the visit of Madame KRUNEVEK at Leipsic last winter," (says a public journal) "the most melancholy consequences of mystical absurdity have shewn themselves in the Kingdom of Saxony. Soon after her arrival, there appeared in the neighbourhood of the towns of Leisnig and Döbenu (which are the greatest corn-markets in Saxony), several Prophets who preached in her spirit, particularly in the patrimonial jurisdictions in the public houses and mills belonging to them. Besides Kloos, who is arrested, another peasant of the village of Taundorf has been preaching since the winter, and announces the judgments of Heaven and the sacrifices which are still required, particularly in the patrimonial jurisdiction of the neighbouring country.—Other peasants travel about with their wives, magnetise them, and make them relate to the mob the greatest absurdities respecting their visions of the good and evil spirits. A wag, who lately heard this nonsense, whispered to another, but loud enough for the woman magnetised to hear, "The police officers are coming." This immediately worked her out of her magnetic sleep, and she looked anxiously towards the door. These circumstances, and above all the late horrible murder, will doubtless excite the attention of the superior magistrates in the kingdom of Saxony, and it is to be expected that they will rouse the activity of the local authorities, to put an end to abuses which may have incalculable consequences."

We rather refer our readers to the article written on the former occasion, than repeat its observations which apply equally well to the present. Exclamations of horror though natural, and at first unavoidable, it is not necessary to set down deliberately. The thing in fact goes to such an excess as to outstrip them. We feel that we have nothing to do but to convert our horror as quickly as possible into pity for the madness of the folly, and to do our best towards rooting out its first causes.

That these are involuntarily felt to be what they really are, is curiously betrayed to us by the manner in which the accounts are related. We noticed in the article alluded to the more suspicious simplicity of the Courier, who in thinking to turn the story to account as a blow against the SPENCEANS, did not know what a blow he was hitting at his own ostensible religion. Many very pious Christians believe, that their early brethren entertained the notions of equality and common property; and at any rate, there is no evidence of a cruel feeling in such opinions. But what was our holy-altar and establishment-loving Courier about, when he talked of "the horrible doctrine of sacrificing men for the purpose of purifying others from their sins?" What is this but a bleeding branch of the famous doctrine of the atonement, which tells us that God was pleased with the vicarious sacrifice of his own agonized Son, as a pain necessary to satisfy his sense of justice; and which doctrine, for here venturing to differ with, as equally injurious to the Divine Spirit and to men, the Courier would hold us up to the public indignation if he dared?

By this we may judge of the report admitted into the second account, or cunningly added to it,—viz. that the new sect of Kloos professes the most vigorous observation of the doctrine of the Old Testament, but rejects the New;—"they would destroy," it adds, "all who do not follow their system, and they proclaim the regeneration of mankind,"—"because such persons ought to be regarded as the children of the devil." But the doctrine of atonement,—which by the way first begs the question of a necessity for itself,—is found by most Christians in the New Testament as well as the Old,—aye, by nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand; and in truth, this Christian doctrine whether really found there or not, is itself an imitation of the same doctrine in the Old Testament; and carried infinitely further; for in the Old, a brute animal is the medium of atonement, whereas in the New, consciousness and anguish as well as innocence are carried to as high an extreme as possible in order to meet the infinite demand for pain. And why for pain? Because vice had already produced so much pain. Such are the strange inconsistencies of this dreadful opinion, which can only make out a good and a merciful case by sinking all the real question.

There is another thing which the followers of Pöschel and Kloos appear to have copied from the New Testament, or at least from those texts of it in which the Christian world have found the doctrines of hell-fire, and the war with the "children of the devil." Reasoning upon the latter phrase, as the Inquisitors used, and as they would now do again if they could, they think they ought to exterminate all who differ with them; and upon the strength of the former doctrine, they imagine that if God can be pleased with the sufferings of his own creatures hereafter for all eternity, it is not much to suppose that he might like a few torments now. We do not wish to speak with levity; but we have long been tired of approaching these shocking dogmas with any thing like an appearance of ceremony; and it is for the benefit of humanity that such nonsense should have its chair of authority cut from under it.

Kloos and his followers must be stopped, if possible, as POESCHL was; and it will be politic to treat all they can, as he was treated. But this does not settle the question; for much higher leaders have been accused of madness in their time; and the people may ask, why governments should interfere to put down a cruel bigotry on their parts, if an insurrection against one of their own, the Inquisition for instance, is treated as rebellion. Bigotry itself must be destroyed; religious dogmatism must be destroyed; the infamous use of the name of the SUPREME BEING in all human quarrels, civil and religious, must be destroyed. Foolish and violent men must no longer be suffered to palm their bad and vindictive passions on Heaven; nor must the DIVINE BEING be supposed capable of acting upon the most half-witted and savage principles,—principles which originated in barbarous times; which were made holy by fear and tyranny; and which are now driven to their last desperate climax of imitation, by conquerors, who puzzle with their success those who are just wise enough to wonder at it.

EMIGRATION.—MR. BIRKBECK.

There are two principal causes why people quit an old civilized country. One is an excess of population, the other a bad state of things, owing either to a tyrannical government, oppressive laws, or chiefly (because it affects all classes) a heavy taxation. In the former case, emigration is useful to all; to those who go away, it affords a comfortable existence and freedom from care; and among those who remain, it prevents that great competition, which presses so hard on the middling and lower ranks of society. In the latter, however, the departure of any portion of the inhabitants makes the public burthens fall heavier on the rest, and although it may be eventually beneficial by compelling a change of measures on the part of the rulers, the present effect is injurious. This country is under the influence of both these causes: for though the land may be capable of supporting more people than it does at present, the war stimulus, by causing greater attention to be paid to manufactures than to agriculture, created a large manufacturing population, who were thrown out of employment by the peace, and most of them are of course unable to follow any other pursuit than that in which they have been instructed. All therefore, who dislike an extravagant government and a House of Commons in which (to use the insulting avowal of the corrupt) the buying and selling of seats is "as notorious as the sun at noon-day," who are weary of toiling all their lives for a hard-earned subsistence, with a continual dread of pauperism and misery, must be desirous of seeking some place, where they can be free from their anxieties and disagreeable reflections, where they may provide a quiet repose for their old age, undisturbed by the fear of their children's future wants. Such an asylum do the western parts of the United States offer. There they will find a fine climate; political liberty greater than is possessed by any European nation, secured to them by an assembly truly the representatives of the people; an economical government, and consequently very few taxes; and a situation most favourable for commercial purposes, on account of the numerous navigable rivers, among which are the Ohio, the Missouri, and the Mississippi.

These inducements would be to many irresistible, were it not for the dangers, real and imaginary, of the voyage and journey afterwards. The dislike to leave their friends and their home—their local attachments—pecuniary and other ties—and that feeling which "makes us rather bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of." Another impediment also frequently occurs in the want of a proper account of the difficulties incident to emigrants, and the means of avoiding or lessening them. This has been in a great measure supplied by the gentleman whose name is at the head of this article, and who was himself a farmer at Wanborough, in Surrey. His was not the usual general and superficial view of a person merely travelling along the high roads, and making passing observations. Going with his family in quest of a settlement, and searching carefully as he proceeded for an eligible situation, he of course felt the privations to which strangers are exposed, and has noted them down. His books are therefore most valuable to those who think of emigrating, and very amusing besides to other readers.

Since his arrival in America, Mr. Birkbeck has published two works: the first, entitled "Notes on a Journey in America," gives an account of his proceedings from the time of his landing to the period when he fixed on the place of his abode: the second, consists of letters written to his friends after his establishment in his new residence, containing more useful particulars, the result of his longer experience, and may be considered as a supplement to the first. The style is pleasant and familiar, and there are many passages, which not only show the intelligence and observation of the writer, but also his kind-heartedness, his sympathy for his suffering fellow-creatures, and his ardent love of liberty. The statements are supported by well selected facts and individual histories, and the books contain throughout internal evidence of their truth.

About the beginning of May, 1817, Mr. Birkbeck and his family arrived at Norfolk, in Virginia, and proceeded from thence to Richmond, the capital of the state, which contains 13,000 inhabitants, of whom half are negroes. Although a thriving place in a commercial point of view, its market is badly supplied, and the surrounding farmers are said to be jealous of its prosperity. The slavery which exists in this and other southern states prevented all idea of settling there. This dreadful evil is felt even by the slave-owners themselves. At a tavern where the party stopped, the conversation of the farmers turned almost entirely on this subject; they were unanimous in their opinion as to its bad consequences, but the remedy could not be settled. The effects of this system are the moral degradation both of the masters and the slaves, and a constant apprehension of the vengeance of the latter felt by the masters, whose houses they frequently burn. It is to be hoped that so strong a feeling respecting this inhuman and pernicious practice will suggest the means of its abolition.

Passing through Fredericksburg, they were conveyed up the river Potomack by the steam-boat to Washington. This city, including George Town, which adjoins it, contains about 20,000 people, scattered over a large space intended to be occupied by regular streets, of most of which, however, there is at present only a slight trace. The effects of the magnanimous conduct of the English army here in burning down houses which they could not retain many hours, are still visible. The President's house and the capitol are under repair. Mr. Birkbeck deprecates the ridiculous rage of the Americans for foreign ornament. "Ninety marble capitals have been imported at vast cost from Italy, and show how un-American is the whole plan."

They proceeded northwards from Washington as far as the great turnpike-road from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, which place they reached after crossing the Alleghany mountains. The number of emigrants on the road was immense: 12,000 waggons passed in 1816 between Baltimore and Philadelphia, besides loaded stages, and other travellers on foot and horseback. A great many of these were Americans from the eastern states, who are very fond of travelling and migrating. The most disagreeable thing to an Englishman, in the great eastern towns, is the bad state of the taverns.

At these places all is performed on the gregarious plan: every thing is public by day and by night;—for even night in an American inn affords no privacy. Whatever may be the number of guests, they must receive their entertainment en masse, and they must sleep en masse. Three times a day the great bell rings, and a hundred persons collect from all quarters to eat a hurried meal, composed of almost as many dishes. At breakfast you have fish, flesh, and fowl, bread of every shape and kind, butter, eggs, coffee, tea—every thing, and more than you can think of. Dinner is much like the breakfast, omitting the tea and coffee; and supper is the breakfast repeated. Soon after this meal, you assemble once more, in rooms crowded with beds, something like the wards of an hospital; where, after undressing in public, you are fortunate if you escape a partner in your bed, in addition to the myriads of bugs, which you need not hope to escape.

But the horrors of the kitchen, from whence issue these shoals of dishes, how shall I describe, though I have witnessed them. It is a dark and sooty hole, where the idea of cleanliness never entered, swarming with negroes of all sexes and ages, who seem as though they were bred there: without floor, except the rude stones that support a raging fire of pine logs, extending across the entire place; which forbids your approach, and which no being but a negro could face.

In your reception at a western Pennsylvania tavern, there is something of hospitality combined with the mercantile feelings of your host. He is generally a man of property, the head man of the village, perhaps, with the title of Colonel; and feels that he confers, rather than receives, a favour by the accommodation he affords; and rude as his establishment may be, he does not perceive that you have a right to complain; what he has you partake of, but he makes no apologies; and if you show symptoms of dissatisfaction or disgust, you will fare the worse; whilst a disposition to be pleased and satisfied, will be met by a wish to make you so.

Pittsburg stands at the junction of the two rivers which form the Ohio, and has a population of about 7000. It has been called the Birmingham of America, but the difference is too great to allow of any comparison between the two places. There are however iron-foundries, glass-houses, &c. and steam-engines are constructed there. It is likewise an entrepot for the commodities sent by the eastern states to the western. The wages of shoe-makers, tailors, and other artizans, were two dollars (nine shillings) a day. The usual mode of going from Pittsburg to the western territory is by passing down the Ohio; a sort of floating rooms called "arks" are used for the purpose. But Mr. Birkbeck, whose object was to see the country in order that he might judge for himself, preferred horseback. Horses were therefore procured, and the party commenced their journey. Having crossed the Ohio at Wheeling, they proceeded through the towns of St. Clairsville, Louisville, Lancaster, Chillicothe, &c. to Cincinnati. The rapid progress of this place is truly surprising; yet it is not more so than the other settlements in this fine country. After lamenting the sordid and short-sighted views which have caused this and most of the other towns to be built in unwholesome situations, for the sake of the advantage of a navigable stream, Mr. B. says—

Cincinnati is, however, a most thriving place, and backed as it is already by a great population and a most fruitful country, bids fair to be one of the first cities of the west. We are told, and we cannot doubt the fact, that the chief of what we see is the work of four years. The hundreds of commodious, well-finished brick houses, the spacious and busy markets, the substantial public buildings, the thousands of prosperous well-dressed, industrious inhabitants, the numerous waggons and drays, the gay carriages and elegant females;—the shoals of craft on the river, the busy stir prevailing every where, houses building, boat building, paving and levelling streets; the numbers of country people, constantly coming and going, with the spacious taverns, crowded with travellers from a distance.

I was assured by a respectable gentleman, one of the first settlers, and now a man of wealth and influence, that he remembers when there was only one poor cabin where this noble town now stands. The county of Hamilton is something under the regular dimensions of twenty miles square, and it already contains 30,000 inhabitants. Twenty years ago, the vast region comprising the states of Ohio and Indiana, and the territory of Illinois and Michigan, only counted 30,000 inhabitants; the number that are now living, and living happily, in the little county of Hamilton, in which stands Cincinnati.

The price of land in the state of Ohio varies from 25 to 50 dollars per acre, according to the "improvements" and local advantages. Many people travelling this road are tempted to stop here by the comparatively mature state of society, and the consequent conveniences. Mr. Birkbeck felt this temptation, but was determined to see what was beyond, that when he fixed on a spot, he might be satisfied that he had not neglected better opportunities. If unsuccessful, he could but return to this part of the country. There was, too, another reason: as the land in Ohio then fetched 15 or 20 times the price it did ten years before, producing an immense profit to the first cultivators, it was natural to conclude that the same advantages would accrue to them in a more unsettled country, where the land might be purchased at the government price of two dollars an acre. In return for this future good, it was however necessary to make up their minds to endure the privations attendant on all first settlers, but which every day grow less and less until the progress of population makes them no longer felt.

From Cincinnati they continued their route through Indiana to Vincennes on the river Wabash, which is here the boundary of the state, lodging frequently at the solitary huts in the woods, inhabited by a class of people who live entirely by their rifles. They are called backwoodsmen, and form the medium between civilization and a state of nature. The supposition "that they are lawless, semi-barbarous vagabonds, dangerous to live among," is contradicted by Mr. Birkbeck. "On the contrary, the laws are respected and are effectual; and the manners of the people are kind and gentle to each other, and to strangers." The inhabitants of Vincennes consist of Americans, French, Canadians, and Negroes, who are all tinged with French politeness,—a circumstance which does honour to that nation. Indeed as far as the fourth or even the tenth generation, Mr. B. says, the descendants of the French preserve that distinguishing trace of their fathers. Some Indian nations also, who dwell about 100 miles north, trade here for skins.

They next bent their course towards the south, and came to Princeton, a town not three years old, containing about fifty houses. The inn, though built of logs, was as neat a one as many in Bath, and the society as good, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, as any county town Mr. Birkbeck is acquainted with. Making Princeton their head-quarters, they explored the country beyond the Wabash, and at last made choice of a prairie, (or meadow) about thirty miles beyond Princeton, in the south-eastern part of the territory of Illinois. The situation is admirable. On one side, at the distance of six miles, is the Big Wabash, a river four hundred miles long, which empties itself into the Ohio, and has a communication with Canada and the Great Lakes, by means of a portage of only eight miles to the little stream of the Miami, which runs into Lake Huron. As soon as the population becomes of sufficient importance, a canal will of course be formed, and render it one of the longest and most useful inland navigations in the world. On the other side, at about the same distance, there is the Little

Wabash, also navigable. The nearest point on the Ohio is Shawnee Town, and that is 45 miles off. From New Orleans, at the mouth of the Mississippi, to Shawnee Town, is 1,200 miles, and the facility of communication is greatly increased by the invention of steam-boats, of which many were then in use, and the number continually becoming larger. By this means, European and other foreign commodities are easily procured, and a market is also secured for all the superfluous produce of the land. Nor is a good geographical position the only advantage. The soil is light and sandy, and so easy of tillage that the ploughing irons require sharpening but once in the year. The northern end of the prairie rises to a great elevation, and thus prevents the dampness which renders some of them unwholesome; but even that may be generally remedied by cultivation. The situation of the new settlers, on their first arrival, is thus described:—

But, that our friends in England, who may read these notes, may have an idea of our real position, let them consider our two families, viz. that of my friend Mr. George Flower, late of Marden, in England, and my own, about to be fixed upon eligible sites on our two adjoining estates, of fifteen hundred acres each, which we have carved for ourselves from a beautiful prairie and the adjoining woods.

Here we are preparing to raise buildings; carpenters and builders have offered themselves; estimates are made, and materials are at hand. We are also providing for gardens and orchards, that we may literally "sit under our own vines and our own fig trees." We might now mow many hundred acres of valuable grass if we had a good stock of cattle to require it.

Having now brought Mr. Birkbeck to his journey's end, we shall give his opinion respecting emigration, and his advice as to the mode of procedure.

From what I have seen, and heard from others of America, east of the Alleghany mountains, I judge that artisans in general will succeed in any part of it; and that labourers of every description will greatly improve their condition; in so much, that they will, if saving and industrious, soon lay by enough to tempt them to migrate still farther in quest of land, on which they may establish themselves as proprietors.—That mercantile adventurers would be likely to succeed as well, but not better than in England; that clerks, lawyers, and doctors, would gain nothing by the exchange of countries: the same of master manufacturers in general.

As to the condition of farmers in the eastern states, I am not very particularly informed. (The southern or slave states, I consider as without the range of the present inquiry.) But from what I have learnt, I entertain great doubts of the exchange, on the whole, proving satisfactory to the British farmer; and I am clear that it would not be advisable for persons of any other description than farmers to remove from Great Britain to the eastern states, in order to practice agriculture.

He is very confident, however, that all who resolve to penetrate farther west, and rely upon the earth for their support, and who can bring with them moderate industry and good morals, will not be disappointed in any reasonable expectations. Artisans are of course wanted in a proper proportion to the other inhabitants, and are sure to advance rapidly. They can certainly earn a dollar and a half or two dollars a day, the price charged at the inns for board and lodging for a week! Indeed all labour is dear in America, and provisions being so cheap, the condition of the lower classes is many degrees above that of the same classes in England. The wages of the commonest labourer are three quarters of a dollar, enough to enable a provident man in the course of a few years to buy land for himself. One effect, however, of this facility of living, is the indolence which seems to be very prevalent among the natives. The Indians, except when engaged in hunting or fishing, are notoriously idle, though something is perhaps to be attributed to their precarious mode of life; the backwoods-men come next, and then the inhabitants of the towns. Mr. B. frequently saw strong young men lolling about, inactive and listless; they said, as a sort of excuse, "You English are very industrious, but we have liberty." The following are some instances of the success of men, who, having no capital to begin with, were necessitated to rely on their own industry and resources. The first is written at Pittsburg.

A shoemaker of my acquaintance, that is to say, whom I employed, left Ireland, as poor as an Irish emigrant, four years ago,—staid one year in Philadelphia, then removed hither, and was employed by a master practitioner of the same calling, at twelve dollars per week.—He saved his money, married, paid his master, who retired on his fortune, three hundred dollars for his business, and is now in a fair way of retiring too: as he has a shop well stocked and a thriving trade, wholesale and retail, with vast profits.

The second is the history of two Germans, with three young children, who were even unable to speak English:

These two men were hired at Philadelphia, by a respectable man (with whom I have contracted an acquaintance, through a common friend) and they are now together, master and men, on their way to his farm, near Croydon, in the state of Indiana. These men are engaged for two years, at eighty dollars per annum each, with all necessaries; viz. house, food, and clothing, for themselves, and children. Thus, at the expiration of two years, they are possessed of thirty-six pounds sterling each, and their children growing up to be useful. With this they may pay the first deposit on farms of eighty or a hundred acres, build themselves cabins, and become freeholders and citizens. Mechanics, or artisans of the most simple kind, earn half as much more, and those of superior talents rise rapidly to wealth.

The next example is that of an old Irishman, living near St. Clairsville, with a wife and two children, whom he had brought from his native country; and the last, that of an intelligent farmer from the neighbourhood of Chillicothe, whom Mr. B. met at an inn:—

The son and daughter were married, and well-settled; each having eight children. He came to this place fourteen years ago, before an axe had been lifted, except to make a blaze road, a track across the wilderness, marked by the hatchet on the trees, which passed over the spot where the town now stands. A free and independent American, and a warm politician, he now discusses the interests of the state as one concerned in its prosperity:—and so he is, for he owns one hundred and eighteen acres of excellent land, and has twenty descendants. He has also a right to scrutinize the acts of the government, for he has a share in its appointment, and pays eight dollars a year in taxes:—five to the general treasury, and three to his own country:—in all about four-pence per acre. He still inhabits a cabin, but it is not an Irish cabin.

Fourteen years ago, he also came into this new settlement, and "unloaded his family under a tree," on his present estate; where he has now two hundred acres of excellent land, cleared and in good cultivation, capable of producing from eighty to one hundred bushels of Indian corn per acre.

It will be seen from these passages, that even the most indigent get well off, in no very long time too. It naturally follows, that persons with capital will get on faster in proportion to the quantity of it. Mr. Birkbeck says that "a small sum will do;" and in the "Letters from Illinois," invites a friend in England to emigrate, who has "a large family and small means," if he can transport himself to the Illinois, and have then one hundred pounds sterling left. The laying out this sum would be in this way:—

A hundred pounds sterling will go a great way in dollars. With eighty dollars you will "enter a quarter section of land;" that is, you will purchase at the land-office one hundred and sixty acres, and pay one-fourth of the purchase-money, and looking to the land to reward your pains with the means of discharging the other three-fourths as they become due, in two, three, and four years. You will build a house with fifty dollars; and you will find it extremely comfortable and convenient, as it will be really and truly yours. Two horses will cost, with harness and plough, one hundred. Cows, and hogs, and seed corn, and fencing, with other expenses, will require the remaining two hundred and ten dollars. This beginning, humble as it appears, is affluence and splendour, compared with the original outfit of settlers in general. Yet no man remains in poverty, who possesses even moderate industry and economy, and especially of time.

There are two good and pretty cheap modes of reaching Illinois; one is by landing at Philadelphia, taking the stage to Pittsburg, and thence falling down the river Ohio as far as Shawnee Town, which is at the southeastern corner of the territory; the other by making New Orleans your port, and then putting yourself into one of the steam-boats that go up the Wabash: the former is the nearest way; the latter saves the jolting of the stages, and frequent changing of conveyances. The sale of the public lands is thus managed:—

The tract of country, which is to be disposed of, is surveyed, and laid out in sections of a mile square, containing six hundred and forty acres, and these are subdivided into quarters, and, in particular situations, half-quarters. The country is also laid out in counties of about twenty miles square, and townships of six miles square, in some instances, and in others eight. The townships are numbered in ranges, from north to south, and the ranges are numbered from west to east; and lastly, the sections in each township are marked numerically. All these lines are well defined in the woods, by marks on the trees. This done, at a period of which public notice is given, the lands in question are put up to auction, excepting the sixteenth section in every township, which is reserved for the support of schools, and the maintenance of the poor. There are also sundry reserves of entire townships, as funds for the support of seminaries on a more extensive scale; and sometimes for other purposes of general interest. No government lands are sold under two dollars per acre; and I believe they are put up at this price in quarter sections, at the auction, and if there be no bidding they pass on. The best lands and most favourable situations are sometimes run up to ten or twelve dollars, and in some late instances much higher. The lots which remain unsold are, from that time, open to the public, at the price of two dollars per acre; one-fourth to be paid down, and the remaining three-fourths to be paid by instalments in five years; at which time, if the payments are not completed, the lands revert to the state, and the prior advances are forfeited.

When a purchaser has made his election of one, or any number of vacant quarters, he repairs to the land office, pays eighty dollars, or as many times that sum as he purchases quarters, and receives a certificate, which is the basis of the complete title, which will be given him when he pays all; this he may do immediately, and receive eight per cent. interest for prompt payment. The sections thus sold are marked immediately on the general plan, which is always open at the land office to public inspection, with the letters A. P. "advance paid." There is a receiver and a register at each land office, who are checks on each other, and are remunerated by a per centage on the receipts.

The uncultivated land is in general either covered with forests, or with a long coarse grass, which is however killed by sowing the common grasses. "Nothing but fencing and providing water for stock is wanted to reduce a prairie into the condition of useful grass land; and from that state, we all know, the transition to arable is through a simple process, easy to perform, and profitable as it goes on." The next thing to be done is to get a log cabin, which the carpenters there will contract to erect at thirty dollars a room, each room being 18 feet long, and 16 broad, with a plank floor and roof. Those who have the means can exchange this for a good brick dwelling in a short time; and for poor labourers, Mr. B. has provided some cabins, with an inclosure for each of two acres and a half, and a right of common in an extensive piece of ground. These are to be rented by the occupiers.

Of the dangers to be feared, and the privations to be undergone, we shall now say something; and first, of those which regard health. All parts annually overflowed by rivers, or naturally swampy, or in the neighbourhood of a mill pond, are unwholesome, and cause agues, &c. They likewise abound with mosquitoes, as our English fens do with rats. But though Mr. Birkbeck was frequently told, in the progress of his journey, that he was going to an unhealthy country, he found by experience, that only the situations above mentioned were so. Of the wild beasts, the only ones which attack the cattle at night, unless dogs are employed, are the bears, when furious from want, will attack a man; the hunting of the latter is the chief employment of the backwoodsmen, and hams are made of their flesh. There are several of the serpent kind, the rattle-snake, black snake, &c. but the former is the only one whose bite is mortal, and it will generally slink away at the sight of any person, unless suddenly trodden upon. The privations are of the comforts and luxuries, not of the necessities of life. Nothing need be feared on the score of food. Besides the mutton and beef and pork grown on the farms, there is a good deal of game in the woods. Wild Turkeys, weighing 12lbs. each, are sold at a dollar for five, and all other articles of food are very cheap. Clothing is, however, expensive, as it must be brought from the eastern towns, or New Orleans. The woods furnish materials for household furniture. Respecting the disposal of the produce, Mr. B. is of opinion, that there is a certain market at an average price, on account of the great influx of emigrants, and the number of births.

We have given this long account of these entertaining books, because we think the information which they contain cannot be too widely spread.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

FROM THE FRENCH FRONTIER, AUG. 23.—The reviews of the various corps of the Army of Occupation are put off till the beginning of the month of September. That of the Austrian corps, commanded by General Baron Frimont, is fixed for the 6th, and this, it seems, is to be the first. The delay is occasioned by the Duke's going to Paris, whither he has been called on account of the mediation of the differences between Spain and Portugal. The Spanish General Alava has accompanied the Duke to Paris.

PRUSSIA.

BERLIN, AUG. 18.—We are able to refute some of the reports circulated in Germany relative to Prussian affairs. Nothing is yet decided upon respecting the future constitution of the Prussian monarchy; it is certain that this subject was not discussed during the last session of the Council of State. Thus we may perceive how little credit is due to the news of the fabricated project of the constitution, drawn up by the Council of State; and the pretended decision of the King, communicated to that assembly, that the ancient constitution would be continued without any modifications whatever.

NORTH AMERICA.

QUEBEC, JULY 21.—On Monday, the 6th inst. about five o'clock in the morning, the inhabitants of the parish of St. Giles, the settlements of which extend two leagues and a half along the low grounds on the banks of a river of the same name, falling into the Chaudiere, above the Falls, perceived that the river was rising with extraordinary rapidity. It soon overflowed its banks, and extended over the low grounds, in a wave of considerable height moving faster than a man can walk. The cattle in the fields were either immediately swept away, or retiring to eminences, soon surrounded and overflowed, were drowned. The inhabitants remained or took refuge in their houses, generally built on the highest grounds, in expectation that they would be safe; but these also were soon surrounded. As the water rose in the houses, sweeping away every thing around them, they ascended into their garrets. One whole family, a woman and six children, were precipitated in the flood, along with their house, and drowned. Several other houses and barns were carried away, or damaged, but we have not heard of any other lives being lost. Many of the inhabitants have lost all their cattle, and a great portion of the live stock of the whole settlement is drowned. All the hay, being generally along the river, and almost all the grain, is destroyed. Sand and heaps of drifted timber, now cover the fields.—The river rose seven feet in 12 minutes, and about 18 feet above its usual level in a few hours: from a stream of about 30 feet it became a river of more than a mile in width; it tore up by the roots elm trees of three feet in diameter, and has made gullies throughout the fields to the depth of six feet. In many places its course is changed: it was five days before it retired within its banks.

NORFOLK (VIRGINIA), JULY 10.—The United States frigate Congress anchored at Hampton-roads on Wednesday afternoon, from Buenos-Ayres. Messrs. Graham and Rodney, two of the Commissioners sent out to the new Republic by our Government, have returned in her. Mr. Band, another of the Commissioners, who went out in the Congress, remains at Buenos Ayres in the quality of a public Representative from the Government of the United States. The Congress touched at the island of Margaritta, where she remained two days. The island was still in possession of the patriots, who had rendered it almost impregnable. The affairs of the Patriots were never in a more flourishing condition. They had lately been reinforced by a fine brigade of artillery, composed entirely of British troops; and such was the confidence of all classes in the emancipation of Venezuela, that they considered that event to be certain. The morning the Congress was getting under way, a despatch vessel arrived from the Main, bringing positive intelligence of the death of the Spanish General Morillo.

LANCASTER, AUG. 27.—BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.—

This action was brought by Sarah Settle against John Crumbeholme. The plaintiff, who was about 30, lived at her mother's, and had a fortune of 800*l*. The defendant lived about half a mile from the plaintiff's, and held half of a farm which produced him 500*l*. or 600*l*. a year. A great intimacy subsisted between the parties, and their marriage was considered by their friends as fixed upon. The defendant, by his promises and solicitations, succeeded in seducing the plaintiff, who was delivered of a child. He is also about 30. His attention to the plaintiff had continued for seven or eight years.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY summed up. The only question for the Jury was, what was the proper compensation in damages in this case. The misconduct of women would diminish their claim in a Court of Justice. This was the first action that he was aware of for breach of promise of marriage, where seduction had taken place, and the seduction might diminish if not annihilate the damages. Marriage was for life; respect for each other was essential to its happiness; if jealousy entered into the mind of the husband, it led to incalculable misery, and what more likely to excite jealousy than the knowledge that his wife had fallen when she was most likely to resist? If a woman lose her virtue, whether with seduction or importunity on his part, a man must pause before he perform the promise he may have made. He ought not to abandon her; but to make her his wife is a different thing. They would consult the interests of the sex by showing that if a woman yield to seduction, she cannot come into a Court of Justice with a man for not doing what he would have probably done if she had not fallen from her proper place.

The Jury retired, and in a quarter of an hour came back with a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 700*l*.

GLoucester.—Charles Webb, aged 27, was ignored for a rape, but put upon his trial for an assault.

Mary Barrow, a beautiful little girl of 15, was the prosecutrix. Her father is a labouring man at Beckford. The prisoner is overseer for Squire Wakeman at that place. She worked under the eye of the prisoner for seven-pence a day. On the evening of the 20th of May, she was sent to Mr. Wakeman's brewhouse for barn. The prisoner there attempted to take indecent liberties. Next night he came to her father's house to get her father to assist him in getting some hens off the roost, with which her mother was to go next day to market. Her father was unwell, and in bed, and ordered her to go. She, in consequence of the prisoner's conduct the former day, refused, but her father threatened to break her neck if she did not go. When they got into the garden, the prisoner threw her on a seat and violently effected his purpose. He left her sick and faint, and got hold of the hens, which she carried home. She told nothing to her father and mother, but worked every day with Charles as usual, for fear of offending her father, her mother, and the squire. A fortnight afterwards the thing was generally talked of, the prisoner having mentioned it; and the Rev. Dr. Timbrill had the witness examined, in consequence of which the prisoner was committed for a rape.

The mother corroborated the above evidence as far as she could.

For the prisoner, John Dyer and Robert Smith were called; they said that the prosecutrix had suffered them to take every liberty short of a criminal intercourse. His Lordship examined them strictly on this subject, and they exhibited every symptom of falsehood and inconsistency.

Mr. Baron GARROW summed up. Had they been trying a rape they must acquit the prisoner, whatever might be their moral conviction, since the unhappy girl concealed the circumstance so long. That she went with the prisoner under the force of parental authority, that she concealed her misfortune from mistaken fear of offending persons who had power over her, were circumstances by no means unaccountable. It had been insinuated that this girl of 15 had been a wanton, and two young men gave evidence to support that insinuation. They went to see her after the prisoner had been committed. If their testimony was true, they were disgraced by their conduct.

The Jury at once found him Guilty, and he was sentenced to be imprisoned for 12 months.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 7.

THIS is a week of most interesting and important intelligence. And first for the first real government in the world; for such the faithless meanness of the Allies and the paltry imitation of them by England have conspired to make it. There is at length news from the United States, that may be regarded as all but official. It is comprised in an article which has appeared in the demi-official paper the National Intelligencer, and the substance of which we proceed to give as it was very sufficiently abridged in Saturday's Chronicle. We are told, says the National Intelligencer, "the President of the UNITED STATES has decided, that Pensacola, and the other Spanish posts, which have been taken by General JACKSON in the Floridas, shall be restored to the Spanish Authority; but with a requisition, that the KING of SPAIN shall hereafter keep such a force in those colonies as shall enable him to execute with fidelity the fifth Article of the Treaty between the United States and Spain."

"By this treaty," continues the abridgment, "Spain stipulated not to suffer her Indians to attack the Citizens of the United States, or the Indians inhabiting their territory; and the United States stipulated not to allow the last mentioned Indians to commence hostilities against the subjects of his Catholic Majesty or his Indians. The Seminole Indians occupy the lands on each side of the line between the United States and Florida; much the greater part of them living within the limits of the King of SPAIN. They are neither citizens of the United States, nor subjects of the King of SPAIN, and owe no allegiance to the laws of either Power, are the owners of the soil which they occupy, hold a qualified sovereignty over it, and exercise on all occasions the right of making war and peace. It was owing to the acknowledged incompetency of Spain to fulfil the stipulations of her treaty, by restraining the hostilities of the Seminoles by force, that the United States were compelled to take up arms in their own defence. Yet such was the delicacy of their Government towards Spain, that the first order to their General expressly forbade him to cross the Spanish line. A second order to the same purport was issued; and it was not till it became apparent, that driving the Indians beyond the limits of the United States, was doing nothing towards extinguishing the war, since in falling back within the limits of Florida, they were still at home, with all the means of incursion and annoyance which they possessed at the commencement of hostilities, that a third order was issued, authorising the General, in case the Indians presented themselves in a body beyond the line, to cross it and attack them. Shortly after issuing this order, a massacre was committed by the Indians, which left the United States no alternative but to carry the war into Florida, and to do for Spain what she confessed herself unable to do for herself; and a fourth order was issued to this effect, but expressly commanding the General, at the same time, if the Indians should take refuge under a Spanish fort, not to attack them in that situation, but to report the case to the Secretary at War.—In attacking the posts of St. Mark and Pensacola, with the fort of Barancas, General JACKSON, we are told, acted not under the authority of his Government, but on facts, which were, for the first time, brought to his knowledge on the immediate theatre of war;—facts which implicated the Spanish Authorities in that quarter as the instigators and auxiliaries of the war. Of the important facts alleged by him, satisfactory proof has already been furnished to the PRESIDENT. In the mean time, as Congress only has the power of declaring war, and the PRESIDENT does not consider himself authorised to retain the Spanish posts, which would be an act of war, the resolution had been taken to restore them, and to demand from the King of SPAIN the punishment of those Officers whose improper conduct led to their seizure.

"Such is the substance of the demi-official statement in The National Intelligencer."

If this be true (and there is no reason to doubt it, though the European Governments have rendered suspicion the first natural impulse on such occasions), nobody can help drawing a striking contrast between the conduct of those Governments and that of the North American. People began to fear, from the delay of explanation, that the American like the French Republic, partly provoked and partly spoiled by bad example, had given way to the common appetite of the great vulgar for spoliation; and their hirelings, with their usual self-betrayment, began, not to fear, but to chuckle. It was extremely natural in the latter to do so. Had the Americans condescended to imitate them and their masters, it would at once have served to ease their consciences, to secure their ill-gotten gains, to verify one or two of their despairing jokes, and to keep them in that hopelessness of mankind, which they have both the least and greatest right to indulge in, and which lies, like embittering poison, at the bottom of all their pleasures as well as opinions.

To us, the announcement of the intention of the PRESIDENT is particularly grateful; not because we are of opinion that a just arrangement might not have been made for the cession of Florida, but because this most plain, obvious, and quiet way of acting up to the letter of the thing is the most unequivocal mode of settling it;—because we take a family pride as well as a national one in the noble politics of our American kinsmen;—and because we formerly experienced some apprehensions of common-place ambition on the part of Mr. MONROE, in which it will ever be our delight to say we were mistaken.

A most curious and exemplary contrast to this news is afforded in that of America's royal neighbour the black Sovereign of Hayti. This man, whom the "legitimates" do not like because he is a soldier of fortune whom the bigoted part of the whites think meanly of, because he is not of their colour, whom the liberal part began to shake their heads at when they saw him so eager for the trappings of royalty, and who was waiting with more or less anxiety for eventual acknowledgment from them all, has had the folly to go and lay claim to the republican part of the island, and in a manner truly legitimate. He first makes a military movement; then he issues a Proclamation to quiet the minds of the republicans, and pretends he has no sinister intentions; then he fairly hems them in with a cordon of troops; and lastly he says, Join me, or take the consequences as traitors!—We think we never saw such an impudent specimen of the bad habits of a military life, and of the impatient hunger and thirst instantly produced by the taste of Kingship. The late President PÉRON, of whom he now proves himself to have been afraid, may now more than ever be considered as a wise Chief and a true lover of freedom,—a true follower of those great men in America, whose title of President he could afford to be contented with. Look, hopeless slaves of despotism! Look, hopeful aspirers after Liberty!

At the same period with these two remarkable pieces of intelligence, come advices from South America, which give reason to believe that the United States are about to acknowledge the Independence of one or two of their imitators in the South, if they have not already done so. But Spain now offers a free trade to her former colonies,—now;—yes, now that she finds that her troops have been breaking and hewing them to no purpose but to get despised and driven off with slaughter in return. It will never do. It is too late. The colonies would have compromised matters once; the Court of Madrid would not; and it has shewn itself too weak, despicable, ungrateful, to be treated with at all but as a foreign power. It appeals to the Allies in vain. The Allies, as we have shewn before, have too much on their hands to assist it; and if they attempted, would only fare miserably and ridiculously after their voyage of three thousand miles. Look again, hopeless slaves of despotism! Look again, hopeful lovers of liberty!

After all this, our readers will readily excuse us from recording the weekly and temporary nonsense of the Pro-mise-Breakers in Europe.

Intelligence is communicated via Jamaica, whence it appears that the Royalist Spaniards themselves admit in the full extent ascribed to it the total defeat and destruction of their Chilian army. The army of OSORIO, they say, was decoyed into the open country, where the Patriots, consisting of 7,000 horse and 3,000 infantry, attacked and cut it to pieces. OSORIO himself was subsequently taken by the victors.

A letter from the Agent at Lloyd's at the Cape of Good Hope states, that the Minden, of 74 guns had been despatched in all haste from Ceylon to Madras, to solicit a reinforcement of troops for the relief of General BROWN and his staff, who were surrounded in a mud fort, and besieged by the Candians, all communication between the Governor and his troops, or seat of Government, being cut off by that exasperated enemy. A detachment of the 83d regiment had been totally destroyed by the Insurgents. The Minden had been seen on her return to Colombo, with troops for the General's relief.

LORD COCHRANE was accompanied from Boulogne in the British ship the Rose, by his Lady and two patriotic agents, who have been some time in London. There is no doubt he will proceed round Cape Horn. The Spanish naval force on the south-west coast is pretty considerable. We believe they have two 74's, and several frigates.—Evening Paper.

"We have it from the highest authority, that it is the declared purpose of the Emperor ALEXANDER, the moment the Congress commences its sitting at Aix-la-Chapelle, to insist on BONAPARTE's being allowed to return to Europe, and either to live in England as a prisoner of war on his parole; or, should our Government refuse its assent to this proposition, at all events to insist upon his removal forthwith from the barren rock upon which he is at present confined."—Morning Chronicle.

MANCHESTER COTTON-SPINNERS.—The finances of these poor people are said to be nearly exhausted, and it is perhaps by this circumstance that they have been driven to riotous proceedings. Ten or twelve thousand assembled in front of Messrs. GRAY and Co.'s factory, where some of the spinners were at work, and attacked it, saying that stones had been thrown at them from the windows. They were, however, fired at from within and repulsed. One, it is said, died directly; and another was mortally wounded. The weavers have also turned out, and parade the streets of Manchester in great numbers. The petty shopkeepers, with whom the journeymen chiefly dealt, are almost ruined. Such is the effect of combination on both sides. We think the advice contained in the following article from the Leeds Mercury, the best that can be given:—"The master cotton-weavers in some parts of Lancashire as well as in Scotland, deriving wisdom from the dissensions of others, have at length made an advance of 10 per cent. on the price of weaving. And most assuredly the best way to avert the evils of combinations, is to listen in time to the reasonable claims of the labouring classes, and to endeavour to place them in a situation of humble comfort and contentment. Labour is a commodity that the lower has to sell to the higher classes of society, and while there ought to be no undue attempts to elevate the price of that article beyond its proper level, it is equally unjust and impolitic to endeavour by associations, or otherwise, to depreciate it below the price which the business in which it is exercised will reasonably allow. Maximums and minimums are to be avoided in labour as in other articles: and it has struck us as a glaring inconsistency, that while we hear so much declamation against the combinations of workmen, we find the declaimers exciting and encouraging the masters to persist in their combination. There is a short remedy by which the whole trade of Manchester would be restored to its former activity in a single week. Combinations, we will say conflicting combinations, have brought them into their present difficulties. Let both masters and men cease to combine, and let every factory proprietor offer the price that he can fairly afford for labour, without reference to what his neighbour thinks proper to give, and the contest would be at an end. The spinners must take these prices or they must starve; for if they insist upon higher wages than the master can afford to give, it will be his interest as well as his duty to resist their demand, and the mills must and will in that case continue to stand still, till this refractory and oppressive spirit is subdued."

The Irish have their Donnybrook fair, as we have our Bartholomew fair; and it is, like our own, the resort of all the refuse population of the Metropolis. The Grand Duke MICHAEL, from a wish probably to see society under all its forms, visited this scene on Thursday se'nnight, and was much gratified with the amusements, which, the Irish Editor is careful to tell us, were, as usual, "knocks down for love," and cut heads, with the never-failing accompaniment of picking pockets. The Irish Editor thinks these diversions a certain remedy against treasons, stratagems, and spoils. We are sorry to differ from such high authority; but we really think, from his showing, that Donnybrook fair is no better a school for virtue than that abominable nuisance which is now infesting Smithfield.

CLAREMONT.—A Correspondent, who signs himself "a resident at Esher," complains of a system of extortion practised at the seat of the late Princess CHARLOTTÉ. He says that on going into the principal Drawing-room, at least half a guinea must be paid to the person who shows it, afterwards five shillings to the gardener, and the same sum to the footman who ushers you out. A douceur is also expected at the inns where tickets are obtained. He likewise mentions that the bonnet, shawl, and watch, of the Princess are not left in the Library.

We understand that the names of the Commissioners of Bankrupt in the case of PAGE are as follow:—EDWARD CHRISTIAN, ROBERT TALBOT, FRANCIS VESEY, SPENCER RICHARD JAMES LEWIN, and F. S. M. FONBLANQUE, Esqrs.

ANECDOTE.—Amongst the deliramenta of the learned, which have amused mankind, the following instance merits a conspicuous rank:—Some years ago, there were several large elm trees in the College-garden, behind the Ecclesiastical Court, Doctor's Commons, in which a number of rooks had taken up their abode, forming in appearance a sort of convocation of aerial ecclesiastics. A young gentleman, who lodged in an attic, and was their close neighbour, frequently entertained himself with thinning this covey of black game, by means of a cross-bow. On the opposite side lived a curious old civilian, who, observing from his study that the rooks often dropt senseless from their perch, no sign being made to his vision to account for the phenomenon, set his wits to work to consider the cause. It was probably during a profitless time of peace, and the Doctor, having plenty of leisure, weighed the matter over and over, till he was at length fully satisfied that he had made a great ornithological discovery. He actually wrote a treatise, stating circumstantially what he himself had seen, and in conclusion giving it as the settled conviction of his mind, that rooks were subject to epilepsy!

The importance and value of salt, as an introduction into human food, becomes continually more evident as its medicinal properties are rendered more distinct and fully known. Among other salubrious virtues, may be mentioned its anthelmintic properties, which have been rendered very evident by the publication of some late cases. It appears, that whenever salt is denied to the human being, diseases of the stomach are general, and that worms are engendered in the body; and in one instance, where a person, from aversion to that substance, had refused it either in food, or in any other form, they appear to have been the consequence, and remained for many years. In Ireland salt is a well known remedy for bots in the horse; and among the poor people a dose of common salt is esteemed a cure for the worms.—Journal of the Royal Institution.

CANINE SAGACITY.—Last week a lady going over Lansdown was overtaken by a large dog, which had left two men that were travelling the same road with a horse and cart, and followed by the animal for some distance, the creature endeavouring to make her sensible of something, by looking in her face, and then pointing with his nose behind. Failing in his object, he next placed himself so completely in front of the object of his solicitude, as to prevent her proceeding any farther, still looking steadfastly in her face. The lady became rather alarmed; but judging, from the manner of the dog, who did not appear vicious that there was something about her which engaged his attention, she examined her dress, and found that her lace shawl was gone. The dog, perceiving that he was at length understood, immediately turned back; the lady followed him; and he conducted her to the spot where her shawl lay—some distance back in the road. On her taking it up, and replacing it on her person, the interesting quadruped instantly ran off at full speed after his master, apparently much delighted!—Bath Herald.

ANECDOTE OF MR. CURRAN.—One day after the celebrated debate on the Irish Union, setting his watch at the post-office in Dublin, which was opposite the Parliament House, when a Noble Lord, who had voted for the Union, said to him, with unblushing jocularly, "CURRAN, what do they mean to do with that useless building—for my part I hate even the sight of it?" "I do not wonder at it, my Lord," replied CURRAN, "I never yet heard of a murderer, who was not afraid of a ghost."

ENGLISH OPERA.

THEY toss up musical little dramas here like so many muffins. Saturday week produced a new musical farce called Amateurs and Actors, which is described in the play-bills as "not taken from the French;" and on Saturday evening there was to be "a new comic opera called the Rendez-vous," which not so being described, we must suppose is taken from the French. Does the Lyceum mean, by this and other apparent taunts at its brother theatres, to shew itself to advantage in the comparison? We allude principally to passages in the new piece most obviously levelled at the late management of Drury-lane. If so, we think the quarter from which the satire comes ill-chosen, and the time still more so. Committees, it is true, are very ill adapted to the superintendence of a theatre; because the matters that come under their consideration are not simply matters of government and calculation, but matters of taste and opinion, which are easily brought to a conclusion by one sole authority, but can only become so many jealous and angry questions among a variety of leaders. Committees, therefore, in conjunction with the hugeness of the theatre, and other more general causes have no doubt done injury to Drury-Lane; and Actors and those connected with them have a right to feel sore. The young Mr. RAYMOND, for instance, has done credit both to his lamented father's memory and to his own filial zeal, by the publication of some documents which almost go to prove the absolute martyrdom of that earnest and intelligent person to the duties and perplexities of his situation as Manager. We regret we have not room for them in a Weekly Paper. But Mr. ARNOLD, though a Manager, is not perplexed with Committees; and if sympathy with the anxieties of Mr. RAYMOND incited him to interfere with the subject, (as we are willing, after all, to suppose it did), he might have done it, we think, in a graver, shorter, and more graceful manner.

The story of Amateurs and Actors is of no original description; but it is clear and simple; there are one or two characters that have an air of novelty; and one long scene of equivocal is laughable without being agreeable,—a seeming paradox which an outline of the plot will explain. David Dulcet, Esq. (Mr. PEARMAN), "a musical dramatic amateur, attached to theatricals and Miss Mary Hardacre," (Miss LOVE), contrives to carry her away from her Guardian, a simple retired tradesman of the name of Elderberry (BARTLEY). The Amateur arrives with his mistress at the house of his friend Bustle, a country Manager (HARLEY), whom he has engaged to attend some private theatricals; and here we are severally introduced to Wing, a poor strolling actor (WRENCH); to Mrs Mary Goneril, an alarming tragic actress of the same kind, who turns out to be his fugitive wife (Mrs. PINCOTT); and to Geoffrey Muffincap, a sort of superannuated charity-boy (WILKINSON), who is let out as a servant at Bustle's lodging. While these persons are in the house, Elderberry arrives to look after his ward; and being entirely ignorant of theatricals, is induced by the occasional sudden appearance of one of the sputters, and their strange gestures and speeches, to look upon the place as a badlam. Mr. Wing takes him for the musical amateur, and proposes to sing him a song; Mrs. Mary Genet suddenly startles him on the other side with a tragedy burst; and the Manager, who was expecting a person of the name of Berry as an actor "for the heavy business," confounds all he says with allusions to that matter, and upon being told by him that his name is not Berry but Elderberry, replies, with a non-chalant resumption of the subject, "Well, then, the Elder Berry, if you please;—Berry, Senior." The theatrical property also which he sees on a table, including a whip and fetters, helps to confirm him in his notion; and a sort of standing rattle, moved by a wheel (which we found with great pleasure to be no less a personage than a storm of rain,— is surveyed by him with great agitation and recoiling horror, as the formidable strait waistcoat. The reader sees how all this ends. The fair fugitive arrives ready married, and the mystery ceases.

The piece is well acted: There is not only the usual good performance of HARLEY and WRENCH; but BARTLEY gives us the mystified old gentleman and his helpless exclamations of "My goodness!" with more comic spirit than many would give him credit for; and WILKINSON, as far as a quiet unvaried humour goes, of more truth than force, is very effective in the fatherly Charity Boy, whose parish-costume, childish though grave manners, middle-aged face, and dreary half-starved indolence, make him a newer as well as more amusing lubber than most we have lately seen on the stage. A song, in which he tells a story of his going to make love and of his awkward reception,—(the fair one, something loath, having knocked him into a mash-tub).—is ludicrous, well sung, and well composed. The symphonies to the burden are in the best style of the common humorous ballad, and repeat his pathetic appeals of "Yes, she did—To be sure she did!" like a quaint echo.—Come:—we think the reader will agree with us that we are not hindered from doing justice to a pleasant thing when we find it, by any thing like the pride of criticism.

Romeo and Juliet is to be the opening play of the season at Drury-lane, in which Mr. HENRY KEMBLE, the son of the new Stage Manager, is to make his debut before a London audience in Romeo.

Mr. KNIGHT continues a member of the Drury-lane Company; nor has Mr. DOWTON been engaged by Mr. Elliston for the Olympic Theatre.—Evening paper.

The Proprietors of Covent-garden do not intend to follow the example of the sister theatre, in reducing the prices of admission to their pit and boxes.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

NO. 7.—THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

Siker, now I see thou speakest of spite
All for thou lackest some deal his delight;
I, as I am, had rather be envied,
All were it of my foe, than fondly pitied.

Sp. Shep. Cal. for May.

It, as was shewn the week before last, "of all offices in the gift of the Crown that of Attorney-General is least to be coveted;" on the contrary, that of Solicitor-General is perhaps most to be desired. In point of rank the latter is but just inferior to the former, and the Solicitor-General is relieved from a great part of the weight of public odium which his co-adjutor is under the necessity of sustaining. The Attorney-General stands forward, almost alone, as the public spy, informer, and prosecutor: all ex-officio informations against the libellers of his patrons, or other supposed delinquents are filed in his name, and the wrath of the parties, and their supporters, and the dislike of the nation at large, are levelled principally against him, while the Solicitor-General fights under his shield and sometimes appears not to enter into the contest at all; if he assist in any public proceeding, by far the larger portion of labour and ostensibility belongs to his leader and superior.

It is an error, too, to suppose, that the Solicitor-General has much more official business to transact. I mean much more of that business which is managed within doors and out of sight: he may, and probably does, lend his aid in considering whether such and such a production be or be not libellous, in cases where the advice of their law officers is required by Ministers; but he has no more to do with the flogging drudgery, which is supposed to belong to his situation, than the Attorney-General. It is not commonly known, that there is a subordinate individual connected with the offices of both, who in the profession is called by the Nick-name of a much-injured infernal personage, whose duty it is to go through all, or nearly all, the labour, for a comparatively small part of the emolument—with however, sometimes, a sort of implied promise that if he is zealous in the cause, and renders himself useful, when the opportunity occurs, and he is no longer wanted, he shall be made a puisne Judge, or allowed some other "honourable retirement." How long, exactly, this practice has prevailed I know not, but this under-scrub is paid by the public, and though not ministerially avowed, is ministerially employed. It is understood that Mr. RICHARDSON, a man of great learning and experience, is the present devil, and it is his duty to draw or settle all informations, indictments, or other forms of proceedings emanating from the office of Attorney-General. Thus the odium that might otherwise attach to the Solicitor-General, is diminished by the ostensibility of the Attorney-General, and his labours, are lessened by their mutual assistant—the devil.

It is not surprising therefore that so young a man as Sir ROBERT GIFFORD (or at least a man so young in the profession) should be willing to accept the emoluments and honours of such an appointment; nor is it to be wondered that by so doing he should have drawn upon himself the envy and animosity of a few whose standing and higher rank in the law seemed to give them a prior claim: I say whose standing and higher rank seemed to give them a prior claim, because certainly in most other respects Sir ROBERT GIFFORD was equal to any man at the Bar. Bitter indeed must have been the mortification of some, who having spent a long life in patient servility, and industrious flattery, thus saw their hopes disappointed, their exertions misapplied, and their submission and fawning only contributing to render them contemptible to the world, and despicable even to themselves. It afforded also a useful lesson to the younger aspirants who were following, or preparing to follow the same course. That Ministers however deserved credit for this appointment, on the score of impartiality, ought not to be admitted: it was an act rather of necessity than of choice, for they were, not without reason, tired of nominating men by whose ignorance and arrogance they had been severe sufferers, to whose judgment they could not trust, and on whose prudence they could not rely. In accepting the office, this praise is due to the Solicitor-General, as well as to his colleague, that he did not disgrace himself by deserting the principles he had through life maintained, though in the first instance those principles might have been settled or influenced by some consideration of his future success.

In his public legal capacity the Solicitor-General has yet come forward upon few occasions: he lent his aid, trifling as it necessarily was, on the trial of Don, but was not present when WOOLER resisted the two ex-officio informations filed against him. In the proceeding against PRESTON, THISTLEWOOD, and others, for high treason, he most distinguished himself; the speech he made in summing up the case for the Crown realized all the expectations of his friends, and the hopes of his patrons, while it gave his rivals and enemies an opportunity of seeing that he was quite equal to the arduous duty for which they wished he might prove incompetent. At that time he had just made a sudden and unexampled leap from the fourth or fifth row behind the Bar, to one of the most exalted stations connected with the profession: the eyes of all parties were fixed upon him, and even high talents and attainments might have sunk under the appalling embarrassments and difficulties: but the magnitude of the question, and the greatness of his stake, only seemed to rouse in him new energies, and to call forth additional firmness. His address was one of the most luminous in point of arrangement, forcible in point of argument, and correct in point of delivery, that had ever been heard in the King's Bench. The effect of it was increased by the feebleness of the narrative attempted by the Attorney-General in his opening, who, notwithstanding his great experience, in the amiable diffidence of his nature seemed to feel that he was unequal to the task he had undertaken. I do not mean to imply that Sir ROBERT GIFFORD has not a sufficient share of self-mistrust, but at such a time it would have been misplaced, when the weakness of the individual might have been mistaken for the weakness of the cause. This is almost the only instance in which the talents of the Solicitor-General have been publicly put to the test in London, for though in the country he was rapidly rising into business, and was entrusted with the management of some most important cases, yet in the metropolis, and with its inhabitants at large, he had yet to establish his reputation: among lawyers his abilities and his learning were never doubted from the first, and although his elevation was not expected to be so early, it was considered eventually certain. Hitherto his practice in Westminster-hall had been confined to questions of legal nicety and sublety, and especially to those relating to the dark and complicated subject of real property, to which some men have devoted their whole study, and whose business it has seemed still further to involve it in new intricacies, and to encumber it with fresh absurdities.* With such men as the laborious and mindless SUGDEN and PRESTON, Sir R. GIFFORD has not unfrequently been matched, against them he has had to measure the depth of his learning, and the strength of his reasoning, and if not the best of the argument, (which of course must depend upon other circumstances), he has always had the best argument: in learning he at least seemed equal, and in all other respects superior. In fact though Sir ROBERT GIFFORD has only been a few years at the Bar, if I am not mistaken he practised under it for some time, and the intensity and steadiness of his application are almost proverbial: above all he possesses a logical head, endowed with the rare faculty of arranging all its acquisitions: the furniture is not only solid, but disposed in the best order, so that with the aid of a retentive memory, his knowledge is all applicable even upon emergencies. Others could be named, (such for instance as his antagonist last above mentioned) who possess most extensive information, but they are a mere chaos of learning, confounded by confusion: they have

Skill that doth produce
But terms and tongues and parrating of art—
That which some call a learned ignorance;
A serious trifle, error in a trance.

G. Chapman's Euthymia Raptus.

* A great lawyer has called it a beautiful system, and it is so for lawyers; at least half the emoluments of the profession are derived from disputes and arrangements regarding real property.

Besides his great learning not only upon real property questions, but upon those relating to commerce and shipping, and besides his admirable mode of employing his knowledge, few men at the Bar enjoy greater quickness and readiness than the Solicitor-General—few men seize a point with equal rapidity, or illustrate it with more effect. I never saw him conduct a cause at Nisi Prius, in London, but in the country several, and his acuteness as well as his prudence were surprising. I must nevertheless deny him the highest qualification of an advocate; he has not the natural gift of eloquence, though he has acquired great facility in the use of language: his attempts to rouse the feelings, or to influence the understandings of his hearers, were commonly feeble; but he seldom attempted any thing of the kind, and his deficiency in this respect is much counterbalanced by other admirable requisites: for instance, if Sir ROBERT GIFFORD be not eloquent, he is one of the clearest and most perspicuous speakers ever heard: his voice is peculiarly distinct, though inharmonious, and his sentences are usually complete, though not formed with any great nicety or art: he probably never studied style, but the distinct view he himself takes of a case, is sure to meet with a corresponding distinctness of statement: the facts are always arranged so as to shew their bearings upon each other, and what with others would generally be a mere detail, is by him so artfully managed, that it is really an argument in favour of the side he supports: his audience is, therefore, always gratified, if not delighted. He is a skilful pilot of what is called an unseaworthy case, and sometimes brings it into port in safety, in spite of its own rottenness, and of all the winds and waves of opposition. His examinations of witnesses are marked by penetration, sagacity, and acuteness.

He has been spoken of hitherto as a counsel before a jury; but since his appointment as Solicitor-General, he has changed his Court, and now confines his private practice exclusively to Equity: notwithstanding the excellence of his general management of an action at law, I do not think that the change is to be regretted: in the first place, (a matter perhaps of little consequence) in Chancery the Solicitor-General is at his constitutional post, and (what is of more importance) it will be seen that his peculiar merits and qualifications are such as to be most useful in that Court, where eloquence is little needed, and where a coherent and perspicuous statement of circumstances, with the arguments resulting from them, is much more essential.

There is little to be said of the external manner of Sir ROBERT GIFFORD, while speaking: he uses little or no action, but his style does not require it; or if it did, the expressiveness of his countenance (not always amiable) and the ejaculations of his intelligent and full black eye, would amply supply the deficiency. His general appearance is thoughtful and meditative, with very little of that superficial and skin-deep quickness which usually denotes an absence of sounder qualities.

Regarding his speeches in the House of Commons it may be fit to add a word or two: some persons who, excepting that their minds are probably slightly tinctured with envy, would be deemed pretty competent judges, think that here at least he has failed. I am not of that opinion, for he has done all that ought to have been expected from him. At most of the few debates in which he has taken part, I was present: the questions were generally purely legal, and his arguments were as usual clear, ingenious, and forcible: they certainly had the fault of a want of enlargement in the views taken of the subject, but this error is common to nearly every lawyer that ever spoke in the Senate: it is an error arising out of their education and habits, not out of any actual difference in the construction of their minds; and it is surely a little too much to ask that he who is so absolute a lawyer in Court should not be a lawyer in Parliament.

It may be thought that in this criticism I have been a little too partial: it may be so, and I confess that ever since Sir ROBERT GIFFORD first came forward, he has been a growing favourite with me.

FINE ARTS.

GRAND SERIES OF MEDALS.

WHEN a private individual is engaged on his own responsibility, in a work so expensive, useful, and magnificent, that it would be an undertaking worthy of the national administration, it becomes a pleasure, and we may add a duty, in every one who can to promote its success. There is a social and a public spirited feeling excited by giving a helping hand on so important an occasion. For these reasons we take advantage of the progressive stages in the publication of Mr. MUDIE's Grand Series of Medals, to solicit for it the praises and patronage of the public. Though war is a theme at which reason shakes the head and humanity shudders, though the majority of wars, including the last, have been waged for the selfish purposes of the governments of the contending parties, and not for the good of the governed, yet a very extraordinary portion of talent, of active virtue, of privation, of pain, of industry, of self-denial, of courage, was called forth in our countrymen during the eventful campaigns of the last war, and as those campaigns constitute part of our national history, and these Medallie commemorations of them are beautiful productions of the Numismatic Art, and constitute a work altogether novel and valuable, we repeat our sincere and earnest recommendation of it. We hail its advance to two-thirds towards its completion, having reached to thirty out of the forty of which it will consist. France and Italy have hitherto borne away the palm of superiority in this Art, at least since the time of our SIMON. But why should this boast still remain with foreigners, since it is evident it is occasioned not by any inherent deficiency of native talent, but by deficiency of native encouragement? On a large scale, in Busts for instance, Mr. WEBB wields as successful a tool perhaps as any in Europe; and the able Reverse of St. Sebastian in this series, evinces an improvement so great in a very young Artist, Mr. MILLS, that were the Medallie patronage in any degree proportioned to his abilities, we feel confident that he would very soon equal the exactness and elegant finishing of BRENET, and the admirable drawing and minute execution of DEPAULIS. His bust of Sir S. Smith, his last work, is an improved and no distant approach to foreign excellence. We mention these present examples as sufficient, without the necessity of recurring to the memorable one of the Englishman SIMON, who has, perhaps, been equalled by no modern Engraver of Medals since the time in which he flourished, that of CROMWELL and CHARLES the Second. That selfish, sensual, and arbitrary Monarch neglected him for the very inferior services of two Flemish Artists named BOETTJERS. Our Princes ever since that time, with the exception of Q. ANNE, have given this delightful Art scarcely a thought; and even his present Majesty, distinguished as he has been for his countenance of the other Arts, never paid a visit to the public mint. In France, on the contrary, attention to the Mint is interwoven, and has for many years past been interwoven, in the very business of the State, and it is often honoured with the inspecting presence of the Monarch. NAPOLEON, whose attachment to the Fine Arts shewed itself in a patronage worthy of their beauty, their intellectual and commercial importance, who raised their professors to the peerage, and who was not outdone by the MEDICI themselves in his devotedness to them, paid due respect and furnished employment to the professors of this noble class of Engraving, frequently visited the Mint, and had his example followed by the greater part of the Princes of Europe who visited Paris, as appears by some of the Reverses in the celebrated NAPOLEON Series. In England, then, where there has been no approach even to such encouragement, but while every other branch of Engraving has been highly promoted, this has been confined to an occasional publication of a Bust, or some indifferently executed Reverse, it is no wonder that the capabilities of our Medallists have been but partially brought out, capabilities which, as in every other species of superior excellence, require a considerable portion of promotive agency duly to develop. Let us then, ye generous and enlightened Patrons of British Art, ye STAFFORDS, and DAVISES, and LUCASES, and LEICESTERS, let us give our respective aids towards the furtherance of our native powers in this exquisite Art; let us second, with our best endeavours, the laudable efforts of our own countryman, Mr. MUDIE, who has done so much in the venturous publication of this noble series, the first and only one of its kind in England, to establish a taste for a species of Art, which, in portableness and durability, (for it "exalts its voice to ages"), has properties peculiar to itself; and which, in delicacy of execution, vigour and elegance of design, poetical and classical allusion, historical record, and expression of passion and thought, as resulting from attitude, action, and general composition, holds a close relationship with the other admired Arts of Poetry and Design. Medal Engraving, as included in Sculpture, is one of the charming family of the Muses. The family resemblance is strong and beautiful, both in the linear and the intellectual features. Her charms, like Painting, are seen in her display of the symmetry and truth of exterior nature, and, like Poetry and Painting, she gives

"— the high expression of the mind,
"Life's holy flame and piercing sense," and attracts by various imagery with which Fancy dresses the otherwise naked and unadorned thought.

Since our last notice of this work, the following Medals have been added:—

1. Admiral Sir Sidney Smith, an Obverse by Mr. MILLS, in which most of the parts are an improvement upon his former heads by being cut with more decision, especially in the hair and ear. A free hand, an outline and filling up delicate yet decisive, a naturalists truth in the marking of the muscles, action, and skins of animals, furnish fresh reasons for BRENET's high celebrity, and keep the Reverse of this Medal a long time in our hand for inspection; it exhibits a camel, the type of Syria; a lion, of England; and a tyger, of France. The lion is sitting before a standing camel in the posture of protection; the tyger is skulking away with a look of sulky disappointment, at being prevented seizing the camel. On the Exergue is inscribed—Acre defended, Bonaparte repulsed, Syria saved.

2. On the next Obverse, a beautiful one, appears a helmeted figure of England holding tablets of laws; behind is a figure of Neptune. Below is the inscription. England gives a Constitution to— which is intended to be read in continuation with the following inscription on the Exergue of the Reverse—The Ionian Islands.—On this Reverse are seen seven beautiful women dancing round a British Standard. The idea is novel and pleasing. It boasts the highly finished workmanship of DEPAULIS.

3. The Reverse on this medal exhibits Britannia with a trident, and hurling a thunderbolt as she stands with firm attitude on a ship. Round the face of the Obverse is this legend.—Nile. Aug. 1798. Copenhagen, 28 Apr. 1801. Trafalgar, 21 Oct. 1805. It is the finely-executed work of DROZ. On the Obverse is an excellent head of Lord NELSON by WEBB.

4. Here the design of the Obverse, filling almost the whole field, displays a tent with part of its drapery gracefully festooned on a tree, with WELLINGTON within, sitting in a thoughtful and elegant attitude, and reading. He is in a Roman General's habit, resting one hand on a shield embossed with a fulmen; near it is a helmet. The grouping is highly tasteful, and the composition, design, and meaning of the whole highly classical. Underneath is the motto Fabius Cunctator.—Fabius the Delayer, most appropriately alluding to the similar plans of delay, by which FABIUS baffled HANNIBAL in Italy, and WELLINGTON MASSENA in Portugal. This admirable Obverse is by PETIT. The Reverse has a personified representation of the Tagus—an old man with an urn. Behind is an orange tree, denoting Portugal. The British camp finishes the group.—On the Exergue is inscribed—Lines of Torres Vedras. The English Army on the Tagus, 1810, 1811. The subject, the magnitude, and masterly performance of this Work, will place it among the most distinguished Series of Modern Medals, and will recommend it to the cordial encouragement of every one whose imagination is susceptible of felicitous impressions from these stamps of genius. Such encouragement will add a new grace to the character of the professedly tasteful. Where their finances will permit, this character will be imperfect without it, for a genuine love of one class of Art will always be accompanied with an attachment to every other class, inasmuch as the general principles of the Polite Arts are in the main homogeneous.

PREACHING POLITICS FROM THE PULPIT.

MR. EXAMINER,—It was not without strong feelings of indignation that I perused your late violent and unchristian attack on our Reverend Clergy, for what you term "Preaching Politics from the Pulpit." You presume that a Clergyman ought to confine his entire attention to the reading of prayers and sermons once a week for the edification of his flock, and the conversion of philosophers and infidels; but I beg leave to say that, in this particular, you are egregiously mistaken. I acknowledge indeed that such was the practice in the primitive ages, when the Church was yet in her infancy; but now that Christianity is widely diffused over the earth—now that "kings," according to the prophet Isaiah, "are become her nursing fathers, and queens her nursing mothers," the case is widely different, and a Clergyman has a more exalted duty to discharge. In our happy Constitution, in which the Church and State are so closely connected, in which the Clergy are so deeply indebted to their "nursing fathers and mothers" for those proofs of their affection, I mean tythes, lands, and princely endowments, surely it would evince the most unpardonable neglect and ingratitude to receive such substantial benefits, without an adequate acknowledgment of the favour. No, Sir, the Clergy are not ungrateful; and now that the holy prophecies are so decidedly accomplished in their favour, to "neglect so great salvation," or appear remiss in the cause of their generous benefactors, would amount to little less than profanity and sacrilege. Our Saviour has indeed proclaimed, that "his kingdom is not of this world," but then I must repeat that he alluded to the apostolic age, and that this precept is by no means incompatible with riches, honours, and magnificence, or a firm and steady attachment to the Princes and Powers of this world, by whom they are conferred. Hence, Mr. Examiner, arises that laudable zeal of our Clergy in resisting every attempt at Reform (which indeed is only another name for Rebellion), and "in exerting themselves strenuously to stem the torrent of sedition and disloyalty," to which pious duty they are fervently urged by the Lord Bishop of Ely, in his charge of last year. For reform might produce retrenchment, and retrenchment might encroach on the bounties bestowed by our "nursing fathers;" and thus must the prophecy of Isaiah stand in imminent danger of being counteracted!

In your last Number you have borne ample testimony to the vigilance of the Clergy, in standing up for "the good old ways, that we may walk therein,"—in exhorting our misguided countrymen "to fear God, honour the King, and listen not to them that are given to change,"—(Is not this a plain Scriptural command against Reform?) and notwithstanding your profane scoffs against that holy man, the Rev. Mr. Thorp, his sermon will ever remain an everlasting monument of his zeal for the support of our "unrivalled" Constitution. But this Rev. Divine is not the only Daniel who has in this age of daring innovation raised his voice against the enemies of our good old Church and State. The Reverend Messrs. Whitaker, Horne, &c. have also sounded a spiritual alarm against these pestilent Reformers, and so powerfully convincing are their arguments, that, in my opinion, the thanks of the United Kingdom are justly due to two such enlightened politicians. I send you a few choice passages from these excellent works, and as you are the editor of a free press, I presume that you will not hesitate to insert them in your next number. If they shall not be the means of effecting a change in your own sentiments, they will at least serve to display the merit of our Clergy in a two-fold point of view, as excellent divines and consummate politicians.—I am yours, WARBURTON.

N. B. The following extracts are all taken from the Gentleman's Magazine, for the year 1817:—

The Revenues of our Bishops inadequate.—"Now the Revenues of the English Bishops, which those persons (the Reformers) presume to state as exactly as it they had perused their audit books, are in many instances so inadequate to the high station which they fill, as to render it a station of great anxiety, and sometimes even distress."—Speech of the Rev. T. D. Whitaker to the Hundred of Blackburn, County of Lancaster, Feb. 10, 1817, in Gentleman's Magazine—P. 214.

Endowments of the Clergy inalienable.—"A tax may be repealed by the legislature without injury to any one; but ecclesiastical endowments can no more be taken away, without legal robbery, than any layman's private estate."—"They (Tythes) are secured by divine service, and that service is performed. The doors of our churches stand open every Sunday; there we are in constant attendance to do our duty, and if the people will not do theirs by listening to our instructions, this is no reason, but with Jacobins, for robbing us of our support."—P. 216.

Election—Riot and Phrenzy.—"As to Annual Elections, there are sober persons who presume to think that a recurrence of epidemical riot and phrenzy throughout the nation once in seven years is quite enough."—P. 218.

Established Religion—its use.—"And as their leaders well know, that the established religion of the country is the firmest bulwark of our civil Constitution."—P. 214.

The People not to meddle with Politics—of course incapable of electing their Representatives.—"On the subject of Parliamentary Reform, he ventures to remind his parishioners of their incapacity to undertake it. In his own art, every man is respectable; but the moment he steps beyond it, he becomes an object of contempt and derision. If cobblers will be physicians, they will kill more than they cure, and the fools who trust themselves in their hands deserve the death they find. If you are so absurd as to think you can reform and govern Parliament, are you so mad as to dream that the first deliberative assembly of the first men of the first of nations, will take the medicines, and submit to the surgery of the excellent and sapient freeholders who called the meeting?"—Address to the parishioners of Crasstone (Lancaster), by Melville Horne, Curate, in Gentleman's Magazine—P. 329.

The People mere children—not judges of their own welfare.—"Government, say the Reformers, was ordained of God for the good of the people. Very true, what follows? Then sovereignty must be exercised by the people, who are the best judges of their own welfare. This conclusion we utterly deny—it is obvious to common sense, that if children attempt to govern themselves, they will ruin themselves. So it is with the lower orders of society. Their welfare is the object of government; but government must be exercised by those who understand their welfare better than they do themselves.”—P. 330.

Our restoration of liberty and religion to the Continent, the work of God!—“Under the divine blessing England hath not only preserved her own independence, laws, liberty, and religion, but also restored those inestimable blessings (the Pope and the Inquisition) to the Continent. Other nations have enslaved the world. Britons alone have conquered with no such design. To whom shall we give the glory? This hath God wrought.”—P. 330.

The Republic of America accursed of God.—“The vengeance of Heaven seemed to be hurled upon the Americans for producing the accursed republic in France. As it is said in Scripture, ‘they provoked the Almighty to wrath by their inventions, and the plague broke in upon them.’ In the year 1793, soon after they had instituted liberty and equality in France, and sung their frantic songs of Ca ira, the plague broke out in Philadelphia. This was improperly called the Yellow Fever. It is remarkable that any thing like this disorder was but little known in America before the year 1793, that it has since incessantly continued its ravages in the United States, without afflicting the British provinces in America, which seems (we may say without the imputation of fanaticism) that it was a judgment, that something like the hand of heaven, directed the beginning and progress of the disorder. It is against the principles of our religion to kill Kings, according to the wishes of T. Paine and his disciples. The apostle of Christ enjoins us expressly to ‘fear God and honour the King.’ A Christian cannot, consistently with the gospel, be a republican in the British dominions, where a monarchy has been long established. The sacred Prophecies declare, at the final restoration of the Jews, which is not very distant, that ‘Kings shall be their nursing fathers and Queens their nursing mothers,’ or in other words, Kings and Queens shall be their patrons and patronesses. If we could universally establish republics, and put down Kings, we should defeat the designs of Providence, divulged by the prophets of the Almighty. The Republican delusion is therefore somewhat similar to the madness of the Roman Emperor Julian, who attempted in vain to build the temple at Jerusalem, before the time appointed by the prophets of God. The American Republic therefore, in attempting to procure the general establishment of republics, has become a nuisance to the world, a mischief, a foe to peace, and an enemy to liberty. For a republic in a large nation, in the end, is destructive to liberty; while a constitutional monarchy is calculated to produce liberty, permanently, with order.”—Gentleman's Magazine, June 1817.—P. 596.

Necessity of restraint on Dissenters.—“The conventicle is now become the hive of sedition; and ere long such swarms may issue forth as may overpower the opposition of laws, and force down the barriers which our prudent forefathers set up to secure the Constitution both in Church and State. Liberty ought to have its bounds, not to be abused, not to be allowed to be the means of subverting the established government, therefore it ought not to be supine in such a case, not inattentive, and as it were sharpening a sword that may in time cut their own throats.”—P. 404.

N.B. The extracts from the Rev. Messrs. Whitaker and Horne, are peculiarly deserving of attention. Their pamphlets are styled in that fountain of loyalty and orthodoxy, the Gentleman's Magazine, “Two of the ablest appeals to the good sense of the nation!”—Oct. 1817, P. 330.

MR. JUSTICE PARK.

A short time ago we copied an article from the West Briton accusing Mr. Park of leaving three causes undecided in order that he might go to dine with Sir T. D. Acland. The following is the narrative of the Courier in his defence, which it is but fair to give:—

On Wednesday Mr. Justice Park went into Court at seven o'clock in the morning, and sat till five in the afternoon on the indispensable business of clearing the gaol of the prisoners. There then remained three traverses (cases of slight misdemeanor) which his Lordship was willing to have heard had he not been informed that each of them would necessarily take up a considerable time. He therefore permitted them to stand over to the next assizes, as is customary in such cases; being under the necessity of proceeding immediately to Wells, to prevent the chance of that great inconvenience, which has in fact occurred this very circuit at Gloucester. The day for opening the Commission at Wells was not Monday, but Saturday; the distance is 120 miles; and Mr. Justice Park, travelling with his own horses, could not take less than three days on the road. In fact, he left Bodmin at seven o'clock on Wednesday evening, and reached Wells at eight o'clock on Saturday evening.—In the course of his journey, he passed close by Sir T. Acland's seat, which is not a quarter of a mile out of the road, and dined with that gentleman instead of dining at an inn; neither expediting nor delaying his progress ten minutes on that account. Such are the simple facts on which so serious an accusation was grounded against one of the Judges of the land.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.

Mr. John Stone, a young man of respectable exterior, was brought up on Saturday week. A gentleman, calling himself Mr. Magee, Medical Professor, of Broad-street, Golden square, made the following curious charge against him:—“The prisoner, Mr. Stone, is a friend of mine, residing in Fleet-street, and last night he came to see me in a hackney-coach, without having money to pay the fare. This I thought deserving of such punishment as should impress it upon his mind for the future. I recommended the coachman to give him in charge to an officer, and Mr. Stone being safely lodged in the Compter, I paid the fare to save the coachman farther trouble, and Mr. Stone is before your Worship, to receive such admonition as the case deserves; and I trust it will prevent future inadvertency on his part, he being a young man for whom I have a peculiar regard.”—The Magistrate said that the punishment already inflicted was tolerably “impressive,” and rather more than adequate to the offence.—Mr. Stone appeared to receive the correction of his friend entirely as it was professed to be meant. He said that he had that morning reimbursed the money advanced to the coachman on his account; and was sure he should be particularly careful to avoid getting into such unpleasant predicaments in future.—Mr. Stone was consequently set at liberty; and he and his friend retired amidst the ill-suppressed laughter of a crowded court.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Tuesday, a Mr. Hibbert appeared at this office, to answer the complaint of a Mr. Sharpe, in the Haymarket. Mr. Sharpe said, that he was the manager of Messrs. Adams' business, in the Haymarket, who were coachmakers. The defendant, Mr. Hibbert, came to their house on Tuesday morning and inquired for Mr. Adams, wished to know why his letter had not been answered, and said Mr. Adams was a d—d scoundrel and villain. Mr. Sharpe interrupted him in his volleys of invective, and the defendant drove off; but in about two hours after, returned and horse-whipped the complainant.—Mr. Hibbert said in defence, that Mr. Sharpe had spoken impertinently, and therefore he chastised him. Mr. Hibbert entered into his recognizance to answer the offence at the ensuing Sessions.

HATTON-GARDEN.

Wednesday, Mr. William Aikin Brown, a brewer, residing at Bromley, appeared at the suit of the Excise, charged with having a quantity of deleterious articles in his possession, for the purpose of colouring ale and beer.—Two officers deposed, that they had searched his premises, and found a cask full of colouring matter, and another partly full. The defendant was convicted in the mitigated penalty of 50*l*.

UNION-HALL.

A foolish young man, who stated his name to be Robert Copley Rainer Montague, a Captain in his Majesty's service, was charged by five watchmen of the Surrey New-road, with a-saulting them. Sunday night Captain Montague was walking arm in arm at the end of Westminster-road with Lieutenant Bentham, and pushed against a gentleman very rudely; the gentleman spoke to him of his improper conduct, and he immediately knocked the gentleman down. The latter got up and called watch, and another gentleman passing, merely spoke to Capt. Montague, when he received a violent blow. By this time Smith, a watchman, came up, and asked the former gentleman who had assaulted him; Lieut. Bentham came forward and said—"I assaulted him, and advised Montague to go off, and he would settle matters." The Gentleman could not say whether the Captain or Lieutenant assaulted him, and the watchman advised the Captain to go home; he immediately knocked down the watchman, and kicked him. Newsted, another watchman, then came up, and he received a terrible blow on one eye, which closed it up and sent him down. Another watchman, named Matthews, then made his appearance, and he received a blow so violent, that he fell almost senseless near his colleagues. The other two watchmen were kept at bay until another watchman, hearing the rattles stirring, came up; he boldly seized the Captain, and secured him, but the Captain got the watchman's hand into his mouth, and bit a large piece entirely off the side, which fell out of his mouth upon the ground. The poor fellow by the extreme pain was compelled to loose him, and received a kick on one eye; another watchman who was on the ground was kicked about the face and head until he exhibited a most shocking appearance; another of the watchmen was kicked in a very dangerous part of the body. At last, by the assistance of Lieut. Bentham, he was taken to the watchhouse. While he was in the watchhouse, he again attacked another watchman by beating him on the head; seized a patrol by the neck-cloth, and nearly strangled him; and threatened to kill the watch-house-keeper.—The Captain said, that he did knock down the gentlemen, the former having affronted him, and the latter having impudently interfered. He was not charged with the watch, and he believed that they had no right to interfere. One of the rascals impudently told him to "walk on." To be spoke to by such fellows he could not bear, and he knocked them down as fast as they approached him.—MAGISTRATE—And did you bite that poor fellow's hand.—Montague (coolly)—Yes, I did, they interfered improperly, and I acknowledge I beat them all; I am a young Officer just arrived from abroad, and my habits there, where I have cut down black men like wheat, may not have impressed me with much respect for such fellows as these.—He was ordered to find bail.

An inquest was held on Tuesday on the body of Michael Dillon, of Drury-lane. The deceased had bought an ounce of acid of sugar, and an ounce of Epsom salts on Saturday evening, and on Sunday morning his sister, by mistake, gave him the poison instead of the medicine, he having put away the two powders together without any mark to distinguish one from the other.—Mr. Accum, chymist, had opened the body, and was of opinion that the death of the deceased was caused by his taking some corrosive substance; acid of sugar would produce the effect.—Mr. John Cooper, assistant to Mr. Le Brun, chymist, King-street, Covent-garden, stated, that on Saturday week the deceased came to Mr. Le Brun's shop, and purchased an ounce of acid of sugar. He was going to write the name of it on, when the deceased said, "Never mind," and seemed in a hurry. He was about to leave, when he asked for an ounce of Epsom salts, and left the shop immediately.—Mr. STERLING marked the impropriety of Mr. Cooper's conduct; he said that he had acted with great incaution, but not with any criminality.—Juryman. Every medical man ought to have the word "poison" written on deleterious drugs.—After a long discussion, the following verdict was recorded:—"Died in consequence of having taken half an ounce of acid of sugar instead of a dose of salts."

EXECUTION.—Monday morning, Wm. West, aged 24, for uttering forged Bank-notes, Wm. Park, aged 28, and William Cook, aged 40, for burglary, were led to execution. At a few minutes past nine the signal was given, and they were launched into eternity. An immense concourse of persons attended.

About eleven o'clock on Saturday night, Mr. Cawkwell, the Governor of Chelmsford Gaol, who had retired to rest, was aroused from his bed by a clamour at the gaol door. He got up, and the doors being opened, a man presented himself in an apparently melancholy mood. Mr. Cawkwell demanded his business. He replied, that he came to surrender himself to justice as one of the persons who had murdered Mr. Bird and his housekeeper; that his name was Brooks; (B. was said by Hussey to be the initial of his accomplice's name) that Hussey was innocent of the murders, though he had planned the robbery, and watched whilst it was effected; and that he was determined to expiate his crimes by public execution. He gave the name of the other accomplice to whom Hussey alluded, and stated that he was then in England, mentioning where he could be found.

This tale was delivered with all the appearance of sincerity, and was accompanied with gesticulations bespeaking a soul tortured by the pangs of remorse; he cried bitterly; wrung his hands, and exhibited a frantic demeanour. Mr. Cawkwell was satisfied of the truth of the story, and was giving orders to prepare a cell, when his attention was arrested by the inquiries of other persons at the door, whether a man, answering the description of the supposed murderer, had made his appearance at the gaol. It then turned out that the unfortunate man was little short of a maniac; that he had been drinking at a public-house, where he had made a like confession, and expressed the same determination. The man however still persisted upon being detained in custody. He was locked up for the night; but in the morning the delirious effects of the liquor having subsided, he disclaimed all knowledge of the crime, and was sent home to his friends.

MARRIAGE.

Aug. 28, at Reigate, Surrey, Mr. W. R. Holroyd, to Jane, eldest daughter of Edward Wyatt, Esq. of Merton Cottage, Surrey.

DEATH.

Aug. 31, at Exning, in Suffolk, in the 75th year of his age, Mr. Ashby, writing engraver. The talent evinced by Mr. Ashby, (says a Correspondent) was of the very first order. As an original designer and executor of those notes, &c. which in our country have formed the circulating medium, he displayed great skill and ingenuity; while in his higher efforts to illustrate the beauties of penmanship, there was a clear and rich expression, a taste and freedom which left nothing to be desired.

INSURRECTIONARY PLACARD.

A PLACARD, from which the following is an extract, was seen posted up about the metropolis at the beginning of the week:—

“What are the ten thousand wretches who in Westminster voted against Mr. HUNT but oppressors of their non-franchised fellow-citizens, content to crawl before the higher orders that we may continue slaves to both.—Alike then and equal be their common destiny. The brave, though starving outlanders of Manchester should be avenged in London. Shall non-represented Britons in such a cause be scared by the fear of gibbets or bayonets? Be our remonstrance to the Crown decorous; but let us in one heroic day convince the world that the grievances of mankind are now become insupportable.”

There are three descriptions of persons from whom an effusion of this kind might emanate;—lovers of disorder in the pay of Government, lovers of disorder not in the pay, and persons impatient under real suffering. When the Chronicle saw this placard, it attributed it to the first; upon which the Courier, with its never-failing committal of itself, exclaims, “Hear it, ye Gothamites, and blush to be out-done—it is the Ministers themselves who are firing the train which in its explosion would convulse this country to its very centre.” So then, according to the Courier, its employers are more stupid than Gothamites; for, as the Chronicle reminds it in reply, the Ministers have resorted to such tricks before now. It was part of OLIVER’s system to stimulate the people to acts of violence, and it was actually proved before the LORD MAYOR, that the notorious placard, headed “Go it, my boys,” was printed and circulated under Ministerial connivance. That the Ministers thought the country would be convulsed by these proceedings so as to occasion their own ruin, nobody supposes; but two things are very generally supposed, viz. that they thought would be so far convulsed as to enable them still further to “encumber it with their help,” and that in so doing they foolishly risked an explosion that would have convulsed it to its very centre. Now considering that no such explosion took place, and that the trick, aided by the usual subserviency of corruption, enabled them to suspend our remaining liberties, what they did once they might do again; and therefore the Courier’s pretended joke becomes a piece of grave and self-condemning information. We are bound at least to take his word that the Ministers can outdo the Gothamites, whether they have done so in the present instance or not. Hear it, ye Gothamites, and blush to be outdone:—it is the Ministers themselves who fire trains which in their explosion would convulse the country to its very centre; and it is a ministerial newspaper which tells you so.

Nevertheless the rogue is not always to be believed, even against his employers. This placard may undoubtedly have been written by a mere lover of disorder, who hopes to turn to account the rashness which he would anonymously excite. If so, we heartily wish he may be brought to light. The paper is full of ignorance and inconsistency. The Manchester outlanders are to be avenged in London;—but what is the meaning or the use of avenging them? What is revenge at any time, but a ridiculous and troublesome passion which secures to the revenger ten times more pain than he inflicts,—granting even that he inflicts any? To see the Manchester-men helped and righted is another matter, and so is the overthrow of corruption. To see men ousted from their seats in Parliament who make it an acknowledged place of traffic,—to insist upon the Constitution being restored, upon the responsibility of Ministers, upon the reduction of the expenditure and the standing army, in short, upon the suppression of all the various rebellions that have long been going on in the high places against the popular part of the government, is a becoming as well as necessary thing, fit to be urged in every possible way by old English constitutional freemen, who would see the provisions of the Glorious Revolution realized for the first time; but all this may be done quietly over green tables, especially if a few respectable individuals will but persevere. The reforming part of the Whigs might do it next session, if they took the proper zealous steps;—if they insisted upon it day by day, and would not suffer themselves to be cajoled by corrupted parliamentary forms and the lack-a-daisical tattle of Ministers. And if they will not do it, five or six Major CARTWRIGHTS might do it before long, just as one CLARKSON has lived to see the downfall of the Slave Trade. The late political and theological works of Mr. BENTHAM alone have given a blow to corrupted establishments, which they will never recover.* His unanswerable reasoning has prepared the coolest understandings to take part with the warmest enthusiasm.

But revenge!—Who revenges himself on rats and vermin?

Then what does the placard mean by identifying every one of Mr. Bristol HUNT’s opponents with the enemies of their country,—as if a good cause could not be very heartily relished by those who have a distaste to that coarse and suspicious person!—We must confess this is one of the passages which most induces us to suspect that the paper comes from emissaries of Government. Can any one doubt, for instance, that OLIVER the spy could write such a paper,—and that if he were to do so, it is such a paper as he most probably would write?

There is indeed yet another person with whom such a paper might originate—the actual sufferer from distress. This, we think, would not render it more wise; but it would become another thing in point of excusableness.

* The Treatises on Legislation, on Parliamentary Reform, and on the Catechism.

What! it will be asked,—do we defend dissaffection then, because it may arise from distress? People may be misguided, but they deserve to be punished nevertheless, and must not be suffered to endanger the state.—Good;—this, Gentlemen, is precisely the thing we say of your employers. They may be misguided; we believe they are, by their own selfishness, and folly, and bad education; aye bad education;—do not deprive them of that excuse, for an education may be very bad though it look very high and fashionable. Where people are taught servility, tyranny, and insincerity, they are taught every thing that is bad; and there are numbers of great schools and very solemn books in which all this is taught. But the suffering poor are sure to have the question begged against them; and this is one of the very greatest provocatives to their disaffection. Do they combine, for instance, as at Manchester? Their employers are earnestly entreated not to give in, if it be only for the sake of precedent,—a very cunning reason;—but nothing is said of the previous combinations of the employers themselves. It is the same with political combination. If the poor manifest any rebellious tendencies, put them down by all means, if it be only for the sake of precedent;—yes,—that is to say, let power have the right to do and to deny what it pleases, at all events;—but nothing is said of the previous rebellious practices among the great, which have most likely provoked them. And yet it is no few thing to say, that disaffection has seldom or never arisen among a people, but in consequence of the political profligacy of their rulers. This was proved in England at the time of the Glorious Revolution; in France after the cruel and selfish reigns of Louis the 14th and 15th; and is now undergoing another proof in the Spanish American colonies. Let any one reflect indeed for a moment, and see whether he would encounter confusion and death for nothing? What man or set of men, unless provoked to very madness, would go out from their friends or firesides to raise a tumult and run the risk of being cut to pieces. It is, on the contrary, the infinite patience of a people, and their horror of public discord, that at least enable rich and powerful rebels to usurp their constitutions, exhaust their blood and treasure, and then turn upon them at the least evidence of discontent, and call them by infamous names which belong to themselves. They are then in a state indeed, which is rarely to be mended by violence; neither do we believe there is any necessity for violence now. We have shewn what we consider to be the way of proceeding. But when the government itself is in a corrupt and unconstitutional condition, as ours notoriously is at present, to affect to consider even violence itself as the only or the worst rebellion would be hypocrisy; and to punish it without self-amendment could only be partial murder. Is the question perpetually to be begged, and the truth perpetually to be concealed, in order that perpetual provocation may be given with impunity? That it is given, we all know; it is as numerous as the men of the standing army,—and as notorious as the sun at noon-day;—and whether any of us like public discord or not, come it inevitably will if the Constitution be not restored to its first principles. Should such a dreadful day be seen, we doubt whether the Constitution itself could survive. The question at present is between the Constitution and an Oligarchy; and Heaven grant the former may quietly get the day. The question, we suspect, in a public tumult, would be between an avowed despotism and a republic; and taking into consideration all circumstances, past and present, particularly the faithless and foolish manner in which despotism has been committing itself of late, and the pains it has taken to hold up to the admiration of mankind the contrasted virtue and happiness of our kinsmen the North American republicans, we are of opinion that republicanism would be the conqueror; and then woe betide monarchy all over the world; for the example of America and England united would be irresistible.

A word more of these placards. How is it that they are seldom or never traced to their authors? The Government is vindictive enough; and the occasions, if we are to believe what is said of trains and explosions, are important enough. How is it, that we hear of so many alarming papers thrust under doors and fastened on walls, and yet are left to suspect that the writers are not called for?

SHOCKING AND PERNICIOUS ABSURDITIES OF BIGOTRY.

The following passage should have appeared at the close of our first article in last week's paper; but was omitted in consequence of a petty accident. It is one out of a great number of irresistible blows which the powerful mind of Mr. BENTHAM has struck at the very roots of bigotry and worldliness in his late work, entitled Church of Englandism and its Catechism examined. It will shew the Reader at once one of the greatest causes of the excesses to which bigotry goes,—namely, the bad and horrible opinion entertained of the Supreme Being himself, in spite of the beauty of Nature, and of the good names which his pious blasphemers affect to call him. The venerable author, it will be seen, does not garble the matter; and why should he? Insincerity is the very thing he is striking at, as a curse that has too long been produced by inconsistent, unintelligible, and frightful creeds. The passage, which is the only one we can quote at present, is as follows:—Mr. BENTHAM is commenting upon that passage in the Catechism, in which the little child, who is made responsible for unintelligible things by two or three persons who have no right so to make him, has a definition put into his mouth of “inward and spiritual grace.”—“for being by nature,” says the innocent little creature of God, “born in sin, and the children of wrath, we are hereby made the children of grace.”

OBSERVATIONS.

Note well the sort of story that is here told.—The Almighty God—maker of all things visible and “invisible”—“of heaven and earth, and all that therein is”—makes, amongst other things, a child; and no sooner has he made it, than he is “wrath” with it for being made. He determines accordingly to consign it to a state of endless torture. Meantime comes somebody,—and, pronouncing certain words, applies the child to a quantity of water, or a quantity of water to the child. Moved by these words, the all-wise Being changes his design; and, though he is not so far appeared as to give the child its pardon, vouchsafes to it a chance—no one can say what chance—of ultimate escape.—And this is what the child gets by being “made”—and we see in what way made—“a child of grace.”

Thereupon comes the sort of wit, ghostly and ghastly, which, on such occasions, has been so plentifully played off: there we have death, and here we have new birth; death unto sin, new birth unto righteousness. And in this wit we have a subject—not merely for admiration, but moreover for belief;—for belief, of the withholding of which, as if it were in the power of every man to believe or not believe what he pleased, the consequence is—what at every turn, and, upon every occasion, stares us in the face—a state of endless torture.

Our readers will involuntarily exclaim at the end of this unanswerable exposition—"Good God!" And they well may. We shall give extracts, from time to time, from the whole of this admirable work, which will form an era in the history of rational belief.

FERDINAND VII.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

Lisbon, Aug. 7, 1818.

SIR,—During Bonaparte's dominion over the greatest part of Europe, the rallying cry of those sovereigns who had power and courage enough to resist him, and with which they encouraged the nations in the struggle, was, that the illegitimate aspiring to universal dominion tended to overthrow all liberal institutions, and to bring us back to the days of darkness and slavery. From such language, and from the promises they set forth in opposition thereto, the world might suppose that their only object in opposing the tyrant was the welfare and happiness of mankind, and that the re-establishment of undisturbed legitimacy would be marked by liberal institutions of every kind; but the world has been deceived. Your paper has most ably shewn, in its true light, the slender fabric of those promises, and facts have shewn the result of them!

First, on the list of those returned legitimates, appeared Ferdinand, who acknowledged the loyalty of a nation which had bled for him, by throwing into dungeons its protectors and the preservers of his crown, and by bringing back the Inquisition in the 19th century. The father-in-law and brother-in-law of that amiable sovereign, not to remain behind hand in absurdity at least, has just issued a Decree, condemning to death or transportation all Freemasons or members of secret meetings: I thought that if that document had not already reached you, it might not be unacceptable; and have taken the liberty to enclose it, with a hasty translation which I have made thereof, hoping, for the gratification of myself and other readers, that you will take this extraordinary measure into your consideration, and handle it according to its deserts.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, AN IMPARTIAL OBSERVER.

P.S.—It may not be improper to state, that the same dispatches which brought this Decree, gave the nomination of a new Inquisitor-General.

TRANSLATION.

Lisbon, 2d August.

All good Portuguese will be filled with the greatest joy in reading the following most wise Decree, by which the King is pleased to put a final term to the horrid practice of Meetings or Secret Societies, which, under the denomination of Freemasons and different other names, have sometimes endangered the public tranquillity, and induced several ill-advised, proud, or malevolent men, to take fatal steps, or inspired them with depraved sentiments of corruption.

DECREE.

I, the King, make known to all those who shall see the present Decree,—That events which are notorious having proved the abuse of Secret Meetings, which, under several names of orders or associations, have been converted into conspiracies against the State;—And the correctional measures with which they have hitherto been proceeded against, agreeably to the laws of the kingdom, which prohibit all meetings or associations of persons, unless previously authorized by me, and their statutes approved, being found ineffectual:—And the tranquillity of the people, and the safety and security in which I am bound to maintain them, requiring to avoid giving opportunities and causes of seducing to their ruin, several subjects who might otherwise have proved useful to themselves and to the State, if those occasions had not existed, and if the guilty were punished as they deserve. And having heard on this subject the opinion of several learned persons, and who are zealous for the good of the State and for the happiness of their countrymen; and of others belonging to my Council, and entrusted with high offices, both civil and military, to all whose opinions I have conformed myself, I am pleased to declare criminal and prohibited all secret meetings of every description, under whatever denomination they may be, either with names and forms already known, or under any name or with any form that may now be devised or imagined; all of which will be henceforward considered as directed against the King and the State.

I therefore order that all persons convicted of assisting to Lodges, Clubs, Committees, or any other assembly of secret meetings, and all persons who engage others to such Lodges, Clubs, or Meetings, and all persons assisting at the reception of a member, whether it be with or without oaths, to have incurred the penalties specified in the Code; which penalties will be imposed upon them by the Judges, according to the forms and proceedings established by law for the punishment of persons guilty of high treason.

Are subject to the same punishment all persons who are the head of such assemblies, or members thereof, whatever be their denomination; if it be proved that they have endeavoured, by some art, or by persuasion, or by engagements either verbal, or written, to re-establish, renew, or maintain any such Meetings, Lodges, Clubs, or Committees, within my kingdom and dominions, or to correspond with others without, although such acts may be individual, and not connected with associations of Lodges, Clubs, or Committees.

In other cases, the punishment will be mitigated at the discretion of the Judges, in the form above mentioned. The houses in which the meetings are held will be confiscated, unless the owners thereof can prove that they did not, nor could not, know that they were intended for that purpose.

All medals, seals, symbols, engravings, books, instructions, printed or manuscript, can no longer be published nor used in any way; nor pass through the Custom-houses, nor sold, nor given, nor lent, nor passed in any way from one person to another, unless for the purposes of delivering them immediately to the magistrates, under pain of transportation for a period of from four to ten years, according to the degree of culpability and the circumstances attendant thereon.

I further order, that in this crime no privilege, exemption, nor concession, shall be admitted as exception, whether the guilty be natives or aliens, inhabitants of my dominions, or those who thus abuse the hospitality they receive; and no securities, bails, or liberties, will be allowed without my special authority; and the Magistrates will institute enquiries every year, and upon its being proved to them that Lodges have been held, or such meetings called together, they will immediately proceed to a special enquiry, to arrest and confiscation, delivering the guilty to the competent Courts of Justice, and a copy of the acts will be transmitted to me.

And the whole of this decree is to be put in execution as instructed, notwithstanding all laws or orders to the contrary, and which I now abolish, and I order all Governors, Magistrates, or others, whom it may concern, to observe this Decree exactly, and to cause it to be strictly and exactly observed; and copies thereof under my seal are to be transmitted whenever required, &c. &c. &c.

(Signed)

THE KING.

EMIGRATION.—MR. BIRKBECK.

Our article last week on this subject included only such extracts from Mr. Birkbeck's books as respected emigration, and we were unwilling to digress from that important point; but our limits prevented his defence of leaving England appearing then; we therefore now give it. The other passages are amusing, and may serve to give an idea of the manners of some classes in the back States:—

QUITTING ENGLAND DEFENDED.

DEAR SIR,—I am not so sanguine as yourself about our old and once glorious England: such a rational, honest, economical system, as a true parliament would produce, might, twenty-six years ago, have done something for us. Economy and order are good to prevent ruin, but when all is spent they are of small avail: besides, who wishes for the experiment to be made? Not the fund-holders, nor the borough-holders, nor the army—a few, a very few political characters, and the distressed of all classes. The latter, you will say, are a formidable number. So they are; but they are weak, and have nothing in common but their misery. The “friends of order,” that is, the bulk of the people, who have as yet escaped pauperism, but are shivering on the brink, and fearful that the slightest change will plunge them into the gulf—these are the enemies of reform, and all the timid of every class.

Had I been an owner of land, I might possibly have staid by my paternal acres; or if I had been a single man (that is, a childless man), I might have remained in the hope of contributing to the work of reformation, or, in pure hatred of tyranny, to stand the brunt. But as I am circumstanced, I thought it right to withdraw, with my family, out of its reach; and I have not repented a single moment; on the contrary, I have every reason to rejoice in the change, for it is from gloom and despondency to tranquillity and hope.

As to the comforts and accommodations of life, we have our books, our music, our agreeable and kind neighbours, good food and cloathing, and before two years are ended we expect to have as good and well-furnished a house as that we left. It is astonishing how small are the privations we are subject to. I counted the cost beforehand, but over-reckoned it; and we are of course the better satisfied.

It will be very long before travelling will be pleasant, except in fine weather and on horseback: this is the grand inconvenience of a new country; but it is not to be compared to the inconvenience of living at the mercy of a villainous aristocracy. Why, Sir! I must either have sneaked about, in what you call my country, a prisoner at large, or amused myself with counting the nails on the door of my dungeon. And so must you; for things will not mend without a dreadful crisis: and until that liberates you, you will be free only by sufferance, “within the Rules.”

Here, I shall be employed in enlarging the circle of our enjoyments; there, I was contracting it daily. My family had already made several downward movements; we had learnt to dispense with the comfort of a carriage; we mounted our horses instead: this was no bad exchange; but the cause of our making the exchange was irksome. From horseback, my daughters cheerfully enough betook themselves to their feet: no great harm in that, only it was by compulsion. So we went down step by step.

Our friend Cobbett declaims about patriotism in sounding phrases, but I adhere to the maxim “ubi libertas ibi patria.” What is country? the soil? Of this I was only an occupant. The government? I abhorred its deeds and its principles. The church? I did not believe in its doctrines, and had no reverence for the clergy. The army? No. The law? We have the same law here, with some omissions and some improvements. The people? Yes; but not the fund-holders, nor the soi-disant House of Commons; not the consumers, nor the creators of taxes. My family and friends I love wherever I meet them: I have almost as many, and as strong ties of that sort, on this as on the other side of the Atlantic—soon I hope to have more, and then this will be my country.

SLEEPING IN THE WOODS.

Our rear party, consisting of one of the ladies, a servant boy, and myself, were benighted, in consequence of accidental detention, at the foot of one of these rugged hills; and without being well provided, were compelled to make our first experiment of “camping out.”

A traveller in the woods should always carry flint, steel, tinder, and matches, a few biscuits, a half-pint phial of spirits, and a tin cup, a large knife or tomahawk; then, with his two blankets, and his great coat, and umbrella, he need not be uneasy, should any unforeseen delay require his sleeping under a tree.

Our party having separated, the important articles of tinder and matches were in the baggage of the division which had proceeded, and as the night was rainy and excessively dark, we were for some time under some anxiety lest we should have been deprived of the comfort and security of a fire. Fortunately, my powder-flask was in my saddle-bags, and we succeeded in supplying the place of tinder, by moistening a piece of paper, and rubbing it with gunpowder. We placed our touch-paper on an old cambric-handkerchief, as the most readily combustible article in our stores. On this we scattered gunpowder pretty copiously, and our flint and steel soon enabled us to raise a flame, and collecting dry wood, we made a noble fire. There was a mattress for the lady, a bearskin for myself, and the load of the packhorse as a pallet for the boy. Thus by means of great coats, and blankets, and our umbrellas spread over our heads, we made our quarters comfortable, and placing ourselves to the leeward of the fire, with our feet towards it, we lay more at ease than in the generality of taverns. Our horses fared rather worse, but we took care to tie them where they could browse a little, and occasionally shifted their quarters. We had a few biscuits, a small bottle of spirits, and a phial of oil: with the latter we contrived, by twisting some twine very hard, and dipping it in the oil, to make torches; and after several fruitless attempts we succeeded in finding water; we also collected plenty of dry wood. “Camping out,” when the tents are pitched by daylight, and the party is ready furnished with the articles which we were obliged to supply by expedients, is quite pleasant in fine weather: my companion was exceedingly ill, which was in fact the cause of our being benighted; and never was the night’s charge of a sick friend undertaken with more dismal forebodings, especially during our ineffectual efforts to obtain fire, the first blaze of which was unspeakably delightful: after this, the rain ceased, and the invalid passed the night in safety; so that the morning found us more comfortable than we could have anticipated.

DESCRIPTION OF AN ILLINOIS BACKWOODSMAN.

Wandering without track, where even the sagacity of our hunter-guide had nearly failed us, we at length arrived at the cabin of another hunter, where we lodged. This man and his family are remarkable instances of the effect on the complexion, produced by the perpetual incarceration of a thorough woodland life. Incarceration may seem to be a term less applicable to the condition of a roving backwoodsman than to any other, and especially unsuitable to the habits of this individual and his family; for the cabin in which he entertained us, is the third dwelling he has built within the last twelve months; and a very slender motive would place him in a fourth before the ensuing winter. In his general habits, the hunter ranges as freely as the beasts he pursues: labouring under no restraint, his activity is only bounded by his own physical powers: still he is incarcerated—“Shut from the common air.” Buried in the depth of a boundless forest, the breeze of health never reaches these poor wanderers; the bright prospect of distant hills fading away into the semblance of clouds, never cheered their sight: they are tall and pale, like vegetables that grow in a vault, pining for light.

The man, his pregnant wife, his eldest son, a tall half-naked youth, just initiated in the hunters’ arts, his three daughters, growing up into great rude girls, and a squalling tribe of dirty brats of both sexes, are of one pale yellow, without the slightest tint of healthful bloom.

In passing through a vast expanse of the backwoods, I have been so much struck with this effect, that I fancy I could determine the colour of the inhabitants, if I was apprised of the depth of their immersion; and, vice versa, I could judge of the extent of the “clearing” if I saw the people. The blood, I fancy, is not supplied with its proper dose of oxygen from their gloomy atmosphere, crowded with vegetables growing almost in the dark, or decomposing; and, in either case, abstracting from the air this vital principle.

The cabin, which may serve as a specimen of these rudiments of houses, was formed of round logs, with apertures of three or four inches between: no chimney, but large intervals between the “clapboards,” for the escape of the smoke. The roof was, however, a more effectual covering than we have generally experienced, as it protected us very tolerably from a drenching night. Two bedsteads of unhewn logs, and cleft boards laid across;—two chairs, one of them without a bottom, and a low stool, were all the furniture required by this numerous family. A string of buffalo hide, stretched across the hovel, was a wardrobe for their rags; and their utensils, consisting of a large iron pot, some baskets, the effective rifle and two that were superannuated, stood about in corners, and the fiddle, which was only silent when we were asleep, hung by them.

Many were the tales of dangerous adventures in their hunting expeditions, which kept us from our pallets till a late hour; and the gloomy morning allowed our hunters to resume their discourse, which no doubt would have been protracted to the evening, had not our impatience to depart caused us to interrupt it, which we effected with some difficulty by eleven in the forenoon.

MODE OF CELEBRATING A MARRIAGE.

In this land of plenty, young people first marry, and then look out for the means of a livelihood, without fear or cause for it. The ceremony of marriage is performed in a simple family way in my opinion more delicate, and corresponding to the nature of the contract, than the glaring publicity adopted by some, or the secrecy, not so respectable, affected by others.

The near relations assemble at the house of the bride's parents. The minister or magistrate is in attendance, and when the candidates make their appearance, he asks them severally the usual questions, and having called on the company to declare if there be any objections, he confirms the union by a short religious formula;—the bridegroom salutes the bride, and the ceremony is over. Tea and refreshments follow. Next day the bridegroom holds his levee, his numerous friends, and sympathy makes them numerous on these happy occasions, pour in to offer their congratulations. Abundance of refreshments of the most substantial kind are placed on side-tables, which are taken, not as a formal meal, but as they walk up and down the apartments, in cheerful conversation. This running meal continues from noon till the close of the evening, the bride never making her appearance on the occasion; an example of delicacy worthy the imitation of more refined societies.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, SEPT. 7.—A burglary, as remarkable for its importance as the difficulties under which it was effected, has recently been committed at Vienna. On Sunday the 30th ult., while the Court was absent at the theatre, some thieves carried off a casket belonging to her Imperial Highness the Duchess of Parma. They probably entered the Palace by means of some adjoining chimnies. The casket was not missed until the following morning; all researches after its contents have hitherto been fruitless. It contained the diamonds most frequently worn by her Imperial Highness, and also numerous French and Italian gold coins, which, not being current in Vienna, it is hoped may lead to the discovery of the thief. The loss is estimated at above a million, Vienna value.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, AUG. 31.—They write from the French frontiers, that the Army of Occupation will evacuate the French territory in the month of November, and that preparations are already making in the English Army for the sale of a part of the horses belonging to the artillery and the train. The Russian Contingent will also leave its artillery and train-horses in France, and it is supposed that they will be purchased by the French Government. The royal ordinance for the levy of a part of the men who are now liable to serve has been sent to the various departments by extraordinary couriers, and means will be taken to put it in immediate execution, in order to reinforce the army as soon as possible.

GERMANY.

MANHEIM, AUG. 27.—Letters from Frankfort state, that the matriculation of the Germanic Confederation is now complete. The principle adopted is to raise one man from every hundred of population. The confederate army will therefore consist of 300,000 men, the population of Germany being estimated at 30,000,000. Having settled this important point, the military commission is now employed in discussing the establishment and organization of the fortresses of the confederation.

RASTATT, AUG. 31.—The new constitution of the Grand Duchy of Baden contains very liberal enactments. It establishes equality of rights with all citizens, as also the equality of all employments, by totally suppressing the exemptions from taxes which have hitherto existed. It declares, that all citizens who profess either of the three Christian Creeds have equal rights to civil and military offices. Several of its articles guarantee individual liberty; it declares the responsibility of Ministers and all agents of authority; abolishes for ever all confiscations; establishes the principle of the liberty of the press; and announces that the modifications of which this principle is susceptible depend upon the decisions which the Germanic Diet will adopt on this head: it declares inviolable all engagements made by the State towards its creditors, and provides that the institution of the sinking fund shall be permanent.

EAST INDIES.

The Asiatic Mirror, of the 15th of April, communicates a number of curious particulars respecting the state of politics in the East. It seems that, notwithstanding the friendly professions of the Rajah of Berar to the British Government, and the signal forbearance with which he had been treated, some proceedings of a dark and treacherous, as well as a highly dangerous character, were brought home to that incorrigible Mahratta Chieftain. While in pursuance of formal conventions he was issuing public orders to his officers for the delivery of his forts to the British army, it was discovered from an intercepted correspondence, that he secretly encouraged the Killedars and Commandants to gain time by every possible expedient, and evade the surrender to the last. The same spirit of duplicity and perfidy was detected in an intercourse he maintained with Bajee Row (formerly our friend the Peishwa). This chief, it is known, after escaping the Generals Smith and Pritzler, was marching directly towards Nagpore. From the intercepted letters it appeared that the Rajah had determined to take an unexpected leave of the British, and throw himself into the arms of his worthy Ally. Our Resident, therefore, on finding his suspicions of this false act confirmed by unquestionable documents, sent the Rajah a polite invitation to converse with him at the Residency. His Highness, thinking proper to refuse the desired interview, was seized in his palace by three companies of British troops, and sent off under a strong escort to Allahabad, whence it was presumed he would find his way to Calcutta. A tried friend of the Company's Government is said to have been placed on the Musnud of Nagpore, as successor to this refractory and ungrateful Rajah, who had been indebted for his own sovereignty to the favour and indulgence of Great Britain. Accounts were received at Nagpore on the 26th March, that Gen. Smith had come upon Bajee Row by surprise, and that in an encounter which followed the famous Gokla fell. On the 11th April, however, a general belief prevailed at Nagpore, that Bajee Row was advancing thither "with an immense force," that he had already reached Jaulnah, and would be in the neighbourhood of Nagpore by the 24th of the month. The purpose of this extraordinary movement was probably to reunite under the old Peishwa banners all the scattered bodies of Mahratta troops, beaten as they were, and nominally disbanded, which had been engaged in the service of the Rajah, or even of the Chiefs to the northward of the Nerbuddah, who had signed forced treaties with the Governor-General.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 13.

THERE is no news from the Continent this week worth mention; but as we have often observed, the least reports and appearances are interesting now-a-days. The most prominent thing is the bustle of preparation at Aix-la-Chapelle. What a world of grins, bows, snuff-boxes, lodgings, mummeries, fine clothes, French grammars, grave faces, excuses, new promises, intrigues, and indigestions, is getting ready! But it is too well understood by this time.

The glorious news that came from North America last week remains uncontradicted. The Ministerial writers look very foolish at it; and nothing, as usual, will satisfy the Courier, but he must be talking foolishly still, and committing his own side of the question more and more. We really wish that his periodical friends, instead of taking all sorts of convulsive and recoiling pains to quash his weekly exposé for him, would advise him to be quiet. Both he and they would be a little more comfortable for it,—to say nothing of our relief from this precious task, which the wisdom of their employers forces upon us. He now pretends, in the teeth of the previous question, and of the inability of Spain to keep off the Indians; that the United States first made an unnecessary and unprincipled seizure of Florida and then abandoned it; and so having kept half a story in the back-ground, he comes luminously and triumphantly forward, and says he "should like to know what system of ethics teaches, that having committed a violent wrong, the mere abandonment of our error purifies us from its original stain." Why, what an unlucky dog it is! Here is he, with one unwary question, setting himself busily to cut up Church and State together. What system of ethics! Not the systems, certainly, which he and his paking friends think to oppose;—not the systems, which take such half-witted views of morality either way, and which regard the errors of mankind as thing to be instructed rather than branded. The idea of stains washed away, and of any stains at all, is equally idle, if this be kept in mind. The authors of the ethical systems which these persons pretend to abide by are perhaps as much against such notions, as any other philosophers, if we could see them divested of the cloaks and comments which ignorant and superstitious followers have put upon them; but what do they inculcate, as understood at present? What does the Courier say to that system, which regularly every week "pardons and absolves" any one upon repentance? What does he say to St. Paul's abandonment of his error and immediate apostleship? What does he say to that more ancient system, which we still read in our Churches with veneration, and which pardoned a celebrated Jewish King for the mere abandonment of his error, even in theory! For though he abandoned his error, be it observed, he kept his mistress;—Yes, kept the woman, for whom in the most odious and despicable manner he had killed her husband!—Really it is too late in the day to ask questions with a self-satisfied face, as if there were no one to answer them, and all the world were to keep a hypocritical silence. There has been some re-action no doubt in favour of folly; but folly is luckily too foolish to know how to use it, and mankind will no longer be led by worldly pretenders to morals, who neither understand the theories they defend, nor in the least degree act up to the practice.

The question at Manchester has, generally speaking, been clear enough from the beginning to all who have observed the signs of the times; and we may here supply, in one or two words, a summary of it accordingly. It is, then, neither more nor less than the natural struggle of men, whose adversity and increasing information have made wiser, to get more justice done to the many as compared with the few. A Morning Paper has said that "the great object of a master must always be to get a workman at as low a rate as possible; and, on the other hand, the great object of the workman must be to get as much as he can from his master." This, we think, is a mistake; but it shews the example at any rate which the masters set, and the probable consequence of it. The great object of the masters is, very likely, as it is supposed to be; but that it always must be so, will, we are convinced, not hold good; for adversity will teach the masters in turn, if nothing else will. The masters ought to be told what they should do, as well as the workmen; and their duty on this occasion is not to hold out, whether right or wrong, as some advisers have said who are anxious only to keep things quiet;—and by the way take very silly methods for the purpose. Their duty is to see the workmen well and sufficiently paid, aye, and more than sufficiently, if they themselves have enough for all the luxuries we hear of. Their duty is to diminish the shameful length of time the people are at work; to see that their health and education be taken care of; and to give up, on their own parts, all such superfluous, tasteless, and pernicious luxuries as they can only realize by means of the reverse. For it is all this, as well as the immediate question, which has produced the present alarming discontent. The only thing in which the workmen appear to us to be in the wrong, is in their anger against machinery; for machinery, like their own increased information, is only one of the natural consequences of the progress of knowledge. But then it should not be abused by its possessors. A few should not be made to work at it too long, in order that more hands may be rendered unnecessary; and were labour and property to be more equalized,—(we do not mean in a visionary way, but in the way of common and feasible justice) quite enough work might be found in matters connected with the toil for those whom machinery threw out of employment. At any rate,—Less labour and more pay may be the reasonable motto of the over-driven and suffering workmen;—and less luxury and more justice should be the conscious resolution of the purse-proud and selfish monopolists. To hear some of the papers one would imagine that the masters had no alternative between a state of bloated wealth and absolute ruin; and indeed people of this description have got to such a pitch now-a-days, that they very probably look upon that as ruin to their respective selves which would be an excellent competence for hundreds of those whom they are denying!

Orders have been received from Government, that the Spanish schooner, captured some time since by the Union, Venezuelan privateer, and brought into Falmouth by the Fox Revenue cutter, be restored to the captors. In consequence, the prize-master has been permitted to proceed with his prize to his original destination. It therefore appears to be decided, that the British Government does not intend to interfere in the struggle between Spain and her late provinces in South America.—West Briton.

THE INQUISITION.—An impost of four dollars has been laid on every vessel arriving at the Havannah, for the support of the Holy Inquisition; and two friars are appointed to visit each vessel in search of obnoxious books and pamphlets!

Official Dispatches from the Ships employed on the Discovery of the North-west Passage have been received. They are dated July 28th, at which time the Isabella and the Alexander were in lat. 75. 30. N. long. 60. 30. W. well over to the American Coast, the weather serene and perfectly clear. The variation of the compass, by accurate observations repeatedly made on board both ships, was 89, and dip 84. 30., which led them to conclude that they were approaching very nearly to the Magnetic Pole. It had been perfectly calm, and the sea as smooth as glass for 3 or 4 days, and the current drifted them to the South-eastward, which raised their hopes of an open passage round the point of America, from which quarter it appeared to proceed. All the way up the middle of Davis Strait they skirted an unbroken field of Ice on the left, but as they proceeded, it became thinner, and apparently rotten, and they were sanguine that the moment the breeze sprung up, the ice to the westward would open them a passage, and allow them to reach the Northern shores of America.

CLERKENWELL SESSIONS.—Mr. HUNT attended the Sessions-house, at Clerkenwell, on Friday, in order to try Mr. DOWLING's indictment; but the practice of the Court being, that if a bill is found, it cannot be tried at the same Sessions, he pleaded, traversed, and entered it first on the list, to be tried the first day of next Sessions, which begins the 26th day of October.

The accounts received on Wednesday from Manchester state, that there is every prospect of a speedy restoration of tranquillity in that town. The whole of the workmen, heretofore in the employ of Mr. HOLT, proprietor of the Chorlton New Mills, returned to their looms on Monday last, acknowledging that they had no cause of complaint, and that they deeply regretted their past conduct. It was confidently expected the example of the Chorlton spinners would have the most favourable influence upon the rest of the refractory body, and that in the course of the present week, all the mills would be in full work again. Many of the masters had received applications from their men, soliciting to be re-instated on the same terms as before the "turn out." A meeting of the principal master manufacturers was held on Monday, when certain resolutions were agreed to, expressive of their determination to resist, with the aid of the magistracy, the demands of their workmen.

Accounts from Manchester received on Thursday state, that the spinners, weavers, and colliers, have all returned to their respective employments, and that tranquillity is again restored. According to some of the letters, the master manufacturers have determined to receive into their employ again, only such as had been misled by others. Accurate lists of the names of the ringleaders have been kept, and they are peremptorily rejected.

The Manchester Herald states, that BAGULEY, JOHNSON, and DRUMMOND, have been apprehended, by virtue of a Bench warrant, and that on the person of BAGULEY were found a flask of gunpowder and many balls.

The PRINCE REGENT's warrant for restoring the functions of the late Magistrates of Aberdeen, so as to enable them to elect their successors, after having publicly declared their own incapacity, and the necessity of extending the old mode of election, has given such universal dissatisfaction to the most respectable citizens, that it is doubtful whether they will be able to prevail on any man of character (putting talents out of the question), to accept office in any Magistracy of their nomination.

A Correspondent wishes to be informed whether a person, summoned into a court of law in a case of forgery, when his evidence would lead to the conviction of the prisoner, could be legally compelled to swear, and, if so, what penalty would be the consequence of his refusal?

A Correspondent assures us, that we have been misinformed respecting the conduct of the servants employed to show Claremont: he tells us, that not even the smallest fee is taken, and that the utmost attention is paid to every visiter.—Times.

One of the Paris journals says, "the English Captain MAXWELL is at present at Spa, in order to recover from the wounds he received in London at the period of the elections."

The whole of the old east front of the King's Theatre is now taking down, and is to be re-erected, to correspond with the other part of the building.

As General DILLON and Mr. JARRET, two of the Grand Jurors of the County of Meath, were returning from the late Assizes of Trim, in a gig, they were stopped by two footpads, armed with pistols, and robbed of two pounds in cash. The General also lost a gold chain and two seals, which one of the depredators took from the General's watch, returning the watch, for fear of discovery by its means. The General said, "Lads, why rob me? I have always been a friend to the distressed." One of the thieves answered, "General, who should a man in distress borrow from but a friend?"

CHEAP TRAVELLING.—Owing to the spirit of rivalry which now subsists among the owners of steam conveyances between Hull and Grainsborough, passengers are conveyed from one to the other of these places (being a distance of fifty miles) at the rate of sixpence each.

TOWER GHOST.—For several nights past this spectre has made his appearance again, after an absence of two years, on his old chosen spot, near the Jewel Office. He appears about two o'clock in the morning. The sentry was so alarmed, that he quitted his spot and ran to the Guard-house, to inform his Officer. One man of stout courage attempted to seize him, but by means of his invisible coat he made his escape. What renders it remarkable, the Guards that are on duty now were quartered there before. At a late hour, a few evenings since, the two sentinels on duty at that part of the Tower where the spiritual intruder generally appears, were alarmed by the visit of a large black calf, seemingly in high condition, and fit for the London market, but from the unseasonableness of the hour, it was thought necessary by one of the sentinels to put him to rest. In compliance with the orders given to men on that station, he was about to discharge the contents of his musket into his fillet, but was restrained by his comrade, who being in rather a more elevated position, was a little more enlightened as to this mysterious appearance; and the watchman belonging to the Board of Ordnance was summoned to hold a council of war, wherein it was decreed that the serjeant of the main guard should be made acquainted with the appearance of this visitor with a calf's head, who was in the mean time amusing himself by running up and down the walls, between the legs of the soldiers and the watchmen, defying all their efforts to grapple with him. The serjeant with a file of men having arrived, he demanded a parley, and took occasion to inform his ghostship that he was no gentleman, of which it is supposed he was perfectly aware, as he did not attempt to deny it, but continued to cut his capers with the utmost nonchalance, which induced the serjeant to give orders for the men to present arms at the spot which Master Bos seemed to consider as his home. This mandate had the desired effect, and he vanished into air. There now remains little doubt but that this appearance is produced by the magic lantern, the prime mover of which remains undiscovered.

HISTORICAL ACCURACY.—A recent German traveller in England has published his tour, in which he states, that the English physicians always wear black, and sometimes swords; that all the Opposition eat boiled beef; and that a Tory dinner-table is distinguished by little rolls, while the Whigs show their sturdiness by uncouth lunches of bread!

AN INFALLIBLE CURE FOR THE BITE OF A MAD DOG.—The following receipt has, we are informed, been tried and proved by experience to be an infallible remedy for the bite of a mad dog;—Clean the wound with water, and place on each impression of the dog's tooth a small round pellet of lint, dipped in oil of vitriol, tying the entire round with a bandage—the bales of lint should be in proportion to the wound, from the size of the head of a pin to a small pea. This application Dr. F. has found to be an infallible remedy, even when the bite has been undressed for 48 hours. Should any sore remain after the caustic, it is to be treated as a common burn.—Nottingham Review.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

The operation which her MAJESTY underwent on Saturday night appears to have given her considerable relief; at least, it is certain, that at present she is in a great measure free from those severe pains and spasms of the viscera which on Saturday seemed to threaten her speedy dissolution. Her MAJESTY, however, notwithstanding this temporary cessation of pain, is in a state of extreme debility: unable to bear the slightest motion, to lie down in her bed, or even to move from her chair at all. Neither had it been judged advisable for her to be wheeled into the adjoining room, where the Princesses have been in the habit of personally waiting on their suffering parent during her little repast, with the most affectionate anxiety; and now her MAJESTY takes her repast in her bed-chamber. Her MAJESTY, indeed, has lately received very little food, and that of the lightest kind; the wing of a roasted partridge, or some such trifle, constituting her dinner.—Courier—Tuesday.

The complication of complaints under which her MAJESTY is labouring, appears almost daily to assume a more decided character. The intervals between each relapse regularly decrease in duration, whilst every succeeding attack is more violent than the last, and consequently leaves the Royal sufferer in an increased state of debility. There is therefore but too much reason to apprehend the most serious consequences. Her MAJESTY is also said to suffer extreme mental anxiety from her increasing inability to remove to Windsor, and regrets that she did not sooner follow the dictates of her feelings; for, in her present state, the journey, it seems, is deemed altogether impossible.—Courier.

Her MAJESTY continued, throughout the whole of yesterday, free from pain, and, on the whole, something better than on Tuesday. At six o'clock she dined in her chamber, and ate rather heartily, at the same time conversing with the Princesses much more freely than on any day during the last fortnight; and up to eight o'clock, she remained in the same favourable state.—Courier—Thursday.

The QUEEN has found much benefit from a couch, which has been made under the direction of the PRINCE REGENT, and was sent down to Kew, on Wednesday night. It is so contrived, that it can be used either in an upright sitting posture, with complete support for every part of the body, or it can be gradually inclined, by machinery, to any degree of recumbency, without a perceptible motion to the patient. Her MAJESTY slept in it on Wednesday night, and enjoyed a more refreshing sleep than had been expected.

Up to eight o'clock, yesterday evening, no change had taken place. Her MAJESTY remained free from any violent symptom of her complaint, and compared with the preceding week, certainly in a much more favourable state. Mr. KEATE, and Mr. BRANDE, of Arlington-street, who furnishes the medicines for the use of her MAJESTY, were both in attendance with Sir FRANCIS MILLMAN, on Thursday night, and slept at the Palace. Sir HENRY HALFORD returned from Windsor Castle about three o'clock yesterday, and, we understand, left the Princess SOPHIA in a very indifferent state of health.—Courier—Saturday.

The following is the Bulletin of yesterday:—
“The QUEEN has had an indifferent night, and her MAJESTY remains much indisposed, but without any material alteration in her symptoms.”

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 336.

COVENT-GARDEN.

THIS Theatre has opened for the season. It has been newly gilt and otherwise adorned, particularly with very tasteful patterns running in front of each tier of boxes, a different one to each. The strips of laurel in the compartments over the stage would have been better, had they been less strait and formal. The light of the chandelier is diffused beautifully; the temperature well regulated; and the whole house, with its mixture of red and gold, very snug as well as rich, and a good nest for winter-time. But still these Theatres are a great deal too large, both for good acting and good writing, and a less avacious grasp would realize more. Drury-Lane has lowered it's prices, but we doubt whether it will be able to stand by them. Covent-Garden has kept the old ones, and alleges of course that it cannot afford to do otherwise. We have not forgotten, however, that these prices were once lower, and on what ostensible grounds they were raised, such as the proper payment of good musicians, &c. Pray what are the stories we hear that go to prove these grounds to be only ostensible? We hope they are not true.

We are sorry we missed the first appearance of Mrs. YATES on Monday, and we have to regret also that our negligence has let slip a pleasant farce of the late Mr. COBB's, revived at the Hay-market,—the First Floor. We will make amends next week. Mrs. YATES, who performed Lady Macbeth on Monday, appeared on Wednesday as Meg Merrilies in Guy Rannering; but not having seen her in the former, we did not choose to criticise her in an inferior character. We shall make a point of seeing her to-morrow.

On Wednesday another performer from the Dublin Theatre, a Mr. FARREN, made his first appearance; and in our want of critical gallantry, him we saw. His character was that of Sir Peter Teazle in the School for Scandal. He is said to be a young man not more than five and twenty, which certainly no one would have discovered through his strait old dress and his nut-cracker looking visage as Sir Peter. His legs indeed were stout enough; but old country gentlemen are apt to have very respectable calves. His most youthful symptom was in his voice, which is powerful without effort, and rather harsh.

Mr. FARREN went through his part with great applause. Indeed the announcement of the repetition of the play for next Wednesday was received with enthusiasm, so that it is evident he more than satisfied the audience, and is reckoned an acquisition to the theatre. The daily papers also speak highly of him. We are far from meaning to contradict these expectations, or from saying that Mr. FARREN's Sir Peter was not very effective; but the fact is, that it is extremely difficult to form a final judgment of an Actor from his performance of a character of this description; and for this reason if for no other,—that it is a character which has been represented by some of the best Actors heretofore, whose respective excellences have been grafted on it from time to time, till it flourishes away in abundance under almost any one's management.

Miraturque novos praises et non sua giggles.

Thus the downcast and significant look whenever marriage is mentioned, the fondling old taps on the hand given to Lady Teazle, and the fidgetty whispering enjoyment and unrestrainable giggles at the discovery of the supposed "little French milliner" in Joseph Surface's room, are as old to us as the stage itself; and of course much older to those who recollect Mr. KING. On the other hand Mr. FARREN entered extremely well into those; and if he exaggerated a little, we look upon it as rather a promising fault in such a character, and as implying a wish to do something of his own. The exaggeration was in very good style, and only in the most humorous passages. If we noticed any more doubtful fault, it was in something like a want of polish in company, and of a less self-possessed tone of voice as an old man. But these huge theatres make people cry out in every respect; and the occasional want of polish may be excused by Sir Peter's temperament and old maidishness, to say nothing of the company itself, whose Scandal renders it vulgar and despicable.

We shall be extremely glad to see Mr. FARREN again; and have little doubt from all that is reported of him, from his own relish of the part, and from his even looking the old gentleman so well as he did, to find him a better actor than common.

We congratulate Covent Garden on endeavouring to pluck up its comedy again. The performers seem inclined to second the Manager more than usually; for we never saw Miss BRUNTON to such advantage as in Lady Teazle; and our elegant tragedian CHARLES KEMBLE absolutely surprised us with his vivacity in his namesake. Has he taken a lesson during his stay in France? He really seemed to have got the sprightly French wine in his head; and Miss BRUNTON's laugh guggled away, as if she had been taking a little decanter with him. It was indeed very natural, off-hand, and enjoying; though upon the whole she seemed to regard Sir Peter too much as a butt. We wish we could compliment Mr. TERRY on his proportionate superiority in Charles's uncle; but with his evident good sense, and after the deserved applause he has met in the Green Man, he can afford to be told that his Sir Oliver is very inferior to Mr. DOWTON's. It wants his force and warmth. Nor in the other characters could we help thinking of our old comic friends ELLISTON and Miss DUNCAN,—we beg pardon, Mrs. DAVISON. We know not how it is by the bye with these maiden and married names; but when a lady whom we like gets married, (as it is extremely likely she should) we cannot easily give up the former one. The other seems a kind of faithlessness to one's old habit of admiration, and to the common property of society in her virtues and abilities to please.

The Lady who appeared at Drury-lane last night has been stated in most of the papers to be Miss MUDIE; her name we understand was Moody: she is not related to Miss MUDIE, who has been for some time in Paris attending to her education.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 8.—MR. TOPPING.

A partial praise shall never elevate
My settled censure of my own esteem;
A cankered verdict of malignant hate
Shall ne'er provoke me worse myself to deem:
Spite of despute, and rancour's villany
I am myself——

John Marston's Scourge of Villany.

THERE are few abuses at the Bar more crying at the present moment than the mode in which the examination of witnesses is sometimes conducted; of course no reference is here intended to the technical rules of evidence so long established, and to which perhaps few objections can be reasonably made, but to the manner in which Counsel are permitted to overstep all the bounds of decorum and propriety in their interrogatories. Instances could be pointed out where female delicacy has been outraged with the most unfeeling wantonness, and the most innocent witness is often so confounded by the novelty of his situation, and so bewildered by rapid and purposely complicated questions, that he is absolutely entrapped into falsehood and perjury: under such circumstances the caution of the Satirist can be of no avail:—

—— ambigua si quando citabere testis
Inverteque rei, Phalaris licet imperet ut sis Falsus, &c.

A witness might be proof against all bodily torture, though not against the unfair and even despicable artifices employed to cheat him into a declaration of what is untrue; he may enter the box with a resolution to tell a plain straight-forward story, and to adhere closely to facts within his own knowledge, but if he be not a man of more than ordinary firmness and acuteness, his purpose will be defeated by those who have attained such skill in confusing what is clear, and involving what is simple. The offence offered to the diffidence and delicacy of women, so frequently and so needlessly, though interfering with the due administration of justice, is comparatively a minor evil, and most commonly but a part of the same system. I have more than once had occasion to speak of the powers and penetrating sagacity of Sir W. GARROW, in managing the examination of an adverse witness, and though true it is that he was seldom very scrupulous as to the mode in which he extracted or confounded truth, and though he had as much coarseness and as little feeling as any man who ever practised, yet he seldom without some cause or other (whether sufficient or not is a different question) broke through the ordinary rules of decorum and politeness; if he did so, it usually turned out that the individual he was perforating by his dogged interrogatories deserved the treatment he received. While he continued at the Bar he was justly considered unrivalled in this respect, and few men, not even those of the highest rank, ventured to put themselves in competition; but since his elevation to the Bench there is scarcely a single Counsel, however young and inexperienced, who does not think himself warranted in going all lengths, and this frequently without any instructions to warrant an attack upon the character and demeanour of the witness: all flatter themselves that they are peculiarly gifted, and take every opportunity of shewing how much they are deceived in their self-conceited estimate. To such an extent has this abuse been carried, that of late it has sometimes called for the controuling power of the Bench, which finds that the discretion generally allowed to Sir W. GARROW ought not to be entrusted to his overweening imitators.

It has often excited astonishment that a shrewd and practised Advocate should be disconcerted, if not dumfounded, by an answer in the spirit of his question, or by a retort remarkable only for its impertinence or effrontery; but the wonder ends the moment we reflect, that those who may be most accustomed to attack, on that account may be least competent to defend, and that Counsel, covered by their imposing paraphernalia, only prepare themselves to assail: they fight as it were with a long sword, by which they keep their antagonist (who they take care shall be unarmed and as helpless as possible) at a distance; but if he have resolution to advance, or the skill to meet them at their own weapon, as they have only learnt to thrust and to parry, they are compelled to retire or submit. This is the true cause of the constant appeals made by Counsel to the Court, when they happen to encounter an individual who makes even a faint attempt at retaliation.

Some of the foregoing remarks will apply to the gentleman who is the subject of the present article, and who is the senior practising Counsel in the Court of King's Bench: in the outset however let me relieve him from the supposed charge of intentionally and unnecessarily infringing upon the delicacy and consideration due to female witnesses: I never observed it, nor have I ever heard that he was guilty of such an offence. Of course, however, his standing at the Bar warrants him in taking upon himself as much or more license than any of his present competitors, and it must be allowed that he generally avails himself of his privilege, though not always to the advantage of his clients; for it is obvious that if an Advocate severely cross-examine a witness and totally fails, the Jury, to a certain extent, must feel disgusted, and the cause will probably suffer in proportion. Mr. TOPPING may be, and no doubt is, like other men, sometimes misinstructed, but one of his great faults is, that he never seems to endeavour to judge of the correctness of the instructions put into his hands by the Attorney, by watching closely the demeanour and appearance of the witness: he is an industrious pains-taking note-maker of all the deposition in chief, or what the witness proves for the party on whose behalf he is called, but instead of poring over his pen and keeping his eyes invariably fixed upon his brief, he should be minutely scrutinizing the conduct and countenance of the person in the box: he should leave to his younger co-adjutor the labour of taking notes; for all men who have been successful in this department of the office of an Advocate, have been much more careless about what a witness said than about the manner in which it was said—the look and the various expressions of the face: every body knows that there is no interrogatory so effectual in detecting guilt as that which is put by a steady and searching eye: a man who is skilful in this respect will keep up a sort of silent cross-examination of a person, all the time he is giving evidence for the opposite party. Not a few of the awkward dilemmas into which Mr. TOPPING has at various times fallen, are to be attributed to his constant neglect of this mode of detecting falsehood; the questions he puts are generally framed with sufficient ingenuity, and long practice has given him a knack, which men of greater quickness do not always attain, viz. that of always having a second question ready to follow up the first, and to stifle the answer to the first, provided that answer do not exactly suit his purpose. This expedient is, notwithstanding, held a little unfair, and is frequently exclaimed against, though all more or less pursue it according to the degree of facility they have acquired.

Mr. TOPPING is also not remarkable for the gentlemanliness of the mode in which he conducts an examination. I have acquitted him of all design to insult or outrage female delicacy, but at the same time it cannot be denied that there is a coarseness and even a vulgarity in his language and manner that are liable to misinterpretation: this is aided by the grating hoarseness of his voice.* His words are usually unselected, and if there be a mild and a harsh way of putting a question, he does not give himself the trouble to consider which will be least offensive; yet if he receive an answer, partly called for by the terms of the question, his indignation instantly rises and he usually appeals to the Court against this uncalled for insolence. He appears to think that a witness is bound to endure all and to return nothing; though considering the extent of his practice there is no Counsel who has been so frequently interrupted by the Bench with a sort of gentle hint that more restraint would be becoming. I allude here principally to Mr. Justice ABBOTT when he presides at Nisi Prius for the Lord Chief Justice, for Lord ELLENBOROUGH seldom seems to feel much for the painful situation of the individual in the box. I have some reluctance in making these remarks upon Mr. TOPPING, however just, because I understand and believe, that in private life he is a man of peculiarly kind and gentlemanly deportment, and it only shews that the sort of masquerade in which the persons of Counsel appear in public, makes them sometimes put their thoughts and feelings in masquerade also; not a few are very different beings with very different natures, when they put off their legal habiliments.

The practice enjoyed by Mr. TOPPING has fluctuated much since he became King's Counsel, about 12 or 13 years ago: for a considerable time he sat briefless within the Bar at Westminster, excepting when his aid was required in a case from the Northern Circuit, where he had some business; and I do not hesitate to say that for the greater part of his emoluments he is more indebted to his good fortune than to his talents: though tutus est fictis

* The following epigrammatic description of the voices of the four leading Counsel of the Court of King's Bench was handed about among the youngers a year or two ago:—

“SCARLET neighs like a stallion, and MARRYAT
Barks out his short words like a dog;
GURNEY looks like and talks like a parrot;
TOPPING croaks between raven and frog.”

contendere verbis, yet, as far as relates to promotion and advancement, the law resembles the army, since it much depends upon stepping into dead men's shoes: if I mistake not Mr. TOPPING obtained the greater share of his business in the country on the death of Mr. Sergeant COCKELL, after which he and Mr. Justice PARK long kept the lead, not so much because they merited the station, as because there were then no Barristers of sufficient rank and standing to oppose them. Circumstances in a similar manner combined in his favour in London, for the elevation of Sir V. GIBBS threw many briefs unavoidably into his hands, and made him for some time a competitor, however unequal, with Sir W. GARROW: at that period, to use a vulgar phrase, there was little more than Hobson's choice, Mr. TOPPING or nobody,—that is to say, Mr. PARK,—to oppose Sir W. GARROW. Within the last three or four years however about six or eight new silk-gowns have been given away in the King's Bench, and the consequence has been, that Mr. TOPPING's business has very much declined: it has fallen chiefly into the hands of younger rivals, Messrs. SCARLETT, MARRYAT, and GURNEY. This fact therefore proves the correctness of what I advanced, that Mr. TOPPING would not have been nearly so often employed but for a few fortuitous coincidences.

It has been already stated that Mr. TOPPING is an industrious pains-taking man, who reads his instructions patiently, and adheres to them faithfully: his other merits are however neither numerous nor prominent. Of late his health has certainly suffered, and to that his friends have mainly attributed the decay of his practice: his mental as well as his bodily vigour are impaired, and he no longer possesses much of that temporary energy which I used formerly to think his principal recommendation. His speech, in opening a case was always the worst part of his mode of conducting it: if the facts were numerous and complicated, the laborious reading he had given his brief appeared to entangle and confuse him; and by stating and restating the same thing, he usually required twice as much time as would have been necessary for a combined and concentrated detail; not that his memory was defective, but he failed in putting things in their right places. The articulation of his words is always indistinct, arising partly perhaps from an attempt to smother and conceal his strong northern accent; and though his voice is naturally strong, he seldom throws it out, as if he were afraid of betraying its harshness. In the north I have heard his Yorkshire brogue (if it may be so called) of considerable use to him; but it is much to be regretted that he could never leave much of it behind him.

Judging from what is seen of it in public, it would be said that Mr. TOPPING's temper now and then requires great regulation; he is much too irritable on slight and unintentionable interruptions: he has sometimes appeared as if were overwhelmed in the foam of his own wrath, but when it has subsided a little, it gives him an impulse which displays his temporary energy to advantage: it gives rise to two or three vigorous sentences which tell with the Jury, and if they be a little too much ornamented with Friar John's Couleurs de rhetorique Ciceroniane, they may be admitted in the absence of something better: they have their effect upon those who mistake constitutional heat for the passion of eloquence. His action, like Mr. MARRYAT's, is confined generally to his head and shoulders, though he now and then doubles his fist very imposingly. His face, never very inviting, when he is angry is grievously distorted even to ferocity: his own witnesses are frequently terror-struck.

Though a man of much experience in routine business, he is not looked upon in the profession as a man of much learning. His general information seems to lie in a narrow compass; or if it be at all extensive, he is one of a number who make but little use of their acquirements in a situation where every species of knowledge may be turned to account. Upon the whole, I am inclined to think that Mr. TOPPING is much more admirable in his private character than in his public capacity; and the cheerful encouragement he has not unfrequently given to young and diffident beginners, is one proof of an amiable disposition.

AMICUS CURBEE.

MR. JUSTICE PARK.

MR. EXAMINER,—The apology for Mr. Justice Park which you inserted in your paper on Sunday, copied from that venal advocate of every thing exceptionable, the Courier, is lame and unsatisfactory. The answer to the charge brought against him in the West Briton, namely—the leaving a part of the business of the Assize unattended to, in order that he might dine with Sir T. Ackland, is not disproved by the circumstance of his travelling 120 miles with his own horses, and only stepping in ten minutes to dine with Sir Thomas. Because he chose to use his own horses, and take three days, or 72 hours, to travel a distance which at 6 miles an hour (a very slow rate for posting), he might have performed in 20 with ease, the suitors in different actions are to be put to unnecessary expense, and to travel, many of them 40 miles, with witnesses, twice over.—The Learned Judge had a right to press horses or conveyances, to further the ends of justice, and his choosing to have his own horses, and travel only 40 miles a-day, is no excuse for him. He might have remained a day longer in Bodmin, slept 9 or 10 hours each night, and reached Wells time enough to dine the following day but one.

You will not surely, Mr. Examiner, admit, that a Judge is borne out in travelling at the slowest possible rate he can, thereby leaving unheard causes which must experience a six months further delay in consequence, for no reason but his own caprice. In the better times of Old England, public servants were considered bound to serve the public: it seems now as if the public must attend the caprices of its servants.

A LOVER OF TRUTH.

NEW CHURCH IN CHELSEA.

MR. EXAMINER,—On the 20th of last month, a Vestry was held in St. Luke's, Chelsea, to consider the propriety of erecting a New Church. At this Meeting the Hon. and Rev. G. V. Wellesley presided, and the Worshipful Luke Flood, Magistrate, brought forward the Resolutions. The following transcript of the Third Resolution will best pourtray its various meanings:—

"That in order to carry this measure into effect, a sum not exceeding in all Thirty Thousand Pounds must be raised, including every other advance that may be made from the Commissioners of Churches and others. That the interest of this sum, together with the principal, shall be paid out of a Church-rate, and that the Rate for this purpose shall not exceed one shilling in the pound in the year."

Here, Sir, is ability and consistency. Government is to give one-third of the Thirty Thousand, besides other subscriptions, on which we are to pay interest, and to repay the principal also.

It can no longer be matter of wonder that the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Wellesley should be allowed to receive so ample a stipend for doing nothing (Vide the article headed "Clerical Proceedings in St. Luke's, Chelsea," in the Examiner of the 12th of April last), when he appears to be so capable of doing every thing *. Does this specimen of the ability, " exertions, and anxious solicitude" of our worthy Divine and his Magisterial Coadjutor displayed in this Resolution, or does it not, nullify their entire Resolutions? I certainly think it does, and am of opinion, that before our parish wiseacres proceed any further in the business of Church building, there must be another meeting to make void that of the 20th of August last, and to adopt more rational Resolutions.

* This is the Reverend Divine who drew up what he denominated a "Counter Requisition," (and afterwards would not call a meeting on it) in opposition to one previously sent to the Churchwardens, which was signed by 24 respectable house-

I shall take the question in another point of view. If all our clear headed Magistrate asserts in his first Resolution be true, let us build a chapel of ease at the new end of the parish, and let the present Church stand. This would accommodate the inhabitants of the new town at one-fourth of the expense of building a new Church, and answer every purpose except that of the " loaves and fishes." I would ask,—Is it decent or reasonable in times of deep distress like the present to propose the building of a new Church, when the old one has so recently undergone considerable and substantial repairs, the expence of which you may imagine, when I inform you that the rates for it amount to 8*d.* in the pound. When the old Church is thus repaired, I really see no necessity for a new one. Indeed I am of opinion that the old Church would stand as long as it has hitherto done. On that score, therefore, they will not now, I think, venture to state that our Rector's life is in danger whenever he enters Chelsea Church, as they did on three or four former occasions, when they urged the necessity of a new Church, and were as often defeated. However they appear to have taken their stand on more plausible pretences this time,—on the plea of an increased population and the want of accommodation for the inhabitants. The Hon. and Rev. Mr. Wellesley would do well to bear in mind this scriptural precept—" Love thy neighbour as thyself,"—and who is the Reverend Doctor's neighbour if not a brother parson? Should they build a new Church (which I am certain they cannot legally do upon the strength of the Resolutions of the 20th of August last) I very much doubt whether three-fourths of the inhabitants would not quit this parish, and leave Mr. Wellesley to preach to empty pews. Some householders would have to pay yearly from 10 to 20*l.* in addition to their present rates. In fact, the taxes in Chelsea parish every of description already are so exceedingly heavy, that the most respectable part of the inhabitants are daily quitting the parish on account of them; and when at almost every third door the tax-gatherer and broker appear with their truck and instructions to distrain for taxes, surely it is not a time to call for a new Church, at any rate till the old one shows some greater signs of decay than it does at present.

On Thursday last there was another Vestry Meeting, at which also the Rev. Mr. Wellesley presided, to receive the report of a Committee, and to take into consideration the best mode of carrying into effect the Resolutions above named.

Here a Parishioner took an opportunity of making an observation on the absurdity of the 3d Resolution passed at the preceding Vestry, and made a motion to the following effect:—" That the Resolutions passed at a Vestry Meeting on the 20th of August last are null and void, and keepers, requesting them to call a Meeting on the distressed state of the Parish. This same Rector having, not a fortnight before, at a Vestry of some local consideration, said, " That the Parishioners would find him at all times act with impartiality," I'll leave the public to judge of his " impartiality," when he even prevented the Churchwardens from doing their duty. Perhaps some might think this a stretch of authority, setting " impartiality" out of the question. Moreover he sanctioned, if he did not cause it to be inserted himself, a notice in the public Newspapers, viz. the Sunday Advertiser and the Morning Advertiser, on the 1st and 2d of June, 1817, annulling the said Meeting, although he knew it would take place, and of which I hope I may not have occasion to speak more fully hereafter. So much for the " impartiality" of the Hon. Divine.

that therefore this Meeting cannot legally proceed to erect a New Church upon such vague, imperfect, and inconsistent Resolutions, without subjecting the Committee to legal and all other expenses attending the erection of the said Church;"—when one of the Committee,—an Overseer and a Carpenter,—one who cannot possibly have any interest in the building of a New Church, made an objection to the motion on the ground of the mover not having paid the last quarter's poor rate. The " impartial" Rector took the hint instead of opposing the argument, and thus the Vestry of the 10th instant ended.

A HOUSEHOLDER OF ST. LUKE'S, CHELSEA.

Would not every householder be justified in refusing to pay towards the building of a New Church, in the event of the Committee persevering in error, that error having been pointed out to them? Who in the event of its being built will have to pay for it? Will not the Committee be solely answerable?

MEETING IN PALACE-YARD.

On Monday a meeting took place in Palace-yard, " to take into consideration the propriety of making a public declaration of their rights; to adopt the most effectual measures for redressing their wrongs, and to remonstrate with the Crown to remove those grievances which are now becoming insupportable." A temporary hustings was erected within a few yards of the door of Westminster-hall. It was composed of poles and boards, lashed together with ropes. From a hackney-coach which drew up to the spot, a chair was taken for the convenience of the chairman. Soon after 12 o'clock a cart arrived bearing four inscriptions, with the words " Come to the public meeting in Palace-yard, this day at 12 o'clock." About half-past twelve, Mr. Hunt, the chairman, arrived in a carriage, accompanied by his son, brother, and Dr. Watson. They were received with partial cheers. The persons at this time assembled did not exceed three or four hundred, but the crowd afterwards increased. Mr. Hunt and his friends immediately mounted the hustings, and, after some consultation with Dr. Watson and others, addressed the meeting.

He observed, that their object on the present occasion was not to petition Parliament, but to remonstrate with the Prince Regent, and to call upon him to assist them in obtaining their right of voting for members to represent them in the House of Commons. Although he had nothing to do with calling this meeting, he by no means wished to shrink from any responsibility which might attach to those who had called it, inasmuch as he was fully aware of every thing which was to be done. Petitions signed by a million and a half of the subjects of this realm had been sent to the late House of Commons, but their petitions had been treated with neglect. In this state of things, it was their determination not to petition the new House of Commons, but to appeal boldly, and in a dignified tone, to the Prince Regent himself, to restore to them those rights which they were entitled to enjoy before they were called upon to fight the battles of their country, to pay the taxes, or to support the Government; and to restore to them the right of voting for those who were to impose their burdens upon them. Mr. Hunt concluded by calling upon the meeting to conduct themselves peaceably and with good order. A declaration and resolutions would be read to them, which they might reject or approve, as they thought proper. If there were any persons disposed to offer objections to the sentiments contained in that declaration and those resolutions, he hoped they would be heard with patience.

Mr. Watson complained that some person who had pledged himself to come and deliver his sentiments upon this occasion, had not been manly enough to show his face. He had not himself been in the habit, until lately, of addressing a public assembly; but for more than 30 years he had paid no little attention to the promises of public men, to the measures of some of our greatest orators and statesmen; and he had heard promise after promise, that the day was not far off, when those liberties, for which our forefathers fought and bled, and which had been torn from us, should be restored to us. But, alas! faction had joined with the despots of Europe, not for the purpose, as they pretended, of giving happiness and liberty to Europe, but to further enslave them. It was not alone the loss of money that had been sustained by the operations of the boroughmongering faction, nor was it money that would make recompense or retribution, but there were those who had lost wives, fathers, mothers, children, and almost every kindred tie, by the operations of a spendthrift ministry. Every domestic comfort had been invaded; wives had famished for want; children had died from disease; and others had been visited by famine; and a son or brother had been taken from a death-bed by the effects of the law; and an almost general deprivation of all human happiness had been effected by the operations of the law; indeed there seemed to be a conspiracy against the happiness of Englishmen—(Applause)—He had seen the miseries of his fellow-countrymen in their darkest colours. He had also visited the manufacturing part of the community, and their miseries were indescribable, all occasioned by the boroughmongers. In some of those places they worked from four in the morning to eight at night. He had seen sights the most miserable and loathsome—sights that would appal human nature—children of the tenderest ages had been driven from their hovels to their work, whimpering and trembling under the want of food.—(Shame, shame)—The people of this country were now, if ever, to speak the language of men. Too long had they been trifled with by Ministers and their profligate agents, who delighted in misrepresenting the sentiments and will of those for whose service they were politically created. It was now for the people to say whether they would be minions to a set of abandoned men, supported by a parcel of boroughmongers, or not. The voice of individuals would not do; the prosperity of the country depended upon the voice of the million, who were now to determine whether they were to exercise their liberties, or to abandon them for ever. He was convinced that there were millions of people in England and Ireland who were determined to die rather than to submit to slavery of any kind.—(Loud applause)—If Persia, and Turkey, and the East Indies were looked to, it would be seen how many millions of slaves attended the beck of almost a single tyrant. England was approaching to this extremity, and would reach it, if the most zealous and unanimous exertions were not made. Were not the people under the control of the bayonet, and had not Ministers threatened in the public press to use the bayonet? Had they not brought forward their cannon against the liberties of mankind?—(Applause)—But whom were they setting up against the people, by calling in the aid of the military? Father against son, brother against brother. Those who should never be employed except against a foreign enemy, were thus forced into a bloody contention with those who were nearest to their hearts.—(Loud applause.)—Mr. Watson then proceeded to read the declaration. It was followed by resolutions, which objected to the present constitution of the House of Commons, insisted on the right of Universal Suffrage, condemned the existence of a standing army, pointed out the propriety of substituting the ancient civil force for a military one, and the reliance for our defence from invasion rather upon a militia drawn from the great body of the people than upon a regular force. They condemned the conduct of Ministers in the employment of spies and the passing of the Corn Bill, which was stated to be a vile conspiracy between the great landholders and the Ministers to extort an immense portion of taxes from the poor. The resolutions lastly condemned the encouragement given to the Bank of England in the unlimited issue of their paper.

There was now and then a slight interruption, and one man in the crowd cried out "false." Mr. Hunt said, that as the myrmidons of Government were ready to pounce upon any in the assembly who appeared warm, it would be advisable to restrain the natural feelings upon such an occasion. All the resolutions in the declaration were then carried, and Mr. Hunt said they would, no doubt, appear in the public papers, with the comments of the hirelings of Ministers. Mr. Hunt then said, that a remonstrance to the Prince Regent would be proposed, which was couched in language such as a free people should use to their sovereign.

A penny subscription for furthering the objects of the meeting was proposed by Mr. Watson and carried. Mr. Hunt was nominated to present the remonstrance, and the meeting adjourned peaceably.

Mr. Hunt, after the meeting on Monday, went to the Office of the Home Secretary, whither a large number followed him. He entered alone, and was immediately introduced to Lord Sidmouth, to whom he delivered the Remonstrance. Mr. Hunt then returned to the persons who waited for him, and stated that Lord Sidmouth had promised to give them an answer in a few days. The crowd then dispersed.

Mr. Hunt afterwards received the following letter:—

Whitehall, Sept. 8.

SIR,—Lord Sidmouth has directed me to inform you, that as the paper containing the Declaration and Remonstrance, addressed to the Prince Regent, which you put into his Lordship's hands yesterday, purports by the description therein given of it, to contain the Declaration and Remonstrance of the inhabitants of the Cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, and as this description is evidently and notoriously untrue, his Lordship does not think himself at liberty to lay the same before his Royal Highness.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. Hunt, Esq., 8, Norfolk-street, Strand.

HENRY CLIVE.

MR. HUNT'S ANSWER.

8, Norfolk-street, Strand, Sept. 9.

MY LORD,—When I delivered to your Lordship the Remonstrance unanimously agreed to at the Meeting held in Palace-yard, on Monday last, addressed to the Prince Regent, you promised me that you would read it over, and if it did not contain any improper language, you would deliver it into the hands of his Royal Highness, and that you would give me an answer in the course of three days.—Late last evening I received a letter, signed Henry Clive, which states, that your Lordship had instructed him to say, that you did not think yourself at liberty to lay the same before the Prince Regent, because it purported to be "the Declaration and Remonstrance of the inhabitants of the Cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, which description was evidently and notoriously untrue."—Now, my Lord, by what means your Lordship ascertained the fact that the persons who attended the Meeting in Palace-yard were not inhabitants of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, I know not; but this I do know, that those persons who proposed and seconded "the Declaration of our manifold Grievances, and the Remonstrance against the cruel, illegal, and unconstitutional acts of the corrupt  and  that had been so long imposed upon his Royal Highness the Prince Regent by the great and overwhelming Borough Proprietors of this Country," &c., were inhabitants of the cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent; and I believe that almost the whole of the five or 6,000 persons at the meeting, who unanimously sanctioned the same, were also inhabitants of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent. However, as your Lordship has declined to deliver the declaration and remonstrance to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, I will trouble your Lordship to return me the original document that I left with you, that I may, agreeable to the instruction of that meeting, take some other method of laying it before his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.—I am, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

H. HUNT.

To Lord Viscount Sidmouth.

OLD BAILEY.

On Wednesday, Laurence Halloran, otherwise Gregory, Doctor in Divinity of King's College, Aberdeen, a gentleman of most respectable appearance and demeanour, and apparently about fifty years of age, was indicted for having in the month of January 1817, counterfeited a frank in the name of Sir Wm. Garrow, Knt., then a member of Parliament, and having thereby defrauded the Post-office of "ten-pence." On being called upon to plead to the indictment, the prisoner, in a firm voice, addressed the Court to the following effect:—"In the long interval of time that has elapsed since the date of the letter in question (upwards of twenty months), the death of the only person who could have established my innocence having unfortunately precluded all possibility of exculpation, and the total exhaustion of my pecuniary resources, and ruin of my circumstances, by the long confinement I have undergone, having equally deprived me of all power to engage legal advice and assistance, I feel that I have no alternative but to plead "Guilty" to the charge, and to throw myself on the clemency of the Court."

Mr. Baron GRAHAM admonished the prisoner to reflect on the conduct he was about to adopt before he decided on pleading. To which Dr. Halloran replied,—"I am most grateful for your Lordship's counsel and consideration, but standing, as I do, single, unarmed, and defenceless, against armed and powerful opponents, I am advised that it will be most prudent to decline the contest from the hopelessness of success. I beg leave, therefore, to persist in the plea of "Guilty," and to implore the commiseration of the Court."

A Solicitor, of the name of Hyatt, here offered, though not personally known to Dr. Halloran, to undertake his defence, and to engage Counsel on his behalf, but the offer was declined and the plea recorded.

[A Correspondent gives us the following account of Dr. Halloran:—The name of this unfortunate Gentleman is not unknown in the literary world. His publications, poetical and theological, amount to seventeen. He conducted a School Establishment near Exeter, upwards of twelve years, which was in the highest repute; and from which he turned out many excellent scholars, who now fill respectable situations in life. Among these may be reckoned the present Solicitor-General, Sir Robert Gifford, who was nine years his pupil, and received from him the whole of his school education. It was at Dr. Halloran's recommendation that Sir Robert's talents were devoted to the law. Dr. Halloran has also been employed many years as a Naval and Military Chaplain, in which engagements he was highly respected. He was three years and a half Chaplain and Secretary to the Earl of Northesk, with whom he was present in the Britannia at the battle of Trafalgar, on which he published a poem. He was also on terms of friendship with Lords Nelson and Collingwood, to the former of whom he had been long known. He was upwards of three years Chaplain to the Naval and Military Forces, and Rector of the public Grammar School at the Cape of Good Hope. His last engagement, as Curate and Lecturer of Broseley in Shropshire, has been a most unfortunate one; for though highly valued by the inhabitants, he was unfortunately on unfriendly terms with the Rector, Dr. Townsend Forester, to whom the counterfeited frank was addressed, and who has been the promoter of this novel prosecution, the first that has ever taken place under the statute, and which subjects the prisoner, after an active and useful life, now in the wane, to seven years transportation. Dr. H. has a large family, at present in extreme distress from this most afflicting reverse. He is confined in the Infirmary in Newgate.]

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

Wednesday morning, Mr. Hunt was brought up, to answer to a charge of assault upon Mr. Dowling.—Mr. Dowling said, that Mr. Hunt had struck him on the preceding day in St. Clement's church-yard.—On Tuesday morning, having borrowed a newspaper of Mr. Charles Clement, he called into his shop, about half-past eleven, to return it. Mr. Hunt and his son were there. Mr. Dowling laid the paper on the counter, and was retiring, when Mr. Hunt exclaimed, "Well, Mr. Spectacle Spy, are you disposed to finish my horse-whipping now?" Mr. Dowling replied, "Mr. Hunt, I wish to have no altercation with you," and was retiring, when Mr. Hunt applied to him the foulest epithets, and said he was a despicable Government spy and informer. Mr. Dowling defied him or any man on earth to prove the assertion. Mr. Hunt then said, "you got inserted in all the papers the account of your having horsewhipped me, and that I had not the spirit to resent it." Mr. Dowling said, "Upon my honour the charge is incorrect." Mr. Hunt then added, "If you did not, some of your myrmidon colleagues did; and I shall find an opportunity to give you a good thrashing," following up this threat with an invitation to go into the street then, and fight it out. Mr. Dowling said that he might execute his threat then, but that he should feel himself degraded by resorting to anything which so contemptible a fellow either said or did, at least in the way he seemed to wish; and was then quitting the shop, when Mr. Hunt followed him to the door, and repeated his invitation to a boxing-match in the street. Mr. Dowling again declined the proposed exhibition, and Mr. Hunt struck him a slight blow on the face, which knocked off his spectacles. "D—n you," continued Mr. Hunt, "will you resent that?"—"Not in the way you would wish, Mr. Hunt," replied Mr. Dowling; and even if I were disposed so far to degrade myself, the infirmity of being short-sighted would prevent me from engaging in so unequal a contest. Mr. Dowling then walked away, but returned, and obtained Mr. Hunt's address, with a view to the present proceeding.—Mr. Lydon, who was in Mr. Clement's shop when the affray took place, corroborated the statement of Mr. Dowling.—Mr. Hunt, being called on for his defence, admitted that Mr. Dowling's account was in a great measure correct, although exaggerated. The cause of this conduct, imputed to him arose out of the business which had occurred in Covent-garden. Mr. Dowling had stated that he had horse-whipped him, and it had been so stated in every paper in the kingdom; whereas, Mr. Dowling had only given him one or two blows when his back was turned. He should, however, be able to meet the case at the proper tribunal, and should prove that Mr. Lee, the High Constable, was the person who gave Mr. Dowling notice of his approach.—Mr.

Dowling.—That is not true.—Mr. Hunt added, that the irritation of his mind, from what had happened at Covent-garden, had induced him to determine to give this bully an opportunity of finishing his horsewhipping, if he thought fit, but he had, in a cowardly manner, refused to fight.—Mr. Dowling.—You knew where I was to be found, and you also knew I was ready and anxious to meet you in the only way a gentleman ought to require.—Mr. Hunt.—What! meet a Government spy, who attempted to swear away the life of Dr. Watson!—Mr. Dowling repelled this attack, and Mr. Hunt left the office, after being bound over to the Sessions, using the most abusive language towards Mr. Dowling.—Mr. Hunt said he should not traverse.

MANSTON-HOUSE.

A complaint was made by a sailor against a showman respecting a monkey, which had been exhibited at Bartholomew fair, when the sailor, going to see it, recognized the animal as his property, which he had lost at Portsmouth some time ago; the showman refused to give it up, saying that his master had bought it fairly for a pound. The parties therefore attended before the Lord Mayor and brought the monkey with them. While in the office, it seized the keeper by the nose, and expressed other signs of aversion, but held out its paws to the sailor, and moaned dismally.—His Lordship thought the only way of deciding was to leave the matter to the animal itself. The monkey was therefore put upon the table, but it was nearly fatal to him, for a large dog which had been watching for some time, made a spring at him, and but for the sailor, would probably have decided the matter without giving his Lordship any further trouble.—The Lord Mayor marked the effect of this very important adventure upon the plaintiff and defendant, and was of opinion that as the greater concern was manifested upon the part of the sailor, he was the right master.—The monkey clung about the neck of the sailor, and licked him, patted his cheeks, and caressed him in the most affectionate manner.—The Lord Mayor suggested that the parties should issue commands to the monkey.—The showman put a piece of stick in the monkey's jaw, and ordered him to shoulder arms. Instead of complying with the order, the monkey struck the keeper on the head, and then threw it in his face. The sailor then called to him, "Jack, make a salaam to his Lordship." The monkey instantly stood erect on his hind legs, raised his paws to the top of his head, and made a low bow to the Lord Mayor in the Turkish style; he then hugged the sailor as before. The disputants left the office, the monkey about the neck of the sailor.

HATTON-GARDEN.

Two Irishwomen, named Conolly and Kelly, were committed on a charge of an outrageous assault upon a poor woman named McCarthy, whom they had treated so barbarously, that the child of which she was pregnant had been killed by their violence. The woman Conolly, it appeared, was jealous of her husband with a girl living in the same house with Mrs. McCarthy, and not being able to find the guilty person, with a somewhat Irish sense of justice, assaulted and half-killed an innocent one.

SHADWELL.

An elderly man, named James Malony, was charged with maliciously cutting John Black with a cutlass. The prisoner, in the first instance, had threatened to cut off his daughter's head, but Mr. Black interfering, he had transferred his murderous attempt to him.—He was committed.

UNION-HALL.

Tuesday a young woman of decent appearance was brought to this office, charged with the following robbery:—Mr. William Manning, shopman to Mr. Sartle, Blackman-street, Borough, boot and shoe-maker, observed the prisoner at the shop of a linen-draper, opposite Mr. Sartle's, attempting to steal some cotton, but she was not able to succeed. About half an hour afterwards he observed her come to the shop door of his employer; he got behind the desk, and was able to see her without her knowing it. He saw her take a knife out of her pocket, and cut the string which tied a pair of shoes to a number of others which hung at the door; she wrapped the shoes in her handkerchief and walked away with them; he followed and secured her.—The prisoner said that distress had caused her to commit the robbery; she declared it was her first offence; she begged that she might not be sent to a prison.—Being fully committed for trial, she was put into the lock-up room at the back of the office, where she attempted to hang herself. She was found by the keeper of the prison in a most deplorable situation; she had tied one of her garters round her neck very tight. A surgeon was sent for, who came immediately from the Dispensary and bled her, and used means to restore her. She soon recovered, and the knife and her handkerchief and garters were taken from her. She declared that she would never live to be tried for robbery; and when the keeper locked her up again, she tried to hang herself with a handkerchief which she had concealed under her clothes; she had tied one end round her neck and the other to the bars of the window, and was going to throw herself down, when the keeper entered the prison and untied the handkerchief. Her arms were pinioned, and she was taken to Horsemonger-lane Gaol.

On Friday, John Surridge was brought up on suspicion of being concerned in the attack on Thomas Cornell, the game-keeper of John Cater, Esq. Mr. Cornell attended, though in a very weak state, and swore to the identity of the prisoner, who however said that he could prove that he was at home at the time of the assault. He was released on giving bail for his appearance when required.

On Tuesday se'nnight an inquest was held at Burton-upon-Trent on the body of a child, about three years of age, whose death was occasioned by eating a quantity of the seeds of a plant called stramonium, or thorn-apple. The deceased and some other children had been amusing themselves with plucking off the fruit and tossing it to, or catching it, when one of the apples, which had been trod upon, discovered to the little infant the seeds it contained; she immediately put some in her mouth, and finding them rather sweet, ate a considerable quantity, in consequence of which she was taken ill in about a quarter of an hour after; and so rapid was the poison in its progress, that notwithstanding every exertion was used by the most eminent of the profession, it proved fatal in little more than eighteen hours.

An Inquisition was taken on Saturday se'nnight, in Newgate, on the body of William Day, alias Oliver, who cut his throat in the morning.—William Harvey said, he was a prisoner confined in Newgate for trial. On Friday afternoon W. Day, alias Oliver, the deceased, seemed very low in spirits, and some of the prisoners proceeded to talk to him. He had been committed for trial upon a charge of forgery on Tuesday afternoon. Witness succeeded in raising his spirits a little, by telling him he was in a similar situation, and with him "to hope." He saw no more of him until nearly 9 o'clock, when they were locked up together. It was proposed to watch him, as from expressions dropped, they feared he meant something not right. Witness went to bed at half-past ten, and again got up at two to relieve the others. A person named Manning then lay down, but the manner of the deceased induced him to stay awake. About half-past three in the morning witness heard a noise, as if the deceased was struggling in his bed, but upon going up and feeling, all appeared quiet. In a few minutes after the noise was repeated as though it proceeded from the throat. Witness, finding the noise increase, took his candle to examine, and perceived the blood upon the wall. He roused his companion Manning, and upon their turning the body round they discovered that his throat was cut. A razor was picked up in the bed close to the body. From the time of his commitment, the deceased has been much depressed; he wept continually, and seldom ate or drank.—It appeared from other evidence, that the deceased had been very wild in his behaviour since his commitment, and knives, &c. were in consequence kept out of his way. The razor was stolen from the box of Manning.—Verdict—Insanity.

An Inquisition was taken a few days ago at the Elephant and Castle, near St. Pancras workhouse, on the body of James King, a pauper.—Mr. Hilditch, assistant to Mr. Uppom, surgeon, of Little College-street, stated, that on Saturday morning, the 29th of August, the deceased was brought to the workhouse, about half-past 12, in the sedan chair. He examined him immediately, and found that he had an inflammation on the lungs—he respired with great difficulty. He ordered him to be put to bed; he had some tea given him, part of which he drank. About six o'clock the same evening he was called to attend the deceased, and on going to him, he saw that he was dying; he soon after expired, in his opinion of a mortification produced by an inflammation of the lungs and stomach.—The deceased was very weak when brought to the workhouse; he could not stand; in fact, he was in a dying state at that time.—John Pizzy, watchman, stated, that on Wednesday night, the 26th of August, he saw the deceased lying opposite to the house of Mr. Crew, plumber, in the New-road, about 150 yards from St. Pancras watch-house. He was unable to move himself, and he narrowly escaped a waggon passing over him. Witness, seeing him so unwell, got another man to assist him to carry the deceased to the watch-house. The deceased was very feeble; he could not stand upon his legs. He had been lying about the neighbourhood of the watch-house for several months; he did not think he had been in a bed for the last six months. At night he had been frequently taken to the watch-house, and turned out next morning. The deceased told him that he had been violently beaten by some persons as he lay near Mr. Crew's house. Mr. Crew requested witness to take him to the watch-house, or remove him from where he was, as he was a nuisance to his house.—George Squibb, watch-house keeper of St. Pancras, stated, that on Thursday night, the 26th of August, the deceased was brought by the last witness to the watch-house. He was immediately put in the common room, where the prisoners are put who are charged with offences. The deceased lay on his back on the boards. On the following morning witness wrote a note to Mr. Cater, the overseer, who was then in attendance at the Board, and immediately received his communication, informing him that the deceased was brought into the watch-house, and was in a very bad state, and required immediate removal. The deceased was turned out of the watch-house on Friday morning, but he was unable to go away, and he was put into the common room again. He received no answer from Mr. C., and, being compelled to go to the police-office, Marlborough-street, with prisoners, he locked the deceased in the watch-house, and no answer had arrived when he returned in the afternoon. He was informed that Mr. Cater had been, and said that "the man was an impostor." Witness having received his instructions from Mr. Cater, he was obliged to keep him in the watch-house all Friday night, and he grew worse. On Saturday, about 12 o'clock in the day, Mr. Cater sent the chair from the workhouse, and the deceased was then removed to the workhouse. Whilst he was in the watch-house, he had some beer and bread and butter, which he procured for him. He found that the deceased had some money in his pocket, and he purchased some beer for him with it. The deceased did not drink, he believed, any of it. The deceased had some other food, but he believed that he did not eat any of it. Mr. Hilditch, being re-examined, was not of opinion that the death of the deceased was caused by his being so long in the watch-house, but he might have lived a day or two longer had he been put to bed directly.—A great discussion took place respecting the verdict; several jurymen blamed Mr. Cater, the overseer, and wished to have his name inserted with reprobation; but it was at length agreed that it was better to prefer an indictment against him, and the following verdict was recorded:—"The deceased died of a mortification in his stomach, being improperly kept in the watch-house of St. Pancras."

An inquest was taken on Tuesday at Mile-end, on the body of Charles Grant, Esq. of Grove-road.—It appeared that on Sunday week, between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, the deceased was alarmed by the violent barking of a Newfoundland dog, which induced him to go into the garden, as various depredations had before been committed there. In order to walk with the greatest silence, he quitted the gravel walk and proceeded close to the garden-wall, where most unhappily, through forgetfulness, he trod on the wire of a spring-gun, which instantly went off, and lodged several bullets in his thigh; feeling himself wounded, he called out "Help, help;" his man-servant immediately came to his assistance, and with his support he reached the parlour. Mr. Grant laid himself upon a sofa, and directed that Mr. Harkness, his surgeon, should be sent for, who came and on viewing the wound, thought it expedient to send for Sir William Blizard. Within an hour Sir William arrived. Four balls were extracted, and the medical gentlemen left the deceased tranquil and free from fever. The appearances seemed favourable at first, but on Sunday it was discovered that mortification had taken place, and between twelve and one o'clock on Monday morning the deceased breathed his last.—The CORONER observed, that the mode of defending property by spring-guns had been considered by persons eminent in the law as highly exceptionable and illegal. In the present instance, however, any observations of this nature were rendered the less necessary, as the deceased had fallen the victim of his own unhappy precaution, and had been the only sufferer on the occasion. Verdict—Accidental Death.

An inquest was taken on Tuesday, at St. Thomas's Hospital, on the body of J. Dowden, of Lewisham.—It appeared from the evidence of several labourers, that on Wednesday last they had prepared to fall a mass of gravel by the usual method of undermining it. They and the deceased were about to go to the top for the purpose of forcing it down with iron crows. They were getting some water to carry up with them, and the deceased was standing with his back towards the fall, a few yards from it, when, without any previous warning, by the falling of stones or by the cracking of the gravel, it fell down upon the deceased, and entirely covered him. They dug him out as quick as possible, and conveyed him to the hospital; he appeared to be dead when he arrived. Verdict—Accidental Death.

An Inquisition was taken on Tuesday night, in Whitecross-street, Cripplegate, on the body of a female, who appeared to be about 30 years of age, who died in Cripplegate watchhouse, her name unknown.—Mr. Glossop, of Whitecross-street, stated, that on Monday morning, about four o'clock, he was awoke by the piercing cries and groans of the deceased; he got out of bed and opened his window, and saw the deceased sitting on the step of a door at the corner of Beach-street and Whitecross-street. He called to John Kelsey, a watchman of Beach-street, and told him to pay attention to the deceased. Kelsey told him not to be officious. The deceased continued uttering dreadful screams, and sat in a double posture, complaining of a violent pain in her bowels, and requested the watchman to give her some water. Kelsey told her to be off from there, and if she wanted water she might go to the pump for it, but she must go off his beat. The deceased replied, "I have lost the use of my limbs, and require assistance; pray give me water, for my throat is parched." Kelsey was going away when he called to him, and told him that he was acting very wrong, and begged that he would pay proper attention to her. By that time a man and woman came up, and he (witness) took some water from his room and carried it (in his night-clothes) to the deceased. Kelsey swore an oath and walked away, and never returned afterwards. The Whitecross-street watchman, named Mason, came up and rendered every assistance; he helped to carry the deceased to the watch-house, where she expired immediately upon her arrival.—Mr. Joseph Andrews stated, that Kelsey, the watchman, said to the deceased, with an oath, "You are able to walk if you like," and wanted to get her off his beat; and said, he wanted to have no trouble with her. He and the other persons had some difficulty in restraining the watchman's violence, and preventing him from assaulting the deceased by striking her with his staff, because she did not walk off his beat.—Mr. Longstaff, surgeon, No 2, New Basinghall-street, stated, that he was called to attend the deceased on Monday morning about four o'clock; upon his arrival at the watch-house the deceased was quite dead. He had since opened the body, and found that she died of a bowel complaint. There was no food in her stomach: she appeared to have been a person of superior class in society.—CORONER—I think the conduct of Kelsey ought to be represented to the Committee of the Watch: it was not only extremely negligent, but very inhuman. Verdict—Died by the visitation of God.—[Mr. Glossop, we need not say, has done himself honour by his conduct. He will have the pleasure too of reflecting, that an example of this kind tends to produce many others; and that many a suffering fellow-creature may owe their relief to his humane treatment of this single one.]—Exam.

On Thursday morning, about half-past eight o'clock, a middle-aged woman, apparently in great distress, was observed walking by the side of the river, near Battersea-bridge, and as her behaviour was such as to excite suspicion, she was watched. In a short time, thinking herself perfectly clear from observation, she threw herself in from the side of a barge. A gentleman immediately went in, and succeeded in getting her out before she had been in the water time enough to sink. The unfortunate creature was a native of Oxfordshire, and had come to town with hopes of getting employment, but failing in her expectations, and reduced nearly to starvation, she had determined on destroying herself.

Tuesday morning, a young man of respectable connections, named George Teasdale, son of Mr. T., clerk of Smithfield market, sitting at breakfast at the house of his brother, Mr. Joseph Teasdale, seized a knife from off the table, and cut his throat with it in a most horrible manner. He was conveyed immediately to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where he died.—An inquest was taken on Friday at the hospital on the body.—The brother of the deceased stated that for some days prior to the commission of the act, the deceased was, in his opinion, deranged in his mental faculties.—Verdict—Insanity.

Thursday morning a shocking accident occurred at Mr. J. Jones's, grinder and file-cutting-manufactory, in Castle-street, Saffron-hill. In one part of the manufactory, the business of flock-cutting is carried on by means of a powerful engine used for cutting the materials. A boy, named Sinclair, eleven years of age, whose business was to sweep away the cut flocks as they came out of the machine, without receiving orders, or having any occasion, crept in unperceived under the large rolling cutter, and unthinkingly, as it is supposed, lifted up his head, having on a tight leather cap, the teeth of the roller laid hold of him, and pulled him into the machine, by which his head was nearly ground to pieces.

A poor cobbler, named Gore, was found hanging in his stall on Thursday morning, in Lisle-street. His wife found him suspended at an early hour. He had been considered insane for some time, and was pitifully poor.

Wednesday morning, as a gig, containing two gentlemen, a lady and a child, was passing through Holborn, it came in contact with a butcher's cart, by which it was unfortunately overturned; the parties were thrown out and much injured, and the infant so hurt, that it died in a very short time.

Monday morning, Cornell, the gamekeeper of — Cater, Esq. of Bicknell, Kent, who had rendered himself very obnoxious to poachers, walking in his master's grounds, was attacked by two fellows, who were discovered by him committing depredations. He attempted to take them into custody, when they beat and kicked him in the most inhuman manner, left him on the ground apparently dead, and decamped. The gamekeeper was found by his fellow servants, and was immediately conveyed to his master's house.

A few nights since, a man who was sleeping in a garret at the Woolpacks in Trowbridge, dreamt that he was about to be seized by the Devil, when, getting out of bed, he climbed up to a high window, at which he got out, and was immediately precipitated upon the pavement in the street, and escaped with only a few slight bruises.

The Sine, Captain N. Doak, sailed from this port on Monday last, for Boston, having on board 34 passengers; and on Thursday night struck on the Platiers, on the Welsh coast, and in about an hour the vessel went down, and 13 of the passengers were drowned; the rest of them and the crew were saved by a pilot-boat which fortunately happened to be near at the moment. Not a single article either belonging to the ship or passengers was saved. Amongst the passengers saved is a boy about 14 years of age, who has lost both his parents by this distressing event. The crew and passengers saved were afterwards put on board the Mary and Sally, from Salem, and arrived here on Friday. About ten o'clock on the night previous the Sine ran down the brig Dash, when three of the crew were drowned; the others (two) were saved by the Sine, and were on board when that vessel was wrecked.—Liverpool paper.

INDIA.

As Lord MORTA, after the fashion of new Governors of India, and indeed of Governors new or old, has lately been treating us with his exploits against the native chiefs; and as a Correspondent, who signs his own name, and begs to be understood as responsible for the truth of what he utters, has commenced a series of articles in which he proposes to elucidate the general corruption of the Indian system, it will be as well to say a few words here upon that mysterious looking subject.

It is a subject indeed very little known in its details, and for one very obvious and sufficing reason, viz. because the English power in the East has all the talk to itself. We hear nothing in England but what it pleases. Not only have the Native Powers no means of informing us of the other sides of the question, but the Anglo-Indian press is avowedly in the lowest state of slavery, being by a special ordinance under the immediate controul of government, which is therefore editor, news, and opinion all in one. What with this circumstance, the distance of the country, and the great and more immediate interests now agitating all over Europe, the people in England seldom even think of India. They are occasionally favoured with accounts of unintelligible battles and somewhat more intelligible dethronements; but except as far as national self-love inclines them to rely on their countrymen's veracity, they can have no more actual dependence on these accounts than on those of any other set of men who exclusively tell their own story under suspicious circumstances. They therefore turn speedily away, partly in doubt, and partly called off by affairs at home; and India only presents itself occasionally to their minds, as a great distant place with strange beasts and trees in it, where Brahmins meditate and Mussulmen keep seraglios,—where white people in regimentals are always fighting for some cause or other with the dark natives in vests and turbans,—and from which sallow elderly gentlemen are every now and then coming away to enjoy the large fortunes which they have acquired,—which they cannot do for the bile.

But to those who at all reflect upon the nature of our situation, government, and conduct in India, the business has long been clear enough; and the pains taken to hide it are only so many additional evidences. It is so clear indeed, that we should be ashamed to mention it, did it not possess a common nature with the very circumstances in Europe that have lately occupied our attention, and were it not highly useful now and then to get out of the bustle and confusion of detail, and look a little upon general principles and conduct. The whole history of our proceedings in India is simply this. We originally got a footing there as traders; we encroached and encroached, and gradually quarrelled with the natives; and at last we acquired a dominion, which rendered them the inferior powers, and which will be content with nothing but reducing them altogether. That this is an usurpation is clear. A quarrel here and there may have been just; many quarrels have been the reverse; and all, in their first and remote cause, must have been so.

This is the whole secret of our Indian dominion; and it fully explains also a circumstance, the cause of which would still appear to be a secret to the wise heads in Downing-street;—we mean the obstinacy of our Indian neighbours the Chinese in refusing to let us get an inch further into their dominions. The Chinese have a lesson still nearer home, in our treatment of Java. If they continue to get translations of our books of travels (which is not impossible) they must be sometimes furnished with a third edification in the profundity of some of our literary travellers. The following is the cool and matter-of-course way in which Mr. BARNOW, apparently not an ill-natured man, speaks of the Javanese seat of empire. “It is still the residence of the Sultan, who has ceased to be an independent prince, having ceded his territory to the British government, and accepted a stipend in return.”—Journal of an Embassy to China, p. 22. It is to no purpose we flatter the Chinese to their faces, and think them fools behind their backs. They are a strange people certainly, especially if we are to give their visitors credit for comparative sagacity; which is not always indisputable. But unless, with a strange self-ignorance, those gentlemen rank among the intellectual qualities of nations a passion for being subjugated, they themselves must allow, internally, that the Chinese are very wise as far as concerns our endeavours to hug them closer. They know very well, that to give us a little more standing room among them, would only be to enable us to plant our foot firmer for a struggle; and in this respect, they do us the justice of thinking we should be too strong for them. They chuse to pay us the compliment at a distance. Never did their love of ceremony vindicate itself to more advantage.

But, it is argued, our empire in India is useful. We do not always respect the interests of the particular princes or people, but we respect the more desirable interests of humanity at large. We convert; we civilize; we put an end to barbarous customs; we prevent, for instance, the shocking practice of widows' burning themselves on the funeral piles of their husbands; we put down the ferocity of the Mussulmen conquerors who preceded us, &c. Be it so. Suppose then, for the sake of argument, that a nation superior to ourselves in point of knowledge, should come to our shores, and proceed to convert and civilize us in the same way.

“Oh,—but they could not do that!” exclaims some zealous, ministerial, orthodox, worldly, anti-catholic, anti-deistical, anti-atheistical, anti-gallican, war-vindicating, habeas-corpus-suspending, money-getting, court-hunting, care-worn or luxury-puffed, time-serving gentleman.

Oh; they could not? And why, pray, could they not?

"Because," (and here, to do him justice, the said gentleman looks a little strange) "because we — —we—are at the top of civilization.

Oh, you are! What, you think yourself perfect then?

No, by no means;—religion forbids that,—to say nothing of common modesty.

Well then, perfect but at the same time imperfect creature, (aside—Perfect ass, but imperfect man;—) this is just what the Chinese say themselves;—they are not perfect; the god Fo tells some of them the contrary, and CONFUCIUS the philosopher others; but then they think they are infinitely the betters of the fantastic, brutal, sneaking English, who come to them in the oddest-cut clothes in the world, without breeding, and for the sake of putting a little vagabond money in their pockets. But if your religion, my perfect-imperfect friend, forbids you to think so highly of yourself, what does it forbid when it says you must "not do evil that good may come?" Now the Indian conquerors avowedly do this.

Oh,—as to that,—we must not always interpret literally. Things must be taken, you know, as they are meant;—texts may be badly translated or misconstrued;—in those times of the world, — —in these times of the world — — I mean — —you see, — —they say — —we know — — Besides, even the best Christians are not perfect, and human nature is frail.

Good. But what then do you say to Bonaparte and his evil doings under the pretence that good might come?

Bonaparte! Oh,—I see to whom I am talking now, and so—and so — —

And so there is an end of the zealous, ministerial, orthodox, worldly, anti-catholic, anti-deistical, anti-atheistical, anti-gallican, war vindicating, habeas-corpus-suspending, money-getting, court-hunting, care-worn or luxury-puffed, time-and-text-serving gentleman.

We beg the reader's pardon; but this animal, whoever he is, would interrupt us. There he goes. Look at him. The Courier and Quarterly Review are sticking out of his pocket. The man there, to whom he takes his hat off, is the greatest rascal in England;—and now, we warrant, he will go and abuse somebody for being sincere and well-intentioned. Nay, nay; let him go.

It is impossible to get rid of this dilemma. Either our encroaching and conquering system in India, under the plea of bettering the natives, is a bad and unjustifiable one, and the writers who defend it are gross and impudent defenders of wrong; or the same proceedings on the part of BONAPARTE with regard to Spain and some other countries, where the Inquisition and slavery were to be rooted out, is good and justifiable, and the same writers are gross and hypocritical palterers with right. Nay, in either case, they are and must be hypocrites and time-servers.

We say no more on this part of the subject, though the most important of all. It is too obvious to want a comment. But we beg the reader to reflect upon it, for the sake of those systems which these very men feel it their interest to oppose with all their feebleness.

INDIAN ATROCITIES.

SIR,—The details with which I have promised to furnish you on the subject of my ten years' servitude in the northern peninsula of India, I hereby commence.

In 1799, at the age of 17, I was appointed a Cadet on the Bombay establishment with about seventy Cadets of the same season. Of these there are not above twenty on the establishment, who have survived the effects of a noxious climate, and the fatigues of that hateful service on which I was engaged. In 1800, I was appointed senior Ensign of the Bombay European regiment, then engaged in the Cotiote war, where in less than ten years that regiment lost not less than twenty-five Officers out of thirty, and eight hundred men out of the full complement of one thousand. In 1801, I was promoted to be Lieutenant, and transferred to the 2d battalion, 3d native regiment, engaged on the same service. The mortality was not less than in the former corps. Here I shall beg leave to describe the nature of the Cotiote war.—A more cruel and vindictive system of proscription was never practised by the most barbarous nation towards its foe, than that which was employed by the Bombay Government towards the Rajah of the Cotiote, hitherto the staunch ally, friend, and tributary, of the Company. Those facts, with which I became acquainted, have never been presented in any shape to the public eye. Indeed the bye-laws of the company would have made it almost treason in any of their servants to have exposed the secrets of the cruel system of extirpation, pursued towards this inoffending people, who from time immemorial had led a life of primitive and pastoral simplicity, attached to their sovereign by every motive of moral and religious obligation, to a degree of enthusiasm surpassing that of any other race of men, under a monarchical government, since the world began.

The Cotiote is that part of the Malabar coast which lies between the sea-shore, and the Bella Ghaut mountains, inland from Calicut, Tillichery, and Cairaone. It is for the most part covered with jungles or forests, interspersed with fruitful vallies, and in many places with impenetrable thickets, in which the ferocious tiger and other wild beasts entrench themselves in safety from the pursuit of man. It is about forty miles in breadth and sixty in length. Its produce—pepper, rice, and vegetables. Its population, now extinct, did not originally exceed 6000 men of the cast or tribe, called Nairs. This warlike people, determined to perish in the cause of their oppressed sovereign. And such was the dear bought victory obtained over them, that we lost in a contest which lasted ten years nearly as many men as our victims; till hunted down like beasts of prey, this race of brave men (who had been proclaimed rebels) were at length extirpated by fire and sword from the face of the earth. Nothing now remains of this people save the country which they inhabited, and that is become a barren and uncultivated desert. The Bullum Rajah is the sovereign of another nation, bordering upon the Cotiote, which was at nearly the same time devoted to proscription and hunted down in like manner under the late General Stevenson, of the Madras cavalry.

The Cotiote war was terminated by the late Colonel Montresore, of the 80th regiment, in 1804, when, as if to throw a veil over these transactions, the Malabar coast was transferred to the Madras Government, who now occupy it.

The Cotiote Rajah had previously assisted the Company in their war with Hyder Ally, and furnished 1000 armed men, who distinguished themselves under our banners, in expelling Hyder from the possession of Cannanore. Ungrateful as the treatment this high-minded prince and people afterwards experienced from their European neighbours, to whom they supplied the whole produce of their cultivation, the task of recording their sufferings in the heart-rending scenes of cold-blooded slaughter, which this picturesque country every where presented to our view, is nevertheless painful to me. It fell to my lot, with a detachment of Sepoys, to command at Pyche, the Rajah's capital, whence he had been expelled; not one of his subjects had remained behind, but they had taken up arms, and followed his desperate fortunes in the field. Thus was I enabled to detail those atrocities, at the relation of which Englishmen here at home must be horror-struck, and to which they can scarcely give credit: but the facts related defy contradiction, and can be attested by respectable persons, lately arrived in England, who were also engaged in that campaign.

This brave but fugitive Indian Prince was alternately attacking or retreating from the detachments in pursuit of him through the forests. Sometimes in one of these rencontres we have lost 800 men. His force being dispersed, he had taken refuge in some lone house, with not above 10 or 12 armed followers. These chose rather to be cut to pieces than surrender, and thus favoured his escape, fighting sword in hand till they fell to a man in defence of his person. This was at a time when a large reward and pardon were offered to his subjects if they would discover his retreat, in order to lead to his decapitation; otherwise no quarter was given. Their towns, houses, and fields of standing corn, were burnt down. On every rising ground and road-side, 20 or 30 bodies were seen hanging to a gibbet, and some promiscuously upon trees. The prisoners taken were either immediately so disposed of, or shot and bayoneted upon the spot; and such was the spirit of desperate resistance and despair manifested on the part of this unhappy people, that, unnatural as it may appear, they actually cut the throats of their own wives and children, in order to prevent their falling into our hands.

The Canute Nambier, and others of his nobles, having been taken prisoners, were ordered for execution. Captain J—, a brother officer and valuable friend of mine, now in England, was commanded to see that order enforced. That Gentleman, in a letter I received from him on the occasion, which does honour to the liberal sentiments of his mind, described this reluctant duty with horror and pity, though mixed with admiration at the heroic firmness of those noble Indians: They faithfully adhered to their Sovereign down to the awful moment of yielding up their lives in his cause. The offer held out to them by the British Government was, a free pardon and an ample reward, provided they would discover the Rajah's retreat. These terms were, even in their last moments, rejected with indignation. They voluntarily stretched out their hands to receive the rope, and putting it round their necks, were launched into another world, which to them afforded a nobler reward, and a brighter hope.*

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, SEPT. 11.—The review of the English troops is expected to take place immediately. The Duke of Wellington will then, about the 20th instant, set out for Aix-la-Chapelle, and remain there till the termination of the conferences. As soon as they are concluded, the departing review of the Allied Army will take place, and then every contingent will be put in route to return to their homes. The order of march is already designated, viz. the Prussian corps d'armée will march through the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, and the territory of Treves; the Russian cavalry, after passing the Rhine, will traverse Germany to proceed to Poland; the Russian infantry and artillery will embark at Dunkirk. The English troops will march successively to Calais and Boulogne, where they will embark; before their departure, they will sell their horses, and all that part of the train which has become useless to them. The Saxon corps will take the shortest road to the Rhine; the Danish and Hanoverian troops will pass through Belgium. At Sedan, the principal equipages of the Prussian corps are ordered to retrograde to the Rhine. At Cambray the officers of the English Royal Guards are disposing of their horses, and every thing in the cantonments announces the preparations for departure. The French Colonel of Engineers Baudran, and the Chef de Battalion Maurin, in concert with several English Officers of Engineers, are employed in inspecting the places occupied, in order to verify their state, previous to their being surrendered to the French Authorities.

We have received a letter from Versailles, dated the 9th instant, informing us that early on that morning the sentinels were alarmed by the discharge of a pistol; they proceeded towards the spot where the report was heard, and perceived a young man walking hastily; they advanced close to him, when he fired another pistol at his head, and instantly fell. The first pistol was charged so strong, that it burst, without doing the unfortunate man any injury; the second attempt proved fatal. One of the police authorities was sent for, to take cognizance of this tragical deed, when it was discovered that he was an Englishman, apparently about the age of twenty-two. There were found upon him thirty louis in gold, a portrait of a lady, some jewels, and several English letters, which indicate both his opulence and connexions. He died after lingering in extreme agony above an hour. This is the second suicide which has been committed in the Park of Versailles, in open day, in less than a month.

SEPT. 12.—We yesterday noticed the unhappy suicide committed in the park of Versailles. In the pockets of this young man were found nearly 600 francs in gold and silver, and a written note as follows:—"I am an Englishman by birth; I have lost my father and mother; I beg those who may find me to cause me to be interred, as I know no person at Versailles." His body was deposited at the Morgue. Some circumstances seem to indicate that his name is Fouralt.

An extraordinary crime was committed about the latter part of August at Chouilly, in the district of Epernay, by two children, one five years of age, and the other eight. They succeeded in getting into a house near their own residence, while the owners were absent, and having satisfied their appetite by eating of every thing they thought proper, they proceeded to torment an infant, eight months old, that was lying in a cradle. They first beat it with a crucifix, and then to stop its cries they filled its mouth with ashes, which they also stuffed into its eyes, and finished by thrusting the child under the grate, and covering its body with cinders. The Judge of Instruction at Epernay, immediately on learning the circumstance, repaired to the place, and caused the elder culprit to be placed in confinement.

SEPT. 13.—Yesterday his Serene Highness the Duke de Bourbon, being on a hunting party, a wild boar suddenly rushed from a thicket and passed between the legs of the horse on which the Prince was mounted. The animal took fright, and pranced about. The Duke, by considerable efforts, kept his seat for some time, but was at length dismounted, and experienced a violent fall. His Serene Highness was conveyed to Chantilly quite in a senseless state. On his arrival he was bled three times. Several bulletins were issued; the last, dated yesterday morning, at two o'clock, states, "that his Highness, having recovered himself a little, complained of having a violent head-ache." A large blister has been applied, and hopes were entertained that a little repose would operate a favourable change in his condition.

SEPT. 14.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Berri has been for eight days past confined to her apartments. Yesterday, at two o'clock in the morning, her Royal Highness experienced considerable pain. The pains of labour soon after came on, and at six o'clock she gave birth to a Prince, who only survived two hours. At half past three his Majesty went to the Palace de l'Elysee-Bourbon to see her Royal Highness. The following bulletin was issued:—"Her Royal Highness Madame the Duchess of Berri having advanced upwards of four months in a state of pregnancy, peculiar circumstances led to the necessity of her being bled in the arm, and the use of other remedies. Notwithstanding every precaution, a miscarriage took place this morning, at six o'clock, of a male child, which survived about two hours. The situation of her Royal Highness the Duchess de Berri is satisfactory."

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, SEPT. 8.—This morning a terrible assassination was committed, between nine and ten o'clock, in this city. A person, armed with a pistol which had a bayonet, got into the apartments of Mr. Cockerell, a very rich Englishman, who lives in the Montagne du Pari, and attempted to discharge his pistol at him; but, as it missed, he made use of his bayonet, and inflicted on his victim several dangerous if not mortal wounds. Having committed this crime, he escaped, leaving in Mr. Cockerell's room the pistol and his coat. The police are in pursuit of him: he is generally spoken of as having inhabited a lodging in a neighbouring house, and various causes are assigned for this dreadful assassination.

SEPT. 9.—The assassin of Mr. Cockerell has hitherto escaped all the exertions of the police. This individual (not a Belgian) was not induced to this crime by jealousy, as has been reported. Mr. Cockerell's situation is very alarming; for of the five wounds which he has received, two are supposed to be mortal. This Englishman enjoyed the public esteem, and the crime committed upon his person has excited in this city equal horror and indignation.

GERMANY.

AUGSBURG, SEPT. 4.—The robber who carried off the casket belonging to the Duchess of Parma has been taken into custody at Baden. It did not contain any jewels, as was at first reported, but there were papers, a pocket-book, 5,330 florins in Bank-bills, 5,352 florins in paper-money, 3,600 francs in French coin, 96 ducats, and 3 Austrian sovereigns in gold.

MANHEIM, SEPT. 6.—Some of the German papers announce that Colonel Massenbach, instead of insisting on a formal decision in the process instituted against him, had thrown himself on the clemency of the King, in consequence of hopes which were held out to him that he would be set at liberty, and that the King of Prussia would order him payment of the amount of his claims. This much, however, is certain, that M. Massenbach is still a prisoner in the fortress of Custrin, and that no public judgment has been pronounced against him.

NORTH AMERICA.

NEW YORK, AUG. 15.—It is understood, that as soon as the news of Gen. Jackson's conquest of Pensacola reached Washington, the President, who was much embarrassed, summoned his Cabinet Counsellors, when the following questions were propounded, and the answers given, which are annexed:—

First.—Whether Pensacola should be retained, viewing all the consequences that may flow from it at home and abroad?—Answer. No; it would be a declaration of war.

Second.—In the event of the captured Spanish ports being restored, should Gen. Jackson be put on his trial before a court-martial for breach of orders and unofficer-like conduct?—Answer. No; it will not appear that the General has violated the spirit of his orders, nor will his conduct be proved unofficer-like.

Third.—Shall the ports be restored, and the acts of Gen. Jackson be disavowed, at the same time justifying his motives?—Answer.—Yes; requiring of the Spaniards garrisons adequate to fulfil the requisitions of the treaty between Spain and the United States.

CARLISLE, PENNSYLVANIA, JULY 30.—On Thursday last a number of hands were at work (cutting grain) on a farm in Cumberland county. In the evening, when about finishing, a heavy cloud came up, accompanied with piercing flashes of lightning, and tremendous claps of thunder. The hands were so much appalled, that they knew not what they were about—some lost their cradles, others their rakes, all calling on God to have mercy on their souls. Two of the hands, James Murray and Mathias Venrich, were struck dead. Murray was struck on the forehead; his clothing was torn from his hat to his shoes. Venrich was struck on the back of his head; his clothing was torn off his back. Moses Kirkpatrick, jun. was knocked down, and Wm. Irvine had his elbow scarred with the same flash. Kirkpatrick and Irvine were about ten rods from the deceased. Rebecca Kirkpatrick, who was in the house, from ten to thirty rods distant, was cast on the floor. Murray has left a widow and two small children. Venrich was about 16 years of age.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

CHESTER, SEPT. 5.—Jacob Hinchcliffe, a dyer of Stockport, in this county, was indicted as implicated in the riots which took place in that town on the 15th, 16th, and 17th of July last. Mr. Gartside stated, that he employed near 300 spinners and weavers at his machinery in that town; and, in consequence of some of the persons in his employ refusing to work, he was under the necessity of sending to Burton-upon-Trent for others to supply their places, who were females, whom he lodged, on their arrival at Stockport, in his factory, going to which place they were beaten and loaded with mud by the populace, who also broke the windows of his factory, and threw stones at the magistrate, Mr. Harrison, when reading the riot act, by which a horse was knocked down. The mob attacked Mr. Gartside's carter, with a load of cotton, and beat him. The prisoner, Hinchcliffe, broke some of the windows of the factory, by throwing stones at the girls therein from Burton. Mr. Gartside had several stones thrown at himself, which struck him on the back, the stones being brought to the street by boys; and Hinchcliffe was particularly active in encouraging the singing of a song of a very inflammatory nature, accompanied by a blind fiddler, for whom he made a ring, in order that he might be surrounded by the populace, then infuriated. Mr. Gartside was compelled to withdraw those women to a house, in the neighbourhood, the window-shutters of which were afterwards pulled down, and entry into the house in part made through the windows; but further depredations were prevented by the arrival of a troop of yeomanry cavalry. At this time girls were getting from 12s. to 15s. a week, that is, those from 12 to 14 years old—the looms are worked by steam. The wages may vary as to stoppages. The weavers would have 1s. a cut more, which is half as much again as the wages they had. He gave them 2s. a cut, and they wanted 3s. He had six young men working at the looms, but it is not a man's work. Many men at three looms will get 27s. a week.

Other witnesses were called to prove that Hinchcliffe was active in the riots.

On behalf of the prisoner, Mr. Gartside was examined to show that he was a good steady workman, and worked every day during the riots, though more absent than usual at that time. He was found Guilty, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment and fined 1s.

Jas. Baker, indicted for the same offence, Guilty. Sentence—one year's imprisonment, and 1s. fine.

Johnson, Baguley, and Drummond, were called upon to plead to two indictments; the one jointly, the other individually. Johnson and Baguley seemed inclined to be tried immediately, but as Drummond demurred, and the joint indictment must necessarily be traversed, they finally traversed them both. The bail required from these defendants was respectively 500*l.*, and two sureties, each 200*l.* They were of course remanded until the bail could be procured.

Carnarvon Sessions commenced on Sept. 4.—J. Jones, a drover, was tried for uttering forged notes, and notwithstanding 31 witnesses established the charge, and Mr. Glover, Inspector to the Bank of England, traced 39 notes to have been paid by the prisoner to different individuals in purchasing cattle, the Jury returned a verdict of—Not Guilty. Next day the same prisoner was indicted for having forged notes in his possession, and the Jury again returned a verdict of—Not Guilty.—Chief Baron RICHARDS:—"Prisoner, you have been tried for a very great offence, but the Jury, both yesterday and to-day, thought proper to bring in a verdict of—Not Guilty! Such a verdict, after such a mass of evidence, must be extremely prejudicial to the public interest; and, for my own part, I cannot conceive how they can answer it to their own consciences! That you are guilty is as clear as that two and two make four. However, if your conduct in future prove honest, it may be considered a fortunate circumstance; but should you ever appear again at that bar, I hope you will never meet a Jury so unjust."

Ann Staden, wife of Edward Staden, a labourer, in the employ of Messrs. Saunders, brewers, in a fit of insanity, strangled her only two children (both fine boys), one seven years of age, and the other three; after which she hung herself on the cellar door. An inquest was held on the following day by Mr. Corfe, Coroner, on the above bodies, when it was clearly proved that the unhappy woman was frequently in a very desponding way.—Verdict—Insanity.—Edward Staden, the husband, on opening the front door of his house, was the first to discover his eldest child, Edward, of whom he was very fond, lying a lifeless corpse on the floor of the passage. Assistance was procured, and the body was taken up stairs, when, on Staden's turning down the bed-clothes, he saw there his youngest child stretched out dead. Then, as a climax to the whole, his wife hanging in the cellar!—Southampton paper.

On Sunday evening last, Mr. George Harrison, of Holt, in the county of Denbigh, accompanied three friends from Wrexham to the Red Lion. He remained with them till near 9 o'clock, and, as the night was very dark, his wife, who was at the house of a neighbour, went out to fetch him home. When they arrived near the croft adjoining the Rev. Mr. Weighton's house, Mrs. Harrison (being a yard or two in advance) heard a rustling among the leaves, and turning her head towards the spot, a gun was instantly discharged about 6 yards from them, and Mr. Harrison fell. Mrs. Harrison distinctly saw the face of a man, who appeared anxious to ascertain whether he had fully finished his bloody purpose: he then fled across the field. Her screams soon brought some neighbours to her relief; and Mr. Harrison was carried into the house, and a surgeon sent for; but before he could arrive, the unfortunate man had breathed his last. On the following day, several of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood assembled, for the purpose of adopting measures for apprehending the assassin; and in consequence of some information then obtained, a man named George Thomas, (jun.) was apprehended on suspicion. A gun in his possession was examined by Col. Dod, which had recently been used. Thomas said it had not been fired since Saturday morning, at a partridge; but it was the opinion of several persons present, that it had been discharged since that time. A shot bag, also his property, was examined, and was found to contain shots similar to those extracted from the head of the deceased: he was very violent on being taken into custody. On Monday, a Coroner's Inquest sat on view of the body, and several witnesses were examined, but what took place we shall at present withhold. It adjourned at a late hour till Tuesday next, at 10 o'clock in the morning. Thomas has been discharged. Thus rests this mysterious case at present. The murder has excited great alarm in Holt, and Farndon. The deceased was a very honest man; and on Wednesday, at noon, his remains were interred in Farndon Church-yard, followed to the grave by a great number of people.—Chester paper.

There are some nice lines in the poem on Music; but it is too long for insertion in a weekly paper.

Can any of our readers inform us, whether a very humorous manuscript now before us, entitled A Lesson in Biography, and written in ridicule of BOSWELL, is at all familiar with the public as a printed work?

We cannot insert the communication of "A Vestryman of Paddington," unless he sends us his name, as a security for the truth of his assertions.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 20.

The news from Paris looks a little more important than of late. It is now stated as certain that the Allied troops are about to retire from France. Their routes are even designated.—The Duke de BERRY's consort has again disappointed the hopes of his family by an infant which lived but two hours. The regret was naturally doubled by its being a male. Another branch of the family has also been threatened with extinction in the person of the Prince de CONDE, who in hunting a wild boar near Chantilly was thrown from his frightened horse, upon which the desperate animal had turned. The bulletins announce his partial recovery, but his head had evidently been much hurt and stupified.—These casualties must be very distressing to the BOURBONS; and though no friends to that family or their pretended exclusive right to the throne, we cannot but sympathize with them on the feelings which must come home to them on such occasions. The Duke de BOURBON has no children;—the Duke and Duchess d'ANGOULEME, we believe, never had any;—the King is too old to marry;—and the Duke de BERRY's succession does not seem very promising. There are the Spanish BOURBONS, it is true; but they have nothing in common now with the family affections; and though the Queen's pregnancy is watched with an officiousness more legitimate than delicate, and is announced as being in its fifth month, the same casualties may happen. To say the truth, these exclusive intermarriages (and the BOURBONS carry them to a pitch little complimentary to their Russian and German restorers) are very likely at last to defeat their own object. They are very prejudicial to any animal race; and when carried to this obstinate pitch, first deteriorate and may ultimately extinguish it. The breed in every respect becomes mulish. These may be unpleasant truths, and coarse minds may coarsely accuse them; but any body with the least knowledge of natural history will bear them testimony, and it is very useful to know them. Princes condescend to recognise a common nature with the rest of their species in many things. It would be well for them if they found it out in this. To inform them of it is at any rate no proof of taking even a negative advantage of their ignorance; and we do not know whether, in our dislike of certain legitimate proceedings, we ought not to have held our tongues. But there is a greater want of sincerity in the world, even than of good Princes.

The Courier of Friday last has the following paragraph:—"We have never ceased to urge the pernicious consequences that must infallibly attend the present licentiousness of the public press. To its honest, legitimate, and powerful functions we are steady friends; nay, we could sometimes become apologists for its transitory excesses, but we are the determined adversaries of that crusade which is now waging against all order, against morals, religion, loyalty, and rank, of whatever kind, or however distinguished. We may continue to disregard the voice of reason, and the language of experience; but assuredly a day will come, when mischiefs of the most desolating kind will flow from this corrupt and pestiferous source."

It then proceeds to allude to Mr. COBBETT as one of this class of writers, leaving the reader of course to rank with it all, who differ with the said delicious Courier. The Courier professes to be "a steady friend to the honest, legitimate, and powerful functions of the press;"—yes, that is to say, to such dishonest functions as those of its brother hirelings, and their substitution of rage for power in behalf of all the illegitimate nonsense that is called legitimate.

"Nay, it would sometimes become an apologist for its transitory excesses:"—Yes, for all such excesses as those just alluded to, and for that fit of transitory excess in particular, in which the Courier called the Princes "Great Babies fit only to fill up ball-rooms." But it is "the determined adversary of that crusade which is now waging against morals, religion, loyalty, and rank of whatever kind and however distinguished." Ah, ha! Yes, of that counter-crusade which is waging against the crusade commenced by the faithless and foolish people who at present have their day;—that counter-crusade against morals made up of insincerity and selfishness; against religion made up of a bad opinion both of God and his creatures; against loyalty made up of a violation of all the elemental laws of society, general, particular, and constitutional;—against rank made up of mere exclusive pretension, and claiming rights for itself superior to those of all knowledge, liberty, and common justice.—The Courier cannot answer; and it will discover some day that it is no longer of any real use to inveigh. The meaning of this occasional piece of angry nonsense which such publications put forth, is simply this;—"Our masters govern badly and irritate the people;—we, their hirelings, write as badly, and yet are laughed at or dispised;—pray masters, put them down by main force."

Caliban. Lo, how he mocks me!—Wilt thou let him, my lord!

A Gentleman, recently returned from a tour in France and Germany, informs us that the mercantile and agricultural part of the population of Prussia and Saxony is extremely discontented. In the former, all classes, with the exception of a few noble families, are unanimous in their wish for a representative Constitution. Copies of the Proclamation of Kalitsch, and of the King's answer, to the Deputation of the States at Vienna, are met with in every house. Even the magnanimous ALEXANDER, about whose liberality we hear so much, immediately dispatched two of the Deputies of the Polish Diet, who had ventured to move for an inquiry into some Departments of the Administration, to Tobolsk, in order that they might enjoy the "free air of Siberia."—Scotsman.

Wednesday morning, at an early hour, Lord COCHRANE's steam-boat left the dock-yard at Rotherhithe, and dropped down the river; she has a regular complement of officers and men, the whole of which are under the command of a First Lieutenant, who it is said will, on their arrival at Chili, serve under the immediate orders of Lord COCHRANE.—(Courier).—This announcement is contradicted by Saturday's Chronicle. It is said that the steam-works are incomplete, and that they are not capable of causing the necessary action. A Correspondent in the Courier of Friday evening suggests the probability of this vessel, which he then supposed to have sailed, being intended to carry off NAPOLEON from St. Helena. He says it is particularly adapted for such an enterprise, as it could beat up to the rocky side of the island, which is watched by only two cutters, and having effected the desired object, might sail to windward, and by that means set at nought the pursuit of all other vessels. The writer thinks it not unlikely that JOSEPH BONAPARTE's expedition might act in concert with Lord COCHRANE.

A good-natured friend of Sir HUDSON LOWE, on learning that his Excellency had been attacked with a complaint in his bowels, at St. Helena, said, he was glad to hear it, as he did not think him susceptible of feeling in that quarter.

COMBINATION FOR ADVANCE OF WAGES.—Monday morning the whole of the excavators employed in forming the new Canal from the Regent's Park to Limehouse, refused to proceed to work unless they received an advance in their wages. Their employers resisted the demand, and an immense number were arranged along the banks of the canal at the hour of commencing business, but refused to touch either shovel or pick-axe, unless their demand was complied with.

By letters received in town on Wednesday morning, it is stated, that the weavers of Chorley have all struck for an advance of wages. From Preston we also learn, that large numbers of the same class of workmen still continue to hold out, and that parties of them were parading the streets. Deputies from their body had been sent into the adjoining towns and villages, to induce others to follow their example.

The accounts from Manchester describe that town as by no means yet restored to a state of perfect tranquillity. As was to be expected, those whom necessity compelled to resume their labour are extremely sullen and discontented. In those factories, again, in which an increase of wages has been conceded to the men, it seems they are perfectly contented, though the rise is not to the amount originally required. We have no doubt, that had such a compromise been at first proposed, it would have been joyfully accepted. Things, we believe, would sooner have been settled, had it not been for the mischievous interference of slavish journals. The masters were told, that their cause was the cause of the country; that the prosperity of its manufactures depended on their resistance; and that, if they yielded one jot, they would be ruined. This language was repeated from so many quarters, and in places, too, where one would hardly have expected to hear it, that it was no wonder the masters began to view themselves in the light of martyrs. If both parties had been left to themselves, their interests would have soon taught them how to act.—Chronicle.

Letters from Preston of the 16th state, that some of the weavers there had again struck, whilst others continued their labour, whereupon, the former visited the latter at their houses, and marking the work which they had in hand, gave them notice, that if they wove beyond that mark, they, the turn-outs, would come and destroy the whole. It is said, that their present rate of wages produces, with great industry, only nine shillings weekly, and that they ask no more than twelve.

The following has been communicated to us as an extract from a private letter received this morning from Manchester, dated the 17th inst.:—"We learn, that at a place called Burnley, a distance of 18 miles from Manchester, and in one of the large manufacturing districts, a very serious disturbance had that morning broke out; that the rioters had committed various acts of depredation, had pulled down the House of Correction, and that the military were called out from Manchester in order to quell the riot."—Courier—Saturday.

Within the last twelve months, at least 100 persons, chiefly consisting of farmers, their sons, and others, employed in agriculture, have left their residences in the neighbourhood of Abergavenny, and embarked for America.

On Thursday morning the deaf and dumb brother and eldest son of Orator HUNT went on board a vessel in the river, bound for New Orleans: their final destination is, we understand, to Shawnee Town, in the Illinois, near the residence of MORRIS BIRKBECK, Esq. where they have purchased a considerable tract of land, for the purpose of commencing agricultural pursuits, and have carried with them a large quantity of necessary husbandry implements: whether the Orator is to follow them or no, we have not learnt.—Courier.

CLAREMONT.—We have received a letter from W. PHILLIPS, House Steward to Prince LEOPOLD, respecting the complaint of extortion at Claremont, sent us by a person calling himself "A Resident at Esber." Mr. PHILLIPS requests that the writer of that letter will either call upon him, or explain himself more fully by letter, in order that he may "have the opportunity of attaching the blame to the proper person, and of preventing such misconduct in future;" and also to "exonerate the many unoffending persons who suffer unjustly from the present unqualified nature of the accusation."

On Wednesday a true bill was found by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, against the Rev. W. F. PLATT, P. RENVOISE, S. T. STRUTWANT, J. B. MUVIN, Stephen WITHERDEN, W. BRAGG, J. G. GREENWOOD, and S. ACRES, the younger, all of the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, for a conspiracy to defraud the poor-rate funds of that parish, in passing the accounts of Mr. MERCERON, who, it will be recollected, was convicted a short time since for a fraud on the parish, and thereby enabling that gentleman to pocket upwards of 900*l.* out of the poor rates, for his own private purpose in paying his Solicitor's bills, for defending certain prosecutions which had been instituted against him.

The following memoir on the subject of the fascinating power of serpents, by Major Alexander Garden, of South Carolina, was read at a meeting of the New York Historical Society, in September last:—"He attributed the phenomenon to an effluvium which the serpent voluntarily exhales at those times when it feels the desire of food, and the effluvium is of so deleterious a nature as to cause convulsions in the smaller and more sensitive animals, such as birds, mice, &c. He mentioned several instances in which men had been powerfully affected by this effluvium. He had been informed by the late Colonel Thompson, of Belleville, that whilst riding over his estate, he came suddenly upon a snake of enormous size, at which, the moment he could sufficiently collect himself, he fired. He killed the reptile, but was at the same instant assailed by an overpowering vapour, which so bewildered him that he could scarcely guide his horse home—that a deadly sickness at the stomach ensued, and a puking more violent than he had ever experienced from an emetic. He had been told by a lady, that the overseer of one of her plantations being missed, was sought for by his family, and found in a state of insensibility. On recovering, he stated that he was watching for a deer, when he heard the rattle of a snake, and that before he could remove from the threatened danger, he perceived a sickening effluvium, which deprived him instantly of sense. From John LLOYD, Esq. he had learned another case:—A negro working in his field was seen suddenly to fall, uttering a shriek; on approaching him, it was found that he had struck off the head of a very large rattlesnake, the body of which was still writhing. On recovering, he said that he had shrieked with horror on discovering the snake, and at the same instant had been overpowered by a smell that took away all his senses. Mr. Nathaniel Barnwell, of Beaufort, had a negro, who could, from the acuteness of his smell, at all times discover the rattle-snake, within a distance of 200 feet, when in the exercise of his fascinating power, and when traced by this sense, some object of prey was always found suffering from this influence. To these facts Major Garden added some anecdotes collected from Valliant's travels and other sources, corroborating his theory. When gorged with food the serpent is supine. It is only when under the stimulus of hunger that he exerts this fascinating faculty. The cases mentioned by Mr. Pintard, at the last meeting of the society, are among the many evidences of the existence of the power in the serpent to influence birds to approach it, maugre their dread; and the circumstances related by him do not militate with the hypothesis of Major Garden."—Carolina Observer.

To-morrow, being St. Matthew's day, according to annual custom, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and Governors of the several Royal Hospitals, will attend divine service at Christ Church. After a sermon by the Rev. JOHN ROGERS PITMAN, A.M. they will proceed to the Great Hall at Christ's Hospital, where two Orations will be delivered—in Latin, by FREDERICK ILIFF—in English, by GEORGE BROOKES, the two senior scholars of the Grammar School.

Mr. BRAHAM, the actor, arrived at Manchester on Sunday evening, on a visit to the friends of his wife, (formerly a Miss BOLTON, the daughter of a dancing-master, of that town). He came in a coach and four, with two outriders, and servants in superb liveries. This arrival gave rise to a ludicrous mistake,—a report being immediately spread, that it was the Grand Duke MICHAEL, of Russia, and his retinue, who had come to honour the town with a visit, to inspect its manufactories, &c.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

THE QUEEN.—Notwithstanding the apparent sameness in the official bulletins, we have every reason to believe, that the excessive debility to which her MAJESTY has been reduced is now almost daily increasing; and although some palliation of the more violent symptoms is occasionally produced by the application of anodynes, and her strength be, in some degree, supported by cordial medicines, yet from the pain she suffers, on the slightest motion, there is, we apprehend, but little doubt but her malady (which latterly has manifested hydrops, in all its varieties) proceeds from an unusual state of the viscera; and this, at her MAJESTY's advanced age, precludes, we fear, entirely, all hope of her restoration. A crisis, therefore, and that at no very distant date, is certainly to be apprehended.—Nevertheless, by the skill of her physicians, by incessant care, and by the extraordinary means which have been resorted to, the event may possibly be procrastinated for some time, should there be no recurrence of spasm. Yet the situation of Kew is materially against this possibility; and it is to be regretted, that her MAJESTY took up her residence there in the first instance, or that she has not been earlier removed. Damp and marshy situations are, in many constitutions, sufficient of themselves to produce hydrops; and a warm dry air is almost indispensable for its cure, even in youthful cases; but the house in which her MAJESTY resides is situated on the low grounds; within a hundred yards of the Thames; and, during fourteen hours out of twenty-four, is enveloped in the autumnal exhalations of the river: to increase the evil too; the very chamber in which she is confined is at the back of the house, and its windows, with only the intervention of a single row of elms, open directly upon the water.—Courier—Wednesday.

Soon after the Princesses and Sir H. HALFORD had retired to rest on Wednesday night, her MAJESTY became very restless. She appeared to suffer great pain, accompanied by an alarming difficulty of respiration. Sir H. HALFORD was immediately called, and fresh medicines were administered, but with very little effect, and her MAJESTY passed the night without sleep. In the morning of Thursday, the Princesses rose early, and visited their afflicted parent; and Sir F. MILLMAN arriving from Pinner about eight o'clock, he and Sir H. HALFORD had an immediate conference. Her MAJESTY continued in the same state throughout the whole of the day, with little or no variation, and took scarcely any refreshment.

The following is the official bulletin of Friday:—

The QUEEN has had a very bad night, and her MAJESTY continues very much indisposed this morning.

Throughout the whole of Thursday night her MAJESTY suffered much from spasmodic affections of the stomach and viscera, which, though not quite so violent as they have been at some former periods of her illness, yet, from her increased debility, distressed her exceedingly, and she passed another restless and very painful night. The Princesses did not retire to rest till after midnight, and the Physicians were up the whole of the night alternately. At nine o'clock in the morning, the Bulletin which we published yesterday was exhibited in the hall, and dispatched by expresses to all the other members of the Royal Family, and to the principal Cabinet Ministers who are in town.—Up to a late hour last night, her MAJESTY remained in the same alarming state, and was so much reduced, by the repeated attacks she had undergone; as to be at times, we understand, almost unconscious of what was passing around her.—Courier, Saturday.

Saturday's bulletin:—

The QUEEN had some good sleep in the latter part of the night, but her Majesty is still much indisposed.

It is confidently mentioned, that her MAJESTY is not possessed of the immense property the public give her credit for; on the contrary, it is said that her personal property almost altogether consists of Jewels. Their MAJESTIES, it is supposed, are the only instance in the United Kingdom, of a man and his wife having been married above fifty-six years, with twelve children living, the youngest of whom is forty years of age.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

The British Government is essentially of the same description as those of the Continental States; it is a Government by a privileged class, only the aristocracy is better organized; more enlightened, more liberal, and, resting on a broader basis, has more sympathy with the public at large. Democracy is recognised as a principle in the Constitution, but assuredly it does not exist in any great quantity in the House of Commons, in which, as Mr. Fox observed, the voice of the people can neither put in nor keep out more than three or four Members. Even Mr. Canning admits, in one of his speeches, that the House of Commons was not meant to be the creature of the people, but, what he calls, the guardian of their interests. A Legislature thus constituted, is not, properly speaking, an organ for expressing the sense of the nation; but an organ for influencing public opinion by the authority of its deliberations, and for moulding it to the views and purposes of the Executive. The true democracy here lies in the influence of the press and of public meetings; and these operate upon the Government exactly as they do in other countries, but with rather more steadiness and effect. Nothing of consequence is yielded to the voice of the people, but from the remote dread of resistance or convulsion. The Government in all matters of importance is guided by the views and interests of the Crown and the Aristocracy. Even many of those privileges which the people hold under the letter of the law are rendered a nullity, by the overwhelming weight of aristocratic and treasury influence. We need not be surprised, therefore, that the British Government made a common cause with the old Governments of the Continent, and outdid them all in its efforts to put down democratic principles. Nor need we wonder that all the institutions of arbitrary power, and all the mummeries and delusions of the dark ages, are reviving on the Continent under British auspices. The only matter of surprise is, that our Rulers should ever have been able to persuade the people that the cause of the Continental Despots was their own.

The Government of the United States is totally distinct in its character from those we have been describing. There is in it no balancing of antagonist principles; no clashing of interests; the opinion of the majority of the population, fairly collected, is the operative principle of the government—not a check upon the motions of the executive; and the executive, so far from forming a separate power, pursuing its own interests, resisting, acting upon, and modifying public opinion, is itself a part of the organization by which the sense of the nation is expressed. As there is neither a privileged class, the sole depositaries of power and patronage on the one hand, nor a degraded and excluded class on the other, those jealousies which exist elsewhere are done away, and with them that load of precautionary measures which have filled the old governments of Europe with abuses, and perverted every institution designed for the benefit of society, into an instrument for enslaving it. The government of the United States does not feel that its security depends on curbing the progress of the human mind, on fettering the press, on religious tests, on the preference of a particular sect. It neither dreads knowledge in the heads of the people, nor arms in their hands. New states are added, and alterations made in the representation from time to time, without any apprehension of shaking the stability of the government. America, blessed with a short genealogy, has not yet learned to set up the wisdom of her ancestors as a cover for every abuse and absurdity.—Scotsman.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 337.

COVENT-GARDEN.

MR. FARREN, for his second character to appear in, chose the part of Lord Ogleby in the Ulandestine Marriage, and performed it on Friday evening. We wish he would choose something less identified with former actors. Lord Ogleby, like Sir Peter Teazle, has been celebrated for the excellent hands, or rather bodies, he has gone through. He has had his old courtly shadow embodied by the first comedians of their time,—his hair perked up, his voice treble-piped, his knees tottered, his manner fastidiously regulated, his living anatomy robe-de-chambered. An actor may possibly surpass the hereditary excellences which his brethren have handed down in such characters; but he must be a great one indeed; and though Mr. FARREN shews a promising relish of a joke, and contrives to have another twinge or so of the lumbago, his performance upon the whole is not better than we have seen before. Indeed, in one great respect it is not so good; we mean, in the patrician polish for which Lord Ogleby is so famous. He judiciously made his voice much feebler than in Sir Peter; but what we feared on the other score in that character, he has realized beyond a doubt in this. He wants a higher breeding,—a delicate self-possession. His Lordship was upon the whole better represented by the late Mr. LOVEGROVE. There was a natural softness in that actor's portrait of him, a faint termination of his words, and a delicate putting forth of a white hand, which we fear are not within the more rigid grasp of Mr. FARREN's natural powers. If he must act old gentlemen, we should like to see him in something less common to the stage; but performers are apt to be rather more out in their self-knowledge than most artists; and we suspect that Mr. FARREN's talent lies hidden in a much less old and superfine napkin.

We expected to see Mrs. YATES on Monday night in Lady Macbeth; but the character was changed to that of Elvira in the quack piece of Pizarro,—a production every way unworthy of SHERIDAN. She is to play to-morrow as Constance in King John, when we shall be happy to pay her our respects.

DRURY-LANE.

We are very sorry we cannot compliment on their success either the gentleman or lady who have appeared here as Romeo and Juliet. They may become useful to the stage from their knowledge of it, and may be intelligent persons in other respects. It would be difficult for one of the KEMBLE family to be otherwise. But as Romeo and Juliet, they seemed to be reading their parts rather than playing them,—and reading them too in a common-place manner. We are heartily anxious for the resuscitation of classical old Drury; but this is not the fire to put into its veins; and we should be doing it an injury to say it was. Nothing can be more erroneous than the notion that a regular system of praise or paltering can raise up what is manifestly faulty. It can no more do it, than a regular system of paltering and dispraise can put down what is manifestly good. It may delay ruin, but it shall only bring down the edifice with more haste in the end. The resentment of those who were deceived in the first instance, will join to demolish it.

The new performers in Othello on Wednesday night were better. We are afraid it is no good symptom in actors when they come out in parts that help to disguise them, especially their faces. Thus there is no saying how the new performer in the Moor looked and managed his countenance. The expression is absorbed in the black colour.

The jaws of darkness do devour it up.

We suspect that his looks are not remarkable for strength and variety; for he was very feeble in the passages which require no very obvious action,—which suggest nothing that compels the actor to be excited. Nay, even in the last scene where Othello kills his wife, and afterwards gives himself up to a torrent of passion and remorse, he took the precipitation very easily, and came down, as it were, like a staid gentleman in a round-about. But he obtained some deserved applause in the chief scene with Iago, especially in the alterations of emphasis on the question "What dost thou mean?" and afterwards in that noble soliloquy "Farewell, the tranquil mind," which has the effect of a lonely picture of sunset, with a plumed army far off in the distance.—This gentleman seems to understand and relish his author, though not equal to the performance of such parts of him. He will make, we doubt not, what is called a very useful and respectable actor.

The lady, we think, is a pitch higher as a performer. She is a Mrs. West from the Bath theatre,—a place which contends with Dublin in sending us good actors. She is slender though not thin, handsome, fair, and lady-like. She was very happy in some passages of the play, particularly those where she asked pardon for Cassio; and in her sudden rising up from a stupor and throwing herself upon Emilia's neck, crying out "I am innocent." But we think that after Othello's rude rebuffs, she ought to have let a more tremulous and doubtful spirit be seen through her returning caresses and apparent confidence. Indeed we were surprised throughout her performance with a sort of strange alternation of feeling and indifference, as if she placed her whole account with the audience in none but particularly striking passages. Something like this is a common fault on the stage; but it is a very injurious one; for the contrast is made too strong, to say nothing of the unnatural cast given to the tone of the character represented. A warm-hearted and romantic character like Desdemona will contrive to appear so throughout, even in her quietest moments. A great actor, like a great painter, poet, and musician, harmonizes every thing; even his contrasts. He does not shew off mere light with mere darkness, or follow up the roll of an organ with a whistle.—We augur upon the whole very well of Mrs. West, and expect to see her make a figure in the pleasanter part of sentimental plays,—that is to say, in any thing which requires a mixture of pleasant and serious without amounting to actual tragedy.

Mrs. GLOVER was very complete indeed in Emilia.—attentive, zealous, affectionate, and vehement without being over loud.

Whenever one of SHAKESPEARE's plays is performed, we are always tempted to cry out, "What a divine play is this!" It is worthy of remark, that Iago, who is the greatest rascal perhaps that SHAKESPEARE ever drew, is made up of a compound of envy, tale-bearing, and a bad opinion of his species. And yet observe this wisest of poets and of men:—he will not leave his fellow-creature without something like redemption;—for even Iago thinks he has been wronged.

The following Address was delivered on Saturday week on the close of the Haymarket Theatre:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I have now the honour of addressing you to offer the acknowledgments of the Proprietors of this Theatre on the close of their season; and you may recollect that they assured you it should be "a short life and a merry one."—The first part of this promise they gave with the utmost confidence, being morally certain that their old friends, and guarantees of Covent-garden, or of Drury-lane, (if not of both), would be anxious to redeem this house's pledge of brevity before it was in any danger of being forfeited.—As to the second part of their obligation—that of producing mirth—you have exonerated them. If they have not furnished mirth themselves you certainly have brought it with you; for (bating those representations, or parts of representation, when we courted your graver attention) never was a merrier set of kind souls than our audiences of this summer. In short,—for every thing at present must be short here,—the Proprietors seem to have accomplished their ends of affording you satisfaction, even from one end of the season to the other; but how (if this system of curtailment should proceed) they are to make both ends meet, is a matter of too serious consideration to obtrude upon your minds at this moment.—They depote me, Ladies and Gentlemen, to entreat your acceptance of their warmest gratitude; to which allow me to add, most respectfully, the farewell tribute of the Performers. We wish you all, Ladies and Gentlemen, a long life and a merry one.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 9.—MR. SERGEANT LENS.

A grave aspect, mixt with austerity,
Which should be temper'd so with lenity,
That in them both he might be understood
A scourge to th' ill, a cheerer to the good.

R. Brathwaite's Time's Anatomy.

THE pains taken a few weeks ago to shew what was meant by the word gentlemanly, as applied to the Court of Chancery, will render it less necessary to explain what is to be understood by the word ungentlemanly, as applied to the Court of Common Pleas: as in the first it is not to be supposed, that all freedom of speech, or even severity of remark, is banished; so in the last, though there certainly prevails a coarseness of manner, and now and then a vulgarity of expression, it would be an error to say that the restraints which well educated men in other situations impose upon themselves are disregarded. Undoubtedly from several causes, to which reference was made in the strictures upon Mr. Sergeant BEST, the Advocates in the Common Pleas assume and are allowed a far greater degree of licence than is granted in the other Courts: their speeches are frequently more violent, and their examinations of witnesses are sometimes conducted with an excess of inconsiderateness, and even fierceness, without a parallel. It would however be extremely unfair to include all the Sergeants in this sweeping accusation, and it would be least of all just to the individual who is the subject of the present article; for a man of greater mildness of manner and general propriety of deportment was perhaps never known than Mr. Sergeant LENS. I never heard of an instance in which he had thrown off his habitual suavity, however great might have been the designed provocation: Mr. Sergeant SHEPHERD has already been excepted, and the same distinction is due to Mr. Sergeant COPLEY, but not so much on account of his education or the gentlemanliness of his feelings, as the calculating coldness of his temperament. It is not however to be understood for a moment that Mr. Sergeant LENS wants either resolution or firmness: on the contrary, his undeviating self-possession is always sure to shew him the clear difference between right and wrong, which some in their passion confound; and when once he is convinced of the solidity of the ground on which he has taken his stand, nothing can shake him—nothing induce him to resign it.

It may seem extraordinary, that with such an example before them the Advocates should not more have profited by it; but as was said many years ago, "the leaven of ill is always more powerful than the leaven of good," and it is aided by the cautious reluctance of the Judges of the Common Pleas to interpose: besides, if Mr. Sergeant LENS be an example of undeviatingly decorous demeanour, Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN is too often an example of the contrary. As I shall not be able to devote a separate article to him, and as the examination of his character and attainments will be of some use, I shall take this opportunity of summing him up in a few sentences: they are the more fit for this place, because he will be more directly contrasted with the gentleman whose name is placed at the head of the present criticism.

It is but fair to begin with his merits; and the most prominent and useful of these are great quickness of perception, and uncommon readiness in emergencies; the next is industry, and the third an apparently deep interest in the event of the cause. It is astonishing sometimes to see of what use the latter is to him: his external anxiety, his unwillingness to give up a point most clearly against him, often has made a Jury hesitate about a question on which they would not otherwise have entertained a moment's doubt: it is aided also by an unblushing confidence which, to use a vulgar phrase, sticks at nothing, and which is most shewn when most needed, viz. when his case is good for nothing. He is a tolerably fluent speaker, not because he has a wide command of language, but because he never cares what words he employs, and those which are uppermost and first present themselves are generally the coarsest and most vulgar; such as many other men would not without reluctance, and could not without difficulty have selected. It is obvious that he has had little or no education, with the pretence of classical attainments, for he is very fond of interlarding his addresses with common-place scraps of Latin, and if without a false quantity, he is more indebted to his good luck than to his knowledge. I apprehend that he has a very slender stock of legal information, and he wants the prudence, of which men of mere quickness are often destitute, to conceal his ignorance. From what has been said, it will perhaps be inferred, that he is by no means a bad Nisi Prius Advocate in common cases, such as those that regard the warranty and soundness of horses or paltry assaults; but to weightier matters his strength is not equal: he is reckoned by some (and among others perhaps by himself) a man of considerable wit, and it must be admitted that he has a share of low humour, which with low people passes for metal of a higher value.

Such is Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN, whose talents have obtained him a considerable proportion of the business in the Court where he practises: there are few men who form so strong a contrast to him as Mr. Sergeant LENS, who holds quite as many briefs, but, as may be guessed, in causes involving very different questions and interests: his business is not only more respectable but more lucrative. At first sight it would not be supposed that he had the same velocity at catching a point as Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN; his countenance does not express it, and perhaps he has it not in the same degree: his face, if it be a little marked by grave lines, is far from having a harsh expression, or can only be thought so by those who cannot distinguish between the staidness of reflection and thought, and the crabbedness of severity. When Sir V. GIBBS is on the Bench, and Mr. Sergeant LENS is at Bar, a fine opportunity is afforded of remarking the difference. Mr. Sergeant LENS looks as if he were intended for a Judge, and probably the only reason he is not so, is, that he values so highly the principles which he first adopted with caution and afterwards adhered to with firmness, that he would not accept any office which would bear even the appearance of an abandonment of them.* Notwithstanding the number of instances in which he has been opposed as an advocate to the empty flippancies of Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN, and to the peevish impetuosity of Mr. Sergeant BEST, I am not aware, as I remarked in the outset, that on any occasion his equanimity has been disturbed: much may be attributed to the goodness of his temper, and to the coolness of his judgment, but perhaps not a little to the respect which his appearance and demeanour cannot fail to excite: it strikes one as a thing impossible to offer an offence to such a man: a generous or a mean spirit would be afraid to do it; the one because he would despise himself, the other because he would be despised.

I do not place him upon a level with mere Nisi Prius Advocates: it is scarcely fair to institute a comparison between them; for there are few persons more distinct than an able Lawyer before a Court, and an able Counsel before a Jury; independent of the different sort of talent required on the one place and in the other, the knowledge which is necessary for each is also different: but when I say that Mr. Sergeant LENS is no match for some who consider themselves his rivals, in the low chicanery and artifices of practice, his inferiority does not arise from his ignorance of those tricks, but from his contempt and disdain of them: he will not condescend to employ them, nor will he ever give them his support when resorted to by others who may be coupled with him in the management of the cause. It should seem as if he had unluckily fallen upon evil times; as if his learning, his abilities, and his disposition were intended for an age, when the petty and despicable contrivances by which the great ends of justice are now delayed or defeated, had either not been invented or were perpetually abolished: he may truly say at the present moment, and in the present state of the practice of our Courts,

This study fits a mercenary drudge
Who aims at nothing but external trash—
Too servile and illiberal for me.

C. Marlow's Fleustus.

The mildness and urbanity of deportment, of which I have already spoken, belongs to him in all situations, and towards all persons: how often have the most respectable Solicitors, who mix in the best companies, and are there treated as they deserve with the utmost attention, reason to complain of the presumptuous pettishness of some upstart Barrister who has attained such a station in his profession as to

* It is not my practice to deal in private anecdotes; on the contrary I have expressly avoided them, but the following reflects so much credit upon the subject of this article, and has been so publicly stated, and still remains uncontradicted, that it cannot be supposed that I am guilty of anything like prying into secret history, or committing a breach of confidence. When the Solicitor-Generalship was last vacant, it was offered to Mr. Sergeant LENS who of course refused it, alledging that the acceptance would be inconsistent with the political opinions he had always entertained. Ministers were in want of his services, well knowing their value, and proposed, that if he would give them his legal advice, they would not require that he should sit, speak, or vote in Parliament. Mr. Sergeant LENS still adhered to his first determination, refusing thus to compromise his principles, and declaring that he would not accept the place of Solicitor-General at all, if he could not conscientiously do so on the same terms as his predecessors.

command a certain quantity of business. Sir W. GARROW was sometimes positively ferocious to them if they happened to interrupt him by any suggestion which did not meet with his concurrence, and I once saw Sir V. GIBBS inflict upon an Attorney a very sound box on the ear in open Court: the man shewed however that it was in some degree merited by his patient submission under it. Aspericus nihil est humili cum surgit in altum is an old but not perhaps a very elegant Latin proverb, which may be applied to many successful Advocates, but never to Mr. Sergeant LENS who behaves with equal respect towards his inferiors, his equals, or his superiors.

It remains now only for me to say a few words regarding the stile and manner of the individual before us: his mode of speaking is forcible, but its principal fault is that it is too constantly so; that it has not sufficient variety, that there is too little relief, and that his endeavour to secure attention, and to keep it up as he proceeds now and then defeats itself: his voice too is rather monotonous and heavy in its sound, which tends to increase the defect. His language is always well chosen, and shews that he a scholar and a man of general education: a vulgarism seldom or never escapes his lips, unless to answer some particular purpose, and his sentences are usually full and complete: they are perhaps somewhat too long and might be advantageously relieved by an occasional interrogation or interjection. On these accounts his stile is much better adapted to a continued legal argument, than to an address to a Jury. His action has little about it that is remarkable, but certainly nothing that is offensive.

Of his learning, I believe, no person competent to form an opinion entertains a doubt;—his talents, his acquirements, his character, and his temper, all unite to recommend him to one of the highest stations of the law: he has several times presided on the home circuit when Lord ELLENBOROUGH was absent from illness; and there are I believe few members of the profession who do not hope at no distant period to see him confirmed in the seat which hitherto he has only temporarily occupied.

AMICUS CURIE.

[No. 10, Mr. DAUNCEY.]

THE COTTON SPINNERS AND THEIR EMPLOYERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—As the disputes between the Cotton-spinners and their employers as to wages have become a matter of serious consequence to at least 300,000 persons, particularly in Lancashire and the adjoining counties, and as it has excited a considerable share of attention from the public at large, an attempt to place the business in its true light will, I trust, induce you to give it publicity.

But as I am going to speak of two distinct classes of persons, it may not be amiss first to notice their distinct general character; and I declare I will “nothing extenuate or set down ought in malice.” First, then, as to the employers; with very few exceptions, they are a set of men who have sprung from the cotton-shop without education or address, except so much as they have acquired by their intercourse with the little world of merchants on the exchange at Manchester; but to counterbalance that deficiency, they give you enough of appearances by an ostentatious display of elegant mansions, equipages, liveries, parks, hunters, hounds, &c. which they take care to shew off to the merchant stranger in the most pompous manner. Indeed their houses are gorgeous palaces, far surpassing in bulk and extent the neat charming retreats you see round London. There are scores of them surpassing in appearance Buckingham-house; but the chaste observer of the beauties of nature and art combined will observe a woeful deficiency of taste. They bring up their families at the most costly schools, determined to give their offspring a double portion of what they were so deficient in themselves. Thus, with scarcely a second idea in their heads, they are literally petty monarchs, absolute and despotic, in their own particular districts; and to support all this, their whole time is occupied in contriving how to get the greatest quantity of work turned off with the least expence. What is generally understood by the word abilities is here unnecessary. The mental power of arithmetical calculation is all that they require; the steam engine and their slave drivers or overlookers will do the rest. In short, I will venture to say, without fear of contradiction, that there is a greater distance observed between the master there and the spinner, than there is between the first merchant in London and his lowest servant or the lowest artisan. Indeed there is no comparison. I know it to be a fact, that the greater part of the master spinners are as anxious to keep wages low for the purpose of keeping the spinners indigent and spiritless, (for poverty breaks the spirit in general) as for the purpose of taking the surplus to their own pockets. The master spinners are a class of men unlike all other master tradesmen in the kingdom. They are ignorant, proud, and tyrannical. What then must be the men or rather beings who are the instruments of such masters? Why, they have been for a series of years, with their wives and their families, patience itself—bondmen and bondwomen to their cruel task masters. It is in vain to insult our common understandings with the observation that such men are free; that the law protects the rich and poor alike, and that a spinner can leave his master if he does not like the wages. True; so he can; but where must he go? why to another, to be sure. Well; he goes; he is asked where did you work last; “did he discharge you?” No; we could not agree about wages. Well I shall not employ you nor any one who leaves his master in that manner. Why is this? Because there is an abominable combination existing amongst the masters, first established at Stockport in 1802, and it has since become so general, as to embrace all the great masters for a circuit of many miles round Manchester, though not the little masters: they are excluded. They are the most obnoxious beings to the great ones that can be imagined. I believe it is a greater pleasure to the lofty ones to see the name of one of those middle men in the Gazette, than if he received as much as he is bankrupt for; and I am sorry to say these great gormandizers of all the power, labour, and profit, in that circuit, have had too many delectable treats of that kind of late years. When the combination first took place, one of their first articles was, that no master should take on a man until he had first ascertained whether his last master had discharged him. What then is the man to do? If he goes to the parish, that grave of all independence, he is there told—We shall not relieve you; if you dispute with your master and don't support your family, we will send you to prison; so that the man is bound, by a combination of circumstances, to submit to his master. He cannot travel and get work in any town like a shoemaker or joiner; he is confined to the district. The workmen in general are an inoffensive, unassuming, set of well-informed men, though how they acquire their information is almost a mystery to me. They are docile and tractable, if not goaded too much; but this is not to be wondered at, when we consider that they are trained to work from six years old, from five in a morning to eight and nine at night. Let one of the advocates for obedience to his master take his stand in an avenue leading to a factory a little before five o'clock, and observe the squalid appearance of the little infants and their parents taken from their bed at so early an hour in all kinds of weather; let him examine the miserable pittance of food, chiefly composed of water gruel and oatcake broken into it, a little salt, and sometimes coloured with a little milk, together with a few potatoes, and a bit of bacon or fat for dinner; would a London mechanic eat this? There they are, (and if late a few minutes, a quarter of a day is stopped in wages) locked up until night in rooms heated above the hottest days we have had this summer, and allowed no time, except three-quarters of an hour at dinner in the whole day: whatever they eat at any other time must be as they are at work. The negro slave in the West Indies, if he works under a scorching sun, has probably a little breeze of air sometimes to fan him; he has a space of ground, and time allowed to cultivate it. The English spinner slave has no enjoyment of the open atmosphere and breezes of heaven. Locked up in factories eight or ten stories high, he has no relaxation till the ponderous engine stops, and then he goes home to get refreshed for the next day; no time for sweet association with his family; they are all alike fatigued and exhausted. This is no over drawn picture: it is literally true; and I defy all the editors at Manchester to prove the contrary. I ask again, would the mechanics in the South of England submit to this?

When the spinning of cotton was in its infancy, and before those terrible machines for superseding the necessity of human labour, called steam engines, came into use, there were a great number of what were there called little masters; men who, with a small capital, could procure a few machines, and employ a few hands, men and boys (say to twenty or thirty), the produce of whose labour was all taken to Manchester central mart, and put into the hands of brokers (an useful and deserving set of men who are, by the overbearing monopoly of the great spinner, now almost annihilated). The brokers sold it to the merchant, by which means the master spinner was enabled to stay at home and work, and attend to his workmen. The cotton was then always given out in its raw state from the bale to the wives of the spinners at home, where they beat and cleansed it ready for the spinners in the factory. By this they could earn eight, ten, or twelve shillings a week, and cook, and attend to their families. But none are thus employed now; for all the cotton is broken up by a machine, turned by the steam engine, called a devil; so that the spinner's wives have no employment, except they go to work in the factory all day at what can be done by children for a few shillings, four or five per week. If a man then could not agree with his master, he left him, and could get employed elsewhere. A few years however changed the face of things. Steam engines came into use, to purchase which, and to erect buildings sufficient to contain them and six or seven hundred hands, required a great capital. The engine power produced a more marketable (though not a better) article than the little masters could at the same price. The consequence was their ruin in a short time; and the overgrown capitalists triumphed in their fall; for they were the only obstacle that stood between them and the complete controul of the workmen.

Various disputes then originated between the workmen and masters as to the fineness of the work, the workman being paid according to the number of hanks or yards of thread he produced from a given quantity of cotton, which was always to be proved by the overlooker, whose interest made it imperative on him to lean to his master, and call the material coarser than it was. If the workman would not submit, he must summon his employer before a magistrate; the whole of the acting magistrates in that district, with the exception of two worthy clergymen, being gentlemen who have sprung from the same source with the master cotton spinners. The employer generally contented himself with sending his overlooker to answer any such summons, thinking it beneath him to meet his servant. The magistrate's decision was generally in favour of the master, though on the statement of the overlooker only. The workman dared not appeal to the sessions on account of the expense. I never knew in ten years more than one appeal succeed, and that was tried before a bench of independent Cheshire Gentlemen; and then, because a few other spinners had subscribed to assist the appellant in his expenses, they were all turned out of their employment next week, though at that very time there was a written article amongst the master spinners to support each other in all expenses of appeals, &c. I may say with truth, once for all, that there are many laws for the protection of the master-spinner which all militate against the independence of the workman, for whom they are no protecting enactments: or if there are, they are out of his reach on account of expence. It is false to say the master-spinners cannot give more wages on account of being undersold in a continental market. This only holds true with respect to manufactured goods; and this it is which causes the weaver's wages to be so low: but with regard to cotton yarns, there is no competition of importance. Facts speak for themselves, the Manchester warehouses are empty of yarns, and if the spinners could fill them to-morrow, they would be emptied the next day at their own price.

Take forty of the best spinners, workmen, and on an average a few years since they could have earned 40s. a week. They were satisfied and complained not. Then the masters by one trick or another contrived to reduce them; urging, that there was no demand on the continent, &c., and promising to advance again as soon as things were improved. Things are improved; they can sell any quantity at their own price; and yet when the spinners now asked an advance, they could not earn (on an average, the same forty good hands) more than 20s. a week, after deducting expenses. This is not enough even to keep them alive: if you were to see them work, you would wonder how they lived at all. They ought, according to circumstances, to have an advance of at least 60 per cent., according to what we well know the masters sell their yarns for. The spinners ought to have more than will support them for the time being; they soon wear out, are old men at fifty, and very few spinners can work after that age. Surely then they ought to be enabled to lay by a little for the time of incapacity, from that source which has caused such premature feebleness. These evils to the men have arisen from that dreadful monopoly which exists in those districts where the wealth and power are got into the hands of a few, who, in the pride of their hearts; think themselves the lords of the universe.

One thing however, Mr. Editor, you may depend upon, that the important question, whether the workmen shall be the slaves of the master-spinners, or whether they shall have fair wages and due consideration in the scale of society, will shortly be set at rest; for they receive such support from all classes of society (except the privileged class) as will enable them to hold out till the factories and machinery of the monopolists are rendered by lapse of time unfit for use.—I am, &c. H. Hopson.

I could, if you thought it worth publishing, offer some observations, shewing the cause of the destruction of the manufacturing or weaving trade in those districts, which has reduced to pauperism many thousands of worthy industrious men and families. A good weaver, who a few years since could earn 20s. a week clear, cannot now get more than 10s. if he works sixteen hours a day.

IMITATION OPIUM.

Sir,—I take the liberty of calling your attention to the following shameful imposition, which has already, I fear, caused too much mischief, and which, if not instantly checked, must inevitably produce more.—The public of late, one would imagine, have had their feelings sufficiently outraged by the substitution of poisonous ingredients for tea, but it is now attempted to injure them still more by robbing them of those means which Providence has kindly given for the relief of suffering humanity. In the former case, a very laudable spirit was shewn in the proper quarter, which had the desired effect; let us hope some means will be adopted to bring to light the shameful conduct of those who have been palming on the medical world an imitation of that invaluable article Opium. In consequence of the high price of this drug, an imitation of it was offered to the wholesale houses at somewhat a lower charge, and, as may be expected, instantly bought and distributed: the imitation in point of colour, flavour, and smell, was so excellent as to deceive the first judges, and the druggists have unwittingly been the means of distributing it to the medical practitioners. These latter for some time past were at a loss to account for the violence of those diseases, which used to yield to the above remedy, particularly the diseases of this season, diarrhoea, cholera morbus, &c. which, it is well known, have proved particularly fatal of late, and which were attributed to the unusual heat. Be that as it may, the antidote was not so fortunate as customary, and until these few weeks, no cause could be assigned for it. The physician, whilst he was administering, as he imagined, the powerful influence of opium, was giving a substance unlike it in every respect but appearance. No doubt much of this is still remaining in the possession of apothecaries in town and country, who are quite ignorant of such an imposition, and who will be, through your means, extensively and quickly put on their guard, and thereby not only be enabled to account for the unexpected failure in its effects, but prevented from splitting on the same rock. I leave to the chemists the task of shewing of what this article is composed; my intention is only to tell of the fact of its existence. To detect it, no reliance is to be placed either on its smell, appearance when broken, or its taste; for in all these it very much resembles the genuine drug: it can only be discovered by dissolving it in spirits of wine, when it will appear muddy, and so glutinous as not to pass through the filtering paper, in consequence (as I imagine) of some mucilaginous or oily substance being used in the making. CELEBRATION of the TRIUMPH of PURITY of ELECTION at READING.

The Electors of Reading dined together on Monday last to commemorate their triumph. The company that sat down to dinner rather exceeded 400. At half-past three, Colonel Newbury took the chair, and soon after, Sir Francis Burdett entered the hall, and was greeted with every demonstration of cordial respect. After dinner, when the healths of the King and Royal Family had been drank, the Chairman proposed—"The Members for the borough of Reading;" which toast was drank with three times three.

Mr. C. F. PALMER rose amid great applause, and returned thanks for Mr. Lefevre and himself. He hoped the confidence placed in them would be rather increased than diminished by their Parliamentary conduct. If the professions made to the people were kept, they would have a most virtuous Parliament, but that was not the case. The people had however sent a few men to Parliament to attend to their interests, and it was the business of the people to remind them of their duty. They should therefore persist in petitioning, and they would strengthen the hands of the Reformers in the House. He was proud of the name of Reformer, and he supported Reform in order to prevent a Revolution, in which the present system, unless checked, would terminate. They should not quarrel about minute definitions of Reform; it was the endeavour of their enemies to divide them. Let the same course be pursued with respect to the national cause as had been done in that town, and the same glorious result would follow.

"Sir F. Romilly and Sir Francis Burdett" was then drank with three times three amidst immense applause.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT rose, and thus addressed the meeting:—Gentlemen, it is with great satisfaction that I meet here independent men of this county and town to celebrate the triumph of their own independence over the corrupt practices, and all those acts which are constantly used to support a system of injustice and oppression—(Applause)—To join with you in expressing my good opinion and confidence respecting the member you have elected, from private regard and long acquaintance, is one of the objects I had in view—(Applause)—But I cannot flatter Mr. Palmer or you with anticipations of great advantages from your exertions, because in the House of Commons there are few members returned by the people. I understand the general object of this meeting to be, to celebrate the triumph of the people, standing on the ground of reform, (Loud applause) of retrenchment and of economy, which by the long continuance of taxation occasioned by the war, a war which (whether right or wrong is beside the question) has sunk the nation in the greatest distress.—(Applause)—The pressure of taxation makes it now indispensable to retrench our warlike establishments: but retrenchment is not sufficient for our purpose, which is the freedom and independence of every man—(Great applause)—Nor would any measure of retrenchment or economy be efficient till the assembly in St. Stephen's is reformed—(Applause)—A reform in the House of Commons is the great fundamental one thing needful; which obtained, every thing else will become satisfactory and effectual; if not, every other attempt will by some means or other be made ineffectual—(Applause)—I also beg leave to thank you on behalf of my colleague; and to assure you, that he feels the honour of your notice, and of that of every honest Englishman, when their good opinion is the fruit of their reflection on public conduct and public integrity as I do—(Very great applause)—I give—"The Borough of Reading, and may its prosperity and independence increase."—(The Hon. Baronet sat down amid the loudest plaudits.)

The CHAIRMAN—"The Lord Lieutenant and the Magistrates of the County."

Mr. HENRY MARSH returned thanks for himself and the other Magistrates. "Our enemies allege that the object of the Reformers is to bring the Magistrates every where into derision and contempt. Nothing can be more unjust and untrue. If Magistrates perform their duty, the people are sure to respect them—(Applause)—but if Magistrates, instead of attending to the interests of the people, or to the dictates of justice and truth, act according to the wishes of a Secretary of State, or of the circulator of circulars, let them not complain of the people, if they are regarded with contempt and odium."—(Shouts of applause.)

The healths of several gentlemen who had contributed by their exertions to the election of the members were then drank with applause, after which, Sir Francis Burdett retired amid the same demonstrations of enthusiasm which welcomed his entrance. The whole assembly stood up, and spontaneously drank his health with three times three.

"The Chairman" was then proposed. Col. Newbury made his acknowledgements.

On the health of Mr. Marsh, as the seconder of Mr. Palmer's nomination, being drank, that gentleman spoke to the following effect:—"We felt zealously interested in the election of a member who should do justice to our political sentiments. I am a Reformer, and I am proud of the name as equally creditable and constitutional. We support the prerogatives of the Crown, we have no objection to the privileges of the nobility; but we will not have the people robbed of their rights and liberties by an oligarchy who plunder us of our property by an organized system of corruption, and threaten us with final loss of liberty from a large standing army—(Very great applause)—As diffusing sentiments incompatible with the proper care of our liberties among a large proportion of the community, as a ready instrument for despotic purposes, and as occasioning excessive taxation, our standing army was a cause of complaint and a source of alarm—(Applause)—But from this general subject I come to say a few words of our late contest. From the law we have had able assistance, and from medicine we have had some aid. From the Church not one assisted us. If, as our member has said, we hang together, we must hang without benefit of Clergy—(Much laughter)—I feel the profoundest respect for true religion, whether in the dignified sanctuary of the church, or in the humble retirement of the thatched cottage. But when religion forsakes her proper province, and lends her cloak to purposes of corruption and oppression, we cannot withhold our indignation, contempt, and abhorrence—(Great applause)—Mr. Weyland, however, we sent away unsuccessful. I respect his private character; but when he would be our representative, we could not admit his pretensions. Our friend, Mr. Palmer, we have elected, and we must now send him to a distant place, to a strange company, and a very dangerous atmosphere—(Applause)—I have lately read of a cave near Naples called grotta del cane, the cave of dogs, of which the air is so noxious, that if a dog be put into it, he is at once seized with the malaria, or malady occasioned by foul air, and if not soon taken out, is deprived of all vitality. I cannot help comparing St. Stephen's chapel to this cave of dogs—(Immense applause)—There is a kind of noxious vapour there which may be called Treasury gas, and which has very generally produced a malaria, or destruction of all vitality of political principle—(Shouts of applause)—Mr. Palmer will, however, we hope, escape this foul air. We know if physical altitude can preserve him, he is in no danger—(Laughter)—But his moral elevation is a better security, and that is as well known to us as his height.—(Very loud and long continued cheering.)

Some other toasts were then drank and the meeting broke up about twelve o'clock. No meeting could be more orderly and harmonious than this one, numerous as it was.

OLD BAILEY.

The indictments for forgery of Bank of England notes were very numerous: there were no less than 38. Many of the unfortunate people pleaded guilty, either wholly, or to the minor offence of having forged notes in their possession, and few of those who were tried escaped conviction. Several of the prisoners were under twenty-four years of age. The facts brought to light by some of these trials, discover the same system of villainy as the investigation of the case of Spicer and Kelly did some time ago; that is, that the bad notes pass through many hands, and first those of wretches, who do not themselves pass them off at the shops, but sell them at a low price to other poor people (chiefly unwary youths), whom they sometimes betray to the police; and the sale of the notes is conducted with such caution, that these dealers in human blood generally escape the punishment of their crimes, while the lives of their victims are forfeited to a cruel and unjust law. These cases also shew the prodigious quantity of forged notes daily brought into circulation, the facility with which they are made, and afterwards passed, as well as the want of feeling in those persons, who have been for years prosecuting these miserable creatures, and nevertheless have not even attempted to prevent the frequent recurrence of their disgraceful and unmerited deaths.

Wm. Weller, aged 20, and George Cashman, aged 26, two men remarkably well dressed, were indicted capitally for disposing of ten forged one pound notes.

Ann Frears is a married woman; has known the prisoners since the 13th of July; went to the Coopers' Arms that day, in consequence of instructions she had received from the Solicitor to the Bank to purchase forged Bank-notes; introduced herself to Weller, and said she had got a watch to sell, for which she wanted 18s., but she understood he could let her have some queer notes (forged ones); he said he could. He let her have two one-pound notes for the watch. She took the notes to the Bank. Weller told her she might have forged notes at any time. On the following day she went again and purchased two one 14. notes for 16s. He said if she took ten, he would let her have them at 7s. 6d. a piece. She went again on Saturday. On this occasion she saw both Weller and Cashman; they went into the back parlour, and sat down. Cashman asked her for the money. She gave him 31. 15s. and he went to get the notes; he was gone about half an hour. During Cashman's absence, Weller asked witness if she ever wanted any 5l. notes, and said he would let her have them at 30s., and she might charge 50s. Cashman soon after came back, and delivered the notes to Weller, who gave them to the witness. Ultimately it was agreed that Weller and Cashman were to come to the Horse and Cart, in Goswell-street, to meet a friend who wanted some notes; and on the Monday morning after, she went, accompanied by Sellers, the police officer, who was introduced to her by the Bank Solicitor, to the Horse and Cart. Sellers was dressed as a countryman. After some negotiation, Sellers agreed to take four fives at 2l. a-piece, and ten ones at 9s.—Witness does not live with her husband, who is on board the hulks for passing bad notes; no promise had been made to her that, if she convicted the present prisoners, her husband should be pardoned. Witness expects to be paid for her loss of time, but looks for no other reward; she got the money to purchase the notes from Mr. Christmas, of the Bank: the money, 12l., was given to Cashman, but the notes were never delivered to Sellers or to the witness.

This evidence was corroborated by Joseph Guy and William Sellers.

Mr. Christmas, the Bank Inspector, proved receiving the notes from Mrs. Frears, and that they were all forgeries.

Cashman, in his defence, declared he never saw Mrs. Frears in his life till he saw her at Marlborough-street-office; and she then said, in the hearing of several persons, "My husband was transported last Sessions by means of a Jew in Field-lane, and I'll hang every Jew in the country if I can, for they are all related."

The Jury found a verdict of Guilty against both the prisoners.

On Saturday se'nnight, at the rising of the Court, Henry Hunt, who had previously attempted to make a motion, but was prevented by the proceedings before the Court, rose and stated that the Grand Jury had found a true bill against John Stoddart, Edward Quin, and Andrew Mitchell, the Proprietors and Printer of the New Times, for a libel upon his character, and he therefore moved that they should give him 48 hours' notice of bail; and that the principals should themselves be bound in 400*l.* each, and their bail in 200*l.* each.

The COMMON SERJEANT said, that 80*l.* themselves, and 40*l.* their bail, was the common sum in cases of libel: the object was to get the Court to grant a warrant on Saturday night, and so to hold the defendant in custody till Monday morning.

Mr. Hunt said that was not his object, but since he found he was entitled to it, he would move for the warrant. This was refused by the Court, but the application for notice of bail was granted. Upon which Mr. Hunt left the Court.

On Monday morning, when the COMMON SERJEANT entered this Court, he observed Mr. Hunt, and said, "Mr. Hunt, the motion you made on Saturday night is granted."

Mr. Hunt then requested that an augmented amount of bail should be put in.

The COMMON SERJEANT said, that unless it could be proved to be a libel, imputing to him an indictable offence, he could not require bail beyond the usual amount.

Mr. Hunt said it was calculated to provoke an extraordinary breach of the peace.

The COMMON SERJEANT said, if Mr. Hunt would leave his address, proper notice would be given him of the bail, but they could not hold a conversation an hour long with him.

Mr. Hunt then went away and procured a warrant, which he had resolved to execute in propria persona. He proceeded down Fleet-street for that purpose, and it is a singular coincidence, that Mr. Quin was walking towards him: whether or not he had received any information of Mr. Hunt's approach, he was observed to turn round and retire rather hastily from the grasp of his pursuer. Mr. Hunt placed the warrant in the hands of Brand, the city marshalman, with instructions to take the parties into custody immediately.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Saturday week, the Lord Mayor received intimation that a most extraordinary personage would wait upon him, with the design of making a proposal of great interest to this country. At 12 o'clock the visiter arrived. A chair was placed near the Lord Mayor, and the marshalmen were directed to conduct the gentleman to it. A man of a most venerable aspect then entered the justice-room. His head was white, and his beard, which descended and was scattered over his chest, made his appearance truly patriarchal. He had upon his head a military hat, which seemed to have witnessed innumerable campaigns. It was fantastically decorated with an old feather and pieces of riband. A belt was tied round his waist, to which was suspended a sword. Pieces of brass, which were attached to his dress in various places for the purpose of proving his rank, gave him the likeness of an aged warrior. He said that he was a native of America, and his name was Moses Osgood. He had served in the revolutionary war with the British, and had received many wounds. His age was 74. His object was to get the Lord Mayor to introduce him to the Prince Regent, in order to propose an alliance between the Princess Elizabeth and himself.—The LORD MAYOR informed him that the Princess was already married, at which intelligence he seemed much affected, but still appeared to think that he might marry some other of the Princesses. At last he gave up the idea, and requested his Lordship's assistance in procuring for him the Prince Regent's permission to take a certain number of men and utensils to work a gold mine which he said he had on his estate at home.—The LORD MAYOR reprimanded the Captain of the ship for having brought over a person in this insane condition, and ordered Osgood to be taken to the Compter, and there to be treated with the utmost attention, till means can be found of sending him back again to his own country.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

An atrocious attempt was made upon the life and property of Mr. James Baker, a small farmer residing near Brentford, in the night of Friday week. Mr. Baker had retired to rest with his wife about 10 o'clock, and was awake between twelve and one by the noise of several persons on the stairs leading to his chamber. The door of his room was fastened with a spring-latch; but, before he had time to get out of bed and arm himself, it was violently burst open, and a man entered the room armed with a pitchfork, and calling to his companions to come on. Mr. Baker instantly sprung upon the villain, driving him backwards with all his force against the door, with a view to prevent those in the passage from entering. In this he succeeded, notwithstanding he received the prong of the pitchfork between the thumb and fingers of his right hand, to the depth of nearly two inches. The handle of the weapon was cut short, so as to render it more manageable; and immediately after they had closed, Mr. Baker received another thrust in the lower part of the groin, but he still contrived to keep his hold of the villain, and after a deadly struggle, they fell together against the door, the latter continually calling upon his accomplices, with horrible imprecations, to force themselves in. Mr. Baker, however, being a powerful man, prevented this, by keeping himself and the assassin close against the door, and his own foot against the headstead, which stood near it. During the first moments of this dreadful contest, Mrs. Baker was too much terrified to render any assistance to her husband; but when he fell to the ground, in the grasp of the murderer, she sprung from the bed and reached down an old spring-bayonet blunderbuss, which hung over the fire-place. Mr. Baker held out his hand for the weapon, and during the temporary relaxation of his hold in so doing, the villain gave him two other stabs in the abdomen, and with a desperate effort sprung upon his feet, and forced himself through the now partly-open door, and followed his companions, who had fled on hearing the blunderbuss mentioned. Mr. Baker was too much wounded to attempt a pursuit, and the villains escaped. The only other person in the house was a Mr. Kell. It is supposed that it was the knowledge of this circumstance which instigated the robbers to this attack, it being generally understood that Mr. Kell had a considerable sum of money by him. It is remarkable that Mr. Kell, though usually very restless in the night, was on this occasion in so deep a sleep that he heard nothing of the matter till Mr. Baker repaired to his chamber, under the impression that he should find him murdered; and this doubtless would have been the case, had the villains known the room in which he slept; but being ignorant of this, they fortunately first attempted that of Mr. Baker.

An Inquisition was taken at the Old Bailey, on the body of Ann Maria Underwood, aged 24 years.—Jonas Moulding deposed, that the deceased, himself, and two other young persons, went on the preceding afternoon to Piccadilly to see some friends; the deceased drank spirits very frequently, and when they returned she was very much intoxicated; she said she would go and see a Mrs. Saunders, who lived in the house of Mrs. Gahagan, in Dean's-court, Old Bailey. The deceased entered Mrs. Gahagan's house about six o'clock in the evening; Mrs. Gahagan said she should not go up stairs in that disgraceful condition, and immediately the deceased was pushed backwards through the door, her head struck against a wall, her skull was fractured, and she immediately expired.—Caroline Davies deposed, that she lived in Mrs. Gahagan's house. She saw the deceased enter the door, and walk up three stairs, for the purpose of going to Mrs. Saunders's apartment. Mrs. Gahagan met the deceased, and told her she should not go up stairs; she ordered her to leave her house, and gave her a blow; the deceased tumbled backwards down the stairs, and fell off the step of the front door, which is opposite the bottom of the stairs. The deceased did not endeavour to force herself up stairs. Mrs. Gahagan was in a great passion. The deceased and Mrs. G. were not upon friendly terms; they had had a lawsuit.—Mr. Hurlock, surgeon, proved, that the deceased died from the effect of the fracture in the skull, combined with the liquor she had drank.—Verdict—Justifiable Homicide.

Monday an Inquest was held at Mile-end New-town, on the body of Mr. Michael May, aged 33, of Mile-end-road. The deceased was in affluent circumstances, but had been for a length of time in bad health; he appeared lately very much disturbed in his mind; a nurse remained with him the whole of Friday se'nnight; the morning after, about ten o'clock, the deceased expressing a desire to have something to eat, the servant got him some ham; brought with it a knife and fork, and left it by the side of the bedstead; the deceased was then sitting up in the bed. About a quarter of an hour after, the servant going to the chamber, found his master lying on the bed, which was covered with blood, with his throat cut from ear to ear, and his head hanging over the side of the bedstead; a surgeon was procured, who pronounced him dead on his arrival. Verdict—Insanity.

On Friday se'night an inquisition was taken on the body of Sarah Williams, who hung herself at her lodgings on Thursday morning.—It appeared that some years ago the deceased married a journeyman baker, who committed some crime, for which he was transported for seven years. The deceased, in his absence, supported herself by taking in washings. Some time ago she formed a connexion with a Jew. The husband, at the expiration of his time, came home, and last week met her accidentally in Goswell-street. Having obtained employment at his trade, he thought proper to claim her from the Jew, and she went home with him. Wednesday se'night he went to his work, and returned home between eight and nine o'clock the next morning; he was surprised at finding several persons, for whom she washed, at her room-door, which was locked. He got a poker, and forced it open. She was then found suspended by a cord from the bed-post. A surgeon as called in, but he could render no assistance; the vital spark was quite extinct. The deceased, it was said, was six months advanced in pregnancy. She had been in a desponding state since her husband came home. Verdict—Insanity.

A Jury was summoned on Tuesday night to hold an inquisition on the body of Mr. Joshua Crane, painter and glazier, of New Exchange-court, Strand, at the Thatched House Tavern. A person presented himself as Coroner, and having administered the usual oath to the Jury, he accompanied them to take a view of the body. After they returned to the Jury-room, the Foreman remarked that the person who presided was so much intoxicated as to be incapable of taking the evidence, and he suspected that he was not the Coroner; or if he was, he thought he ought not to have come to take an inquest in such a situation.—The assumed Coroner, who said his name was Eustace, replied in a manner almost unintelligible, that "he came for his governor." Mr. Stirling. The Jury unanimously declared that the inquiry should not proceed, they not having been "legally sworn and impanelled by one of his Majesty's Coroners."—Thursday night the Jury re-assembled, and Mr. Stirling attended.—It appeared that on Saturday se'night last the deceased left home about half-past eight in apparently perfect health; about nine he was seen at the corner of Turnstile, in a convulsive fit; it took six men to hold him, his convulsions were so strong; he tore their clothes. After he had recovered a little, he was taken to a watch-house on Saffron-hill, and put in the usual place of security. On his way, he fell several times backwards, and it was supposed that a vessel in the head was ruptured. The deceased's wife went to the watch-house, and was informed that he was intoxicated; she told them that he never took liquor to excess, and that he must be unwell. After some time the deceased was brought out of the dark room; he was quite insensible; his wife procured a coach at five o'clock on Sunday morning, and the deceased was conveyed home.—Mrs. Crane informed the Jury that the deceased's clothes were wet through when she found him in the dark room, and she was informed that being thought to be an impostor, a bucket of water had been thrown upon him to bring him to his senses. When he arrived at home, she sent for a surgeon, who said he could not render him any assistance.—Mr. J. H. Ray, surgeon, deposed that he had examined the body of the deceased, and was of opinion that the external violence was not sufficient to cause his death. His frequently falling would produce all the external appearances.—The Foreman of the Jury then addressed the Coroner upon the impropriety of a drunken man being sent to take an inquest; he hoped such a recurrence would never take place for the Jury considered that they had been grossly insulted.—The Coroner made no reply.—Verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."

About ten o'clock on Thursday morning the neighbourhood of Knightsbridge was thrown into serious alarm, by the appearance of a mad dog at Hyde Park-corner. He first snapped at horses in the Park; but at the Piccadilly gate he seized Mr. Cross, son of the game-keeper, by the leg, and making his way down on the right-hand side of the Knightsbridge-road, snapped at every person and animal he met; he fixed upon Mr. Edwards, whom he bit severely; he then attacked Mr. Richardson, of Hammer-smith, whom he fell upon most ferociously, in consequence of his determined resistance with his umbrella. This gentleman escaped without any injury to his person, although his coat and trousers were literally torn to pieces. In the mean time the dog was pursued by a labourer, named Denford, who overtook him at the coach-stand at Sloane-street, but missing his first aim with a pitchfork, the dog flew at his ankle, and made five deep incisions. The poor man's brother extricated him, while the courageous sufferer despatched the animal. He is now in St. George's hospital, with Mr. Edwards and the boy, where they are undergoing the extraction of the bitten parts.

Wednesday morning, as T. Bulmer, Esq. merchant, of Aldersgate-street, was endeavouring to avoid a hackney-coach which was driving furiously along before the India House, his foot slipped, and he fell with his legs underneath a cart, heavily laden, which was passing at the moment, the wheel of which went over both thighs, and crushed them to pieces. He was immediately conveyed to a public-house, and medical assistance procured. He was quite senseless, but his residence having been ascertained by a card in his pocket, he was conveyed home upon a litter prepared for the purpose. The medical men said, that the amputation of both legs would be indispensable, and that even then his recovery was very doubtful.

A few days ago, Mr. Bryant, a farmer, residing at Hazlemere, went out shooting, accompanied by his son, about ten years of age. Having occasion to pass through a gate, he sent the boy forward to open it, whilst he beat about some furze bushes for game at a few yards distance with the butt end of the gun; unhappily the piece went off, and the muzzle being pointed towards the lad, the contents lodged in his body. The poor little sufferer languished a few hours and expired.

Sunday evening a man who travels round the country with a dancing bear, called at the house of Mr. Tuke, farmer, between Enfield and Edmonton, and requested a night's lodging; he was accommodated with a bed in the house, and the servant who accompanied him, was put in a loft in which the bear was. About midnight the barn door was forced open, and two men entered for the purpose of stealing corn, when Bruin, who was not much accustomed to nocturnal visitors, on one of the fellows' approach, saluted him with a most ardent though unwelcome embrace, on which his companion, finding that he was laid hold of, ran off as fast as he could. The fellow roared out most vehemently; Bruin as vehemently hugged, till at length the keeper got up out of bed, and found the affrighted wretch locked in the paws of the irritated animal, from whom he rescued him. The fellow was so much affrighted that he threw himself on his knees to his preserver, confessed his purpose, and said he thought the devil had laid wait for him to prevent his design. The keeper kept the thief in custody until the landlord, after a suitable admonition, suffered him to depart, being satisfied with the punishment he had received from the bear.

MARRIAGES.

On Saturday week, Mr. George Philpot, of Bishopsgate-street without, to Miss Clarke, of Stockwell-place, Surrey.

On Thursday week, at Hackney, Mr. T. J. Wooler, to Miss Elizabeth Pratt, of Kingsland.

Last week, at Paris, the Hon. Mr. Clifford, eldest son of Lord Clifford, of Uxbridge-park, Devon, to Miss Weld, only daughter of Thomas Weld, Esq. of Lutworth-castle, Dorset.

DEATHS.

On the 14th inst. in the 81st year of his age, Joseph Smith, Esq. formerly a Commander in the East India Company's Service.

On Friday morning, one of the compositors in the employ of Mr. Mansard, printer. On leaving his frame to wash his hands, he fell down to all appearance in a fit; but upon the arrival of two medical men, it was ascertained he had burst a blood vessel, and the attempts to recover him proved unavailing. His name was Johnson.

On Monday, about 12 o'clock at noon, at the Queen's Head, Great Windmill-street, Mr. Walton, broker, of Pulteney-court, near Golden-square. He came out of his house about an hour before, apparently in perfect health, walked over to Mr. Stansbury's (with whom he was extremely intimate), and conversed with Mr. S.'s daughter, when another acquaintance coming up, asked Mr. Walton to partake of a lunch at his house, and they started off together. Upon their arrival, Mr. W. entered the parlour and attempted to sit down; but a lethargic stupor seizing him, he fell forwards and expired instantaneously, without a groan or a struggle.

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 546.

ARTICLE AND NO ARTICLE.

Our readers will do us the justice to acknowledge, that we very rarely indeed fail in giving them the usual article at the head of our paper; and perhaps when it is considered that it is one and the same individual that has been in the habit of furnishing the original matter in this paper for nearly ten years, through all the various feelings of health and sickness, and the love of other studies besides politics, it may be granted by those who understand human nature kindly and wisely, that he has not failed in his regularity as often as might be excused him. We think our courteous readers exclaim, in one of the few good things that may be imitated from Parliament,—“Hear! Hear!”

Dr. JOHNSON, it is true, says that an author may always write, provided he sits down to it doggedly. And write he certainly may; but how write is another question. Not that industry in general is not sufficient; but even setting aside the inclination, industry itself will not always do, as in cases for instance where the subject does not readily present itself, or rather where out of many subjects it is difficult to choose. A man's very industry and anxiety may then hamper him; for he may go through so many subjects, and consider them so fastidiously as he goes, that he shall reject them one after the other from mere overweighing and comparison. The dogged argument is very apt, we must confess, to apply to journals. There would be no excuse, for instance, for the frequent short articles in such papers as the Courier, if it were not, in the nature of things, to be found in their very brevity. The Morning Post (if it is what it used to be) is bound to be in its place at all times, like one of its namesakes in a street; the Sun has no reason for not shining in all weathers, as much as it does in any; and the Editor of the Quarterly Review would have no excuse for being behind-hand with his publication, as there is always to be found a sufficient number of better-tempered spirits, agreeable women, or promising young poets, to throw him into the requisite passion.* But in proportion as Journalists differ with these Journalists, who will deny that they become excusable?

Chance Reader. Yet after all, Mr. Examiner, what is the good of an excuse?

Exam. To shew the good-nature of those who accept it.

* We congratulate, most sincerely, our young friend JOHN KEATS on the involuntary homage that, we understand, has been paid to his undoubted genius, in an article full of groveling abuse,

INDIAN ATROCITIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

“I, from the Orient to the drooping West, making the winds my post horse, thus do ride.—I speak of sudden deaths, of treasons, murders, plots, conspiracies,” &c.—SHAKESPEARE.

The cause and origin of that obstinate contest between the East India Company and the Nairs on the coast of Malabar, which terminated in the entire extirpation of both prince and people of that country, after a struggle of ten years, attended with a series of atrocities, the subject of my last article, may be thus collected from the concurrent testimony of the natives, as well as Europeans, who were engaged on that service.

A Gentleman of the name of Peel, lately deceased, who held the office of Collector in that district, a civilian in the Company's service (with whom I was personally unacquainted), is reported to have provoked, by his conduct towards the Rajah of the Cotiote, that oppressive system of proscription which led to the annihilation of the whole race of Nairs, with the loss of an equal number of British troops, who were employed with a view to root out and destroy, as the only means of subjugating that nation to the yoke of the East India Company.

The quarrel between Mr. Peel and the Rajah of the Cotiote is alledged to have arisen from the attempting to impose upon the Rajah an additional rate of tribute to that which he had voluntarily submitted to pay to the Company. The Rajah having remonstrated at this encroachment, Mr. Peel forgot to treat him with that respect which, as an independent prince and faithful ally of the Company, he had a right to expect from their representative, or rather their servant. The refusing to pull off his shoes, according to oriental custom, on entering the Palace, was construed into such premeditated personal contempt, that the Rajah, it is said, grasped his sword, and compelled this diplomatic agent of the Company, in terms of indignation, as he valued his life, that instant to consult his safety.

The next step after this (corresponding with the measures adopted towards our late faithful friend and ally, the Peishwa*), was to obtain possession of the Rajah's person or capital. The brave prince resolved to preserve his liberty, even at the expence of becoming a desperate fugitive, in arms against his pursuers; and the consequence was, that he and his faithful adherents, or, in other words, the whole of his subjects, were proscribed and hunted down, without quarter being given, as rebels to the power and authority of the British Government.

* A series of systematic warfare, spreading over almost the whole extent of the vast peninsula of Hindostan, has been incessantly carried on in that country before and since the year 1790; namely, the war in Mysore; in the province of Trichinopoly; the Mahratta war, which is now revived; war in the Guzerat; the Napaui war; war in Cattach; and the present war with the Peishwas Holkar and Scindia; besides various contests with the natives of India not enumerated: since it would be difficult to say at what period of their history the East India Company were not engaged in some war or other, for the purpose of subjugating, or of extirpating, the Indian nations.

The principal features of this disastrous campaign against the Niams, in confirmation of what I have already stated, were these:—The 2d battalion 3d Bombay native infantry, on ascending a steep hill, by means of a narrow defile surrounded by impenetrable jungles, and without the possibility either of retreat or change of position, were attacked by the Rajah's force, which lay in ambush to intercept them. A heavy shower of musquetry opened upon them in all directions, without their being able to discover one of the men from whom it came, or being enabled effectually to return it. The commander, Major Cameron, was killed, together with 15 officers; and except Captain Kennet and a few Sepoys, who happening to be in the rear providentially escaped, the whole battalion was destroyed. A battalion of Madras native infantry was reported to have shared a similar fate some years afterwards, and many of our detachments were occasionally attacked by surprise, and in like manner put to the sword. A still more certain and destructive enemy to our troops was the jungle fever, which raged in that country, and caused considerable mortality.

About 300 Niams, from famine and distress, surrendered, were taken prisoners, and confined in the fort of Cannanore. When I mounted guard there, which was every other day, these prisoners were under my charge. The whole were ordered to be marched to a distance from thence, in different divisions, for execution. Lieutenant Loraine, a brother officer, (deceased) with a detachment of sepoy, was ordered on that duty, and he accordingly performed the office of executioner in hanging a considerable portion of them, whom he left in that state;—a melancholy spectacle which every where presented itself throughout this country. Lieut. Charles Brown, European regiment, then residing in the same house with me, took charge of another division of these prisoners. His humanity induced him to disencumber them of their heavy chains, and, in neglect of duty, he suffered them intentionally to escape, and then threw himself upon the generosity of General Stevenson: and the General, instead of bringing that officer to a Court-martial, declared that his own mind was agreeably relieved from the horror he felt at this detestable mode of warfare against fellow-creatures, whose only crime, either in their own consciences or in the eyes of God and man, was a firm adherence to the cause of their lawful sovereign. Amidst all the hardships, dangers, and fatigues, which the service presented to those engaged in it, the original circumstance which produced those melancholy consequences, and which tended to blunt every feeling of humanity for the fate of these oppressed and tortured Indians, was traced to the conduct of Mr. Peel the collector; and his name was accordingly uttered with perpetual execration by his fellow-servants.

To mark the feelings even of the private soldiery of the Bombay European regiment, whose courage (at the storm of Seringapatam, and on every forlorn hope to which they could volunteer their services) had hitherto mocked at danger, the following anecdote alone will suffice to shew their compassion at the scenes of atrocity which they were commanded to execute towards this magnanimous, suffering, and unhappy people:—Some prisoners surrendered to a detachment of ours, by which they were brought to head-quarters then at Cottaparamba. The commanding officer of the detachment was reprimanded for not causing them to be put to immediate death, agreeably to general orders. Ensign Smith, of the European regiment, with a party of Europeans, was ordered to counter-march the prisoners into an adjoining forest, there to execute the murderous blow; which decency, or rather humanity, suggested should be removed to a distance, to be witnessed by those alone who were commanded upon that horrid duty.

The prisoners, being made fast together, were distended in line by ropes, which were secured between two trees, to keep them in one position. These facts, I apprehend, are well known to officers now in England. In this posture Ensign Smith drew up his men, and ordered them to fire upon their victims. Those men, however, having some remains of christianity about them, shrunk from their military duty at the hazard of being shot themselves for disobedience. They stood appalled at the horrid deed, and declared, though they had often met the enemy in the field, yet they could not and they would not be "guilty of murder in cold blood;" for such was their idea upon the subject, little as men kept in their state of ignorance could be supposed to know of the merits of the question upon which these victims suffered.

Ensign Smith, who if he ever possessed Christian feelings, must have left them at the Cape of Good Hope, being reduced to this dilemma, determined to shew his zeal for the honour of the Company's service—"Infirm of purpose, give me the daggers." Seizing one musket after another from the hands of the men, he thus proceeded. He put the muzzle of his piece to the head of one of the wretched men, and contriving at each discharge that several should fall at one and the same fire, scattered their heads and brains in the air, until he had thus triumphantly dispatched the whole of them. He then returned to camp, and boasted the barbarous zeal which he had opposed to the supineness of his men. The result no sooner reached his brother officers, than it occasioned them, one and all, to shun his society: they gave him the name of Hopeless till the hour of his death, which happened a short time afterwards; and the disobedience of the soldiers on that occasion was not recorded to their prejudice.

I shall conclude this article with an act of atrocity on the part of Major Lloyd, my late commanding officer, now no more; which, to say the least of his acts (including those that relate to myself as well), had not the sanction of authority.

I need be under no difficulty on the subject of that which follows, as the facts are recorded in the proceedings of one of several Courts-martial to which the irascible disposition of this man had given rise. Major, then Captain Lloyd, 2d battalion 3d regiment N. I., was brought to trial before a general Court-martial held at Cottaparamba. I state the circumstances as they were related to me by Captain John M'Kenzie, European regiment, who was a member of the Court; and as the conduct and character of Major Lloyd is involved in my own appeal to the Court of Directors, he will form the subject of still further remark, always however referable to those proceedings which are upon record at the India House. And whatever rank or character in the service may be affected by my succeeding narrative, to those records I appeal for th truth of it. The subject of investigation was this:—Capt. James Lloyd (who shortly after his return to England died, as is well known, in a state of mental derangement, and indeed his proceedings towards myself can afford no other inference than that of his being subject to derangement long before his death), was at this time in command of a military station in the Cotiote; and having retired to repose himself, upon a sofa, as is usual during the heat of the day in that oppressive climate, he was awoken by a party of Colcars (native troops in the employ of the Company) who were engaged in noisy rustic gambols, in a field adjoining his quarters. Under the sudden burst of anger which this circumstance produced, he instantly ordered out a Havildar's guard, and commanded them to fire upon those innocent and unsuspecting young men, who were thus carelessly diverting themselves at foot ball. Several of them were killed and wounded. He retired again to rest, and the matter might have been no more agitated or thought of, but as it rested with God and his own conscience, if it had not been for the vigilance of the Collector of that district, who conceived it his duty to report the circumstance to the Bombay Government. Nearly about the same time, Lieut. Dodd, another officer of the 3d regiment native infantry, was convicted of peculation, tyranny, and murder, whilst commanding at Sedasseghur, by laying the natives of that country under contribution, and, in order to extort money, flogging them to death. He escaped under his then sentence of death, and suddenly became commander of 5000 Mahratta horse under Holkar, by whom he afterwards was beheaded. The abandoning his capital Poonah to the then brigade of the Mahratta Colonel Dodd is made one of the grounds for deposing his Highness the Peishwa.—Vide proclamation of the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone.

And here, as in the case of Major Lloyd, mark the indulgence shewn by those in authority in that country towards crimes committed by those in authority under them.

The charge preferred against this gentleman, and which he was called upon to answer, was simply this and no more, namely,—“For a stretch of authority, in causing certain persons to be fired upon.”

Sentence.—“The Court having maturely weighed and deliberated upon the charge preferred against the prisoner, find that he is guilty of a stretch of authority, and they sentence him to be publicly reprimanded!!”

My informant said in conclusion—“Had the charge been laid as wanton and cruel murders, in the plural number, we must have pronounced him guilty, or violated our oaths.”

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, SEPT. 16.—The following declaration has been made to the Police of Brussels, by Mr. Cockrell, the attack on whom we lately mentioned:—The assassin, on entering my chamber, said, that he came to pay the rent of the house occupied by Madame Montaud. I observed to him, that, besides this rent, he had also to pay that of a cellar, and 14 francs which I had paid for water. On this he became insolent, and denied that I should make such a claim. I told him that it was my wish to postpone the question until the following day, that I might be enabled to send some one who could speak French to explain the affair to Madame Montaud. He then left my house, and I went out at the same time. Some minutes after Madame Montaud herself came, and inquired of a boy in my service if I were at home. On my return I found her at my door; she said she had come to pay her rent. I repeated to her what I had already said to her domestic—that I had spoken to a friend, with whom I should go on the following day to her house to explain the affair to herself. But Madame Montaud persisted in wishing to pay me the rent, otherwise she would deposit it in the hands of a notary. At the moment I had signed the receipt, the assassin again entered, saying, “You have treated me with contempt.” It is you, I replied, who are beginning again to insult me. “No, Sir,” said he, “I have been 12 years in the service of France, and you would thrust me from your house.” Saying this, he drew from his left pocket two small pistols, with one of which he fired at me. I fortunately had time to turn his arm; he then fired the other pistol, which I also had the good fortune to escape. He then struck me several times with a bayonet. The little boy who was with me fled, crying out “a l’assassin!” on which the assassin left me, and escaped through the street door.”

SEPT. 19.—A carriage, of which the box, the body, the harness, and the horses, are white, has excited for some days the curiosity of the Parisians. The coachman and footmen wear white hats, and are dressed in white liveries. Inside is a child, aged about ten years, dressed in white, as is also a female servant who accompanies him. A journal has announced this fact, simple in itself, and infinitely respectable in its motive; but has explained it in a very obscure manner, saying that, according to all probability, the child was devoted to white. On this explanation, two journals, affecting ignorance, although well knowing the meaning of the phrase, devote to ridicule the first journal that announced the fact, and exclaim at the revival of the ancient superstitions. For ourselves, we are happy to explain, at the risk of incurring the anathema of the scoffers, that a child devoted to white, means a child placed by its parents under the protection of the Virgin. The clothes and other white appendages which evince this species of consecration have nothing in them more surprising than the black garb and mournful draperies whereby we render homage to the memory of some cherished friend. We shall also tell them, that this public act of religion and parental love honours no less the courage than the sentiments of the parents, who do not fear to make a solemn profession of their devotion to her to whom our Kings have confided the guardianship of the realm, and to whom every year they renew the homage of their Crown.—Journal des Debats.

Monsieur Watson, a Scotchman by birth, who resided long at Rome, has past some time in France, on his way to London. He has had the happiness to make a literary discovery of great importance—a manuscript of the poems of Ossian, deposited by some Scotchman at the College of Douay, in the commencement of the last century. We are assured, that this manuscript agrees, in sense, with the translation of Macpherson, which is sufficient to demonstrate the authenticity of these poems, the subject of so many literary disputes.

In the course of last month, the Bishop of Dijon received the following Circular from the Minister of the Interior:—

MY LORD,—For some time past the reports of the Prefects have portrayed striking examples of the excesses to which superstitious ideas may lead. Pretended sorceries have occasioned crimes and misdemeanors, which now occupy the tribunals, and many individuals have been sentenced to ignominious punishments. You will doubtless perceive, my Lord, that it is of the utmost importance to instruct the ignorant and credulous, and especially the peasantry. The Civil Authority is at this moment occupied in devising measures to dissipate similar errors. I request, on your part, that you will promulgate such instructions as you may deem requisite on a subject equally important to religion and public order. Receive, my Lord, the assurance of my high consideration.—The Minister Secretary of State and Interior, (Signed) LAINE.

On the receipt of this letter, the Bishop addressed a pastoral letter to different Curates and inhabitants of the departments of the Cote d'Or, and Haute Marne, in which he congratulated them, that the errors, to which his instructions were especially applicable, did not prevail in the communes under his jurisdiction.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, SEPT. 20.—The foreign soldier, who, after assassinating Mr. Cockrell, disappeared, was found the day before yesterday hanging in a garden, situate on the Rampart des Moines, which he entered in the absence of the occupier. According to the report of the surgeons, he must have been dead about two days. He attempted some days before to drown himself in the Seine. This man, who was of a violent character, had been guilty of a similar crime at Lyons, where he had assassinated an officer. Thus he has only done justice upon himself.—The Duke of Richelieu is to be at Aix-la-Chapelle by the 26th of this month. The Duke of Wellington will arrive there about the same time. The conferences will commence in the beginning of October.

GERMANY.

AUGSBURG, SEPT. 13.—Some journals pretend to announce what are to be the objects of discussion at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle. These articles are only founded in conjecture; but we believe we may state as follows:—The great and principal question will be, whether the Army of Occupation shall be withdrawn from France; then will come on, 1st, the disputes of Spain with the Court of Brazil, with the United States, and with the Insurgents, and the question of the intervention of the Allied Sovereigns; 2d, some complaints of the Court of Denmark against that of Stockholm, respecting the non-fulfilment of the third paragraph of the Treaty of Kiel; 3d and last, the Piracies of the Barbary Corsairs. It is said, that with respect to the second question, the conferences which took place at London on the 28th of July, and of which the minutes have been sent to the Allied Powers, will be continued after the breaking up of the Congress.

PRUSSIA.

BERLIN, SEPT. 8.—There is a great deal said here about the new division of the Russian Empire, which may lead to important consequences. It is affirmed, that the Emperor, like Dioclesian, will divide his vast empire into the North, South, and West divisions, to place in them his three brothers, with the titles of Kings (Czars), and, like Augustus, will be the supreme head of the whole. The geographical situation of Russia is well adapted to this project, which besides seems very favourable to a constitutional organization.

RUSSIA.

PETERSBURGH, AUG. 28.—By the following Imperial Manifesto, which appeared on the 16th of July, several false reports are contradicted:—

We, Alexander I., by the Grace of God, &c., hereby make known, that the peace with Persia gives tranquillity and security to the eastern frontiers of Russia. It was concluded at a decisive moment, at the time when the new destiny of Europe was fixed, and unanimity was crowned by victory. Since that memorable period the Powers have enjoyed the blessing of a general peace. The bonds of friendship, which were restored between Russia and Persia, have in the course of four years been drawn still closer, and are now by reciprocal and solemn embassies confirmed on a sure and lasting basis. At the same time that we notify to all our faithful subjects this happy event, which has already produced many fruits of a solid union and undisturbed repose, we order the publication of the treaty concluded with Persia in the Gulistan on the 12th of October, 1813.

Given at Petersburg, July 16, 1818.

Signed, ALEXANDER.
Counter-signed, NESSELRODE.

[Here follows the treaty, by which peace is concluded between Russia and Persia, on the basis of status quo ad presentem. The boundary line is described, and several districts are enumerated by name, which the Padishaw of Persia specifically recognizes as belonging to Russia.—His Majesty the Emperor of Russia binds himself to support, if necessary, the succession of the son of the Schah, who may by him be nominated heir to the throne, and by the powerful assistance of the Russian Empire to prevent any foreign foe from interfering in the affairs of Persia. If, however, contests should arise between the sons of the Schah, respecting the concerns of the Persian empire, Russia will take no part therein, until invited for that purpose by the reigning Schah.—The Russian and Persian merchantmen have the right, as formerly, to sail to, and land on the opposite coasts of the Caspian sea. No ships of war, except Russian, to be allowed on the Caspian sea. All prisoners on both sides, whether prisoners of war or inhabitants, who may have been carried away, to be restored within three months after the signing of the treaty, and supplied with provisions and the means of travelling to Caraklis.—Provision is made for the respectful treatment of the Ambassadors and Consuls of both Powers, and for the reciprocal protection of the subjects of either country when in the other.—Provision is also made for the security of merchants, and facilitating commercial intercourse between the two empires.—A duty not exceeding 5 per cent. is payable on Russian goods imported into Persian towns or harbours, and the same on Persian goods conveyed to Russia.—On the arrival of merchandize on the coasts in the harbours or frontier towns, the respective contracting parties secure full freedom to the merchants in the sale of their goods, the purchase of other, or in their barter. DEPOSITION OF THE PEISHWA.

[From the Bombay Gazette, March 11.]

We have been favoured with a Mahratta copy of a Proclamation, issued by the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone in the Deccan, declaratory of the views of the British Government, and the policy intended to be pursued towards Bajee Row and the territories dependent on the late Government of Poona. That important document adverts, in the first instance, to the disorganized and rebellious condition of the country, on Bajee Row's accession to the Peishwa ship, to the confused and insecure state of his power and government, which led to its usurpation by Jeswant Row Holkar, to his flight from Poona to Bassem, and the pusillanimous abandonment of his capital to that enterprising soldier.

The proclamation notices the alliance that was, under these circumstances, formed with the British Government, the troops that were immediately furnished on the faith of that connexion, and his consequent restoration to his government. The beneficial effects of that alliance, in reviving the prosperity of his country, notwithstanding the destructive farming system by which it was managed, the personal happiness which Bajee Row enjoyed under the British protection, and the rapid and immense surplus revenue which flowed into his treasury, are depicted; and the anxiety which we manifested to adjust those claims of a pecuniary nature which the head of the Mahratta Empire possessed on its subordinate branches, which it was its policy to keep alive, and the occasional assertion of which was pregnant with so much evil and injustice, is adverted to. It then explains, that the deputation of Gungratier Shastry, the Guyca-war Minister to Poona, under the guarantee of the British Go-

Government, had for its object the settlement of the pecuniary claims between the two states, by which the interests of Bajee Row would be greatly promoted; adverts to the Shastry's assassination by the official functionaries of Bajee Row on consecrated ground—a deed, which the general voice of the country declared could not have been perpetrated without the orders of Bajee Row. It refers to the delicacy, forbearance, and moderation which the British Government manifested on the occasion, by merely requiring the surrender of Trimbeckjee Dainglia as the murderer, without throwing the slightest suspicion against the character of its ally; that this demand, however, was not voluntarily complied with, but enforced, at no small degree of expense to the British Government; that as soon as Trimbeckjee was given up, the former relations were instantly restored. The proclamation next notices the extensive intrigues which Bajee Row commenced, in rousing the native states to a resistance of the British Government, in exciting disturbances in his own country, and in raising troops on the plea of suppressing those insurrections; and the measures of precaution which we pursued to suppress those disturbances, which led to our investing the city of Poona; that Bajee Row became thus subject to our power. It points to those repeated professions and acknowledgments which Bajee Row has made of his being indebted to the British Government for his existence as a Sovereign, and of his gratitude for the blessings he had enjoyed; and to the necessity of concluding another treaty in confirmation of that of Bassein, for the purpose of depriving him, not of his sovereignty, but of the means of intriguing to the prejudice of the alliance. The proclamation proceeds to explain the objects of the late arrangements for suppressing the Pindarees, whose depredations has devastated Bajee Row's territories; that he confessed that it would be a measure highly conducive to his interest, and engaged to co-operate in its accomplishment; but that under these fair promises, the most active, extensive, and powerful engines were secretly set to work, to organize a force to oppose us; that he seized a moment which he thought favourable, attacked the troops of his ally, and burnt and plundered the British residency and cantonments.

That the Company's subjects passing through his country, in the security of existing treaties, were seized and imprisoned, and British officers on the road to Poona were murdered in the most inhuman and disgraceful manner, and the perpetrators retained in his service. It notices the recall of Trimbeckjee to his councils, and thus becoming a participator in his crime, and the invitation given to the Pindarees to enter and plunder his territories. It declares, that Bajee Row had by these acts abandoned the duties of a sovereign, and pronounces his unfitness to govern; it proclaims his deposition, and develops the determination of the British to place the country under the Company's government. It details the military arrangements in progress for that purpose, and our determination to rescue the Rajah of Sattarah from the custody of Bajee Row, and to establish a principality for the maintenance of his rank and dignity, with which view the Rajah's flag had been displayed at the fort of Sattarah. That the Rajah's territories should be governed by his own laws, but that the British authority would be introduced into those to be reserved to the Company. It adverts to the principles of justice which distinguish our administration, and warns all of the consequences of adhering to the fortunes of Bajee Row.

We have attempted to give the purport only of the proclamation, which is dated the 11th of last month. It is a most important and interesting document. It has been received with feelings of the highest satisfaction by the inhabitants of the Concan, and we doubt not has produced effects equally cheering and exhilarating to the great and valuable mass of the population of the Deccan. Thus has the power and influence of the mild and inoffensive government of the Brahmans terminated, we trust, for ever.

SOUTH AMERICA.

[From the Buenos-Ayres papers.]

When the combined Patriotic Army was in daily expectation of being attacked by the Royalists in Chili, and the public treasury exhausted by preparations of defence, the whole of the secular and regular clergy, the various corporate bodies, and richest individuals of Santiago, met together, and agreed to form a depot of all the silver plate and valuable ornaments they respectively possessed for their personal use, and a committee was named to present the same to Government with an appropriate Address.

The Government accepted the same as a loan, and as property which, in the hands of Commissioners, might be pledged as a security for advances of money, but not alienated, as the same would be returned to the respective owners as soon as the revenue of the State would allow. In the mean time, to record such a patriotic act, the following inscription was engraved on the pyramids which exist in the eastern and western points forming the two entrances from the sea and land side into the capital:—

"On the 5th of March, 1818, the inhabitants of Santiago voluntarily delivered up the whole of their jewels and silver plate, protesting that they would furnish themselves with no other as long as their country was in danger. Nations of the universe, foreigners who may enter Chili, decide whether such people can again be converted into slaves!"

It is a well known fact, that General San Martin refused to accept either additional rank or any personal recompense after the two brilliant victories gained at Chacabuco and Maipo. On the first occasion, the Municipality of Santiago sent him a present of 20,000 dollars, which he returned, saying that he was satisfied with having done his duty. His example has been followed by the other Chief Officers.

A Correspondent says,—“The Overseer resident at Worthing refused, on the 10th September, to give an order for medical assistance to a poor woman and her three children. Application was made repeatedly by the distressed mother, for which importunate conduct he ordered her with her children into the Black Hole, or Lock-up House, as a lodging. The small-pox soon appeared, and the youngest child fell a victim to its malignity and the want of medical aid. This affair is undergoing strict investigation by the inhabitants, who have warmly interested themselves in behalf of this much oppressed and injured individual and family.”

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 27.

If any doubt remained respecting the speedy meeting of the Allied Promise-breakers at Aix-la-Chapelle, it would be done away by the intelligence that "engagements" have been concluded for lodgings and palaces, and "arrangements" made to procure game, and "the finest fish," and "the conveyance of oysters from Antwerp." The blessed personages, who are now having their day, are earnest in these things if in nothing else. Their own comforts, their own luxuries, their own liberties and enjoyments of every species, are sure to be kept in fine condition. The "high contracting parties" for treaties and political promises, may fail in their word; but "the high contracting parties" for oysters! See if they fail,—at least in eating them. The old saying about promises and pie-crust is realized with them in all its glory. It is said that King JAMES knighted the piece of beef, which is called in consequence Sir Loin. The French, who are fond of giving names to their dishes, should dignify pie-crust with the title of Foi dui Roi. It will not meddle with the celebrated oath of FRANCIS the First, who though he was a King chose to swear upon Foi de Gentilhomme.

The Courier says, it is "sorry to state," that the slaves at Demerara, Trinidad, and the adjacent islands, have been in the habit for some time of seizing schooners and boats during the night, and proceeding to join the "freebooters" in the Caraccas. This is one of the usual daily specimens of unconscious absurdity and self-committal, with which the demi-official journal is in the habit of treating us. By "freebooters" he means, we suppose, the men who have undertaken to free themselves from the yoke of a bigoted and tyrannical prince, as we did at the time of the Revolution; but even if he meant real freebooters, what reason has he to cry out thus against the West Indian slaves? How came they slaves but by the most odious and infamous of all freebooting,—the stealing of men,—the tearing them up by the roots from their country and their affections? The official notification, of which the Courier gives an extract, talks of a schooner having been stolen by some negroes,—of a negro who "calls himself free,"—of another "belonging to a Mr. HARRIS,"—and of another who was "slave to a barber!"—Such language is to be expected from an official notification; but when a political writer, in these times, sees things to make him sorry in negroes who steal schooners and run away from slavery to barbers, what a ridiculous figure does he cut in eyes that have the least perception of common justice and morals! A schooner deplorably stolen by stolen men! And fellow-creatures belonging to barbers!—Oh most legitimate barbers!

Not to fail in any thing that can help to shew him absurd and unwitting, the Courier follows up this passage about the negroes with the following one respecting our Holy Ally the Emperor of RUSSIA. "The article," says he, "from St. Petersburg, dated the 28th of August, communicates an important Manifesto," with respect to the existing relations between Russia and Persia. After noticing that the peace with Persia "gives tranquillity and security to the eastern frontiers of Russia," it proceeds to publish the terms of that peace, which, though now first promulgated, was concluded as far back as the year 1813. "The most remarkable stipulation is that by which the Emperor of RUSSIA binds himself to support, if necessary, the succession of the son of the СНАН, who may by him be nominated heir to the Throne, and pledges the powerful assistance of Russia, to prevent any foreign foe from interfering in the affairs of Persia. In other words, Persia is taken specifically under the protection of Russia. What will Sir ROBERT WILSON say to this? The least he can do will be to write another book upon Russia, and prove with his usual accuracy, that in a few years the Imperial flag of ALEXANDER will float upon the walls of Fort Wilam."

Now we know not what Sir ROBERT will write on the subject; but we know, that the least he can do will be to say that the opinion he has generally expressed of the Russian Emperor is hereby proved to be true; aye, and that the Courier thinks so too, or it would not put on this affected smile. But see the way in which the literary representative of my Lord CASTLEREAGH speaks of this manifesto:—there is no "sorry to state" here, as in the case of the negro-stolen schooners. And yet with all our notion of the would-be liberality and real common-place tendencies of the Emperor ALEXANDER, we hardly thought he would put forth this long-concealed manifesto at a moment like the present. Does he do it to give us a fore-taste of the Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle?—to break the pie-crust gently for us? Here is an avowed document by one of the Allied and Holy-Allied Sovereigns, in which he binds himself to support the succession of any son whom the СНАН may name, whether of course the Persians like it or not. "In other words," says the non-chalant Courier, relaxing from his outcries against traitors, "Persia is taken specifically under the protection of Russia." The Persians are to have a king forced on them, if necessary, as the French had; and if necessary, the said king is to be protected as his neighbours have been protected by us,—as the Cotiate Rajah was protected formerly, and the Peishwa is just now! And to crown the consummate decency of this Imperial, Allied, and Holy-Allied Manifesto, published in the year 1818, just before the meeting of a new Congress, it turns out that it was concluded as far back as the year 1813,—the very year when Russia and the other Holy Allies were making all those promises of a counter-description to the people of Europe which enabled them to keep their thrones and laugh in their saviours' faces. This ALEXANDER the Little recognized the very principle of non-interference with the popular choice of a Sovereign, at the very moment when he knew he had signed a State Paper in violation of it, and when of course he was prepared to violate it again, as he did, the moment he had an opportunity. An attempt to comment upon this would be unnecessary. It reminds us of the received joke on he stage, where any body, who is astounded beyond measure at a finished piece of impudence, can find no other means of expressing an adequate idea of it, than by stepping a little aside, pulling down his waistcoat, and exclaiming with a nodding head and lifted eyebrows—"Well, damn me, if ever I saw any thing like this!"

The affairs of the Spanish Main attract considerable attention in the United States. A letter from Margaretha announces, that General BOLIVAR has resigned the chief command of the armies. He is to be placed high in the civil administration of Venezuela, for which, it now appears, his high acquirements are more suitable. He is succeeded by General PAEZ.

A Printer of Ghent, the Sieur BUCHER, has been sentenced to a month's imprisonment, for an article inserted in the Journal Des deux Flandre, against the Duke of WELLINGTON.

One Thousand Slaves arrived in the harbour of Savannah the 1st of June: the cargo of one vessel consisted of seven hundred and forty-five negroes!—and this is under the auspices of a Government whose despotism we are to support!

THE KING.—We are enabled, exclusively, to give a few particulars, as to the present situation of our venerable Sovereign, which may not be uninteresting to our readers—and particularly so when such a studied silence prevails on the subject. His MAJESTY is perfectly blind; and occupies a long suite of rooms, through which he is almost continually strolling. Several piano-fortes, and harpsichords, are placed at certain intervals, and the MONARCH frequently stops at them, runs over a few notes of HANDEL'S Oratorios, and proceeds on his walk. He dines chiefly on cold meats, and frequently eats standing. He has a silk plaid dress, and will sometimes stop and address himself to a Noble Duke, or Lord, thus holding a colloquy, and furnishing their answers. The KING suffers his beard to grow two or three days; seldom, however, exceeding three days. His hair is perfectly white. The Doctors WILLIS attend with the other Physicians, but not with the privacy of the KING. He is quite cheerful in his conduct and conversation, eats very heartily, and enjoys good bodily health.—Provincial paper.

It is supposed, from the late and present number of the Bank prosecutions for forgery, that the profits of their Solicitor must exceed twenty thousand pounds a year, under that head of practice alone.

A mercantile establishment, in the course of business, received a 1*l*. note from the Bank of England, stamped as FORGED; but, relying upon the correctness of their own judgment in the matter, they sent it back to the Bank, persisting that it was a good and valid note. The Bank, thereupon, replied, "On re-inspection, it appears to be a genuine note, and, therefore, I enclose you one of the like value. This unfortunate mistake and oversight arose out of the hurry and multiplicity of business."—Portsmouth paper.

It is computed that no less than 10,000 persons are daily on the road, in stage-coaches, in different parts of the kingdom.

We have received a vast number of letters, complaining of a periodical work published in Scotland, but lately circulated in London, and called Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine. From the specimens which have been shown to us, we think it better to let the work die that natural death to which, though so newly born, it must soon come. It has the principles of corruption and mortality in every page. In other words, it is, like the Scourge and the Satirist, so grossly slanderous on individual character, that a gentleman would blush to have it seen a second time on his table.—Times.

Private letters have been received from the Discovery Ships under Captain Ross, dated 1st August, in lat. 75. 48. N. long. 61. 30. W. They state, that the ice was clearing away, and that their prospect of success was improving. The most extraordinary phenomenon of the variation of the compass had gone on increasing; it was 88. 13. on the ice; we say on the ice, for on board ship, owing to some peculiar influence not yet ascertained, it was much more. The former letters, of which we have already given extracts, mention, that on board ship the variation was at one time 95 degrees, that is, the needle pointed instead of north, to the southward of west. This difference between the real variation and an apparent variation on board ship was first observed by Captain FLINDERS; but it was supposed to be an accidental peculiarity in his ship: it is now clear that it belongs to all ships, and varies in all, and there would be little doubt that it should be attributed to the influence of the iron about the vessel, except for a curious fact which we understand has been ascertained—namely, that the compasses called insulated compasses, which are placed in boxes of iron, and which are uninfluenced by external iron, when brought near to them, are affected by the ship-variation in the same degree as the common compasses. This, which is now called the deviation, has been found to be much greater as the experiments go northward. This is accounted for from the circumstance of the dip of the needle diminishing what is usually called its polarity, and allowing it, therefore, to be more easily affected by the local influence of the ship.—Courier.

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.—"This artist, by order of the PRINCE REGENT, is gone to Aix-la-Chapelle, for the purpose of painting all the heroes of Waterloo who may be present at the ensuing Congress. A room is to be allotted in Carlton-house for the reception of these portraits, which is to be called the Waterloo room. The Prince shows a true sense of the value of the glorious victory in question, as well as taste in the selection of the artist who is employed on so honourable an occasion."—(Sun.) "Every body (adds the Times) must applaud the feeling which has induced the Prince to give this order; and if we had any weight with Sir THOMAS LAWRENCE, we would entreat him to add to the merit of his beautiful portraits, that essential one of resemblance. In general his pictures have scarcely a shadow of likeness: witness his last portrait of the PRINCE REGENT, who was represented, not as a stout and manly Prince of 55, which his Royal Highness really is, but as a mere foppish youth of 25, who had no cares but of wearing his regimentals sprucely. Sir T. LAWRENCE should recollect, that a flattering painter seldom survives the objects painted; and that a lasting character in art, as in every thing else, must have its basis in truth. Who cares a jot now for Sir GODFREY KNELLER, the favourite of Kings and Queens?"

The extraordinary disappearance of a young man named Roberts, who held a clerkship at the Ordnance Office, has been recently mentioned. On Monday night, a young man, attired in a smock frock and red cap, was taken into custody by one of the constables at Woolwich, having been observed wandering about that place without any apparent business. The constable took him before a Magistrate, and upon being interrogated, he said that his name was Roberts. Upon further inquiry, it appeared that he was the young man whose sudden disappearance had caused his family to imagine that he had either been murdered, or committed suicide. The constable, by direction of the Kentish Magistrate, took him before the Magistrates of Surrey, who ascertained the address of one of his relations in town, and ordered the constable to deliver his charge to him. The youth, upon being questioned, said that he was sick of a sedentary occupation, and had determined to join the Independents in South America.

MUNDEN is re-engaged at Drury-lane Theatre, upon his own terms, to perform whenever the gout will permit him to appear on the stage.

Mrs. BILLINGTON died at Pisa about three weeks ago. The Sun gives the following account of this celebrated singer:—"It is stated in a Morning paper, that this admirable singer, who is justly said to have been the best that England ever produced, died about three weeks ago at Pisa. We sincerely hope that the report is not well-founded. Into whatever human errors she might have fallen, she possessed an excellent heart, and a truly benevolent disposition. Unprotected talents, and unfriended distress, were sure of all the assistance which she could afford them, and her benevolence was wholly without ostentation. Hospitality was another prominent feature in her character, and her friends were among the most respectable persons in this country. As a proof how much she was esteemed and regarded, it is impossible to describe the anxiety with which her numerous friends implored her not to leave this country with a husband who, after having lived separate from her abroad for 16 years, came to England, and declared he could no longer live without her!!! Every effort of persuasion was exerted to prevent her departure; but her answer was, that her husband demanded her, and that she thought it her duty to comply. It is said, that since she left this country she had made over the whole of her property to her husband, who had been a Commissary in BONAPARTE'S army, and to whom his wife, during his absence of 16 years, had allowed an ample provision."

The period of Mr. BUTT'S imprisonment terminated on the 22d instant, but his determination is, we understand, not to leave the King's Bench Prison until the One Thousand Pounds is restored to him, which he says has been unjustly taken from him—in the name of the King.

COAL METAGE.—When so many just complaints were lately raised against the Westminster Coal Metage, a ministerial Reform at length took place, under the very eye of Lord LIVERPOOL, who seemed to be of opinion, that if the system was a bad one with two Inspectors, the appointment of four must necessarily do away all objections. His Lordship, whatever else he saw, saw this pretty plainly, that whether the interests of the public were or were not advanced by such an arrangement, the patronage of Government was increased, and this therefore was a clear gain. Besides an excellent political object, his Lordship, it appears, had an excellent private one also to answer on this occasion, for he found no person better fitted to become one of the additional Inspectors of Coal Meters, than his own worthy Butler, Mr. LEE.—Now perhaps there is nothing in the duty of carefully watching over the due admeasurement of coals at the various wharfs of Westminster, which an honest butler might not be well able to perform—but if it be true (as we believe it is) that Mr. LEE still retains the superintendence of his Lordship's plate and the guardianship of his claret and champagne, both at Fifehouse and at Walmer Castle, we really cannot but fear, that Mr. LEE, in spite of all the wonderful aptitude for business which he doubtless possesses, must find it rather difficult to be at the same time on duty on the banks of the Thames, and on the coast of Kent.—Mr. LEE will probably enlighten us on this point, and prove that the measurement of Coals goes on "quite as well" in his absence as in his presence; and this, on reflection, we apprehend may really be the case.

A labouring man, named THOMAS FIVISON, of Friskney, is now down of the small-pox the second time; he had them, when an infant, in the natural way, was then very bad, blind three weeks, and retained the marks of them in several parts of his face. He has them this time of a very fine kind, but has been very full. —Nottingham Review.

The town of Tavistock has lately shown a most laudable example as to parochial system by having its monthly expenditure published regularly, by which means every parishioner has an opportunity of inspecting it, so as to point out where saving ought to be made.

"Cliefden," says the Chronicle, "which is shortly to be brought to the hammer, is no less distinguished by its natural beauties than by the fame it has acquired from the illustrious persons who have at different times made it their residence: it was originally planned and occupied by VILLIERS, Duke of BUCKINGHAM, who expended the greater part of his princely fortune and exhausted his luxurious imagination in adding to the charms of this highly favoured spot. The beauties of more southern countries form its distinguished features, and of them the magnificent artificial terrace, the temple, the alcoves, and the shaded walks, still remain, and are proofs of the exquisite taste of the age in which they were executed."—We can bear testimony to the general accuracy of this account, having been in the grounds, and taken a repast in a boat by the side of them, rocking under the trees on a summer water. Cliefden, at present the possession of the Countess of ORKNEY, is situated in the loveliest part of the Thames, before you come to Marlow, Medmenham, and Henley. POPE'S allusion to it and BUCKINGHAM'S intrigue with Lady SHREWSBURY is well known;—

From what we heard of the present fair proprietor and her love of books, we are sorry she is parting with this abode equally princely and poetical; but the pleasantest places, for want of some old or accustomed association, may become valueless to the most pleasant natures.

BOW-CHURCH, CHEAPSIDE.—It is reported, that the greater part of the beautiful steeple of this church will be pulled down. At the time of the building of the beautiful tower and spire, by Sir CHRISTOPHER WREN, in the year 1673, and for many years afterwards, it was held in so high estimation, and its fame spread so far abroad, that many foreigners came over to see it. It has been very justly deemed the masterpiece of Sir C. WREN; he has not equalled it in any of his designs, public or private, nor indeed has any other architect. The height of this steeple is 225 feet, and it is built on an old Roman causeway, discovered by Sir C. WREN, at the time of rebuilding the present church.—Times.—The same paper of Friday adds—"We understand (from a Correspondent) that the dragon which has served the purpose of a weathercock, on the summit of Bow-steeple, for the last 145 years, will be lowered to the ground on Tuesday next, preparatory to taking down the stone-work, which the injudicious use of iron in the original construction of this justly-admired structure has rendered necessary for the public safety. To ascending the scaffolding which has lately been put up, it was astonishing to see the prodigious effect produced by the expansion of the iron work above-mentioned, which has partially lifted the obelisk on its eastern side in a most surprising and dangerous degree. The vane, which is constructed of thick copper, gilt, is of exceedingly curious workmanship, and (for a dragon) possesses a very intelligent countenance; it measures 7 feet 6 inches in length. Mr. H. ELMES, of College-hill, has contracted with the parish for taking down as much of the present edifice as is considered to be dangerous. We are exceedingly pleased to find, that it is intended to replace this far-famed chef-d'œuvre of Sir C. WREN in the ensuing spring without the slightest variation from the present design, except in the use of more permanent materials, under the architectural superintendence of Mr. GWILT, of Southwark, who is in possession of accurate drawings and measurements of every part, taken expressly with that object in view."

FASHIONABLE BONNETS.—A Lady with an immense Leghorn bonnet, who was recently under examination before the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, did not speak out, even after several warnings and admonitions; at last his Lordship lost all patience, and burst out, "I must get the officers of the Court to remove that pent-house from your head, that I may hear you."

A distinguished Foreigner, who was expressing his admiration of the beauty and magnificence of Waterloo Bridge, observed to an English Gentleman, who accompanied him, that it was doubtless built by Government—"Oh! no, Sir," replied his friend, "it was built entirely by the subscription of private individuals; if you wish to see a Government Bridge, you must go to St. James's Park."

MR. BRAHAM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Birmingham, Sept. 20.

Sir,—Trusting to your acknowledged candour and liberality, I hope you will, in answer to a malicious paragraph inserted in the Times of the 18th inst., state, that I have no coach and four horses, I have no outriders, and I have no superb liveries—would to Heaven I had! nor was I paying a visit to Mrs. Braham's relations at Manchester. But the simple and plain truth was, being engaged to perform at a provincial theatre, and being pressed for time, I was obliged to put leaders to my carriage-horses, and this common incident is maliciously exaggerated into a ridiculous affectation of aping the magnificence of a Duke! True it is I keep my carriage (and so do many theatrical performers), which indulgence I owe to the fostering kindness of a generous public, who, for 20 years, have deigned to regard with favour my humble talents as a vocal performer; and I trust I shall never be found deficient in gratitude to that public to whom I owe all my prosperity, or in respect to my own character, when so wantonly and ill-naturedly attacked.—I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

J. BRAHAM.

The above took place five weeks since, but the anonymous slanderer, to answer his own malicious views, states it to have taken place last Sunday.

[The paragraph (adds the Times) was taken from an evening paper.]

APPROACHING CONGRESS.

(FROM THE TIMES.)

Aix-la-Chapelle, Sept. 18.

This scene of the approaching Congress is not so full as might have been expected from the interest of the spectacle which it will soon exhibit, and the importance of the business which is about to be transacted in it. You meet with very few strangers in the streets, or on the public walks; and the baths and gambling-houses are not more frequented than they used to be, at the same season, in former years. The cause of this will probably be found in the apprehended scarcity of lodgings on the part of some who, but for that circumstance, would have come hither for health or amusement; and a reluctance on the part of others, whose plan includes a sight of this august meeting, to visit a scene of which they are sure afterwards to have enough, before its proper attractions arrive; while those, again, who regard it as a place of business rather than of pleasure, are willing to make sure of their relaxation elsewhere, before they enter on their duties here. Accordingly, Spa and Carlsbad are full of brilliant company, while there is scarcely a single person of distinction at Aix-la-Chapelle. The former watering-place is so crowded, that scarcely any accommodation can be found for fresh visitors, and some, it is said, have lately been obliged to sleep in their carriages. All the persons of distinction who mean to come here have houses or apartments already engaged, so that there is no necessity for their presence till the Sovereigns, the principal objects of interest, are assembled. Their arrival, we learn from the best authority, will not be delayed beyond to-morday or Sunday se'nnight, and the preparations already made, or making, seem to confirm this account. Some of the military force (about 600 men) which is to form the garrison of the town during the residence of the Allied Monarchs, is already arrived, and occupies the casernes near the gate of Borset. It is to consist of about 1,600 men, a considerable portion of whom must, for want of room in the barracks, be quartered on the inhabitants. It will be composed of a company of grenadiers of the regiment of Alexander, of a company of that of Francis (so called at the Congress of Vienna, out of compliment to these two Emperors), of part of a regiment of Rhenish Grenadier Landwehr, of a battalion of sharpshooters, and of a squadron of Hussars. Sentry-boxes are already placed before the houses of the three Allied Sovereigns. There are none as yet before the hotels engaged for the Ministers of the different legations. Prince Hardenberg, who was here some time ago, is now at Coblenz, on the Rhine, and will probably wait at Cologne for the arrival of his Sovereign. They will proceed thence on the 26th, for Aix-la-Chapelle, a day before the arrival of the Emperors Alexander and Francis, that the King may receive, en hole, on the 27th, his illustrious guests into this imperial city of his dominions. The different Ministers of the Allied Courts will probably arrive on the same day, or very soon afterwards.

I have to-day made a circuit of the houses engaged for the different Sovereigns and Ministers, and have heard the sums for which they are hired. They are all engaged, provisionally only, for two months, and the rents which they pay would make it politic for less illustrious characters not to prolong the term on the same conditions. The good citizens of this place knew well that they had a monopoly of lodgings, and, like other monopolists, have taken advantage of their privilege, without making any deduction in solid cash for the honour done their houses by the temporary residence of Royalty. The Emperor of Austria pays for apartments to himself and his suite, including Prince Metternich, 45,000 francs. His Majesty will occupy the house of Mr. Bramertz, a small but elegant residence in one of the best streets of the city, towards the south side. The Emperor of Russia has engaged two houses, one in the town (that of Madame Claus), for which he pays 30,000 francs; and one beyond the walls, about a mile towards Louisberg, for which he is to pay 26,000 more. The suite of his Majesty Alexander will be more numerous than that of any of the other Sovereigns. The Russian Minister at the Court of Berlin, M. Alopeus, is already here. The King of Prussia has engaged a house at 18,000 francs (that of Madame Offerman); and his Minister, Prince Hardenberg, that of M. Bettendorf, at 28,000. Lord Castlereagh is to occupy the hotel of the banker Schlosser, and the Duke of Wellington that of the burgomaster M. Gaita, each at a rent of between 28 and 30,000 francs. The Duke of Richelieu is to occupy the house of M. Polen, for which he pays 22,000 francs: his suite, it is said, will be very limited. Among the Prussian financiers, diplomatists, and military officers who are expected to arrive, are mentioned, besides Prince Hardenberg, the Counsellor of State Jordan, the Counsellor of State Rother, who negotiated the late loan at London, and General Mulling, who during the campaign of 1815, was attached to the staff of the Duke of Wellington. M. Gentz, so celebrated for his political writings, will be in the suite of Prince Metternich. The Princess of Tour and Taxis, the sister of the late Queen of Prussia, has hired a house, and will reside at Aix-la-Chapelle during Congress. Bankers will be as necessary in a part of the ensuing negotiations as ambassadors, and accordingly Messrs. Baring, Rothschild, and Muhlens, are soon expected. Two of the Princes of Hesse are here.

The shopkeepers and the poorer inhabitants of the town, who have not hotels to let, are as busy in preparations as those who have, and have taken the hint with astonishing quickness regarding prices. In every street you see masons, plasterers, and carpenters, at work, repairing, embellishing, or enlarging houses, to enable their owners to catch a portion of the golden shower. Loads of furniture are daily arriving from Paris or Brussels, to fill the formerly unprofitable spaces of empty rooms, and unexplored attics; assortments of candelabras, candlesticks, lamps, house-bells, looking-glasses, and ink-stands, are sold before they reach the magazine of the shopkeeper; and on every third or fourth window along some of the streets you see the inviting notice of Chambres garnies à louer. Their numbers, however, have not yet reduced the price. The enormity of the demand made by the owners of these chambres garnies exceeds any thing we experience in the small assize towns of England on the arrival of the Judges. They know not, indeed, here what to ask, as they have no experience to guide them in deciding what the daily sight of one King and two Emperors is worth at Aix-la-Chapelle; and therefore they exhibit, when fixing the price, the awkward appearance of people struggling between a violent desire to gain all they can, and a fear lest the magnitude of their demand should appear ridiculous. It is no uncommon thing for them to ask 20 or 25 francs a-day, during two months, for apartments which in London could be procured for less than that sum a-week. Two thousand francs for a small bedroom and parlour during Congress, are frequently asked and given. If they ask more, they generally assign some reason, however unsatisfactory, for the excess. A pert little French woollen-draper, in one of the principal streets, who is coining every inch of a large house into francs and Napoleons, had yesterday the conscience to ask for more, and justified the extravagance of his demand, when it appeared to excite ridicule, by elaborately proving that this Congress would be different in point of facilities of accommodation from the Congress of 1814-15, as Aix-la-Chapelle was not so large as Paris or Vienna. Lord Castle-reagh pays forty francs a-day for a stall for four horses, without including the expences of their forage.

During Congress, this town must be a scene of pleasure and recreation, as well as of business; but whence are its amusements to come? Where are its spectacles, its theatres, its race or review grounds, its gardens, its Tivoli's, its Russian mountains, and other Parisian attractions? Must the Sovereigns and their Ministers make a kind of picnic, and each club their share to the common stock? The theatre here is small and inelegant. When the French Government of this department was overturned, a French party who occupied it was prohibited from acting French plays, out of a belief that if Moliere or Corneille were banished from the stage, the people could more easily forget Bonaparte and the empire. A German company now occupies the place of the French one, acting operas and German pieces. The theatre has not since been very prosperous, and the German manager, from a confidence of being able now to make up for former deficiencies, has refused to cede his right of amusing the Sovereigns to a French party who had made an application for the use of his boards: but if we have no brilliant spectacle on the stage, we shall have sights of a different kind.—There are here already no fewer than two aeronauts—Madame Reichard, the wife of a professor at Dresden; and Mademoiselle Garnerin, so celebrated for her ascents in France. The former lady, as being a German, will have the preference, and make the first experiment. Besides several other singular characters expected here during Congress, I may mention Mademoiselle La Normand, who excited such a noise in Paris in 1815 and 14, by her fortune-telling powers.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

THE QUEEN.

The Morning Chronicle of Monday contained the following article:—"Great pains seem to be taken to make the public believe that the QUEEN has no personal property besides her jewels. It may be so, though when it is recollected that her MAJESTY has been in the habitual receipt of costly presents, as well as a great income, for fifty-eight years, and that she has never been suspected of extravagance, it can scarcely be credited that she is destitute of funds. Certain it is, that from the first day of her illness, she has expressed a most eager desire of going to Windsor and to Frogmore; and surely provision might have been made to gratify her wish in this particular. It is supposed that her MAJESTY has papers and valuables there that she wished to dispose of in her life time, and which she has been prevented from doing. If she should die without a will, her property, to whatever extent, will go by law to the KING—and the KING's property, if he should die without a will (which it is now manifest he must do) goes undivided to the PRINCE REGENT. We cannot believe, however, that this consideration could influence his Royal Highness, or that any feeling but that of apprehensions for her safety could have prevented an attempt being made, in the intervals of her malady, to gratify her anxious wish of removal.—All thoughts of removing her at this time must be now given up."

The Courier of the same day thus replied:—"On Saturday we copied from a Morning Paper a paragraph, asserting that the QUEEN possessed little or no private property besides her jewels and trinkets. The fiction of the immense wealth privately amassed by her MAJESTY has long been a favourite topic of calumny. The silent and unobtrusive manner in which the QUEEN has conducted her private affairs, was converted into a ground of slander; and because no clamour could be raised against her MAJESTY on account of improvident debts, it was assumed that must exist matter of reproach on the score of her avarice and parsimony. "Be thou chaste as ice and pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." If the QUEEN does possess a few score thousand pounds, it is more to her honour than to die penniless. But we believe her MAJESTY never has had any private fortune, and this fact must now soon be known, notwithstanding the base insinuations in a Morning Paper on this subject. At such a moment as this, it might have been expected the characters of the QUEEN and of her children, those children whose attentions are most exemplary and affectionate, would have been spared. But faction knows neither times nor seasons. It invades the death-bed, with the same cold malignity that it does every other sanctuary which the decencies of social life have always held sacred. Could no motive suggest itself to these most pernicious adepts in defamation, who violate the harmony of domestic intercourse, why the QUEEN should wish to be removed to Windsor, but the sordid one, of watching over the appropriation of hoarded treasures? This was calumny enough; but it was fabricated only as the foundation for building one of a still darker complexion against the illustrious individual who administers the government of the country. We will not disgrace our columns by copying the detestable insinuation, even for the purpose of refuting it. And it is the less necessary, because, while we hope there is but one man capable of making such a charge, we are sure there are none by whom it will be believed."

To this the Morning Chronicle replies:—"We are accused by the Courier of having made an insinuation unfavourable to the filial piety of an illustrious person, in the remark we made on the circumstance of the QUEEN's not having been removed to Windsor, at the time when she was in the habit of taking the air in her garden-chair. We certainly made no insinuation disrespectful to the PRINCE, as we distinctly stated that no doubt her non-removal arose from apprehensions for her safety—much less did we think it would be any reproach to the QUEEN, that, in the course of a long life, she had, by frugality, acquired the means of distributing among her affectionate issue the valuables of which she may be possessed, and we simply expressed our sorrow that her anxious wish to be removed to Windsor had not been gratified.—We are aware that all the Members of the Royal Family are of opinion that her MAJESTY does not possess any considerable pecuniary funds, and they are the best judges; but undoubtedly the public notion is different. The circumstance of so many of the Royal Family going abroad at a moment so alarming, has given occasion to much conjecture, and it is the province of an independent print to allude to the circumstance. The Courier thinks otherwise. Every thing is sacred with the Editor of that Paper which appertains to power; but he can truly refer to his past labours to shew that he was the man of all others to speak of the PRINCE REGENT and his Brothers in terms too gross for repetition."

The Morning Herald, in which first appeared a paragraph denying that the QUEEN possessed any considerable private fortune, has inserted the following statement upon the subject:—"A paragraph inserted by us some days since, in contradiction of the notion that her MAJESTY is the possessor of immense wealth, has subjected an Evening Paper which copied it to a very unreasonable attack. A pretence is set up that this paragraph is part of an endeavour to represent that the QUEEN has no personal property, besides her jewels. The paragraph went no such length, and from our knowledge of the writer, we are very sure that it was written without any courtly, or other political purpose. We have no doubt that her MAJESTY's accumulations were considerable, but we understand that those of them which remained in this country have been greatly diminished within these few years. The Princess ELIZABETH has full powers with respect to those in Germany. That her MAJESTY wished most earnestly to go to Windsor we have frequently mentioned from good authority, and it is probable that her anxiety had relation to some papers and other valuables there. But it is absolutely untrue that she was ever prevented from going. She went to Kew as a stage on her way to Windsor. That short journey was injurious to her, and while she staid in the hope to gain strength, she became worse. In an interval of her illness an experiment was made, as to her ability to bear the motion of a coach, and by that she was so much distressed that it could not be repeated. Preparations were then made for suspending a chair in a very long carriage of the landau shape. Twenty workmen were employed upon this, when the QUEEN became incapable of being removed from one room to another, and an order was sent to discontinue their work."

"It appears that the justly-celebrated Dr. BAILLIE has been called in to attend her MAJESTY. We are assured that till within the last three or four days, no hint was given to the QUEEN of her alarming condition, and she was herself totally unaware of it; for when it was with all possible delicacy suggested to her that the malady was of a nature to excite apprehension, her answer was, "You do not think my complaint serious?" The calling in of another physician, therefore, and of the high reputation of Dr. BAILLIE, must necessarily have made an impression on her mind; and, under all the circumstances, it is a proof that she is considered in extreme danger."—Morning Herald.

We understand that Dr. BAILLIE did not see her MAJESTY when he called at her house in Kew. It was probably thought that the appearance of a new Physician would too much agitate her mind.—Morning Herald.

Her MAJESTY was better on Thursday night, than she has been on any preceding night during the last fortnight. From ten o'clock till four in the morning, she slept without intermission, and she awoke in a state of great composure, and in a considerable degree free from those painful sensations of the chest, which have heretofore oppressed her so very much. These favourable symptoms continued throughout the whole of yesterday, and at half-past seven o'clock in the evening, there was every prospect of another comfortable night.—Courier—Saturday.

Yesterday's Bulletin:—

"Kew Palace, Sept. 26.

"The QUEEN has slept well in the night, but her MAJESTY's complaint is much in the same state this morning as yesterday."

The Abbey and St. Margaret's Bells were rung on Tuesday morning, and at one o'clock the Park and Tower guns were fired, to commemorate the 57th anniversary of their MAJESTIES' Coronation.

SMOLLETT'S TOMB.

Situated on the banks of the Arno, between Leghorn and Pisa, in the most romantic spot that even the vivid imagination of an Italian could select, rises the tomb of our countryman Smollett, the author of Roderick Random, &c. It is of a plain octagonal form, about 30 feet in height, and 6 feet in diameter at the base, which forms an apartment to which there are three doors. The English who visit it from the port of Leghorn have erected a plain marble table, surrounded with stone seats within; and scarcely a vessel arrives, but the officers and crews pay a visit to Smollett's tomb. It is worthy of remark, (as noticed in a former paper,) that the tomb is covered with laurel, so that hardly one stone can be seen, and it is even bound up to clear the entrance at the doors. The laurel grows wild in all parts of Tuscany, and the homage of friends has planted many a slip on the tomb of departed genius. Four marble slabs are placed inside, with inscriptions in the Italian, Latin, Greek, and English languages. The Italian runs thus—

Stranger! respect the name of TOMAS SMOLLETT,

An Englishman,

A man of letters, and playful genius,

He died contented in Tuscany,

His soul requires your prayers.

J. B.

LATIN.

He knew every thing—he loved every one.

Familiar with past and present ages,

His works merit a place by the side of Boccaccio.

Pray for his soul.

GREEK.

Here Smollett rests, a citizen of the world,

A Xenophon and an Hippocrates,

A Terence and a Boccaccio.

If he had a native country, it was this;

For here he chose to die:

I was his friend.

J. PALLONIETTA.

THE ENGLISH INSCRIPTION.

"Patria cara carior libertas."

The great Historian of his day,

Who rivalled all but Hume below,

Thou tread'st upon his lowly clay;

Then let thy tears of rapture flow.

The first of Novelists he shone,

The first of Moralists was he,

Who nature's pencil waved alone,

And painted man as he should be.

Dumbarton's vale in life's gay prime

Cherished this blossom of the north,

Italia's sweet and favour'd clime

Enshrines in death the man of worth.

J. H. B.

A poet of Italy has said pleasantly, that he cared not where his bones were laid, so that they were not molested by having bad verses inscribed on the spot where they lay. If poor Smollett had the same feelings, how dreadfully unquiet must he lie under the weight of such execrable epitaphs as are above quoted. The first three are translations of the Italian, Latin, and Greek inscriptions; the fourth is original English, and luckily defies translation.

into any other tongue. Besides the wretched versification, the two first contain what is frequently very necessary in an epitaph, but what certainly cannot recommend it to those who knew the subject of it. They contain each an untruth: Smollett did not die contented in Tuscany, but with the utmost regret. Smollett did not love every body, but was almost as great a hater of his fellow-creatures as Swift himself. The Greek appears to have been written by some not very "learned Theban" or Boeotian, who had probably learnt logic from an Irish priest, if we may judge by the inconsequence of his reasoning. The fourth has the merit, and that alone, of a successful attempt to crowd into twelve lines as much nonsense and bad verse as the space would admit.—Times.

COMPLAINTS OF A PLEBEIAN.

SIR,—Before the meeting of Parliament, when your columns will be devoted to the labours of that most enlightened and virtuous body, may the tittle-tattle of a plain industrious shop-keeper presume to occupy a corner in your Journal? I cannot indeed offer you many brilliant ideas, such as embarking into a feature, standing prostrate, or turning my back on myself. I cannot repeat "Agen Sir," like Mr. Finlay, the Cotton-spinner, or roll out a load of syllables like paving stones out of a cart, in imitation of the Duke of A. But in the absence of such entertainment, I hope to be allowed a hearing.

Sir, I am a poor man, who have been plainly educated and hardly brought up. My father wore out his life in ill-requited labour before it had lasted 50 years. I have just married and embarked in the endeavour to work for my living and enjoy my life, and I think, Mr. Examiner, with due deference to your understanding, that no man has a better right to enjoy his existence than he who supports it by his labour. In short, I have always held it but just that a man should reap the fruits of his own exertions. Carrying this opinion to its full extent, I am no enemy to taxes in the abstract, because, if they were imposed and employed by persons in whose appointment I had a share, and for the purpose of administering laws made by persons as properly appointed, I should be really then reaping the fruits of my labour, in the security afforded to my life and property, much better than if I had laid out the money in purchasing arms for my own defence. But I begin already to find, that work as hard as he will, a man has very little prospect, under the existing order of things, of gaining anything more by his industry and patience, than the liberty of working just as hard for the rest of his life.

I am not much of a politician, Sir, and have come into life but lately; I cannot see through the events of past years; my time is too much occupied in providing food, raiment, and lodging, the first necessities of life, to allow me to acquire much knowledge. I work from six in the morning till ten at night, and sleep from eleven till six, consequently I have but one hour in twenty four, and but one day in seven for any thing else. I cannot untwist the chain of causes and effects, but this I can easily see, that in a society where one half or one third, or even one fourth of the members, live luxuriously on the labours of the remainder, there must needs be a much greater portion of labour exacted of that unfortunate remainder than would suffice to procure them a comfortable subsistence, and for which too they will receive nothing in return. In short, there must be an unequal distribution of pleasure and pain. I must open my heart to you, Sir, in plain terms:—my life is becoming a burthen to me. I strive to get forward, as it is called, that is, to keep by me a little more money than I have immediate occasion for. I open shop sooner than any of my neighbours, am never away from the counter, and keep open till the chance of a customer is quite extinct for the day. But all in vain. The excise-man visits me one day, the assessed-tax collector the next, and the overseer's collector the day after. Well, away my money goes—but not discouraged, I say to myself, "they will not at least be here again these three months, let me try again." In this resolve, and with an hawk's eye to every penny that comes to my till, I go to work again; a wretch, poor, squalid, sick, half-naked, presents himself at my door—"Have pity, Sir, for God's sake, one halfpenny to buy bread,—I am a disbanded soldier,—a wounded and discharged seaman,—a workman who cannot find employment."—What can I do? I guard as much as possible against imposition; I enquire into circumstances, and almost always find the necessity for relief urgent; and so my labours are once more partially defeated. Once more, however, I start for myself, but another drawback is at hand,—the Parson must have his dues, and my contribution to the repairs of the Church must be forthcoming. Well, try again: If I cannot stop this efflux on one side, let me try to save on another; I must deny myself some enjoyment that shall be equivalent. Accordingly, I turn off my shop-boy, and run out with parcels myself, leaving all the trouble to my wife the while. I sit at home every other Sunday, instead of walking in the fields with my wife, lest I should be tempted to the extravagance of laying out a few shillings in treating her with tea abroad. Still, however, I am not at rest, and cannot enjoy even the few pleasures to which I have reduced my allowance. If I ask a friend to spend an evening with us, I cannot dismiss the reflection that his entertainment costs money, how little soever, and I have yet a sum to lay by for my taxes. If I go abroad with a light heart, to pursue some cheap and innocent diversion, a tale of distress, originating in those exactions which my youth, strength, and perseverance only enable me to bear up against, assails me from some shirtless, shoeless, comfortless wretch, at every corner of the street, wrings my heart with commiseration, dissipates every thought of joy, and fills my mind with the most alarming apprehensions. What can I expect but to meet their fate, who have had just such means as I have, and yet have fallen? Distracted with fears, I ask myself, Why is this? why is my labour unprofitable to me, my temperance unrewarded with cheerfulness, my patience unproductive of relief? I grow serious, Sir, my spirits are sinking; the labours of the day, to which this letter has added a 17th hour, oblige me to break off and take repose. If you insert this, I shall resume my correspondence in one more letter, and if possible in a more cheerful style, next week.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A PLEBEIAN.

BANK NOTES.

TO THE COMMISSIONERS FOR PREVENTING THE FORGERY OF BANK NOTES.

GENTLEMEN,—To each of you it may be said, "Work whilst it is called to day, for the night cometh in which no man can work." An interval of six weeks has produced in London and Middlesex a host of criminals, whose lives are forfeited, as the law now stands, but against whom the Bank Directors dare not take convictions. Months have elapsed since the House of Commons recognized the necessity of some attempt to remedy the evil, and yet its march is unchecked, and the only palliative is the extraordinary phenomenon of a conspiracy between the Bank Directors, their Solicitor, and Counsel, and strange to say, the Judges on the Bench, to compound felony! And in order thereto, we have heard pathetic pleadings from the Judge, to induce the criminal, when solemnly called on before God and his country to tell the truth, to mutter out a falsehood, that he may have the benefit of escaping under a verdict, that Judge, Jury, and Criminal, all know to be false: and this violation of principle is made expedient and right, (that is, better than not doing it) because all parties agree with the public opinion, that the law ought not to be executed.—Gentlemen,—the probability is, that you are dispersed to enjoy the beauties of nature, and that another Session will produce its 20 or 30 victims, to be decimated at the will of the Bank Directors, and the unfortunate two or three to be brought out and strangled, because the Directors, feeling that the crime, even if successful, does not affect them the twentieth part of a penny, are too much absorbed in higher matters to attempt a remedy. Should no other occur to you, it will be in your power to enforce one improvement, often suggested to them, which must inevitably so narrow the power of imitation, that few would possess it, and in the same ratio would be the facility of detection and the aversion to the risk. It is, TO HAVE THE NOTES WELL ENGRAVED. This they will say is impossible, from the number they require. Let them have them as well done as POSSIBLE, and unless excellence is a very common thing indeed, there will be few who possess the talent that will expose themselves to long solitary confinement, supposing that the punishment.

Were I addressing a Bank Director, I would say to him,—“When you say in your daily prayer, forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us, remember the select persons whom you have doomed to die for their trespasses against you, and if your tongue will obey you, repeat this clause in the Lord's Prayer: if you hesitate, resolve to have no more blood on your hands, and rest not till you have removed the temptation to crime that the present facility affords.”

On you, Gentlemen, an awful responsibility rests; lay it to the heart, and it will stimulate you to exertions which must produce good;—but what you do, do quickly.
HUMANITAS.

We are quite weary of attending to Counsels' truisms and Judges' charges with respect to the wickedness and mischief of fraud and forgery. Who can deny that they are both wicked and mischievous, but the same nature of things which makes them so, has imperiously ordained that crime should increase in proportion to extent of temptation and ease of execution; nor will this general law suspend itself in deference to the connexion between a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Banking Company; neither is it like the Habeas Corpus Act, to be suspended by an alarmed majority. What was to be expected, but what is the case, in regard to a crime, the temptation to which is palpable to man, woman, and child, and which every age and degree of understanding can commit? From the moment that Bank Notes, capable of being imitated, descended to express sums, which all may be supposed to possess, the present result might have been anticipated. The operation reminds us of the embankments against water in Fen countries; woe to the proprietor who sees an outlet of the circumference of a quill, without immediately attending to it; the whole bank soon yields to the laws which govern water, and a deluge ensues—which is just the history of Bank Note forgery. We heartily despise the inconclusive heads, to say nothing of the torpid hearts, of those who can trust to banishment and the rope, for the cure of an evil of this nature. But allowing the punishment of delinquency, however created, to be a matter of indifference, what is to be said for the mistrust, suspicion, and thralldom of innocent persons, which are becoming every day more common in this wretched state of things? What person can offer a Bank Note in a strange place without exciting all manner of apprehension, and submitting to that pleasant kind of interrogative look, which seems to ask if he is uttering what he knows to be forged? This to all, but how in regard to poverty of appearance? Why nothing more likely than that the slightest surmise or mistake may conduct a poor man, woman, or child, to examinations and commitment, one case of which we insert in the present paper, and several of which have lately met our attention. The Magistrate not unfrequently reprimands the mistaken person in these instances, but it would be easy to shew, that he is almost as much to be pitied, as the person he has injured. In short, in regard to its currency, the country is in a state of most “admirable disorder,” and as if there must be blunders in regard to it of all sorts and sizes, an act has lately been passed in regard to 3s. and 1s. 6d. pieces, which, for the first month or two of its existence, could not possibly be obeyed; there not being a town of magnitude in Great Britain, out of which a dextrous informer might not have levied a fortune in penalties. This is ingenious and creditable. As to the Bank notes business, it must be attended to; for it is of little consequence whether Mahomet go to the mountain, if the mountain will come to Mahomet.—Chester Guardian.

DISPUTES AT PADDINGTON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—As several errors and omissions occur in the account recently published of the late Parish Meeting at Paddington, I beg leave to offer a few remarks, which, I hope, will tend to rectify the mistakes and supply the deficiencies. The Vestry of Paddington is not “a select” but an open Vestry, in which every inhabitant who pays rates can give his opinion and vote. But I presume the person who furnished the narrative in the Observer introduced the adjective “select” merely to evince his wit at the expense of his neighbours. I am at a loss to imagine how he can call the majority of a legal assembly “a faction,” especially when the “boisterous and personal animosity” alluded to originated with the minority, whose leaders had lately been ousted from office, for involving the Parish in a labyrinth of debt and confusion. Whether Mr. Thatcher's charge of mal-practices against Mr. Shill, late Surveyor of the Highways, “was factious,” appeared sufficiently evident at the last Vestry, where it was demonstrated that Mr. Thatcher himself, as well as the rest of the Parish, had sanctioned those accounts, which he now came to denounce, and where he received censure instead of applause for his behaviour on the occasion. The Vestry attributed no “heinous crime” to the short-hand writer, but simply enforced its customary regulation for the exclusion of every one who is not entitled to vote; nay, they are so tenacious on this point, as not to admit agents or representatives of absentees. The 43d of Elizabeth states, that the liability of an inhabitant to pay rates, constitutes him a Parishioner; but the recent Act says, that his last assessment must be paid or tendered, to render him eligible to vote, as was the case a little time ago with Messrs. Thatcher and Butler, who were not allowed to give their suffrages, because their ultimate rates were not liquidated.

The parish affairs concern none but those who contribute to the rates; and although a difference of opinion and animosity will often arise, it is still not proper to obtrude such dissensions on the world in a garbled or exaggerated manner; a course, which will perpetuate party spirit and not repress it. The gentleman in question was not the only person who was requested to retire; another was expelled on the ground of not being eligible.

Messrs. Thatcher, Butler, and others of their “faction,” no doubt wished to put some one of the name of Craig in the chair, in preference to the Churchwarden, for the purpose of displaying a trial of strength, and giving the Inhabitants “a retort courteous” for the treatment which some of the party had very deservedly received; but the parish was not to be hoaxed with the repetition of old schemes, which produced nothing but expense, jobs, and trouble. The motions for the said Mr. Craig to take the chair, and for exculpating Mr. Thatcher from blame in his accusations against Mr. Shill, were, it is true, carried in the affirmative by their own partizans, who at an earlier hour than usual monopolized all the Vestry-room. Such a decision was therefore superseded by the majority, who, with a large surplus of votes, determined that Mr. Bones, the Churchwarden, should be placed in the chair, and that Mr. Thatcher's conduct, relative to the charges against Mr. Shill, was reprehensible and unjust. Permit me to advance a few words on Parish Committees. Messrs. Thatcher, Butler, Kent, and others, who modestly, in the Observer, arrogate to themselves the appellation of "most respectable gentlemen," have always been partial to Committees, although their labours have generally augmented those expenses which they professed to curtail, and increased those disputes which they promised to diminish. If the Parish-officers are not worthy to be trusted, why appoint them? But if they are unexceptionable characters, why perplex them with investigations, involve them in difficulties, and detain them from their business? The Vestry is the proper place to adjust their accounts; and indeed any inhabitant, who contributes his quota, can inspect the books at seasonable hours.

I trust to your candour for the insertion of these observations, since it is necessary to publish a correct statement to obviate partial details, and unfair misrepresentations.

A VESTRYMAN OF PADDINGTON.

Paddington, Sept. 10, 1818.

P.S.—To shew how highly the Inhabitants of Paddington appreciate the services of Messrs. Thatcher and Kent, I annex the final state of the Poll, on Tuesday the 22d instant, when these Gentlemen again offered themselves to fill the office of Surveyors of the Roads for the ensuing year:—

LAW QUESTION.

MR. EXAMINER,—In answer to your Correspondent, who inquires whether a witness summoned, or rather subpoenaed, in a case of forgery, can be compelled to swear, &c., I believe he will find that the law cannot compel him either to attend or to be sworn or to give evidence, but that he is liable to an attachment and to be imprisoned for any such refusal in a criminal case, and to a penalty and an action for damages in a civil case. There is no legal power or instrument to force a witness into Court, or to make him speak when he gets into the Jury-box, for the rack and torture are luckily abolished (from our legal code at least), though it was formerly resorted to in the case of a prisoner standing mute, the only punishment for which however now is, that the prisoner is considered guilty of the crime for which he stands indicted.—If a witness submits to be called and sworn, his refusal then to give evidence would, I apprehend, amount to perjury—(having taken the oath "to speak the truth and the whole truth," &c.)—presuming that it can be proved that he is in possession of material evidence. The only legal excuse for a witness declining to give evidence is, when it might tend to criminate himself, which no witness can be compelled to do. As to the point "when the evidence would lead to the conviction of the prisoner," this makes no part of the question; for until evidence be given, it is not presumed by or known to the Court what a witness can or may depose. It is the refusal of a witness to attend or to be sworn, or to give evidence at all, by standing mute, or by not speaking the truth and the whole truth, which renders him liable to punishment, and not whether his evidence be important or not, either for or against the prisoner.—I am, &c. EGOMET.

OLD BAILEY.

On Saturday week, the COMMON SERJEANT passed sentence upon 21 prisoners, who all pleaded guilty to the minor offence of having forged Bank of England notes in their possession, knowing them to be forged.

The COMMON SERJEANT, in passing sentence of transportation for fourteen years upon the prisoners, observed, that they had all, except Wm. Sadler, who had suffered his case to go to trial, confessed themselves guilty of the crime of having forged Bank of England notes in their possession, knowing them to be forged, and availed themselves of the humanity of the Bank, the Directors of which were willing not to proceed capitally against them on a confession of guilt to the minor charge. They ought to feel the force of the mercy thus extended to them by the prosecutors; for had the capital charges been persevered in against them, and convictions ensued, their lives would have been the inevitable forfeit which the law would have enforced for their crimes.

The greater part of the prisoners seemed perfectly indifferent.

On Thursday, John Bishop, aged 29, was indicted for stealing a pocket-book containing 4l. 16s. and a brooch, from the person of Elizabeth Rose.

The prosecutrix stated she was wife to Joseph Rose; she lived at 25, Devonshire-place. On the 8th of August she was going to Upper Mary-le-bonne-street, at nine in the evening. She had a large bundle of clothes and a bundle of potatoes. She was going along Upper Wimpole-street, when the prisoner came up and said—"It is a pity so slender a figure as you are should be so loaded." Witness made him no answer, and he then said—"Madam, allow me to treat you with a coach," and she answered—"I don't want you nor a coach either." He said—"Don't be frightened, I am a gentleman of unlimited fortune, and don't wish to sit in the coach with you." Witness said he certainly should not. He followed her to Portland-place, and it being very dull, she was afraid to cross it. She had 16s. on her, four 1l. notes, a brooch, and some memorandums. Prisoner seized her arm, and by force detained her. When she got as far as Weymouth-mews, he thrust a parcel into her hand, and said, "There is 20l. if you will go with me for a few minutes." He put a very indecent question to her. He pulled her about, and she felt his hand about her pocket. Seeing somebody come up, he let her go, and ran away. She then missed her pocket book. She was so much injured as to be unable to cry out for a moment or two, but he was pursued and taken. The prisoner wished to make up matters at the watch-house, but she would not. She could not swear to the notes, as she had not marked them.

Stephen Lidgard was passing the street, saw the prisoner running fast, he was stooped, and putting his hands behind him, he asked what he was stooped for, and in a minute or two the woman came, and said, "You have robbed me, Sir, of my pocket-book." He was then given in custody of two watchmen. The area of the house, where the prisoner was apprehended was examined, and a pocket-book was found.

This evidence was corroborated by two watchmen, and by the constable.

The Prisoner, in his defence, declared his innocence, and laid his hand on his heart. He was most genteely dressed in black. He called five witnesses to character, who knew nothing of him but that he was a gentleman.

The RECORDER—Of course every fellow who does not work for his living is a gentleman; that is the way of the world now. It is a very easy thing for thieves to appear as gentlemen.

Verdict—Guilty of felony.

The RECORDER—Gentlemen, this is a very proper prosecution, for you see this convicted thief dresses like a gentleman, and represents himself to be a person of unlimited fortune. By this means he got opportunities of stealing from persons, especially females; and you have done very proper in finding him guilty. The Court will take care what becomes of him, and that he shall not do the same again in this country. The fellow lived, as you see, in an attic story in a dwelling house, and this shewed whether he was an independent gentleman or not. At all events, gentlemen, he was fond, it seems, of being exalted by living there, and I trust he will feel that the punishment which we shall award him is no more than proper. I see you had no doubt of his guilt, for you instantly convicted him; and indeed it was utterly impossible you could do otherwise. It is a horrible thing to think on, so many thieves of that description are at large in this country; but we must do our duty.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.

On Monday, a case came before Sir William Curtis, which sets all ordinary powers of description at defiance.—A man, named Oldershaw, a conveyancer, once in flourishing circumstances, residing at St. Paul's chain, was brought up charged with having done several dangerous things, to the great terror of those who lived within his reach. The particular act with which he was first charged was, that of having proceeded to pull down the upper part of his house, without having made any arrangements by which the lives of the people could be secured. He had, it seems, already taken down a hundred weight of lead, without the assistance of a human being, and was constantly employed in hammering the walls, so that the neighbours round about were trembling for their lives.—Mr. Godwin, of Paul's-chain, represented these circumstances to Sir William Curtis, who said he could not interfere upon the present evidence.—Mr. Godwin said, that if this case could not be proceeded upon, there was another which had the strongest claim upon their humanity, for it comprehended the distresses of the defendant's wife and family.—The poor man's wife and children were in the office. His wife had a half-starved child in her arms; the other two children sat on the ground at the feet of their father; one of them was a cripple; the other almost blind; want was the strongest expression in the faces of the whole family, except the mother's, who had that combined with many troubles to make her a signal instance of suffering.—Mrs. Oldershaw said, her husband had been once in great circumstances, but now was fallen below the notice of every one in the world but herself by unavoidable misfortunes. Every thing in the house had been disposed of for the support of the family, and her husband had not dined since Thursday last. She declared that he was as harmless as his poor children, and she endeavoured to justify the extraordinary proceeding of taking down the house, by saying, that his object was to improve it.—Her face was bathed in tears while she thus spoke of her husband's necessities. She complained that he was now in hunger as well as in grief, and she seemed to lose all sense of her own privations in her fears for him.—Sir WILLIAM CURTIS said, "You are a good woman, and I see will never desert him. God help you all. You must now tell me whether he is right in his mind."—Mrs. Oldershaw said, she feared he was not at all times: his troubles had taken effect upon him, but he would come round to his senses when the world treated him with less bitterness.—Mr. Godwin said, the affection the poor creature had for her husband made her conceal the most serious consequences of his disorder; to the violence of which, one of his children owed the loss of his limbs, and the other the loss of his sight. "I remember," said Mr. Godwin, "when that poor cripple was as fine a child as ever I beheld; and I have seen the unhappy man drag his wife through the snow in the middle of the night." Another gentleman said, he saw the defendant running about the house early on Saturday morning with a lighted paper in his hand.—Sir W. CURTIS.—The case is, without doubt, the most affecting that ever came before me: the parish officers must do their duty. Mr. Deputy Box, I request you will convene a vestry, and take immediate steps for the relief of this poor family. As to the unfortunate man, I consider him a complete lunatic.—Mr. Box said, it should be done as soon as possible. The Worthy Baronet ordered that the utmost care should be taken of Mr. Oldershaw, in the Compter, for the present, and of his wife and children by the Overseers.—"You shan't want your dinner any more, my poor woman," said Sir William, "if I can help it."—"Aye, but will he have his dinner?" observed the poor woman. "He shall indeed," was the reply.—Every one in the office was deeply affected at the scene. Several were in tears.—Mr. Godwin, it appeared, had prevented the family from starving for the last two or three days.

BOW-STREET.

A young female, apparently not more than 17 years of age, was charged by her own mother, a respectable woman in the Strand, with having plundered her to a large amount. The mother, in extreme agitation, stated the circumstances:—Her husband died when the prisoner was about nine years of age, and left her with three other children. Every attention was paid to their education, and especially to that of the prisoner. Her behaviour was always most dutiful, until about a year ago, when she became acquainted with a man named Rotherton, who represented himself to be a half-pay Captain. This acquaintance commenced at the theatre, and his appearance and manners were so favourable, that he was invited to visit at her house. He came to the house every day, and sought every opportunity of taking the girl to places of amusement. This intimacy at length proved fatal to the virtue of the daughter. Rotherton, one evening, prevailed upon her to accompany him to a house in Chandos-street, Covent-garden, where they remained together for three days and nights. On the evening of the third day she came home, and although received with joy, her behaviour from that moment was totally changed. She conducted herself in the most violent manner, even abusing her mother. Her paramour constantly came to see her, notwithstanding that her mother forbid him the house. Within the last three months she missed jewellery and wearing apparel from her house; and discovered that they had been stolen and pledged by the prisoner, and she had every reason to believe, to support the vile seducer, who was no more than an adventurer. She put up with these losses in the hope that her daughter would listen to her remonstrances; but it was of no use; and having detected her in the act of carrying away her own watch and seals, she gave her in charge of an officer.—The girl, with a smile, said she would do the same again, and ten times more, "to assist her dear Mr. R."—At this answer, the unfortunate mother dropped senseless into the arms of an officer, and was conveyed out of the office.—The Magistrate, after giving the prisoner a most severe admonition, which seemed to have no effect upon her, ordered her to be remanded, and to be kept in close confinement.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

A complaint of a most aggravated nature was submitted to the Magistrates of this office. Two gentlemen, who said they were parish-officers, represented, that a person, living at 10, Noel-street, retired to rest in perfect health on Thursday week; as he did not appear at his usual hour to breakfast, the landlord went to his bed-chamber, and found him quite dead. On Friday and Saturday application was made to Mr. Lewis, the Coroner: he was in the country. Mr. Gell was then sent for: he also was absent. On Monday an application was made to Mr. Stirling at Battersea, and that gentleman was engaged at an inquest twelve miles distant. Under these circumstances, finding it impossible to obtain the attendance of a Coroner, the Overseer requested the advice of the Magistrates what course to pursue, the body being in so putrid a state as to be quite dangerous.—Mr. FARRANT deprecated the negligence of the Coroners; he granted an order for the body to be removed to the workhouse. He recommended that the body should be examined by a surgeon, and that the depositions of the beadle should be made before a Magistrate, and that a vestry should be immediately convened to take this negligence of the Coroners into consideration. These measures were delayed until Tuesday. As no Coroner had then appeared, it became imperative on the parish officers to act decisively.

UNION-HALL.

On Wednesday, a boy, aged 10, of most deplorable appearance, was brought before the Magistrate by the constable of Christchurch, who stated that he found him soliciting charity in Blackfriars-road; the only article of covering which he had was a piece of coarse, filthy sacking, which was wrapped round his body, and fastened with a piece of rope. Upon being questioned, the child stated, without hesitation, that his father's name was Shaw; he lived in Fox's-court, Gray's-inn, and was by trade a carpenter; his mother was a bookbinder, and they both had plenty of employment; himself and his brother, who was about nine years of age, were regularly sent out every day by their parents to get all the money they possibly could by begging; the whole of what they procured they gave to their father and mother.—The Magistrate directed the constable to take the child to the parish-officers of Holborn parish, where the friends of the child lived, and inform them of their infamous conduct.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

STR.—The dreadful results to be feared by the employment of armed bodies in a free State, and more especially in a time of peace, are shewing themselves more and more every day. The following relation will shock you as much as the transaction itself did numbers of eye witnesses. One of the soldiers stationed as a guard at the gate of the British Museum, whose name I understand to be Daniel Newton, entered into a contest by some practical joke with a poor woman. After abusing each other, the fellow, to prevent the woman passing along the pavement, presented his bayonet to her breast, and then struck her with his musket and bayonet violently over the neck, shoulders, and back, at least seven or eight heavy blows. The whole neighbourhood was alarmed with the shrieks of the woman, and many of the residents, as well as the spectators, much to their honour, interfered. The Serjeant of the Guard was called for, who wished to enter into a discussion as to their political sentiments, and whether they considered soldiers unnecessary. For redress he referred them to the Horse Guards. The fellow who committed the outrageous assault declared, that if he had run his bayonet through the woman, no one could have hurt him, and finished by defying the Gentlemen who had interfered.

Is this, then, the language that soldiers are taught; and are they armed against their fellow citizens?

This outrage took place about 11 o'clock this morning.

Leaving you to comment upon such atrocious conduct and language,—I remain, yours, &c. AN EYE WITNESS.

Wednesday, Sept. 23, 1818.

A man of the name of Peck, a keeper of cows, who cut his throat a few days since, died on Tuesday week. He was in pretty good circumstances, yet the present scarcity of fodder for his cows had impressed on his mind a persuasion that he should die from want, and to this circumstance is this act of suicide attributed.

An unfortunate accident occurred on Monday afternoon, in White Rose-alley, Beach-street, Barbican. The wind blowing very strong, a stack of chimnies, at the house of Mrs. Roach, No. 3, in the Alley, was blown down, which fell upon the roof and drove it in; two children were asleep in bed in the attic, a beam fell upon the head of one of them, a girl about six years of age, and killed her instantly. The other, an infant only two years of age, was taken out of the ruins, but slightly injured; the mother (Mrs. Roach), who is a widow, was injured very severely on one side.

An inquisition was taken on Wednesday before Mr. Lewis, at the Committee-room, St. James's Workhouse, on the body of Mr. Frederick Renaud.—The Jury viewed the body, which was in such a state of putrefaction that they could not discover a single feature.—The Foreman inquired when the deceased died, and being informed that it was on Thursday week, he said the inquest ought to have taken place sooner, for the health, if not the lives of the Jury, might be affected by such negligent delay.—An application had been made to the Magistrates whether the parish would be justifiable in burying the body, the Coroner being out of town, and the Magistrates said that the body might be interred immediately, if the parish officers were of opinion it might cause infection if it was above ground until the Coroner arrived.—The Coroner's Clerk stated, that it was the duty of the beadle to inform the Coroner when an inquest was necessary, and no information of the death of the deceased was given until eight o'clock on Saturday night, and the beadle said that Tuesday would be the most convenient day for the Jury to sit.—The Jury said they hoped such delay would never take place again.—It was stated in evidence, that the deceased had resided for some years at the house of Mr. Hopkins, No. 10, Noel-street. He went to bed on Wednesday evening, and on Thursday night he was found dead, lying on his bed with his clothes on. A surgeon gave it as his opinion that the deceased died on Wednesday night; he had therefore been dead 24 hours when found; he was also of opinion that he died from the rupture of a blood vessel, or apoplexy. There were no marks of violence on the body of the deceased. The witnesses did not believe that the deceased had taken poison, as there were no phials or cups about the room.—The Foreman and other Jurymen said, that had the inquisition been taken sooner, they might have had better evidence to have enabled them to return their verdict; they might have seen themselves whether there were marks of violence, on the body, and also have formed their own opinion, from their own observation, whether he had taken poison or not.—It appeared to have been the fault of the beadle that the inquest was not taken before. The Jury returned a verdict of—Died by the visitation of God.

Tuesday night, Mr. H. Brooks, of the Strand, with two ladies returning to town in a gig, were stopped by a highwayman near the end of Chalk Farm-lane, in the Hampstead-road. The fellow with one hand seized the horse's head, and with the other presented a pistol, with horrid imprecations. Mr. B. urged forward his horse, and cut at the highwayman. He succeeded in disengaging himself at a time when three men, armed with bludgeons, were advancing from the hedge to assist their companion; the fellows followed up their object until the appearance of a coach induced them to relinquish their pursuit.

Wednesday morning, about four o'clock, the premises of Mr. Withers, High-street, Whitechapel, were broken open, and robbed of a writing-desk, containing 12*l.* and a quantity of plate and wearing apparel. Thursday night some thieves got into the workshop of Mr. Jebbete, builder, Webber-row, Blackfriars-road, and stole a number of deals. Same night the house of Mr. Scoldfield, Kent-street, was broken open, and various articles of plate, wearing apparel, and a pocket-book, containing 50*l.* stolen.

Wednesday night, or early on Thursday morning, the house of Mr. James Amazon, James-street, Bethnal-green, was broken into and robbed of various articles of plate, about 10*l.* in Bank notes, two watches, and several articles of wearing apparel.

Thursday evening, Maria Waller, servant to J. P. Prestcott, Esq. Nottingham-street, who had left her place in the evening at nine o'clock, with a bundle, and 12*l.* in money, was, on her way to a friend's in the Hampstead-road, accosted by a well-dressed man, who obtruded his conversation upon her, and made splendid offers of protection, all of which she rejected. He persisted in walking by her side, and at the north-west angle of Fitzroy-square, he snatched her bundle of linen, which contained a small box with the money, and thus deprived the poor girl of all the fruits of her industry.

Two of the gang of robbers, whose depredations have been so extensive in Surrey, and whose proceedings have been productive of serious alarm, are now in custody. They were found in a place of concealment by Snow, the constable of Newington, who discovered a crow-bar, box of phosphorus, and matches and several picklocks near their haunt. The crow-bar has been found, on comparison, to correspond with the marks at eight different houses in and about Newington where doors and shutters have been broken open within the last fortnight.

REMONSTRANCE WITH THE PRESENT POSSESSOR OF THE SPANISH THRONE.

WE have the pleasure of laying before our readers this week a representation addressed to the Creature now on the Spanish throne by a Gentleman high in the estimation of his country for talents and integrity. Upon the subject of it we have often had occasion to speak ourselves; and we can truly say, that we never did it without a certain loathing, in the midst of which there was one little "cordial drop" which relieved us,—and that was the impossibility that a subject so every way disgusting could continue for any great length of time to be a subject. The very loathing became its own reconciliation.

And yet, if any thing could add to this sensation, it would be the sight of this wise and patriotic individual before us compelled to put his mind into a posture of official respect, and address this creature by the titles of "Sire" and "Majesty";—nay, more,—compelled to talk to it of thousands of human beings, to whom the conformation of its head and heart really happens, for the present, to be of consequence!—Of consequence?—Aye, and of infinite consequence too, unless such remonstrances are made, and such loathing felt as it ought to be. But it must be so. The snake in the fable, which stung the man that warmed it, was nothing to the spectacle here offered us. The ceremonious approach to a bull, a cat, or an onion, by an Egyptian theosophist, was nothing. The bull has his strength and his uses; the cat is at least handsome, and will not quit its home for nothing; and the onion, after it was worshipped, might have been eaten. But here is a patriotic and high-minded Spaniard, who for being one of the foremost in keeping a throne for a King who had forsaken it, for helping to administer his affairs well in his absence, and for paying him the compliment of supposing that he would keep his promises and be grateful in return, was actually condemned to death by this very animal, and is now obliged, at a safe distance, to address him as if he were his superior! The snake is coiled on a royal cushion, and its saviour must look and shiver afar off.

Doubtless this spectacle is as degrading to the Spaniards who stand near and can suffer it, as the necessity of forming a part of it must be disgusting to the patriot at a distance. But it only shews what bigotry and bad habits can do. If it were not for the gratuitous and implicit obedience shewn to FERDINAND's predecessors, for the very sound of "I the King" which is pompously put at the bottom of proclamations, and for the instinctive worldly compromise which has so long existed between king-craft and priest-craft—

FERDINAND would not have sat thirty days on his restored throne.

Luckily for one's fellow-feeling of humanity, the want of common gratitude in FERDINAND is equalled by his want of common sense. He is one of the weakest-headed of mankind; and this at once furnishes our best relief and his best apology. Every man has his excuse more or less, to be found in the depths of charity; and thank heaven it is so, or we should sometimes take one's fellow-creatures for devils. In proportion therefore as we are made angry and impatient by such a being as FERDINAND, we repose ourselves on his ignorance. In proportion as we loath and shrink with abhorrence from his ingratitude, we lay our cheek in very gratitude against his stupidity, and thank it for rendering him bearable.

Not the less intolerable however does he become in a political point of view; and this very stupidity which reconciles him in the eye of philosophy, will be the overthrow of his graceless despotism. The bigotries and bad habits above alluded to, in spite of the re-action afforded them by the victories gained for his ungrateful brethren, are not what they were in any part of Europe. So well are they understood and exposed in some quarters, and so felt to be hollow in others, that even the negative feeling on the subject shall have its effect; and FERDINAND and his nonsense can not go on abusing common sense, virtue, and decency, even from the bare inability of his would-be advocates to espouse his cause, for very shame. These very brethren are ashamed of him. He breaks his promises and exposes the bad part of royalty, too grossly even for them. Lord CASTLEREAGH, that gentleman-usher in politics, who thinks it the top thing in creation to bow, and smirk, and be shallow, and prepare the way for kings, might say something for him at Aix-la-Chapelle, and probably will insinuate; but even he, with his instinctive feeling for common-places, has found out, that the Spanish Monarch cannot be defended as earnestly as a genteel handler of holy altars and snuff-boxes could wish; and the subject both of Spain and Spanish America will most likely slide off at Congress into mutual shrugs and little snuff-taking attempts at accommodation:—"Now couldn't we manage this!" and "Couldn't we manage that!" and "Wouldn't it, upon the whole, be advisable?"—

It is, of course, to extend and impress this general feeling respecting FERDINAND, rather than from any hope of its making an impression on him, that Signior FLOREZ has published his Representation. And no doubt it will have a very considerable effect. It is the first time that Europe has had a regular account of the matter in question from the pen of any one of the intelligent and excellent men concerned. The Spanish Patriots have, in this representation, at least put forth their voice. Don ALVARO speaks for all; and if we may guess from the translation, he speaks well and nobly. His paper is a kind of counter-proclamation against the faithless and ungrateful measures of the King:—it is a Manifesto from the Real Sovereignty of the Spanish nation,—from that Intellectual and Moral part of Power, which is now so contrasted, and compelled to be contrasted, with Power merely Political.

We do but spell Spanish ourselves; though the events of the present times, joined to the celebrity of the Spanish wits and poets, and to the evident beauty of the language, which seems to contradict the old saying about the non-union of Majesty and Love, incite us strongly to become acquainted with it. But on turning to the original of this document in the Espanol Constitucional,* we perceive that the Morning Chronicle translation has omitted passages, chiefly referring to well-known English authors. It may have been as well to do so, considering the press of matter in newspapers; and a weekly paper has more to consider in this respect than others; but still we should like to have had the whole piece; for a good author always loses by abridgment; the observations too of former eminent writers on the duties of kings may well be repeated at the present time; and finally, the name of Locke quoted as an authority by a Spanish writer is unfortunately an absolute curiosity, especially when it is remembered that our celebrated philosopher, in common with a number of his countrymen, is in the list of authors prohibited by the Inquisition.

We have already said that Don ALVARO FLOREZ ESTRADA is in high repute with his countrymen as a man of talents and integrity. It should be added, as giving singular weight even to this character, that at the beginning of the Spanish Revolution, he held the chief office (Procurator-General) in the Principality of Asturias;—that he was the only Authority in Spain that solemnly declared war against NAPOLEON, the people having been the movers in all the other provinces;—that he was the first Authority that opened the Spanish ports to the English;—and that it was he who sent Commissioners to this country to form an alliance against the invader. Through the hands of one of the English Commissioners, he was complimented, we understand, with a snuff-box to the value of a thousand pounds, in which our Sovereign's picture was set in diamonds,—so high, at any rate, was our notion of his services. But after the return of the King, he still continued to write in favour of the promised Constitutional Monarchy, and "what," exclaims the Editor of the Espanol, "was his reward for services so exalted? We shudder with horror to repeat it! He was condemned to death!—And by whom? By that very FERDINAND, for whose restoration he had laboured so diligently."

The Editor puts no note of admiration to the close of this passage; and it wants none. There are some things to be admiringly uttered in the progress of astonishment,—others to be quietly pronounced in the settlement of disgust.

It has also made its entire appearance in a separate pamphlet, published, as well as the Magazine, by BOOSEY and Sons, Broad-street.

REMONSTRANCE ADDRESSED TO FERDINAND VII. BY DON ALVARO FLOREZ ESTRADA.

SIRE,—At the end of four years, and when the evils of the nation are daily increasing, it is full time that your Majesty should listen to the voice of other persons than those who have hitherto directed the operations of your Majesty. As I am confident that a greater service cannot be rendered to the nation and to your Majesty than by exhibiting, without the least disguise, the true causes of so many disasters which have occurred, I derive courage in laying before your Royal Person the present humble Memoir, in which I will endeavour to explain the most principal of them. A moment, Sire, in which the baneful influence of your advisers has no controul, those advisers who, transforming the names of every thing, convert small weaknesses into great crimes, and the foulest acts into patriotic virtues, will suffice for your Majesty to be convinced of the importance of my object, and induce you to listen calmly to the only language capable of repairing the stained character of your Majesty and saving your political existence; the only one capable of freeing the Spanish people from the evils by which they are oppressed and raising the nation to the rank for which it is destined, if well governed. I therefore presume to hope your Majesty will accede to my reverent supplication, since it is the last stage of depravity to reject plain and honest truths, particularly when they have for object the felicity of millions of oppressed beings.

That Prince ought not to reign, says a Philosopher, who is ignorant of three things, viz.—the means of exercising his authority according to the enactment of wise laws; of administering justice impartially to all his subjects; and lastly, of carrying on war, either by himself or his Captains, against external enemies. These same maxims are also upheld by the Book of Wisdom, which assures us, that if the Prince administers, as he ought, justice to all his people, the latter will live in peace and be contented, and the Prince will be loaded with blessings, as his only glory is to render his subjects happy. It would, in fact, be a phenomenon, unknown in the history of human affairs, to see a people dissatisfied and in continual commotions against a just and prudent Prince. If this undeniable maxim is acknowledged, how terrible, Sire, is the consequence to be deduced when we reflect on the general and great discontent that has existed among all classes of the state, during the reign of your Majesty. Will it be necessary, in order to remove all doubts respecting the existence of this dissatisfaction, for me to incorporate in this Memorial a specific list of the many persons who, without any other crime than the courage to think and a wish to establish the same that is thought and established in the most happy nations of Europe, are now dragging a miserable existence in dungeons, of which a description would make humanity shudder; or confined in prisons destined for the most infamous criminals, or without a home, friends or fortune; divested, in short, of every enjoyment in life, as a reward for the most important services, are compelled in foreign countries to beg a scanty and precarious subsistence, filled with tribulation and bitterness? Is it by any chance unknown that, within the space only of four years, the whole of your Majesty's reign, the blood of several heries has been spilled, who no longer able to bear up with an absolute, unlimited and illegal power, had placed themselves at the head of various parties, in order to re-establish the empire of the law, of order, and of reason, which we had all sworn to defend, and without which a King cannot be powerful, or fail of being converted into a tyrant? Is it besides supposed, that the clandestine and shameful manner in which the sentence was executed on the worthy Lacy is unknown, an act which, of all others, manifests, in the most evident manner, the discontent of the nation? The penalties imposed against crime, on the secure principle that good legislation ought to act rather as a preventative than punishment of evil, have for their first object not so much the chastisement of the criminals themselves, as the timely warning of the other members of society; and for this reason, when executions are not done in a public manner, they naturally point out the real existence of discontent on the part of the people, as well as the injustice and dread of those who decree them.

With a view to give greater clearness to my Exposition, I shall divide it into three parts. In the first I shall rapidly sketch the circumstances and events of the departure, absence and return of your Majesty to Spain. Without this previous examination, it would be impossible to form a just conception of your Majesty's conduct, as well as of the grounds of complaint on the part of your subjects—what your Majesty had a right to claim from the nation, and the latter from your Majesty. In the second, I will take a view of the present state of the nation: without this it would be impossible to estimate the rectitude or errors of your Majesty's government, since it is from the laws only and their administration, that the benefits or evils of society emanate. In the third, Sire, may I be allowed to lay down my opinion with regard to the measures which ought to be adopted in order to re-establish the felicity of the nation, without which it would be an impious and gross absurdity to suppose that your Majesty can be a just and powerful Prince, beloved by your subjects, and respected by foreigners.

PART FIRST.

Unfortunately, kings are no more than men; that is, like them they are subject to errors and passions, to the same want of experience, and the same intellectual and physical deficiencies; but with this difference, that in the former, defects are attended with much more important consequences, because kings are bound to watch over the happiness of others, and much less pardonable, because they have so many more means of avoiding them. Very young, or, which is the same thing, without prudence, the exclusive result of years and reflection, and without any other knowledge of the management of public affairs than that received through the medium of a clergyman, perhaps suited to direct a seminary of ecclesiastics, but by no means proper to form the opinions of a Prince, your Majesty saw yourself placed on the throne in a situation difficult to fill with dignity, being involved in intestine dissensions, of a nature the most serious and fatal to domestic repose, at the same time that a cunning, bold, and powerful Conqueror was in possession of all the important places on the frontier, and, under the cloak of friendship, with numerous and strong armies, was invading the very capital and the remainder of the kingdom. Circumstances were, in truth, extremely difficult, and for this reason any error of political calculation was then pardonable in your Majesty. The Spanish nation, too generous—too much habituated to tolerate and even overlook the defects of its Kings—too inflammable at the idea of a certain species of heroism—too much beset by external enemies, and at the same time strongly disunited, not so much with its own misfortunes, as with the authors of the disasters of the preceding reign; at first time thought of nothing else but the enjoyment of having changed the Monarch, and consequently of expressing their good wishes in favour of your Majesty, borne away with the infatuation of considering him traitor to his country who cordially did not consider your Majesty as the first hero of history. But, at the same time, the nation could not help viewing in the light of a crime, or at least of the extremest folly, the advice of those who persuaded your Majesty to depart for Bayonne, leaving your subjects in the sad alternative of yielding to a shameful submission which they detested, and which, at every sacrifice, they wished to repel,—or of placing themselves in a state of real anarchy, before they were able to choose fresh authorities, and throw down those left by your Majesty, which either corrupted or intimidated by the very orders left behind by your Majesty yourself, counteracted the wishes of the people, already so heroically manifested.

Your Majesty, borne away by the advice of men, whom I shall rather class among the ignorant and weak, than among the perfidious and traitors to their country, not only abandoned the nation at the precise moment when it required most protection, at a time when it was invaded by a conqueror, but you made a renunciation of all your rights in favour of the conqueror himself. This, in the very language of the greatest advocates for absolute power, is for a King to dethrone himself.

In this state of things, and at the end of a two years' war, without being possessed of a King, either in fact or right, notwithstanding the contrary might at that time be said and believed, the Representatives of the nation, elected in conformity to the regulations of the Supreme Government then in existence, most assuredly in conformity to the general opinion of the most sensible Spaniards, and beyond doubt in the most legal manner such elections can be made, assembled in the Island of Leon, one of the few points then free from French dominion. In their first sitting, and before thinking of the many dangers by which they were surrounded, they unanimously declared your Majesty to be King of Spain. By this acknowledgment they made to your Majesty the present of a Crown which your Majesty had lost, and which, although received from their hands, was, if not more legitimate than the former one, at least more decorous, more estimable, and more conformable to reason. After this act, in order that the present might not remain without effect, their only great and unceasing care was, under the greatest sacrifices, to promote the safety and existence of that very Throne, then so strongly attacked, and previously so shamefully abandoned. As no one of their enemies has hitherto dared to deny this truth, it would be superfluous for me to seek to prove this second and important service they rendered to your Majesty.

But in order that the merit of these two services, so rendered, may appear in their proper light, notwithstanding I have not the honour to rank among the number of those who forced that worthy Congress, allow me, Sire, to make a few observations, which I will present with a certain degree of caution, in order that they may not be charged with forced colouring.

The said Representatives, without incurring the charge of being wanting to any law, divine or human, were then at full liberty to constitute themselves into a Republic, or to name a King taken from a new dynasty, more strongly bound, on this account, to conform himself to the future Constitution. They were not ignorant that, after the renunciations at Bayonne, your Majesty, from Bordeaux, and without being under any state of compulsion, had issued a Proclamation, in which you enjoined the Spaniards to submit to Napoleon. They knew that your Majesty had written to the latter, felicitating him on his victories, on the very inauguration of his brother Joseph; soliciting of him to grant you one of his nieces as your spouse; and requesting him to confer the command of one of the divisions of his armies on the Infante Don Carlos. They all had seen the Escorial Decree, and the motives therein published and circulated to the whole nation, by your august Father himself. They were aware that the renunciation at Aranjuez had been done in the midst of a popular tumult, without the consent of the nation, and indeed without the smallest previous form of decency; as if the nation possessed no other privilege than that of obeying him who asserted that he occupied the Throne. Finally, they were made acquainted, that two days after this singular occurrence, your august Father had declared his abdication in favour of your Majesty to be null, which it would be a strange contradiction not to admit, if they acted according to the principles of legitimacy, by the virtue of which alone your advisers wish to suppose your Majesty King of Spain; since, if a nation holds no powers to elect a King, even when the latter has abandoned it, much less can it cease to acknowledge one who has already been acknowledged as such, till he declares to the nation itself that he does not wish to reign any longer.

Notwithstanding all these considerations, each one of which was sufficient to make them stagger, not one of them hesitated to declare your Majesty to be King of Spain. What more important merits, or what more voluntary services than these two, could these men have rendered in favour of your Majesty? And is it possible, Sire, that at the time you were issuing your Decree of extermination against the whole of them at Valencia, a Decree, afterwards commuted, according to language INSULTING TO HUMANITY, into "the indulgent sentence of confiscation of property and confinement in castles and dungeons;" is it possible, I repeat, that such great and spontaneous services, which of themselves alone destroy the whole of the impostures of their enemies, should not have had more weight in the breast of your Majesty than the crimes alleged against them, even when the latter were true, and even when your Majesty had been led to believe that your Majesty at will was allowed to trample to the ground all the laws which exist among men? Is it possible that your Majesty should have rewarded the party of advisers who persuaded you to abandon the nation and the throne, and who were more or less stained by oaths and submission to the Usurper, whilst you punish the good Spaniards who saved your Majesty and the country? Is not this to have forgotten, on the day of the distribution of rewards, all those who were present in battle? Would the majesty of justice have been in any way injured by the pardon of imaginary crimes, and in no way proved, at the sight of real and indubitable services? Would the prerogative of your Majesty have been in any way diminished, by the confession and acknowledgment of a debt of gratitude?

But, independent of the services which these men rendered to their country and to your Majesty, I will examine their conduct purely on the reverse, which their enemies have succeeded in representing so abominable in the eyes of your Majesty.—What, therefore, are their supposed crimes? As their cause, contrary to the common usages of all civilized nations, has not been examined by any competent or even incompetent tribunal (they having been condemned by a mere proceeding of your Majesty, which scarcely appears credible in foreign countries, so great is the horror inspired by a measure of this kind), it will become a difficult task. Their very enemies, after using every effort to establish charges against them in a judicial form, have not known how or have not dared to do it, so good was their cause; notwithstanding which your Majesty has not hesitated to condemn them to such penalties as are imposed on the greatest delinquents of the very lowest class. Under such obscure circumstances, or rather under such a non-existence of accusations or crimes, confining myself to what results from the conversation or some loose writings of their enemies, who sought to criminate them, I am led to believe that three charges only can be alleged against them, viz. 1st. Having assembled in the Cortes.—2d. Having declared that the sovereignty resided in the nation—and, 3dly. Having endeavoured to diminish the authority of the Monarch.

It is scarcely credible in the 19th century, and within one of the nations of Europe, that it should be necessary to write the apology of thousands of victims, condemned to endure the most horrid punishments for no other cause than the above three imaginary crimes. The avowed and undeniable maxim that the nation holds the power and authority of assembling its own Representatives, completely destroys the criminality of the first charge. Besides, if it were a crime to assemble in Cortes, how is it that your Majesty, in the face of Europe, holds out to the nation the vain promise of assembling them? Since when did this idea begin to be considered criminal in Spain, which country has enjoyed the Cortes for many centuries, and when they only ceased to exist through the effects of absolute and arbitrary power, and when the liberty and glory of the nation always disappeared with them? How is it that even after their abolition, and during the time that no other Legislator but the King was known in Spain, all the ancestors of your Majesty, when they promulgated any law, uniformly therein inserted, "that it should have equal force and vigour as if the same had been enacted in the Cortes?" Does not this form, in other respects vain and ridiculous, at least point out the respect entertained for that body in Spain? Does it not suppose the King to be only a legislator ad interim, and that circumstances prevented the law being made by the said body, to whom only it belonged to legislate? Supposing it was an error to believe that the Cortes could contribute to the felicity of the nation, or supposing that they ought to be held, as the advisers of your Majesty seek to insinuate, under a less popular form than those assembled in the island of Leon,—from this is it to be inferred that the members belonging to the latter ought to be condemned as criminals to the State? On what probable grounds of justice, can that be treated in Spain as a crime of high treason, which, in a bordering nation, is established by the Monarch himself for the felicity of his subjects, and as a security to his very throne? By what particular services have our neighbours rendered themselves worthy of receiving a Constitution and possessing a National Representation, and by what crimes have we Spaniards made ourselves unworthy of retaining and amending that we before possessed? Let not your Majesty forget the great lesson of Louis XVIII. when a second time he saw himself compelled to quit France. Acting with the greatest wisdom, he did not allege in his own favour to the French nation any other merit than that of having given to them a good Constitution, and having been faithful to it. Perhaps no King could allege more in his own favour. And if your Majesty should again find yourself in a similar situation (no strange event, if we consider how often this has already happened in Europe in a short period of time), would the advisers of your Majesty expect to allege in your favour the re-establishment of a tribunal, the enemy of learning and of every man who makes use of his reason; of that tribunal whose smallest crime is perhaps to shield itself with the name of the Divinity, in order to commit those crimes which most offend it?

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SWEDEN.

DRONTHEIM, SEPT. 8.—Yesterday the coronation of his Majesty took place in the most solemn manner in the principal church of this town. The weather, being uncommonly fine for this climate at so advanced a season, heightened the splendour of this day, which is dear both to the Norwegians and Swedes, on which their Monarch put on the royal diadem in a temple within whose ancient walls no coronation had been celebrated for three centuries. —The act of the coronation was performed with pomp and dignity: when the crown was placed on the King's head, the air resounded with the acclamations of all those who were present, as well as of the numerous crowd outside of the church and in the neighbouring streets. A great part of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood collected to see a ceremony so new in Drontheim, and which might recall to every Norwegian the fairest historical remembrance of his country, and being renewed under such happy auspices, promises to the two united nations a long series of happiness, founded upon their union and their love to their Sovereign.

EAST INDIES.

Another Gazette from the Governor and Council at Bombay, with intelligence of farther military movements and successes in India, was published on Monday. Some of the particulars received through this channel may be considered as indicative of a speedy termination of the war with the Peishwa, or rather of the chase into which he has led our troops. On the 17th of April that Chieftain was attacked by Colonel Adams, who killed and wounded a number of his men, and captured some fine artillery, with elephants, camels, baggage, and treasury. The Peishwa's army was described by Mr. Elphinstone to be in a state of rapid dissolution. The troops, worn out, and completely dispirited, were returning in crowds to their homes and villages. The forts of Bajee Row were almost without exception in our hands; and his own brother, Chinnajee Appa, and Nepaunker, one of his principal officers, have surrendered with their followers, amounting to some thousand men. Gokla, it is known, had been killed in an action with General Smith about the middle of February, and at the date of the last despatches, the immediate submission of Bajee Row was looked for. Sir John Malcolm had pretty well disposed of the remaining Pindarrees. Ranjun had yielded himself to that officer; and Cheetoo had fled in a destitute condition, with not more than twenty attendants. Sir John Malcolm confidently anticipated the capture of that once powerful Pindarree.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

NOTTINGHAM, SEPT. 29.—A dreadful accident occurred yesterday at the Canal Company's wharf, by the explosion of gunpowder in a boat. The vessel was lying under the arch of the Company's warehouse, when an explosion took place, which threw the whole town into consternation, and spread the most extensive devastation throughout the neighbourhood. The report was so tremendous as to be heard at a distance of many miles, and every house in the town was shaken as if by an earthquake. The Company's warehouse, with its contents, was blown into the air, and not a vestige of the building remains. Several roofs were carried off from the adjoining buildings, lead and tiles torn off, window-frames blown out, and hundreds of windows demolished. But the most dreadful part of the calamity is the extensive destruction of human life; no less than eleven persons, already ascertained, have been precipitated into eternity, besides two taken to the hospital, who are not expected to survive. The mangled remains of eight men and a boy had been collected last night. The bodies presented a shocking spectacle; two men were found lying on the edge of the boat, with their heads completely taken off; two others lay near the gateway of the yard, with their skulls dashed to pieces and otherwise disfigured; two other bodies were found in the meadows, having been blown across the canal, one to a distance of about one hundred yards, and the other more than three hundred yards, and the limbs and flesh scattered about in different directions; another was taken out of the ruins a complete trunk, with both legs and arms blown off; and the remaining two mangled in a manner equally shocking. Most of them were married men and had families. The accident (as related by a boatman belonging to another vessel lying near, and who escaped with a few light bruises) originated by a youth of the name of Cross imprudently fetching a hot cinder, and applying it to some loose powder which lay scattered about, with a view of having a "flash," as he termed it. The consequence was, that the fire communicated instantly by a sort of train to the cask from whence it had dropped out, which ignited, and setting fire to five other barrels, the whole exploded with a most tremendous noise. The damage is estimated at many thousand pounds—some calculations go as high as 30,000*l.*, but certainly it is very great. Mr. Wilkes, the Agent of the Company, was fortunately from home, and the book-keeper had only left the premises not more than ten minutes. The explosion took place about three in the afternoon. The papers and books were in a counting-house at some distance from the warehouse, which escaped destruction. A waggon belonging to Mr. Hooton was standing in the yard, and the waggoner, who was near the shaft horse at the time, lost his life; the waggon was utterly destroyed, and two of the horses in the team killed. The sufferers were principally boatmen and labourers about the wharf. Mr. Wilkes's house, which stands near the gateway, sustained comparatively little injury; the windows and the furniture in the house were for the most part demolished: Mrs. Wilkes was thrown with great violence from a table to the other side of the house, but escaped without other injury than what arose from the shock and fright. One person crawled out of the ruins unhurt, owing to several beams falling crossways over him, which preserved his life.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

Melksham, Wilts, Sept. 24, 1818.

SIR,—In answer to your enquiry relative to "A Lesson in Biography," I have to inform you that it may be found in a volume entitled Light Reading for Leisure Hours, published (without the author's name) by Ridgway. That which I have before me is the second edition, and bears date in 1800. It is, in my humble opinion, a book which will well repay you the trouble of reading it.—I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,

T. M. E.

[We have been obliged to another Correspondent for a sight of the book in question, which seems to deserve the character here given it; and a third has politely informed us that the article is also to be found in the Lounger's Common-Place Book, a work which we know to be very entertaining.—Exam.]

If the Lady, who honours us with a question under the signature of A. B. C. is the same that sent us a manuscript for our consideration, she will find that it has been attended to. If not, we are not aware of having received any letter under that signature.

The first part of the communication sent to us by Don DIEGO CORREA is unavoidably postponed till next week, till when that Gentleman will accept our apologies. We have been attending, meanwhile, to his country's cause; and this, we have good reason to know, he loves better than his own personal one.

We should be happy to hear from a MUSICAL PROFESSOR on any other occasion; but though it was very natural in him to notice such an error of our brother critic's, he will feel perhaps a reason why we would rather not be the publishers of his remark. We have much more to do already with the errors of our contemporaries than we would willingly have; but that we cannot help. It is in the course of our political soldieryship.

We thank "A FRIEND" for his letter, and shall consider it. Our friend at Margate is not forgotten, he may be assured. Mr. S.'s third letter on India in our next.

LONDON, OCTOBER 4.

THE distant noise of preparation at Aix-la-Chapelle grows stronger every day:—

"The hum of either army stillly sounds."

The Duke of WELLINGTON set off for that city the other day; the Emperor of AUSTRIA has been on his road for some time; and the Emperor of RUSSIA and King of PRUSSIA have met at Berlin previously to their journey. The King went out to meet the Emperor; and then they entered together, with joint amiableness, like the two Sovereigns of Brentford smelling to one nosegay.—It is curious to observe the different sorts of announcement which the August or Holy Allies have thought proper to make, previously to their new Congress. Some of the smaller Princes have really brought forward their promised constitutions, or at least something of the kind; the illegitimate King of SWEDEN publishes friendly and patronizing letters sent him by the RUSSIAN EMPEROR; the King of SPAIN dismisses his Ministers into banishment,* selects others more intolerant, and sends an order of Knighthood to the King of DENMARK; the Emperor of RUSSIA publishes the most legitimate manifesto, noticed in our last, in which he engages to support the succession of any son whom the Persian SENAI chooses for his heir; and the King of PRUSSIA issues a Cabinet order, in which he speaks of the monument of iron to be erected at Berlin in honour of the late victories, and calls it "an honourable recollection for the valiant combatants, and a serious warning to the youth of the Kingdom to emulate them in valour and in true attachment to their King and Country!" The meaning of this is, that the said youth have expressed an impatience for the long-promised and never-coming Constitution, and that the King wishes to have it supposed that he looks upon this impatience as a young and inexperienced feeling not common to his older subjects. It is common however, and to "the valiant combatants" among the rest; and he knows it, and will be compelled to acknowledge it sooner or later.

Another pleasant legitimate touch has transpired respecting the Russian and his new Persian protégé. Besides the influence and patronage, he is to have it seems a good slice of territory, consisting of the district of Caucasus, and as large as two-thirds of the Spanish peninsula. But he is not ambitious, not he! Oh Lord no!—nor grasping, nor promise-breaking, nor politically profligate, nor a religious hypocrite to others and perhaps to himself! Poland, France, Finland, and the Holy Alliance, prove him the reverse of all this; and now we are to grow absolutely fiery in our admiration of him.

"By thinking of the frosty Caucasus."

The Courier, always contriving to be in the wrong, asserted positively on Thursday evening that there was to be no change of Spanish Ministers whatever. The news of the direct reverse appeared in the Times of the following morning.

"In a statement" (says the Chronicle) "of several leading articles, which are to fix the attention of the four Allied Powers at Aix-la-Chapelle, and respecting which, it is said, there was no diversity of opinion, that appeared in the shape of a letter from Paris, in the Courier of yesterday, among others there is the following:—

"II. The confirmation of the Holy Alliance in its political object, and the examination of the propriety of an armed coalition as a guarantee for monarchical authority, and the recognised dynasties, against the progress of the democratic spirit, and the efforts of usurpation on the part of the competitors of different thrones."

"Though we believe," (continues the Chronicle) "there has been but one opinion among all persons possessed of any reflection, as to the real object of the Christian or Holy Alliance, yet this is the first time, as far as we know, that that object has been directly and unequivocally avowed officially, or demi-officially."

Perhaps the reader may remember what we said of this blessed Alliance when it first put on its character of Saint; and perhaps it is not forgotten also how vehemently the very papers who now avow its real character, insisted it was as innocent and as simply-spoken as an angel,—a very angel in regimentals!

More of this by and by. We shall most probably have to write upon Spain again next week.

The Paris Papers of Wednesday last arrived yesterday. They contain the following intelligence from Madrid:—

Madrid, Sept. 17.

ROYAL DECREES.

"Having judged it expedient to remove D. JOSEPH GARCIA LEON Y PIZARRO from his office of my Secretary of State and Dispatches, I appoint as his successor, par interim, the Marquis de Caza-Irujo, my honorary Counsellor of State. By these presents it is made known, in order to be communicated to all whom it may concern.

("Signed by the King's hand, at the Palace, Sept. 14, 1818.)

"To Don Francois Egnia."

"I have removed D. JOSEPH VASQUEZ FIGUEROA from his office of Secretary of State and the Marine, and by virtue hereof appoint it to be filled by Lieut.-General D. BALTHASAR HIDALGO de Cisneros, Captain-General of the Department of Cadiz. Until his arrival in the capital, this Department is under your charge.

("Signed by the King's hand, at the Palace, Sept. 14, 1818.)

"To Don Francois Egnia."

"In consideration of the bad state of the health of D. MARTIN DE GARAY, and that he may be enabled to recover it, I have removed him from his office of Secretary of State, and of the Finances of Spain and the Indies. I appoint as his successor, par interim, D. JOSEPH IMAZ, my Counsellor of Finances, and First Director-General of Rentes. By these presents it is made known to you.

("Signed by the King's hand, at the Palace, Sept. 14, 1818.)

"To Don Francois Egnia."

"M. PIZARRO will not be much regretted; but M. GARAY will be exceedingly so. It is said, that M. de CASA-IRUJO, who succeeds the former, is a man of great talents, and celebrated for his integrity. The new Grand Inquisitor, who has recently been appointed, is the Bishop of Tarrazona, M. CASTILLON. This change in the Ministry has astonished every body, by the celerity and mystery with which it was effected. The Ministers were ignorant of their fate on the evening of the 14th, when they returned from the Palace, and they were only informed of it at midnight, by an Officer of the War Department, M. Egnia; by six o'clock on the morning of the 15th, they had quitted Madrid.—M. PIZARRO on the route to Valencia, with his wife in the last stage of pregnancy; M. GARAY on that to Saragossa, and M. FIGUEROA, with his family, on that to Corunna. Madame PIZARRO was refused permission to lie-in here; her mother, who went to implore the King's clemency, received orders to join her daughter instantly, and she set off on the 16th at two o'clock.—The Marquis de CASA-IRUJO arrived here from Cadiz on the same day that M. PIZARRO departed, who had summoned him for a different object: he has been Minister to the United States and the Brazils; he is a man of talent, who has long followed a diplomatic career.—It is asserted, that some days previously to the removal of these Ministers, they had influenced the King to get rid of MM. EGNIA and LOZANO DE TORRES, who had eloquently defended themselves, and obstinately resisted their adversaries."

"We received (says the Sun of last night) an important communication this day, which throws a new light upon the recent changes in the Spanish Ministry. It appears, that the Russian interest predominated over the Counsels of the Spanish Cabinet, but that by the timely zeal and ability of Sir HENRY WELLESLEY, our Ambassador at Madrid, that interest has been completely put down.—That Gentleman presented a frank Exposé to the King of SPAIN on the state of the nation, and pointed out the inevitable consequence of the existing system. The King was so forcibly struck with this exposition, that he immediately dismissed his Ministers. This intelligence, we understand, was communicated to the Court of France by a special courier who arrived at Paris on Tuesday last. The English interest triumphs in Spain. By the wise and honest advice of our Ambassador, it is said, that all PROSCRIPTIONS are to cease, and the INQUISITION is to be limited in its powers. These are important changes; and may give a new face to the affairs of Europe, as they will probably have a powerful influence on the pending discussions at Aix-la-Chapelle."

Letters have been received from Buenos Ayres of the 15th July. The Government was making great efforts to reinforce the Patriot army in Chili, and were organizing a considerable force, which were to take part in new enterprises. A vessel commissioned by General ARTIGAS had captured a Portuguese merchantman with a valuable cargo, besides 70,000 dollars on board.—According to advices received at Brussels from the same place, the Patriots in Chili had gained another victory over the Royalists, under General Sr. JACO, who were advancing fifteen hundred strong to support the remnant of the army which escaped from the battle of Maipo. The action lasted a long time, and it is said, that the Royalists evinced much bravery. It was not known what was their loss in killed and wounded, as the official dispatches had not been published.

THE ARMY.—The following reductions, it is said, are to take place before the meeting of Parliament:—Infantry regiments are to be brought down to the 80th foot; and it is said that the cavalry is to come as low as the 16th Light Dragoons. All the second Field Officers of regiments are to be removed to half-pay. The whole of the Royal Artillery Drivers, together with the Horse Artillery, two battalions of Foot Artillery, and one of Artillery Invalids, will also fall under the necessary pruning hand of Economy. Considerable reductions are likewise to be made in all the military departments.—Morning Chronicle.

Letters from Germany affirm, that her Majesty MARIA LOUISA has prevailed on her august father to support the proposals which are to be made at Aix-la-Chapelle, to remove NAPOLEON to a climate more suited to his health, and where he may follow his usual habits. It is added, that Count LAS CASES has drawn up a memorial to this effect, and that he has written on the subject to the Duke of RICHÉLIEU; it is possible that this Minister, who is allowed to have elevated views, may see that it is politic to deprive BONAPARTE of the interest attached to great misfortunes. NAPOLEON, in fetters and resigned in the midst of sufferings, excites admiration and pity. Happy and without apparent restraint, he would not be less great, but less dangerous, in the political sense of the word. All the journals, both national and foreign, which are written without passion and meanness, have expressed these same sentiments of justice and generosity which nature has implanted in souls that are not depraved by hatred and self-interest.—Ghent Journal, Sept. 27.

NEW BARONETS.—The Gazette of last night announces that the Prince Regent has conferred the dignity of a Baronet on the following persons:—Gen. Maitland, of Rosehill; Gen. Johnson, of Bath; Gen. Farrington, of Blackheath; Lieut.-Gen. Sir H. Calvert; Lieut.-Gen. Campbell, of Inverell; Major-Gen. Sir J. W. Gordon, of Niton; Colonel Hervey, of Lainsong; J. Powell, Esq. of Hardwick; J. Acland, Esq. of Fairfield; A. Lechmere, Esq. of Rhyd; Sir E. Lacon, of Great Yarmouth; John Shelley Sidney, Esq. of Penshurst-Place; T. Hare, Esq. of Stow-Hall; E. Stracey, Esq. of Rackheath-Hall; G. Shiffner, Esq. of Coombe-Place; J. Croft, Esq. of Cowling-Hall; B. Bresson, Esq. of Belvoir-Park; and Dr. Mathew John Tierney, of Brighton.

From the evidence adduced before the Committee, it appears that Lord LONSDALE is in possession of a very beneficial lease of the whole coals belonging to St. Bees School, for a term of 800 years, at a rent of 3*l.* 14*s.* per annum! The Noble Lord is a Trustee of the School. His ancestor, Sir JAMES LOWTHER, was a Trustee, and as such granted a lease to himself of the coals within the manor—being quite an illegal act, and has of course only to be noticed to be set aside. What blame must attach to the Trustees of the Charity for allowing this abuse to exist without noticing it! The evidence is incomplete, owing to the dissolution of Parliament before the matter had been fully investigated. We formerly noticed the abuse of the Lowther charity; the whole of this is contained in the evidence. Dr. SATTERTHWAITE tells us that the estate of Dambrook, in Yorkshire, was sold by the present Lord LONSDALE, and that the tithes of Hale and Birne were exchanged also by Lord LONSDALE for a freehold estate which he now enjoys. These estates ought, by the will of Viscount LONSDALE, above a century ago, to go in support of a school at Lowther, for the education of the poor of Cumberland and Westmoreland.—After our readers shall have perused and digested this evidence, we shall take an opportunity of making some remarks;—in the mean time, we must add our mite of applause to that of the whole nation, of Mr. BROUGHAM's great exertions in bringing those abuses to light. All parties agree in giving him the greatest credit, and we trust that he will be allowed to proceed with the investigation as soon as Parliament meets.—Carlisle Journal.

The will of MATTHEW GREGORY LEWIS, author of "The Castle Spectre," "The Monk," and other works, has been proved. In his will he gives to Mrs. H. JOHNSTONE, late of the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, the sum of 100*l.*, to purchase some trinket or other ornament to be worn on her neck in remembrance of him: to Lord HOLLAND, his book of caricatures.—Personal property within the province of Canterbury sworn under 60,000*l.*

DEATH OF MR. WILSON.—This afflicting case will be found under the head of "Accidents and Offences."—A Correspondent has sent us the following remarks upon it, deeming it, he says, not only a "case of crying neglect of merit by our superiors, but of absolute dereliction of trust in a description of men that the Legislature cannot too soon take cognizance of.—Poor Mr. ANTHONY HENRY WILSON! you have escaped from an ungrateful country, to go, I trust, to a better.—But here are two Boards, on which he had a just claim, the Admiralty, and that other precious gnarled Board, the Committee for the Relief of Destitute Seamen, who had nine thousand pounds left, I understand, after declaring "that they had effected all that came within their plan."

"How came this man thus?"

Boards, high and low, are composed of faces, wigs, coats, sticks, hands, &c., but no one individual conscience. No one has an idea that he is responsible in Foro Conscientie sug. for what is done or left undone by a Board, to which he belongs.—As for the Charitable Committee, I preach not to stones. But I feel convinced, that not one of the Lords of the Admiralty could have known this man's claims upon his country. What then? Why did he not? Perhaps he was reading his own and his friends speeches in the House, when WILSON's numerous testimonials of merit from Admirals and Captains were presented to the Board, (many a brave man has, I fear, gone home to his family broken-hearted, through the interposition of a long debate). However it may have happened, let me whisper in the ear of every one of My Lords of the Admiralty, "You ought to have known Mr. WILSON's claims."

The annual expenses of Drury-lane Theatre, it is said, are reduced, by the economical measures adopted by the Sub-Committee, from 70,000*l.* to 40,000*l.*, a sum below the lowest annual receipt ever experienced at that house.

A seventh number of the IRISH MELODIES has just appeared,—the more delightful from it's being unexpected. We shall pay a long debt, and give some remarks on the whole of this publication in a week or two.

We are informed that Mr. BUTT's first trial next term will be against Sir NATHANIEL CONANT, for the 48 days he was confined in Newgate, on his committal for a charge of libel: "This trial (our Correspondent says) will determine the point, whether Magistrates are authorised by law to commit for libel before indictment is found, and will also set at rest the question of the legality of the ever memorable Circular Letter of Lord STAMFORD."

ST. CLEMENT DANES.—There is a competition, we observe, for the office of Vestry Clerk in this parish. We know nothing whatever of the qualifications of the candidates, but the Address of Mr. HOLLAND, as it strikes us, contains many things much to the purpose. "The question," he says, "upon which the parishioners are called by duty and interest to decide, is, Whether the office of Vestry Clerk shall continue in the hands of one particular set of people, from generation to generation;—or, Whether they will have an officer of their own choice annually elected, and of consequence annually accountable to them for the manner in which he demeaned himself in the discharge of his duty."—This is indeed the proper question; and though we know nothing of this particular case, we are quite aware, that, owing to the supineness of parishioners in general, the situation of Vestry Clerk,—one of the most valuable and important in every parish,—is usually given, not to the person best qualified to hold it for the public benefit, but to the man who can manage to obtain the ear of the little junta of self-sufficient and interested persons, who contrive to govern in the name of the parish.—Nothing is more common than complaints of the ill conduct of parish-officers: but parishioners should remember, that if the affairs of a parish, with an open Vestry, are badly managed, it is entirely their own faults.

TO SIR HUDSON LOWE.

Effare causam nominis,
Utrum ne mores hoc tui
Nomen dedere, an nomen hoc
Secura morum regula. AUSONIUS.

Sir HUDSON LOWE, Sir HUDSON LOWE,
(By name and, ah! by nature so),
As thou art fond of persecutions,
Perhaps thou'st read, or heard repeated,
How Captain GULLIVER was treated,
When thrown among the Lilliputians.

They tied him down—these little men did—
And, having valiantly ascended

Upon the mighty man's protuberance,
They did so strut!—upon my soul,
It must have been extremely droll

To see their pigmy pride's exuberance;

And how the doughty manikins
Amus'd themselves with sticking pins
And needles in the great man's breeches;
And how some very little things,
That pass'd for Lords, on scaffoldings
Got up, and worried him with speeches.

Alas, alas, that it should happen
To mighty men to be caught napping!
Tho' different, too, these persecutions—

For GULLIVER there took the nap,
While here the NAP, oh sad mishap!
Is taken by the Lilliputians. T. SHANDY.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

STATE OF THE QUEEN.

Her MAJESTY, on Thursday, again slept the greater part of the night; and, as throughout the preceding day she had been free from pain, it was hoped she would have derived some advantage from the repose. The hope, however, was not realized, for the Physicians, on visiting the chamber of their Royal Patient in the morning, found no alteration whatever in her general state. Toward the middle of the day, her MAJESTY was again moved into the room adjoining her chamber, and she took a slight repast there at five o'clock; but up to half past seven, no variation in her health had taken place.

The following Bulletin was issued yesterday morning:—

"The QUEEN has had several hours sleep, but the symptoms of her MAJESTY's disease do not appear to have been relieved by it."

BRURY-LANE.

MR. KEAN has returned from his tour to France and Italy,—a very proper relaxation for a man of his talents,—and has performed in the course of the week Richard the Third and Othello. We saw the latter on Thursday evening; and with all our experience of the stage, and with all our scepticism as to the powers of the very best actors in characters from SHAKESPEARE, we never witnessed a performance that struck us so forcibly. It brought back upon us the earnestness and implicit attention of our younger days. We have admired Mrs. Siddons, been infinitely amused with LEWIS, been sore with laughing at MURDEN, been charmed with Mrs. JORDAN; but we never saw any thing that so completely held us suspended and heart-stricken, as Mr. KEAN's Othello. In all parts it is as complete as actor can shew it,—in the previous composure of its dignity, in its soldier-like repression of common impulse, in the deep agitation of its first jealousy, in the low-voiced and faltering affectation of occasional ease, in the burst of intolerable anguish, in the consciousness that rage has hurt its dignity and ruined the future completeness of its character, in the consequent melancholy farewell to its past joys and greatness, in the desperate savageness of its revenge, in its half-exhausted reception of the real truth, and lastly, in the final resumption of a kind of moral attitude and dignity, at the moment when it uses that fine deliberate artifice, and sheathes the dagger in its breast.

If we might venture to point out any parts the most admirable in this performance, it would be the low and agitated affectation of quiet discontent, in which he first canvasses the subject with Iago, the mild and tremulous farewell to "the tranquil mind, the plumed troop," &c. in which his voice occasionally uttered little tones of endearment, his head shook, and his visage quivered; and thirdly, those still more awfully mild tones in which he trembles and halts through those dreadful lines beginning—

"Had it pleased heaven

"To try me with affliction; had he rained

"All kinds of sores and shames on my bare head."

His louder bitterness and his rage were always fine; but such passages as these, we think, were still finer. You might fancy you saw the water quivering in his eyes.

And here two things struck us very forcibly; first, how impossible it is for actor and audience to be both as they ought to be in such large theatres, since Mr. KEAN's quietest and noblest passages could certainly not have been audible in the galleries;—and second, how much an actor's talent must be modified by his own character off the stage;—an observation we may reasonably make when it leans to the favourable side; for we conjecture from anecdotes that are before the public, that Mr. KEAN's temper is hasty, and his disposition excellent and generous; and it is of passion and natural generosity that Othello's character is made up. For this reason we can never help being sceptical about GARRICK's excellence in characters of deep and serious interest; since, off the stage, he was little better than a quick-eyed trifle, full of phrases of gabbling jargon, and coarse-minded withal.

Of the two new performers,—Mrs. WEST, who repeated Desdemona, and Mr. CLEARY, who changed from Othello to Iago, we have nothing to add to our former observations, except that the lady performed still better than before.

There is a new afterpiece here, which is below criticism. Mr. KEAN's Othello is the masterpiece of the living stage.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 10.—MR. DAUNCEY.

False dice will run as smooth as truest bones;
Fine-filed tongues deceive plain people oft;
Fondlings may take pure glass for precious stones.
T. Churchyard's Honour of the Law, 1596.

Persons who have not been in the habit of attending the circuits would be astonished to see what very different figures some men cut in town and in the country. A young Barrister (by which I mean a man of perhaps from ten to fifteen years standing, but whose name, like Sergeant ELLERSLIE's antagonist, was scarcely known in Westminster-Hall) who has hardly had the opportunity of hearing the sound of his own voice in the metropolis, may enjoy a tolerable share of practice at a distance from it, in the district where his relatives and friends can exert their influence in his favour. This, as I have elsewhere pointed out, is one of the modern modes by which men creep into business: formerly, as many examples would establish, a man of real talents having made a dash in some great case, afterwards commanded employment; but of late years not a single instance of the kind has been known; but individuals have slowly worked their way upwards, first by holding briefs as juniors to a silk gown or a coif, and subsequently by inducing an Attorney, with whom they are connected, or with whom they have scraped acquaintance, to entrust them with a leading brief, which gives them a chance of making a speech to a Jury: of course they employ the occasion to the best advantage, as far as their talents go—they do their utmost for their client, and independent of the great pains taken, there is something animating, not to say inspiring, in an audience composed of the first gentry of the surrounding counties, and among them, what operates above all upon a young and ardent spirit, not a few females, who, adorned with their fresh summer beauty, have travelled far to witness the administration of justice. In London, nearly the whole area of the Court is filled by cold-blooded Solicitors, their ignorant Clerks, and Barristers much more inclined enviously to detract and discourage, than generously to acknowledge excellence and to aid diffident infirmity,—“who sicken even if a friend prevail,” and smile and chuckle at every new failure.

There are other reasons, besides, quite as important, why as a general proposition it may be said, that on the circuits better speeches are delivered, and a nearer approach made to what may deserve the name of eloquence, than in London. There seems something damp and depressing in the very air of Westminster-Hall: we associate with the thought of it a recollection of the petty stateliness of four men in scarlet or purple, who have just stiffness enough to be chilling, without dignity enough to be awful: who, nominally presiding in the noblest apartment in Europe, are in fact boxed up in an insignificant corner, as if their intellects were only fitted to that contracted sphere; where the deficiency of splendour is attempted to be supplied by a paltry tapestry of the royal arms; and the absence of true majesty by the wooden representatives of four kings with gilt globes, sceptres, and crowns. In some of the fine town-halls in the country, at least much of this is got rid of; the business, too, is usually placed in a greater variety of hands; we have not the perpetual and wearisome recurrence of the same Counsel with the same peculiarities and habits in every cause, but, as I have said, more room is given for rising ambition, and for the talent by which it is most frequently accompanied. Let me add too, that a Judge at the assizes is a personage of much greater apparent consequence than elsewhere—he is surrounded by a great deal more pomp and circumstance—trumpeters for state and javelin-men for guard—and, to use rather a vulgarism, he is therefore somewhat more upon his good behaviour, particularly in Court, where he generally makes all possible efforts to keep up his artificial consequence: for this reason, perhaps, his temper is not so easily ruffled, and he endeavours as much to controul himself as others. Counsel on this account, and others that could be easily enumerated if necessary, are not so frequently interrupted by the Bench; a greater degree of latitude is allowed, and greater indulgence is shewn to those who may have been less accustomed, if not less inclined to submit. Though Lawyers, educated in a contempt for every thing but their own immediate pursuit, (which if they did not feel they would entertain perhaps a thorough contempt for themselves) are of all men least sensible of the beautiful in nature, and though most of them, when travelling from town to town, are much more intent upon the prospect of their fees than of the country, yet all cannot be alike dead in this respect; it would perhaps be too much to say, that even the dullest and most calculating was not in some degree or other operated upon and improved by beholding the contrast to “the smoke and stir of this dim spot.” One of our first legal orators was once asked by a poring plodder of Pump Court, how he managed to make such good speeches, and the often-quoted reply was, “Sir, my Chambers looks upon the Thames.” That the answer was unintelligible to the questioner, we may easily believe—he had never heard of Sir JOHN DENHAM’s celebrated lines, and probably, had not the remotest notion that there was anything in the view of a majestic river that could even more easily afford “a great example” to an orator than to a poet.

Yet, if leading briefs on the circuits now and then fall into young hands, those who hold them are apt to fall into young errors: the patience shewn by the Judges of assize sometimes occasions a needless waste of time, by the enforcing of points of little consequence, or by miscalculated exertions to astonish: a young speaker of promise will be almost sure, at first, to deviate into bombast or balderdash: yet this is scarcely to be called a fault, when compared with the cropped and clipped business-like speeches of Counsel in London: it is only the exuberance and extravagance of that, which if pruned by good taste, instead of being usually cut up by the roots by merciless caprice and ill-temper, would bear not only the blossoms but the fruits of eloquence—I do not say that this exuberance prevails to any considerable extent—certainly not—I wish it did; but the reverse of wrong is not always right, and this has no doubt led a young or two to bring eloquence into disrepute, by imagining that to make a fine speech little more was necessary than to do exactly the contrary of what he had seen performed by many of the older stagers in Westminster-Hall. The indulgence too of country audiences, or the bad taste and bad judgment of the applauding friends of these would-be orators, prevents them from seeing their errors, and their blindness is aided by the want of more living examples of excellence in this kind.

These remarks have been partly produced by reflecting upon the great popularity acquired by Mr. DAUNCEY on the Oxford Circuit, while his talents, such as they are, are comparatively but little known and esteemed in London. This circumstance is to be attributed in some degree to the fact, that here he confines his practice exclusively to the Exchequer, the proceedings in which are seldom noticed in the newspapers, (the usual channels of legal information), and to which persons seldom resort as parties but upon compulsion, when informations for a breach of some of the revenue laws are filed against them. Although it is a Court of Equity as well as of Law, what is done in the former is even less known than in the latter.

Perhaps I ought to speak with some diffidence as to the talents and qualifications of the subject of this article, because I readily confess that I have not had the same means of forming a judgment as I have possessed with regard to some other men; but I have seen him engaged in important causes in the country not once, twice, nor ten times; and it always struck me, that he by no means deserved the reputation he has acquired. It has often been remarked, that there are some men who never grow wiser from the contemplation of their own faults, because they cannot see them: they may be perfectly alive to the errors of others, but they have the ordinary human infirmity of not being alive to their own;—so it is, I apprehend, with Mr. DAUNCEY; for the greatest mistakes he commits—the blunders into which he now and then unhappily falls, arise from not knowing himself; from not being aware to what he is competent and what is infinitely beyond his reach. Owing to this weakness he sometimes “proves himself a fool in what he would fain seem most wise;" and this false estimate has led to injurious consequences, not merely to himself, but to his clients. For instance, nobody can doubt, who has only heard him once or twice, that he thinks himself a very good speech-maker, not to say orator, and on this account he avails himself at the assizes of every opportunity of making a display of what he conceives a peculiar talent: "he will talk you for an hour on the end of a straw," like a man who professes to walk an hundred miles on a cabbage leaf, and imagine all the time that he is exceedingly entertaining, and is making a rapid progress towards the end of a cause, which he is sure to persuade himself must terminate in his favour: when however the verdict is given against him, he appears astonished at the summing up of the Judge, who did not see things exactly in the light in which he had viewed them, and at the stupidity and perverseness of the Jury, that did not pay more attention and deference to his address than to the real merits. In fact, I consider Mr. DAUNCEY little more than a mere talker, who after long practice has attained a great facility in stringing sentences together; and it would be singular indeed if among so many he did not now and then "stumble on a virtue unwarned," and say something that was tolerable. SWIN's celebrated Laputan machine for mixing and jumbling all sorts of words, was sometimes efficient in producing a line or two that looked like connected poetry. If then it be asked, how he has obtained the character and the business he enjoys, I answer, by having and having had no rivals—that is to say, no persons who could address a Jury as well as himself, however ill in the estimation of some that may be. The Oxford circuit may be considered remarkable for advocates who can talk and who cannot talk at all: Mr. DAUNCEY can talk a great deal—Mr. JERVIS a little, and Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. PULLER not at all: Mr. TAUNTON, who accompanies them, pretends to little more than being a lawyer; so that Mr. DAUNCEY has no adequate antagonist, for Mr. JERVIS, who has also a silk gown, and is a most amiable man, cannot cope with his volubility, which in the country is easily mistaken for something much better. The current of a paltry mill-stream is often much more rapid than the tide of a mighty river.

What has contributed to that which I feel inclined to call the deception, is a certain portion of quickness and cunning, which is no doubt possessed by the individual in question, and which many unreflecting and inexperienced people reckon qualifications of great rarity and of the highest excellence. The first, however, belongs to every clever schoolboy; and the last, when it amounts to nothing more than mere cunning, of itself proves the absence of nobler requisites: cunning, as applied to a Barrister, is generally an endeavour to supply the place of and to make up for other deficiencies. At the same time it is often useful in detecting falsehood, where a witness is a fool; but cunning is easily met by cunning, and a witness is frequently an over-match for an Advocate who has no other resources: in laqueos quos posuit cadit. Mr. DAUNCEY has a good deal of artifice, but he has always wanted commanding power: he never in his hand the iron flail did hold,

With which he thrash'd out falsehood and did truth unfold;
but his contrivances are too frequently petty and insignificant, and of course what he accomplishes bears its proportion to the means employed.

Of the furniture of his mind, I can say but little: it certainly does not appear to possess any great solidity—rather for ornament than for use: were he master of any considerable resources, I think he has cleverness enough to bring them forward; but they have never made their appearance when I had an opportunity of hearing him. I am told that he has a humorous way of relating a story out of Joe Miller or some other jest-book, and this would go a great way in the provinces to persuade the uneducated inhabitants that he must be a man of very superior abilities.

"Though a dram of sweet be worth a pound of sour," after what I have said in dispraise of Mr. DAUNCEY, it will perhaps not be easy to satisfy his numerous and partial friends by any applause I can bestow upon his appearance and manner: both, but especially the last, are much in his favour: his countenance is vivid and expressive—his voice clear and tolerably harmonious, though nasal; and his action generally easy and appropriate. I know no man at present at the bar who excels him in the use of his arms, yet, like most persons in the habit of speaking at a table, he is too apt to visit it with severe inflections. In externals, he leaves little to be desired.

FINE ARTS.

Among the minor publications of Engraving and Printing, we must not omit to mention Views of the Seats of Noblemen and Gentlemen in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. It makes us pleasingly acquainted with the exterior of the best country residences in the British Isles, of the interior, as given in the accounts affixed to each view, and of the erectional and topographical history of the edifice from its foundation, with some leading incidents in the biography of the first and successive occupants and proprietors. Whatever, too, is particularly valuable or curious in Art, Literature, or Manufacture, belonging to the respective mansions, is also stated in this summary. The pleasing effects bestowed on the Views by Mr. NEALE, the Designer, have been neatly brought to the copper by Messrs. BARENGER, HOBSON, MATHEWS, MILTON, SCOTT, SMITH, VERRILL, &c. The reader, who is intimate with publications of Art, may form a tolerable estimate of the execution and size of the plates, by regarding them as about midway between the small, loosely worked plates in Messrs. STOKER and GREIG's Antiquarian and Topographical Cabinet, and the most masterly Engravings by Mr. LANDSEER of the Antiquities of Dacca, and Views round the Coast, engraved by the Messrs. COOKE.* The Noblemen and Gentlemen's Seats have been erected by our best Architects, JONES, WREN, KENT, VANBURGH, COLLINS, BURLEIGH, ADAMS, &c. Garnished as their grandeur is by the streams, the lakes, the parks, and romantic country around, they glisten, even in these small engraved copies, in fancy's eye, as emblems of those happier regions, which reason affords a hope may bless an hereafter. Sentiments and feelings like this float on the mind at sight of the halcyon scenes which wealth and art have spread over the face of our country. But is there no drawback upon their pleasantness to the spectator? Is there nothing in the idea, that most of the very Artists, who, in their imitations of nature, afford us this elegant pleasure, are the victims of a long course of maladministration, slaving, in common with the greater portion of the community, to defray an aggravated and insupportable taxation? Is there nothing in the consideration, that the majority of the nation, the labouring classes,—who in their cottages, and in their manufactories, surround these privileged spots, eat the scanty food of the degraded pauper, a burden on the still more pitiable middle class? Is there nothing in the reflection, that many of the affluent and star and ribbon-decked and titled owners of these "gorgeous palaces," have by their ancestors, or for themselves, purchased the means of obtaining them by Court sycophancy, by treason against the dominion of conscience, and the peace and the rights of mankind?

R. H.

SIR WILLIAM CURTIS.

MR. EXAMINER.—A report in your paper of last Sunday gives rise to this intrusion on your columns. In the truly pathetic statement of the case of Oldershaw the Conveyancer, in Doctors' Commons, before Sir W. Curtis, on Monday the 21st instant, the conduct and language of the Baronet (as there detailed) entitles him to the notice of every friend of humanity; and I wish to call the attention of the public to it, through the medium of your paper, as a proof of your candour as well as of his desert:—since opposed as your political creed undoubtedly is to his course of political action, philanthropy is a virtue, upon the excellence of which there can be no difference among the advocates of virtue, or the friends of human happiness.

Sir W. Curtis has long and frequently been reprobated (with how much justice I will not dispute) on the folly and inconsistency of his political conduct; therefore, when the failings of a man have not only furnished materials for the gratification of the favourite passion to reprove, but also by disgusting us with, have had a tendency to prevent us from following, his example, it is but moral justice to hold up his philanthropy to notice, to impose upon ourselves the duty of praise when we have not hesitated to blame; and as we have been benefited by rejecting his example in one instance, to take the opportunity of profiting by following it in another.

"Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few."

COMPLAINTS OF A PLEBEIAN.

Sept. 29, 1818.

SIR,—In pursuance of the rule, "never to defer that till to-morrow which may be done to-day,"—a rule which a man in my situation must never lose sight of, I proceed to fulfil my promise and finish my complaint.

A worthy neighbour, who reads the Courier and the Quarterly Review, endeavours to persuade me, that the more we pay in taxes the richer we are; "for," says he, "the money so drawn up insensibly from the mass of the people, becomes condensed in the pockets of those who receive it, and returns in fertilizing showers and balmy dews to enrich the country, invigorating its trade and giving new life to its genius and manufactures."—This arguing by analogy, to a plain unlettered man, is somewhat mystifying, and I never attempt to answer it in the same way. My arguments are of a more homely description, and I generally prefer some particular instance. Lord Grenville, with his 4000*l.* a year, is a favourite one. "It is very true," I say, "that the sum drawn by him from the pockets of the people, he exchanges for things which he can eat, drink, and wear. He sets some people to sow, others to reap, others to spin and weave, to rear horses, build carriages, plant trees, hew marble, and in short, do something that can contribute to make his life agreeable. But it is clear to me, that if the money so spent had been suffered to remain with the persons from whose pockets it was drawn, they would have been able to employ it (each his portion) in procuring for themselves those very luxuries, or perhaps necessities, which are now consigned over to Lord Grenville; and some part of it would accordingly have remained with the identical men whose labour produces those necessities and luxuries, and would either have afforded them a share when produced, or have enabled them to relax from their excessive toil, and take some agreeable mode of diversifying their consumed days. Even to take your view of the matter, therefore, the difference between the state of the case before and that after the return of the money in "fertilizing showers and balmy dews," is, with regard to Lord Grenville, that in the first place he takes a sum of money, and in the second gives it back for certain commodities which he can enjoy; and, with regard to the people from whom he takes it (supposing them to be very numerous) that at first they all lose a small sum of money, and then see it return to the hands of a few, who give value for it in some shape or other; and so through a number of hands (each giving value for it and making a small advantage of it by the way) till it comes to them again on the same conditions. But viewing the community as one person, there is no difference at all in the amount of its loss; its stock of money is first diminished by the sum of 4000*l.*, and when that returns, its stock of goods or labour is diminished in an equal degree. But why may we not suppose a peculiar appropriation of the various taxes? If, for example, I pay 100*l.* a year in taxes, and see, in a finance account, such an item as, "*Snuff-box for the French Ambassador, 100*l."—why may I not look on that to be my identical 100*l.*? It is possible to trace every sum of money paid in taxes to its real destination, whether to the renovated spires of Henry the 7th's Chapel, or a new cap for the head-piece of Mrs. Hunn, the basin in the Green Park, or a basin of soup on Sir William's table at Southgate. Since, then, it may be really done, let us arbitrarily apply to the payment of Lord Grenville's sinecure the taxes paid by the very people, who, as you contend, are enriched by its return. You will see that it is very possible that his 4000*l.* may be all paid to him by as small a number of persons. Mr. Preston has asserted, upon calculation, that every labouring man pays 5-9ths of his earnings in taxes. To save odd numbers, let us say half. It will require, therefore, only 50 persons, earning upon an average 16*l.* a year each, (no very great income) to pay him his 4000*l.*; and if the money is spent among the same number (not too great, surely, to supply a Lord) where is the advantage that they are to reap? But the fact must be, that every man who lives on 4000*l.* a year consumes many more commodities than can be furnished by so small a number of persons, and yet this number do actually pay in taxes more than the amount of his sinecure: so that if I were to take as partial a view of the matter on one side as you do on the other, I might contend, with an equal shew of justice, that the money, instead of being drawn insensibly from the mass of the people, to return and enrich a particular few, is drawn from a particular few, who are sensibly impoverished by the loss, and diffused over a mass, among whom its effects are barely perceptible. Neither of these views is correct. The only and the whole truth of the matter may be stated in a few words: Lord Grenville does nothing, and lives in luxury on those who are industrious and in want; and the same may be said of thousands besides."

Thus, Sir, it is, that I and many others feel with regard to sinecures, and such men as Lord Grenville. But it is not on this subject only that we feel. We are too clear-sighted to have our view of affairs completely intercepted by the dust which certain trading politicians (Whigs or otherwise) raise before our eyes about economy, retrenchment, and moderate reform. We know, without the help of Mr. Preston's arithmetic, for we feel, that we are slaves; that our labours and the labours of our children must go to feed the idle; that the assumption of a title to our property will never be voluntarily given up; that old forms cannot avail us any thing, and that there is no relief to be expected but from ourselves. This is no complaint from a few men, at war with a state of things in which they only cannot find prosperity. It is the conviction of thousands of men, whose skill and industry would make them rich and happy, but for that enormous load of debt and extravagance, which, by depriving them of the fruit of their labour, gradually deprives them of the will to follow it, turns them out to prey on their devourers, and brings them ultimately to the gibbet. Our's now (if our's it should be called) is that wretched community in which we see "age going to the workhouse and youth to the gallows." At the doors of men, who live in indolence and splendour on the public taxes, other men die of starvation from their inability to pay them any longer. These are a few truths, the expression of which is not called forth by a momentary impulse, and cannot be stifled by a full meal or a fat customer. For my own part, I am young, strong, and healthy: toil is light to me, and sensual indulgence a total stranger. Shew me the necessity, and I can work from sunrise to sunset the whole year round, and endure any privation, not only without a murmur, but with cheerfulness: but it must be something more considerable than the ease and comfort of a flock of idlers with nicknames.

I should not have sent you this complaint, if I had not believed that you sympathized with it. By inserting my former I find that belief right. I go now back to my shop, but with a very heavy heart.—Your's truly,

A PLEBEIAN.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR.

Tuesday being Michaelmas-day, the Livery were assembled in Common-hall, for the purpose of electing a fit person to serve the office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year.

The COMMON-SERGEANT said that the Livery were called upon to select two fit and proper persons out of the number of those Aldermen who had served the office of Sheriff. These two were to be returned to the Court of Aldermen, who were to choose one of them to fill the office of Lord Mayor.

The names of the Aldermen were then put up according to seniority. Upon the name of Alderman Atkins being placed on the board, there was a large show of hands with considerable applause, mixed, however, with nearly an equal share of disapprobation. The next name was that of Alderman Goodbehere, upon which the show of hands was more numerous, the applause was also greater, though not at all general, there being many who loudly expressed their disapprobation. The name of Mr. Alderman Thorp, was the next upon which many hands were held up. The numbers were in appearance not much, if at all, inferior to those for Alderman Atkins, but upon this the opinions of the Livery were very much divided. Some loudly insisted that Alderman Thorp had the majority, whilst others as stoutly maintained that it rested with Alderman Atkins. During this noisy conflict betwixt "Thorp has it," and "Atkins has it," the Sheriffs appeared to consult together, and having agreed as to the successful candidates, the Common-Sergeant came forward to announce their decision. Silence was instantly restored, but the moment he pronounced that, in the opinion of the Sheriffs, the choice of the Livery had fallen upon Aldermen Atkins and Goodbehere, a mingled shout of dissatisfaction and applause was set up, which was absolutely deafening, and continued so for some minutes. The Sheriffs immediately retired to make their return to the Court of Aldermen, and for a considerable time after their departure, little could be heard but opposing cries of "shame"—"tis a trick"—and "all's fair"—"the Sheriffs are correct." In about three quarters of an hour the Lord Mayor returned to the hustings, when the RECORDER announced that the choice of the Court of Aldermen had fallen upon Alderman ATKINS, whom he therefore declared duly elected. At this the same mingled shouts as before were set up, and continued whilst the Lord Mayor elect was invested with the chain. After this ceremony was performed, he came forward to return thanks, but the noise of those who appeared to approve and disapprove was too loud to have any thing else heard for some time. At length he was understood to express his sincere thanks for the very high honour which had been conferred upon him. He assured the Livery that they should have no reason to regret their choice, but that he should at all times be found to discharge the duties of his high office with that zeal, integrity, and impartiality, which he trusted had already marked his conduct as a Magistrate.

(Applause and some hisses.) He continued to speak for some moments longer, but it was impossible to collect what he said. When he had retired,

Mr. S. DIXON came forward to submit a motion on which he was certain there would be no difference of opinion. It was a motion of thanks to the late Sheriffs for their very praiseworthy conduct while in office. (Cries of "Give it only to one," and "Let the motions be separate.") To him both the gentlemen were strangers when they came into office, but he had since known them as most zealous and indefatigable in the discharge of their very arduous duties. He concluded by moving, that the thanks of the Livery be given to Sir-Francis Desanges and Sir George Alderson, the late Sheriffs, for the very zealous, active, and able manner in which they had discharged the duties of their office, &c. This was carried almost unanimously.

Sir G. ALDERSON, in returning thanks, expressed his regret that his colleague, Sir F. Desanges, was not present, as he would offer his thanks in a much better manner than he could pretend to. It was however a duty which he owed to the Livery to express to them how highly he valued the honour which they had just conferred upon him.

Mr. BLUNDELL next came forward with a paper in his hand, which was understood to contain a resolution, expressing some disapprobation at the conduct of the new Sheriffs in making the return; but before he moved it, the crier, by order of the Lord Mayor, declared the Hall adjourned.

This was commented on in strong terms by many on and near the hustings, who seemed to have been aware of the object of the intended motion.

After the Common-hall, the Lord Mayor held a Court of Aldermen, at which Mr. Norton, who was on Monday elected Common Pleader, in the room of the late William Watson, Esq. was sworn into office.

LEGAL QUESTION.

SIR,—Your Correspondent "Egomel" will excuse me, if I doubt the justness of his opinion on the legal question referred to in your last Number. He says that if a witness, after having taken the usual oath, stand mute, he is thereby guilty of perjury, and he draws this conclusion from the supposition that the witness has sworn to speak the truth. But that this supposition is erroneous will appear from the oath administered in criminal cases. It runs thus:—"The evidence which you shall give to the Court and Jury sworn shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," &c.

So that the witness does not swear to speak the truth, as "Egomel" imagines, but only in paribus verbis, that if he does speak or give evidence, it shall be the truth.

The following is given in the law-books as a definition of perjury:—"Perjurium est mendacium in juramento firmatum;" but that a mere refusal to speak on the part of the witness sworn, will not constitute the crime of perjury as thus defined, is perfectly clear, unless your Correspondent considers silence alone as equivalent to a falsehood.

I perfectly agree with "Egomel," that in case a witness, duly served with a subpoena, shall refuse to attend, the only remedy the law gives to the party aggrieved, is, to indict him on the penal statute of 5th Eliz. ch. 9, § 12. and to bring an action against him for damages sustained on account of his non-attendance.

But in case a witness does attend, and refuses either to be sworn or to speak after he is sworn, I conceive that the Judge may commit him to prison for contempt of Court, and impose a fine at his discretion.

I do not recollect to have read or heard of any statute empowering the Judge so to act, yet several cases might be pointed out where Judges have so acted, and as Junius too truly observes, "The precedent of to-day becomes the law of to-morrow."

Trusting that you will favour me by the insertion of the above in your Paper, I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

EUXONUS.

Chichester, Oct. 1, 1818.

OLD BAILEY.

On Wednesday, when the Recorder dismissed the Jury, with thanks for their unflinching attention,

Mr. Armstrong, one of the Jurymen, wished to take this opportunity of applying to the Court in behalf of Samuel Mason, a little boy, who had been convicted of picking pockets. He had inquired into his case, and had found out several circumstances which would go much in mitigation of punishment. The sister of the unfortunate lad was in his service, and if the Court would discharge the boy, he had no objection to take him into his service at all risks.

The Recorder observed, that it had been found necessary to punish those found guilty of picking pockets very severely, because the number of offenders in that particular branch of infamy had so much increased. Transportation was generally the punishment for such criminals, and the reason why so many were sent out of the country was, that having lost their character here, an opportunity was given to them to begin (as it were) a new life in a foreign country. The grand fault was, that this was not made a capital offence. He would certainly attend to the recommendation.—He then proceeded to pass sentence upon the prisoners:—

Dr. Laurence Halloran, who had been convicted of forging a frank in the name of Sir William Garrow, M.P., was brought to the bar to receive sentence. He begged permission to address the Court for a few minutes, and spoke nearly in these words:—"I beg leave most respectfully to suggest to the Court, that the present prosecution against me is the first that has taken place under the statute; and although I profess not to develop the motives by which this prosecution may have been influenced, yet I hope I may be permitted to advert for a moment to the cruel and unjust sufferings I have experienced, and which, I humbly submit, have been more than were equitably proportioned to the offence committed. They have, indeed, been to me more distressing and dreadfully appalling than even death itself. Under the supposition of having counterfeited a frank, by which the Post-office has been defrauded, I have been torn from my home, from the bosom of my family, and have been incarcerated for more than three months in a dungeon among the refuse of mankind; and although the warrant of the Magistrate extended only to the apprehension of my person, my lodgings were searched, my trunks were rifled, and my papers were seized and carried away by an officer: although, indeed, some of them have been returned, others have been still withheld, which have no reference to the charge in question. I humbly hope that the Court will be pleased to restore these documents.—For the violent manner in which the officer with five or six attendants burst into my apartments, an ample justification has been afforded by the false and malicious statements placed in his mouth by the promoter of this infamous prosecution, representing me as a dangerous character, always carrying loaded pistols about my person; whereas, on the contrary, I have not had a pair of pistols in my possession for 12 months prior to my arrest. These malicious motives could not, however, be concealed, and the subsequent conduct of the officer did honour to his feelings and character as an officer of justice.—I stand here greatly injured in health, in reputation, and in circumstances, and the sole charge against me is that of having defrauded the post-office of 10d. This is the accusation against me, after having gone through an active and useful life of more than 50 years, during which I have given very considerable sums to private and public charities. The greater part of my existence has been devoted to religious and classical instruction—with what credit and success it does not become me to declare; but I hold in my hand testimonials of my moral character for more than 20 years, which I am extremely desirous of submitting to your Lordship's consideration.—The authenticity of these testimonials cannot for a moment be doubted, and I hope they will have some influence on the Court, in mitigation of the punishment to be inflicted.—I hope I may also be allowed to state, that many gentlemen, educated by me, now fill the most respectable situations in the army, in the law, and other professions. The present Solicitor-General, Sir Robert Gifford, was for 9 years my pupil, and received from me the whole of his school education. I have also wholly formed the minds of many gentlemen who are now an ornament to the various situations which they fill.—The frank, which it has been alleged was forged by me, is dated January 9, 1817, and I beg leave to state, that it would have lain dormant, and not a syllable would have been known of this transaction, had not an unfortunate quarrel with my Rector introduced it to the notice of the public.—The death of the only person who could have proved my innocence, the total ruin of my circumstances, my long confinement, and the unjust detention of a considerable portion of my stipend by the promoter of this prosecution, having deprived me of an opportunity of engaging a legal adviser, I felt that I had no other alternative than to allow judgment to be recorded against me. But I entreat most humbly the attention of his Lordship to this single consideration—the improbability that a man, not in a state of actual infatuation, would voluntarily commit such an offence as that which is now laid to my charge, for the sake of tenpence, and that tenpence not to pass into his own pocket, but into that of the promoter of this prosecution.—Having said thus much, I feel the fullest confidence that the judgment which awaits me will be regulated by the most strict and impartial justice.

Adsit

Regula, peccatis quæ penas irroget æquas;

Næ scutica dignum horribili sectare flagello.

It now only remains respectfully to bow to the judgment of the Court, which I hope I shall be enabled to meet with the fortitude of a man, and the resignation of a prisoner."

The Recorder.—The address which you have now made to the Court would have been extremely proper at the time of your trial, but at this stage I can only pass that sentence upon you which I am bound to pass under the authority of the law. It is not in my power to alter it. The Legislature gives the sentence, and it is solely my duty to pass it.

The sentence of seven years' transportation was then passed upon Lawrence Halloran, Samuel Dukes, John Jones, Joseph Saunders, Lydia Green, and Lyon Levy.

Dr. Halloran again addressed the Court. "I must earnestly implore his Lordship to recommend my case to the humane clemency of the Prince Regent, in order if possible to prevent the dreadful necessity of a parent being torn from a numerous family which has no other friend on earth to which it can look for support. It will be a separation which I feel too sensibly I cannot survive."

The Recorder.—Whatever application you have to make to his Royal Highness, it must be done through the medium of his Majesty's Ministers.

The prisoner bowed, and left the Court immediately.

The Recorder then proceeded to pass sentence upon the other prisoners.—William Jones was sentenced to transportation for his natural life. Sentence of death was passed upon the following 35 prisoners. The 13 subsequent prisoners, having been convicted of putting away forged notes, knowing they were forged, now received sentence of death:—Wm. Gracey, John Jones, George Gracey, Richard Bennet, John Driscoll, William Weller, George Cashman, John Hood, Thomas Wm. Smith, Wm. Barnes, Sarah Ward, Jeremiah Bryant, and Eliz. Brookes.—The following 22 prisoners, making 35 in all, were also sentenced to death for various other capital offences:—James Higgins, David Rekan, Henry Mears, Isaac Sampson, William Mitchell, Edward Fletcher, Robert Freeman Thompson, James Noakes, William Saunders, Thomas Webb, James White, Elizabeth Jones, Sarah Butcher, James Lawrence, John Burgess, Margaret Reading, Rebecca Gould, Mary Saunders, Richard Hartoff, John Thomas Littleton, Burton Williams, Hugh Lynch, and Benjamin Jackson.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.

THE BANK v. JOHN JOHNSON.—This case came on on Tuesday before Sir Claudius Hunter. The defendant was coal-merchant to the Bank, and supplies several other extensive establishments. The Directors of the Bank having ascertained that the Act for the regulation of the delivery of coals had not been complied with by Mr. Johnson, ordered that the defendant should be summoned upon no less than 50 informations. The fines allowed by the act in cases of conviction would amount to nearly 1000l. The greatest interest was naturally excited.

Mr. Freshfield attended for the Bank; Mr. Andrews was engaged for the defendant, who admitted that his client had done wrong, but said that the offence had been unintentional. Under such a representation it would, he suggested, be as well not to press the fines to their full extent.

Mr. FRESHFIELD observed, that the object of the Bank was to show the public that they had a security in the Act of Parliament against the practice of impositions of a very serious nature. He thought it due to them to state in the office the probable consequences of an implicit reliance, and he trusted that the lesson would prove of general utility.

Mr. Freshfield and Mr. Andrews then withdrew into a private room, when it was arranged that the defendant should plead guilty upon the whole 50 informations, and that he should abide the decision of the Magistrate as to the fines under the lenient hand of the prosecution.

Mr. FRESHFIELD then stated that he attended on behalf of the Bank. The first information accused the defendant with having sold and delivered coals without a meter's ticket. The rest charged him with having sold and delivered coals without a vender's ticket, countersigned by the meter. Those informations were laid without any view but the benefit of the public. The case was a most important one. It was most necessary the public should have full measure and quality in such an article as coal, and it was but justice to the coal trade to prove that the practice he had to complain of was the mere act of the defendant himself, and not common to the trade. It was found necessary to pass an act in the 47th of the King, to protect the public against what were called in the act, "the frauds of the coal trade." He would not designate the present case by that name, but certainly the public were liable from their carelessness to impositions in the trade of the grossest kind. It was regulated by the act, that coals contained in any ship should be sold at the coal-market only, and that they should be publicly exhibited, under a penalty of 100*l*. It was required, that the meter should, after he had measured the coals, give to the waggoner a ticket, which ticket, if signed and countersigned, would be a security to the consumer that the article purchased was that to which he was entitled. It was most important to have the quality of the coal also properly attended to, it being known that coal varied from five, six, to eight shillings per chaldron, as to quality. The coal-merchant would do a most serious injury to the consumer, by putting upon him coal of a quality inferior to the sum at which he had purchased. For the purpose of guarding against such an imposition, the act had directed that the ship should be furnished with a certificate of the quality, which certificate was, upon the landing of the coals, to be examined by the land coal-meter, that he might ascertain whether they were of the quality mentioned in the ticket directed to be delivered by the vender to the purchaser, and the meter was required to countersign the ticket, if he was satisfied that the coals were as described in it. Thus, by regular stages, from the working of the coal-mine up to the sale, the quality was preserved. Mr. Freshfield then stated the contents of the meter's ticket to be sent with coals to the consumer, observing, that it should be signed by one of the principal land coal-meters, and countersigned by the labouring coal-meter attending and delivering them; and that the penalty affixed in the event of not complying with this regulation was 10*l*. It was here that the frauds contemplated by the legislature began. The vender's ticket was presented on the delivery of the coals to the purchaser, but it was not countersigned. If the provisions of the act were complied with, it was impossible that the public could be defrauded, either as to the quantity or quality of the coals; but it was his duty to state, that in the case now before the public a meter's ticket accompanied the coals, but it was not countersigned according to the act, for it contained the name of a person not in existence. He could call a meter, the only one of the name stated in the ticket, who would prove that he had not countersigned the ticket; and there were other circumstances tending to show the gross irregularity of the proceeding. He could also prove that application had been made to the person who should have countersigned, in order to induce him to do so, and that the person had refused, in consequence of not having seen the ship's certificate. In fact he could, if it was allowed in such a state of the case, prove that the coals were deficient both in quantity and quality.

Mr. ANDREWS suggested the needlessness of proceeding to the test, and observed, that Mr. Freshfield had no right to do so.

Sir CLAUDIUS HUNTER was of opinion that Mr. Freshfield was justified in stating what he had evidence to support.

Mr. FRESHFIELD said, he did not intend to go to circumstances of aggravation; he had no wish but to protect the public. The defendant had declared that his fault was negligence. If that defendant was able to prove that the coals were of the quantity and quality described in the ticket, and sold to the Bank, he should upon the part of the Bank withdraw every information, and be more happy in discharging that duty than the painful one he should probably be obliged to execute. He concluded with stating, that the Magistrate was at liberty to reduce the fine to 1*s*. if he pleased. The Bank would be satisfied with his decision, confident that the public service would be the first consideration with him.

Mr. ANDREWS having intimated that the defendant would plead guilty, Mr. Freshfield abstained from calling witnesses.

Mr. ANDREWS said he should advise his client to confess himself guilty; and he thought it his duty to add that the Bank had acted with great liberality in not pressing the fines to the extent allowed. It was, however, to be considered, that the offence was not of such a nature as to authorize the infliction of such a punishment, it being the fact that the crime was one of mere omission. True it was, that if the defendant was guilty of taking advantage of the opportunities which might have presented themselves and supplied a bad material, his offence would be of the most serious kind. If the merchant had himself attended the delivery of the coals, and acted as his own wharfinger, nothing could excuse the neglect that would subject the public to so serious a disadvantage. But the defendant was not his own wharfinger. He was a great dealer, and always entrusted his tickets to his wharfinger or some other person under him.

Sir CLAUDIUS HUNTER.—That surely can be no justification.

Mr. ANDREWS admitted that it was not a justification. But no circumstances of aggravation could be stated in such a case. It was evident that his client had an excellent character, the Bank (so respectable a body) having employed him, if there were no other reason for saying that his character was unimpeachable. It was, Mr. Andrews observed, in the power of the Magistrate to reduce the fine to the smallest possible coin, and considering all the circumstances of the case, and the promise that neither the Bank nor the Public should be subject to similar inconveniences, he trusted to the lenient decision of the Chair.

Sir CLAUDIUS HUNTER said, the Bank had detected a most palpable and abominable error, to say the least of it; and, if they had proceeded to prove it, perhaps something worse than error would have been found out. It was not enough to say, "I leave my business to my wharfinger, and I therefore am not responsible;" there was no excuse in submitting to the direction of another who acted wrong. Considering all the circumstances of the case, Sir Claudius thought proper to fine Mr. Johnson 10*s*. on each information. The whole amounted to 25*l*.

Mr. ANDREWS expressed his client satisfied.

Mr. FRESHFIELD said, that a moiety being the property of the informer, he should thank the Magistrate to order one half of that moiety to the Spitalfields poor, and the other half to the Society for the relief of small debtors.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

On Wednesday, Edward Page, of Park-street, Grosvenor-place, was charged by a Mr. Hodgkinson, his father-in-law, with creating a riot and breaking the windows of his house. In his defence he said, that the parents of his wife had kept her from him; that he went to his father-in-law and demanded her several times, but she was prevented by them from coming to him, and that it was in consequence of her being detained from him that he had been guilty of violent conduct. His wife, however, appearing against him, and stating that her husband had conducted himself towards her with much brutality, so much so as to render her fearful of personal severity, Mr. Burrows ordered him to find bail. His wife afterwards preferred a second charge, that Page threatened her life several times, and having sworn articles of the peace against him, he was ordered to find sureties for his future good behaviour.

QUEEN-SQUARE.

James Lawler was charged with committing a rape upon the body of Sarah Manning, a young girl about 16 years of age, residing with her mother, a poor widow, in Angel-court, Strand, on last Thursday night.—Remanded.

HATTON-GARDEN.

On Wednesday, Charles Elliott and Leonora, his wife, were charged with cruelty to their own child, a very young boy. In consequence of an anonymous letter addressed to the magistrates of Hatton-garden, Read, one of the police officers, was sent to search the house of the prisoners in Fisher-street, Red Lion-square. There he found the boy naked in a garret, and tied to a bed-post by a leather belt fastened round his body. The evidence of the lodgers proved that the child had been kept in that state for several months, fed on bread and water, and frequently beaten by the father. The parish having undertaken to prosecute, the witnesses were bound over to appear at the Sessions, and the prisoners were committed to Clerkenwell prison until they found good bail.

UNION-HALL.

On Friday, a fellow of ferocious appearance, who said his name was William Smith, was brought up from Camberwell, on various charges of highway robbery and house-breaking.—Mrs. Mary Jones, of Peckham, was crossing Peckham Fields, about 11 o'clock, on Thursday morning last, and was stopped by the prisoner, who demanded the money she had in her possession. She said she had not any; he snatched her umbrella, and forced her ring from her finger, and threatened to murder her if she made the least resistance. He ran off, and escaped.—Mrs. Tyler, of Peckham, was walking by Lothbury House, over a field near Peckham, on Saturday evening; when the prisoner demanded her money; she gave him ten shillings and sixpence, which was all she had, and then he demanded the ring from her finger; she took it off with great reluctance, and he seized her hand, and bruised it very bad by his violence. He then ran off.—A third charge was brought against the prisoner, for robbing Mrs. Powell, of Camberwell. She was crossing Peckham Fields on the night of Monday last, and was overtaken by the prisoner, who, with the most dreadful imprecations, threatened to stab her, if she did not immediately give him the property she had in her possession. Mrs. Powell's husband being not far distant, she declined to give him her money; he seized her umbrella, and hearing footsteps, he decamped.—The fourth charge was for robbing Mrs. Downes, a Lady who resides in the neighbourhood of Kennington. The prisoner met Mrs. D. upon Kennington-Common on Tuesday night, about eight o'clock, and demanded her money. She informed him she had not got any money; he forced his hand into her pocket, and took out two shillings and a knife.—The officer who apprehended the prisoner said, that upon searching him he found Mrs. Jones's gold ring, and a duplicate of an umbrella belonging to one of the other prosecutrices; also a number of religious tracts, which he went about selling, as he stated. It was a singular circumstance, as the Magistrate remarked, that upon the front of each tract was a print of a man suffering upon the gallows. The prisoner was remanded.

SHADWELL.

A Ghost.—Mrs. Jervis, of Regent-street, Poplar, applied to the Magistrates on Thursday, in consequence of frightful noises being every night heard in her house, the cause of which cannot be discovered. These noises have been heard, she said, for three years past, and mobs now assemble in the street to hear the ghost. Possession having been taken of the house in this strange way, no tenant can be found, and it remains on the owner's hands. The Magistrates immediately directed some officers to occupy the house, and to apprehend, as soon as possible, the evil spirit, which, however, they have not yet been able to catch.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

An Inquisition was taken on Monday at Clerkenwell Workhouse, Coppice-row, on the body of Mr. Anthony Henry Wilson, who was suffocated, or burnt to death, on the top of a brick-kiln, in Spa-fields.—John Tibbot, brick-maker, deposed, that on Saturday morning, about six o'clock, he went to his work in Spa-fields, and saw the deceased lying on the top of the kiln, enveloped in smoke and sulphur arising from the bricks, which were in an early stage of burning; he called a young man, and they removed the body; one side of it was very much scorched. He believed that the deceased had been dead several hours. His clothes were not much burned. He appeared between forty and fifty years of age. He had seen the deceased before; he believed that he might have slept several nights on the kiln prior to that on which he died; he saw him get off the kiln on Friday morning; he did not speak to him of the great danger in sleeping on a kiln; he knew that the effluvia arising from the bricks had the effect of drawing persons who lay near the kiln to sleep, and sometimes persons who were not asleep had been reduced to such a torpid state, and were so benumbed by lying upon the kiln, that they could not move when the smoke arose; they exhaled a portion of it and were suffocated. Almost every night twenty or more persons came into the brick-fields for the purpose of lying near the kilns for the benefit of the warmth. He and his fellow workmen were tired of driving them away, for they returned again as soon as they had left the field. A short time ago four of the persons were taken into custody and conveyed to Hatton-garden Police-office, for the purpose of deterring them from coming into the field; but the poor fellows having no parish to go to were discharged.—Mr. Henry Jones, an officer of Clerkenwell Parish, deposed, that he searched the deceased's clothes when he was brought to the Workhouse and found the pocket-book, papers and razor, he then produced; there was not any money about him.—The Coroner examined the papers, by which it appeared the deceased had been more than 20 years in his Majesty's service. He had been Secretary to Admiral Sir R. Calder, and Midshipman under the command of the Hon. Algernon Percy. For many years during the first part of his service he was schoolmaster in several of his Majesty's ships, and a number of those Officers, who are an ornament to their profession, received their education in the branches of Astronomy and Navigation from him.—The documents were read by the Coroner; they were mostly letters of recommendation from Admirals and Captains under whose command he had served, to the Lords of the Admiralty, speaking of him in the highest terms, and describing him as a fit object for promotion.—The last situation the deceased filled was schoolmaster on board a King's ship, and he was paid off, after 20 years' service, without a pension. He applied to the Admiralty to be made a Purser, but did not succeed.—One of the Jury said, that the deceased was the seventh person who had died upon brick-kilns, lately, near Islington and Clerkenwell.—One of the Overseers stated, that last week a poor fellow was brought from the same kiln where the deceased died, apparently dead; he had been suffocated by sleeping on the kiln. After six hours' exertions, by the surgeon, he was restored to animation, and is since perfectly recovered.—After a variety of observations upon the unfortunate death of the deceased, and means being proposed to the parish officers to prevent a similar occurrence taking place, a gentleman, named Packer, the Foreman of the Jury, proposed the following Special Verdict, to which the Jury assented, and it was recorded:—"Died from suffocation, by sleeping on a brick-kiln, not having the means of procuring a lodging."

An Inquisition was taken on Tuesday at the Crown and Anchor, Leadenhall-street, on the body of a young woman, named Jane Homerod, who was a wet nurse in the family of Mr. Phillips, Lecturer on Chemistry, Fenchurch-buildings, who put an end to her existence, on Sunday morning, by strangling herself with her garters.—The father and mother of the deceased are respectable persons residing in Essex. About six months ago the deceased lived servant in the family of Sir Edward Yates, of Tring Park; an improper intercourse took place between her and a young man named Stephen Norton, and she proving to be in a state of pregnancy, both herself and the young man were dismissed. About two months ago, the deceased having been brought to bed of a boy, was recommended by a surgeon to Mrs. Phillips as wet nurse, and was received; lately she became unwell, and it was thought her illness was caused by her leaving her chamber too soon after her confinement. Mrs. P. procured another wet nurse, and the deceased had every attention. During the latter part of the day, on Saturday, she became light-headed, and talked very incoherently. After the family were gone to bed they were awoke by a noise, in the deceased's apartment, like some one falling on the ground. Mr. and Mrs. Phillips went into the room, and found the deceased lying on the bed apparently dead. Mr. Phillips ran for a surgeon, and Mrs. Phillips discovered that the deceased had tied her garters very tight round her neck, a loop was at the end of one of her garters, which had been placed upon a hook from which she suspended herself, the hook giving way she fell, and the noise of her falling awoke the family.—Mr. Panover, surgeon, was of opinion she died of strangulation, her neck was broke in the fall, and the means he used to restore her did not prove successful.—Saturday afternoon the deceased received a letter from her seducer, from which it appeared that he had resolved to abandon her for another whom he conceived more worthy; she grew worse after the receipt of the letter.—The Jury returned the following verdict:—"We find that the deceased, being insane, strangled herself, and thereby caused her death."

On Wednesday an Inquest was held at the Spread Eagle, St. Giles's, on the body of Joanna Duggin, a child, whose death was occasioned by strong liquors given to her by a woman named Ellen Bryan. It appeared from the evidence of the parents and sister of the deceased, that Bryan took the child out about half-past 7 on Sunday morning, and returned about 9 o'clock. On setting down the child it could not stand. Bryan was asked what she had done, and the child said, "I have drank two glasses of gin, one of rum, one of peppermint, and a share of two pots of porter." The child grew very ill, and died in the course of the day. Bryan had before taken her out and made her drunk, in consequence of which she had been very ill. The body of the child was opened, and the stomach found to be greatly inflamed. The jury returned a verdict of—Wilful Murder.

An Inquisition was taken on Thursday at the Queen's Head, Lower Islington, upon the body of a sailor, who was found burnt to death on a brick-kiln in Islington-fields.—The deceased had been seen lying about the brick-kiln for some time and appeared greatly distressed. On Saturday night last Mr. Rhodes's foreman saw the deceased and another man lying near the kiln, he told them of the great danger, and ordered them to go away; they said they had no place to go to; he persisted that they should go, but was obliged to threaten to give them into custody before they would leave the field. After he was gone they returned. On the following morning the deceased was found about seven o'clock lying dead on the kiln from which he had been sent away on the preceding night. His body was very much scorched. There was nothing found in the pockets of the deceased's clothes; but in his hat was found a part of a sheep's bowels, called the paunch, which he had washed clean (as was supposed) for the purpose of eating. Verdict—"The deceased died from suffocation and burning, in consequence of sleeping on a brick kiln."

On Friday an Inquest was held at the Lord Hood, Rich-street, on the body of George Cowderoy, aged three years and a half, son to Mr. Cowderoy, china-merchant, of Rich-street.—It appeared that the deceased, who was at play with another child, saw a mug containing fly-water lying on the window-ledge, and liking the appearance of it, he drank it off; his screams brought assistance; the child's mouth was burnt dreadfully, and on opening the body after death, the coats of the stomach were found burnt in a shocking manner.—Verdict—Accidental Death.

A young lady of amiable manners, about 20 years of age, who for the last two years has resided in the family of a Clergyman in the neighbourhood of Clapham Common, attempted to put a period to her existence on Wednesday by taking poison. It appears that this young woman is the daughter of an officer in the army. When about sixteen, she was addressed by a gentleman of property, and it was settled that the marriage should take place on her attaining the age of nineteen. About two years ago, her father met with a heavy pecuniary loss, in consequence of which it became necessary that his daughter should employ her talents in support of herself and in aid of a beloved parent. She obtained a situation in the family above alluded to, where she has ever since remained as Governess to his daughters. On her father's reverse of fortune, she was forsaken by her lover, and this plunged the unfortunate girl into a deep melancholy. On Wednesday she retired to her own apartment, on a plea of indisposition, when she swallowed a quantity of laudanum. The lady of the house, whose suspicions had been roused, followed her almost immediately, and discovered her upon her knees, apparently at prayers. By dint of questions, she at length induced the unfortunate girl to confess the act. Medical aid was instantly called in, and every effort used to counteract the poison: they were attended with success, and she is now out of danger.

Monday morning as two boys, one about seven, the other not exceeding six years of age, were amusing themselves with sliding down the iron railing at the landing-place on the city side of Blackfriars-bridge, the youngest boy missing his hold fell into the water, at the spot where the common sewer empties itself into the river. The other boy, in attempting to save his companion, shared his fate, and both would probably have perished had it not been for the humanity of a young waterman who was near the spot, and, seeing the accident, without hesitation threw himself into the water, and succeeded, though with considerable difficulty and hazard, in bringing both the children to the shore. One of them escaped with no other injury than a sound ducking; the other was less fortunate, having in his fall struck his head against the stone work of the bridge, and received a severe concussion over the right temple.

On Tuesday evening, between four and five o'clock, the premises of Messrs. James, Wood, and James, oil merchants, College-hill, took fire, which was so rapid in its progress, that, notwithstanding a full supply of water to the numerous engines, they were utterly destroyed in half an hour. All the books and papers were fortunately preserved. The stock, which consisted principally of oil, was entirely consumed; but the greater part is insured.

A dreadful fire broke out about four o'clock on Tuesday morning, at the Crown and Sceptre public-house, Tichfield-street, Mary-le-bone, which consumed that and greater part of the adjoining house, a green grocer's, in Foley-street. The fire was first discovered by a man lodging in a room on the second floor of the public-house, who, being alarmed by the smell, opened the window, and called for assistance. A ladder was immediately procured, but being too short, the man threw himself out; fortunately he caught hold of the ladder and escaped with little injury. A poor woman, residing at the green grocer's, who had lately lain in, was got out, but she has sustained so much injury through the alarm, and being exposed to the atmosphere, that fears are entertained for her life. A watering man to the coach stand, who slept at the public-house, was burnt to death; his remains were dug out in the afternoon, but so blackened and disfigured, that it was scarcely possible to recognize the human form.

A gentleman of property, named Raine, while looking at a print-shop in Oxford-street, had his coat pocket completely cut out, with his pocket-book, containing Bank notes and Bills of Exchange to the amount of 380*l*. There were a quantity of 10*l*. notes of the Bank of England, and country notes to the amount of 100*l*. of the Dorchester Bank.

On Wednesday night, the house of Mr. Maudslay, the engineer, in Lambeth, was broken open by some robbers, who carried off a variety of drawing utensils, and about 3*l*. in silver, which was deposited in a writing-desk. The same night, the house of Mr. Collinge, in Lambeth, was broken open and plundered of 67*l*. in Bank notes.

Tuesday morning a pauper, in Clerkenwell workhouse, who is about 70 years of age, and by trade a painter, was directed by the master of the workhouse to paint the front windows of the house; he was standing upon a projection, which is about two foot wide, and when in the act of pulling down one of the windows, his hands slipped, and he fell backwards; he struck the lamp iron in the fall, and pitched upon his head on the stones; his skull was divided, and he died almost instantaneously.

Robert Jeffries, a labourer, in the service of Mr. Ironmonger, of Guiley, being suspected of having purloined some flour belonging to his master, was charged by him with it while working in a field: Jeffries, however, denied it in the most positive manner, accompanying his declarations of innocence by wishing that he might drop down dead, that his eyes might fall from his head into his hat, and other horrid and blasphemous imprecations, when he suddenly fell to the ground without speech or motion. He has since been conveyed to the residence of his friends at Wheaton-Aston, where he now lies in a deplorable state; and without hopes of recovery.—Chester Courant.

CHANGE IN THE SPANISH MINISTRY.— FERDINAND VII. AND CHARLES IV.

HERE is legitimacy in all its glory! A poor feeble-minded creature, who in private life would amount to a man-milliner at best, first breaking his promises to his deliverers and confining and killing them, and now sending orders in the middle of the night to his own Ministers to vanish different ways to a distance! This is an anticlimax to be sure; but legitimacy will not think so. Imagine the least of tailors dispensing destinies from his board; (but we beg pardon of worthy persons who may not be their own masters)—imagine a cat ordering us out of the house;—imagine a toad sitting upon a throne on Salisbury plain, and telling the natives to keep a circle of homage about him half a mile off; and it is not a more ridiculous spectacle in the eyes of manhood and reason.

It is not yet known what was the immediate cause of this Turk-like proceeding. Some think that FERDINAND was angry at a proposed cession of the Floridas to America; others, at the inability of the late Ministers to make better interest with the Court of Rome respecting the use of the church-property. The fact is, that any thing or nothing is likely to be a reason on such an occasion. A very probable one is a discovery of some intrigue carrying on without the despot's knowledge,—an attempt to dispense a little with his prodigious stupidity.

Nor is much known of the new Ministers. One of them was employed the other day in the Embassy over here; and this might seem to promise at least a little better knowledge of public opinion; but it is astonishing how profoundly ignorant some politicians can contrive to be on that subject, even at head-quarters. People must have a brain to receive, as well as eyes to see. If the English Ministers can be such servile tools of legitimacy, what can be expected from one of FERDINAND's chosen courtiers, who sees them, he cannot tell why, in possession of such power over their country? The liberty of the press must confound him a little, and the grandeur of Portland-place and its establishments delight him; but it is easy to mislead him respecting the importance of the one; and he will refer the grandeur of the other to the dominion of the existing powers,—the unworthy descendants of those who really caused all that is stable of it. It is hardly probable, we think, that the new Ministers should be more liberal than the last. The proceeding which removed the latter was not in the style of a man who had found out his mistakes, or thought he had lost his power; and it is an old truism, that a King's choice of his servants is according to his own character or talents. Had Louis the 16th possessed no character, he would have had bad as well as weak Ministers. Had HENRY the 4th possessed no talents, he would have given way to his ruling infirmity, and chosen mere men of pleasure. When SULLY was sent for by HENRY's feeble successor to consult with him, his old-fashioned appearance raised a giggle among the bye-standers; upon which he said to the King, "When your Majesty's father honoured me by a message of the present nature, he used to send all the coxcombs out of the room."—A man so senseless as well as heartless as FERDINAND is likely to exemplify this truism with an idiotical excess, unless something very obvious indeed should have occurred to make him think himself in danger. The secret and very probably unconscious reason of the bitterest part of his ingratitude towards the patriots, and his favour towards the very courtiers who were so lukewarm in his cause, is this,—that the patriots had the courage to be better and more truly loyal men than himself, while the courtiers shewed themselves as feeble and as faithless.

FERDINAND's conduct must puzzle his brother Promise-Breakers at Aix-la-Chapelle. He plays the part of legitimacy, as we observed in our last, too grossly even for them. It is thought that their difficulty would be increased by the late sudden and violent measure, and that it will hinder any avowed discussion of Spanish affairs. But the discussion never seemed likely. It is too delicate and betraying a matter. They must treat him like an over-foolish relation, and endeavour to instruct or to regulate him in private.

There is one discussion indeed, which the proceeding might hasten, if it ever presented itself for one at all. We mean the question relative to FERDINAND's father,—whether his abdication was voluntary or otherwise, and whether he wishes to reign again. Did the late Ministers venture to make any secret representation to Congress or to Russia on this subject? It is a very awkward business for all parties, let them do with it what they may; and we have no doubt they would restore the old gentleman his throne, if they could contrive it without making matters worse. CHARLES the 4th is a living specimen of what monarchs take to themselves the right of doing, though they will not allow the people to do it. Either a fit of caprice, any other reason, or no reason, induced him to abdicate, or he was made to renounce the throne in favour of his son. If the former was the case, a monarch has the liberty of doing that from a fit of caprice, which the greatest and most urgent and galling necessity will not allow the people to do;—if the latter, a prince may play the Jacobin with a vengeance in his own family, though the mere charge of Jacobinism shall hang up his best subject. And princes have been in the habit of playing the Jacobin at their own pleasure, as we have often remarked. See, for quite enough proofs, the whole history of the French monarchy, which is little else but a riotous succession of princely debaucheries and princely conspiracies.—But how is CHARLES to be reinstated? FERDINAND has been acknowledged, when popular acknowledgments were useful, by all the Sovereigns of Europe; and it would be a dangerous affectation of ignorance to say that they were not aware of the real circumstances of the abdication before. To pretend to please the Spanish people by restoring him would be still more dangerous in every respect; and if Don JOSE PIZARRO ever thought himself a favourite enough with his patron ALEXANDER to canvass the matter with him on the score of the danger of precedent, there is an awkward circumstance in Russian history, which his Majesty would feel galled at seeing brought into play. We allude to the violent death of the Emperor PAUL. Monarchs, it is true, take a great and natural interest in the inviolability of deceased monarchs, or of those who cannot contend with the throne's possessor. This is the cause why the most obstinate Ministers of a late Sovereign are sometimes chosen by his successor in spite of past differences; and this is the cause also why old dynasties are always in great favour at courts, when the new is no longer in any danger from them. But your Russian native, though powerful in the world at present, and represented abroad by a very gentlemanly sort of Tartar, has something unlicked about him still; and it is as well, as in the said gentleman, to secure a temperate kind of hug on his return.

Upon the whole, we think that this new exhibition of tyranny will be of use to the cause of Spanish patriotism, inasmuch as it must tend to deepen the popular disgust. The late temporary successes of the Allies have been in favour of every species of convenient bigotry,—but the bigotry of the Spanish King is a little inconvenient, and we suspect will prove more so. The Allies will most probably do their best to soften matters at Madrid, for their own sakes; but they will hardly venture to talk of them publicly, much less to espouse the reckless stupidity of their brother Impotentate.

DON CORREA.

[From the press of more temporary matter this week, we can only contrive to give the following prefatory letter written by our worthy correspondent Don Diego Correa. A portion of the documents which it precedes will follow next Sunday. The concluding passage of this introduction, coming from an undoubted Spanish patriot, speaks volumes. We only wish Ferdinand had sense enough to read them.—Exam.]

MR. EDITOR,—It having been falsely alleged that I entered Gibraltar under a fictitious character, I refer to the copy of the original passport, annexed to my letter to Ferdinand 7th, in your paper of the 16th August, which fully contradicts such an assertion. I now transmit you my expostulation to the British Ambassador at Madrid, dated 23d December, with his Excellency's answer, which clearly proves, that for an alleged offence, committed in an English territory, I was seized as a criminal, and given over for punishment to a different Government. The injuries I have sustained in character, constitution, and property, are irreparable; but it is a duty I owe myself to make public the origin and nature of my wrongs, and to prove to the generous and enlightened British nation that I have acted towards it as became the loyal subject and patriotic soldier of her ally, documents to prove which are in my possession. I have hitherto from motives of delicacy refrained from making public my claims on the English people, even prior to my unjust and unlawful arrest in the Garrison of Gibraltar. The accompanying letters will produce conviction and sympathy in the mind of every true friend to justice, liberality, and virtue. I have fought and bled for my country's cause; and would to heaven that my blood and that of hundreds of true patriots had been efficient in placing on the throne a constitutional King. We regret not that we suffered, but that we have suffered in vain.

DIEGO CORREA.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—The melancholy and undeserved fate of Mr. Anthony Henry Wilson, who perished on a brick-kiln, as noticed in your paper of the 4th inst. is one which makes the feeling mind shudder, turns the moralist into a sceptic, and fires the patriot bosom with indignation.

Can the affairs of that country be well administered, which, possessing ample means for the subsistence of all its inhabitants, suffers any of its worthy members to starve? Or, can its ample resources be properly directed, whilst it permits an honest, respectable, and intelligent individual, who has devoted himself for twenty years to its public service, and acted meritoriously in his station during that period, to be deprived of the scanty means of procuring himself shelter for the night, and be driven to the necessity of actually perishing by the noxious and sulphureous effluvia of a brick-kiln?

Would not the money wrung from the pockets of the industrious classes of the community, for the unworthy support of sinecurists, placemen or no place men, and pensioners; or, for the paltry and absurd purposes of building stud houses, thatched cottages, and mandarin pavillions, seldom or ever to be occupied, reflecting neither taste on the artists or dignity on the country—Would not, I say, the vast sums squandered on these childish toys, to gratify the puerile pleasures of the parasites of the Court, or the vanity of their master, receive a better direction, and answer a better purpose, if properly applied to the relief of such objects as that which is the miserable subject of these cursory remarks?

It is clear that this unfortunate man had no other recommendations to favour than merit; and it is equally clear, and quite superfluous to observe, that simple merit has few attractions for a Court. It is evident he could not claim lineage with any of the swarms of noble and venal parasites by which the throne is environed almost to suffocation, and who, to gratify its whims and caprices, sacrifice all principles and notions of honour and independence, in order to bask in the sunshine of royal favour, as well as to repose and fatten on the hard earnings of the people.

The public distress begs description: it galls and distresses the real philanthropist, when we reflect, that in 1783, when Pitt came into power, the whole expence of Government did not exceed 12,500,000*l.*; and when we see that at this time the Poor Rates alone approach that sum, what inference can we but draw from that noxious system of misrule, which has plunged a once happy and flourishing country into such a distressing and embarrassed situation? This system, unfortunately, seems still in full activity, and it is to be feared, that neither the Holy Alliance nor the Congress at Aix have been expressly formed to check it. My Lord Castlereagh, with his wonted nonchalance, will, no doubt, again and again tell us, that the present distress is "the natural consequence of the sudden transition from war to peace," and that the discontents of the people are only "an ignorant impatience for the relaxation of taxation." But may not the people as reasonably inquire, Why did we go to war? Who forced us? And, why are we so heavily oppressed with taxation, the consequence and only visible fruits of that war, as to render us impatient to get rid of it? They may even doubt whether it was of any importance to them, whether the Bourbons, for whose support all these taxes were levied, were or were not ever replaced on the throne of France? and they may truly think, that the 600,000,000*l.* of debt incurred in that extra-national contest, was a sum by far greater than any possible advantage likely to be derived from their restoration.

But the pith and marrow of the question is, that principles favourable to the liberty of the human race had begun to be developed; kingcraft and priestcraft were exposed; political light had shed its beams on the mind of man; error was detected: these were startling matters for crowned and mitred heads. A combination of powers must be formed and put in action to controul these liberal sentiments; and to stop their progress throughout Europe. England at that as well as in subsequent times had a corrupt Parliament, which neither felt nor spoke nor acted in unison with the national opinion. Influence and corruption were not confined within the walls of Parliament; they forced their way out. The City was a hot-bed, fully prepared and worked up, to warm them. The celebrated Grocers-hall "life and property" men, who flourished by the extension of blood and warfare, aided by the hireling journals of the day, gave a factitious tone, by their influence and violence, to the public voice. The very name of liberty, by their arts, and those of their ministerial patrons, became odious. English blood was shed, and English gold spent in wild profusion, in order to extinguish that spirit of freedom, which, until that unhappy period, Englishmen had always been taught to consider not only their peculiar birthright, but one of the most precious treasures the bounty of heaven could bestow on man. Thus by these unfortunate and wicked measures, the result of a conspiracy against the liberties of the world, we have been compelled to sustain a debt of 600 to 700,000,000*l.*; not in support of the principles of freedom, or the defence of our liberties, but towards the accomplishment of a great and baneful system, which has nearly already, and which must, if not checked generally and inevitably, effect their total subversion.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,
London, Oct. 5, 1818.

BONAPARTE.

Paris, Sept. 30.—(Private Letter.)

"The following intelligence concerning Bonaparte is widely circulated at Paris. It proceeds from a respectable individual who has just reached Marseilles. He embarked at Bengal on board an English vessel. On touching at St. Helena to supply the ship with water, orders were despatched for the vessel to quit the anchorage ground, and lay to at cannon shot from the batteries until what was wanted was sent out. Several officers from the island dined on board; from them the particulars I subjoin were collected.

"Bonaparte seems in better health since he has resolved to walk out and take occasional exercise in hunting and fishing. To render this latter amusement compatible with his safety, a circuit has been prepared at the mouth of the river, and one end of it barricaded with an iron lattice, in order to close up the passage of boats to the ocean. Four handsome fowling-pieces and six pointers have been sent out to him from London. Bonaparte is permitted to carry a sabre, as a defence against dangerous or troublesome animals when he walks in the interior of the island, but he is not allowed to wear a sword. The English Officers amused themselves with relating the abrupt manner in which he pays his court to the women. The persons composing his suite are not permitted to accost him with the titles of sovereignty when strangers are present. The prisoner is believed to be more resigned to his fate, since he has the entire conviction of the irrevocable loss of his liberty. His residence is daily improved by the arrival of costly furniture; and every month a frigate, which sails from England, is charged by the care and attachment of some of his partisans with all the precious novelties this kingdom produces. No human power can imagine a mode of evasion. The garrison is perpetually on the alert. The service is so active, that the troops are relieved every six months, and that independently of the high pay, this period is counted double.—This news, in which implicit confidence is placed, from the respectability of its source, has tranquillized the minds of many persons in this country, who were led to believe that the Ex-emperor was exposed to distressing privations and wanton outrages.—A traveller of rank who has just reached Paris from Rome, states, that Lucien Bonaparte has been obliged to limit the expense of his household, from having neglected to regulate his affairs with more order. The consideration in which he was held at Rome has considerably diminished since his last co-operation with Napoleon. He does not himself deny the regret he feels for it, but protests that his great motive for returning to France was, from his inability to withstand the solicitations of his mother, who urged him to moderate the impetuosity of his brother by his counsel; and again, he had the hope of being useful to the Pope, for whom he expresses both gratitude and admiration. It is confidently affirmed, that Lucien Bonaparte has in his possession the life of Bonaparte, written by himself, and that not more than two or three persons have copies of the original manuscript. It is added, that Lucien often receives intelligence from his brother, but the channel of this correspondence is a profound secret."—Courier.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 3.—Yesterday a man, in a state of drunkenness, was arrested on the boulevard of the Temple, roaring out the praises of Bonaparte. When interrogated before the Prefect of the Police, he was recognized to be a farmer at Romainville, who has had four sons taken from him by the conscription.

OCT. 6.—According to intelligence from Aix-la-Chapelle, the authenticity of which we believe we may guarantee, the dispositions of the Sovereigns towards France, and their sentiments for the King, permit us to augur that the result of this august union will be as speedy and as favourable as all Frenchmen could desire. The resolutions which are to be adopted, and which will be a homage paid to the virtues and the wisdom of the Prince who governs us, will ensure, without doubt, the repose and the happiness of France, and will seal the sincere and durable reconciliation of all nations.—Moniteur.

Yesterday morning, Count Georges de Caraman arrived in Paris express. He brings the news, that in the conference which took place at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 2d inst., the immediate evacuation of the French territory was unanimously decided upon.

IRELAND.

THE LORD MAYOR'S DINNER.

DUBLIN, OCT. 3.—On Wednesday the new Lord Mayor, Alderman McKenny, entertained his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and suite, Mr. Secretary Grant and his father, Lords Bradford, Meath, Norbury, Forbes, Aylmer, Mr. Plunket, and the principal nobility and gentry at present in town, at the Mansion-house.—On the cloth being removed, the usual toasts were drunk. The next toast was—"The Right Hon. Charles Grant, Chief Secretary for Ireland."—Three times three.

Mr. GRANT begged to return his sincere thanks for the honour they had conferred upon him; an honour which he felt the more sincerely, as he was aware that, having so recently arrived in this country, he could have few personal claims to their good opinion. He assured them that he felt the arduous nature of the situation in which he was placed; he knew what were the qualifications which it required, and was sensible of his own incompetency to do it justice; but, however deeply he felt his own defects, he ventured to say boldly, that there was one qualification, with respect to which he would not consent to place himself second to any man—an ardent and anxious desire to promote, to the utmost of his ability, the happiness of Ireland.

When Mr. Grant concluded, and took his seat, the band instantly played "Croppies lie down." The Lord Mayor directed a look of astonishment and rebuke towards the orchestra, and the tune was discontinued.—Among the toasts which followed was—"The immortal memory of Lord Nelson."—(When this toast was announced, Alderman Archer exclaimed, "Oh yes, a bumper; and the next toast you must give, my Lord, will be a bumper too, 'the glorious and immortal memory of King William the Third.'" The Lord Mayor took no notice of this sally, but repeated the toast he had given, which was drunk in solemn silence.)—"The Lord Primate and the Church of Ireland."—Alderman Archer again interrupted the Lord Mayor, by calling out, "Oh, you mean the glorious memory!" the Lord Mayor said, "Alderman Archer, the toast is—the Lord Primate and the Church of Ireland."

Alderman ARCHER, who had exhibited signs of great impatience at the Lord Mayor's neglect of his call for the "Glorious Memory," now demanded that toast in a manner so audible and persevering, that his Lordship could no longer overlook it. His notice of it, however, was confined to saying, (with equal good humour, good sense, and firmness,) "Alderman Archer, I will not depart from the order in which my toasts are set down upon my list."

Several national and patriotic toasts were drunk, and at half-past 11 o'clock, his Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant, his suite, and several of the noblemen and gentlemen, including Mr. Grant, Mr. Gregory, &c. retired highly delighted with the polite and hospitable attentions of the Lord Mayor, who attended Earl Talbot to his carriage.

We have now to state an occurrence the most unjustifiable which perhaps ever took place at an assembly of this kind. When the Lord Mayor re-entered, after having seen the Lord Lieutenant depart, some members of the Corporation proceeded to bring his Lordship to account, for omitting the "Immortal Memory." The Lord Mayor in very energetic terms explained his reasons for not having given the toast. He said, he felt very strongly the importance and the value of the situation in which he had been placed by the kindness of his fellow-citizens, but that, highly as he prized that situation, he would not compromise his own character, or the dignity of his office, by suffering any man, or set of men, to dictate to him. He said he had been astonished beyond measure upon discovering that the band, who were his servants for the day, had been tutored by some secret influence, which he was wholly at a loss to account for, to disobey his orders, and absolutely insult his guests by playing obnoxious airs. To what, he asked, was he to attribute the circumstance of "Croppies lie down" being played the moment the health of the Chief-Secretary had been drunk, if not to that management behind the curtain which he was surprised to find in such pernicious activity, but which he would make it his business to develop and destroy. He said he had taken the office of Chief-Magistrate of the city of Dublin under different circumstances, and perhaps with different feelings, from many of his predecessors. He should be happy to receive the advice of his friends, but he must always claim the right of exercising his own judgment upon every act which was to be performed by himself, and for which he should hold himself wholly responsible; but he must repeat, he never would permit himself to be dictated to by any man at the head of his own table. The taste and disposition must be very extraordinary indeed, which could select such an accompaniment as "Croppies lie down," for such speeches as those of the Lord Lieutenant and his Secretary—speeches abounding with sentiments so conciliatory, so gratifying to the people of this country, so flattering to their best hopes—speeches such as had never perhaps before been heard from persons in their station. He would take special care, however, that no such trick should ever be played upon him again. These, said his Lordship, are the reasons by which, although the toast was upon my list, I was prevented from giving it; and certainly I should not, in any event, have proposed it without such accompanying observations as would have divested it of all party character, and have rendered it perfectly incapable of giving offence to any individual in this room, or, indeed, to any portion of my fellow-countrymen. I trust, continued the Lord Mayor, that it is not necessary for me, at this time, to make any declaration of my principles. Every man who knows me, knows that I am firmly attached to the King, the constitution, the Government and laws of the country, and that I yield to no one in devotion to the Protestant religion; but I certainly am not among those persons who think that that holy religion, which I profess and venerate, is best supported by wounding, oppressing, or insulting my Catholic countrymen. I have been chosen to fill a high and honourable office, and it shall be my unceasing study to discharge its duties efficiently. To fulfil them honestly, is, at all events, in my power; and I am resolved that every act of mine shall be regulated by the strictest impartiality.

This explanation was received with much approbation.

Alderman ARCHER disclaimed all intention of dictating to the Lord Mayor, or of offending any person, and sought to justify his demand of the toast upon the ground of precedent, and the suggestions of persons who sat near him.

The LORD MAYOR observed, that, as he was willing to believe the conduct of which he had complained was but the result of mistaken zeal, he wished to bury it in oblivion, and would therefore propose a toast, which, he trusted, would restore perfect cordiality and good humour. He then gave "Universal Benevolence," which was drunk with great applause, and after some other toasts the company separated with the greatest harmony, carrying with them the most favourable impressions of their amiable, liberal, and sensible host.—Freeman's Journal.

JOSEPH LANCASTER.—In the month of June last, Mr. LANCASTER, accompanied by his lady, daughter, and secretary, embarked in the Good Washington from Gravesend, and on the 22d of August, after a tedious passage of sixty-four days, arrived safely at the city of New York.—On the Captain's announcing who was his passenger then on board, the ship-owner, an opulent merchant, immediately appeared from the shore, for the purpose of conducting Mr. LANCASTER and his family to appropriate accommodations, and on his name appearing next day amongst the arrivals, the Mayor and his son, together with other principal citizens, personally waited on him, to congratulate and welcome him to their city and country, and to arrange with him for dining next day with the heads of the State Government, when some fit times and places for his lecturing amongst them were to be determined.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, OCTOBER 11.

THE Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle was scarcely assembled, before it has settled the chief alledged object of it's meeting. It has given it's formal sanction to the evacuation of France by the Allied armies. This measure however has long been anticipated; and for our parts, we do not believe that it was the chief object it is said to have been, especially as it could have been well accomplished without meeting. We rather think that the Sovereigns wished to come together in order to sound each other personally respecting the Holy Alliance, the real object of which, though denied with vehement hypocrisy when we detected it in it's first promulgation, is now confessed with as exemplary an impudence. But more of this by and by. The private accounts from Aix-la-Chapelle are filled, as might be expected, with the Bond-street part of the business,—bowing, riding, crowding, visiting, &c. The following passages are the most important, especially as they have been instinctively omitted by the Courier:—"His Lordship (CASTLEREAGH) was dressed in the Windsor uniform, and decorated with the blue riband; but his equipage was rather like that intended for travelling, than for conveying a Minister of State to a royal levee. His Lordship, no doubt from economical motives, has left his carriages and horses behind him in England, and was drawn today by a couple of animals, which probably never expected the honour of standing at the gate of a Royal Court, and driven by a coachman, no doubt from the same stable, who did not even wear his Lordship's livery. During the time that Lord CASTLEREAGH was in the saloon with the King of Prussia, his Majesty showed himself at the balcony to the crowd assembled before it, but the persons who composed it displayed no great quickness of apprehension in distinguishing royalty, nor any enthusiastic devotion in saluting it. They allowed him to stand for a few moments without apparently knowing him, and when a sort of acclamation was at last attempted to be raised, it was feeble, broken, and languid. His Majesty graciously bowed several times, and the satisfied multitude relapsed into the same state of edifying silence which we remarked yesterday on his entrance. It is said that the King observed with a slight expression of dissatisfaction several instances of this apathy during his journey through his Rhenish provinces; and that, seeing on one occasion a boor who did not even doff his hat in his presence, he remarked that there would be more respect shown on the appearance of the Emperor. Petitions are now preparing; it is said, both here and at Cologne, against the new tariff, and probably a dissatisfaction with the high duties it imposes may be one reason why the people do not more zealously pay their duties of another kind. A company of the guard defiled before the gate in compliment to Lord CASTLEREAGH on his departure."

And again:—"Every window has two, three, or more candles, stuck in clay, as a substitute for candlesticks. There is thus much light, without any display of taste, or any exertion of fancy. Yet even this kind of illumination could not be procured without a little management. Every inhabitant of the city, this morning got a gentle hint, in the shape of an order from the police, to provide themselves with a supernumerary stock of candles, to testify their joy on the arrival of the Allied Sovereigns. Knowing the consequence of neglecting it, they have all taken the hint."

The fact of these two omissions on the part of the demi-official, perhaps official scribe of Government, is very curious, and saves us a world of comment. He is the oddest Irish writer in the world, and is always exceedingly eloquent in what he does not say.

Yesterday morning the Paris Papers of Wednesday last arrived. The Journal des Debats retracts its paragraph of the preceding day, announcing the definitive determination of the Allied Powers at Aix-la-Chapelle, that the Army of Occupation should be withdrawn. "We were too eager yesterday," it says, "in promulgating as certain, and as being already published at Aix-la-Chapelle, the decision of the Sovereigns relative to the evacuation of the French territory. Each day, it is true, adds to the hopes of France; but, in point of fact, the news, as we announced it, was premature. This inference at least must be drawn from the article in the Moniteur."

Accounts from South America describe in glowing colours the prospects which open upon the patriotic armies in relation to the ensuing campaign. They have received, it is said, large supplies from Europe in arms, ammunition, and military stores; and M'GREGOR, with some hundreds of English recruits, is likewise reported to have joined them. BOLIVAR, as was before hinted, has been transferred from the chief command of the troops to that of the civil government. PAEZ, a good soldier, has succeeded him. ARISMENDI, BERMUDEZ, M'GREGOR, and MARIANO, have subordinate posts assigned to them. MORILLO, according to these advices, has with him not more than 1,500 men.—An extract of a letter from a British naval officer, states the surrender of Guiría, with the whole of the Spanish gun-boats, to BRION, the admiral of the Patriotic fleet.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE, and Lord SELKIRK and family, were at Kingston, Upper Canada, on the 28th of August. The trial between the Hudson Bay and North west Companies was further put off till the end of October, when it would take place at York.—Quebec paper, Sept. 2.

The Pagoda Bridge over the Canal, in St. James's Park, is in a state of rapid decay. It is to be succeeded by a cast-iron bridge now preparing at Woolwich.

The German papers are filled with accounts of the wretched state of agitation and confusion which has lately prevailed in Constantinople, and which may be adduced as one more amongst a thousand proofs, that what the people lose in liberty, the Government does not always gain in power. The discontented Janissaries have been as usual setting fire to the town, with such success, that, on the 13th August, some thousand houses, with mosques and churches, were reduced to ashes. It seems that these licentious ruffians disliked their Aga; and under the influence, as is alleged, of certain ambitious instigators, demanded the deposition of the Grand Vizier, the Capitan Pacha, and others of the Sultan's Cabinet. The wisdom of the Porte has been praised on this occasion; and as an illustration of that rare quality, two remarkable circumstances are put on record. Ist, The Capitan Pacha was actually dismissed in compliance with the demands of the incendiaries. Next, all the elephants in Constantinople were, like the ex-Minister, dismissed from their places, and sent out of the capital, as being "animals of ill omen." Their natural sagacity might perhaps be an object of suspicion under a despotic Government. One supposed mover of the disturbance, KANBUR SULEIMAUN EFFENDI, was enticed into the hands of the executioners and strangled.

There is a rumour afloat that the Emperor ALEXANDER has come to an understanding with the French Government respecting the disposal of the matériel of his army to France. He intends, it is said, to re-convey the men to Russia by sea, leaving the horses, with their full mountings, and his guns, &c. in France, where they are much wanted. With all these he is amply provided at home; and, as he receives a good price for what he disposes of to the French, and the conveyance of his troops by sea will be less expensive than marching them over land, the arrangement is considered to be for the advantage of both parties.

Notwithstanding the recent accounts of the badness of the climate of St. Helena, the Courier ventured to assert that the island was not insalubrious, knowing, as it well does, the odium which attaches to its masters for confining NAPOLEON in such a place. Dr. CHEVRE will perhaps be considered a better authority than the Courier, at least on such topics; and this is what that celebrated Physician says of the island:—"All high mountains are damp, as Dr. HALLEY observed at St. Helena, a mountainous place, where damps fell so perpetually in the night time, that he was obliged to be every moment wiping his glasses, in making his astronomical observations."

WAGES, &c. IN AMERICA.—The following is an extract from a letter written by Mr. THOMAS EVANS, (addressed to a Gentleman of Wolverhampton) who for many years was a mercer and draper of that place, but who left this country for the United States in May last, dated Philadelphia, Aug. 24, 1818:—"The lowest wages here is one dollar (4s. 6d.) per day, which is given to the scavengers; but mechanics generally get from one and a half to two and a half dollars per day, the time of labour from sun rise to sun set, with one hour for breakfast and two for dinner. Meat from 6 to 14 cents (the 100th part of a dollar) per lb., milk from 6 to 8 cents per quart, but very good. Every thing just now is flat, but an improvement is expected in September and October. The working people here are mostly poor, owing to their very extravagant mode of living—nothing less than meat and fish, onions and cucumbers, tea and coffee, cream, new bread, like your rolls, with plenty of butter, will suffice them for breakfast—the same for supper, as also for dinner, except the tea and coffee. They also go into the country most Sundays in coaches, gigs, or steam boats, which are very expensive; so that you see they may save money and get forward if they choose."

THE REVENUE.—"We have for some time anticipated with pleasure the return of another Quarter-day at the Exchequer, and though the accounts will not be finally made up to this evening, and we cannot have the satisfaction of stating the produce of the Revenue with precision before Monday, we have the gratification of informing the public, that the sanguine hopes which we have from time to time been enabled to hold out to them, have been fully realized in the event. The British Revenue from the 5th July to the 10th Oct. 1818, has been ascertained to exceed that of the corresponding period of the year 1817, by a sum not less than 1,700,000*l.* in the Consolidated Fund; and though the produce of the Irish Revenue is not yet known beyond the 19th of September, it had already on that day improved above 150,000*l.* since the 5th of July. And it gives us the greatest pleasure to add, that in both parts of the United Kingdom the principal improvement has taken place in those great branches of the Customs and Excise, which best prove the increasing consumption and comfort of the great bulk of the people.—They amount upon these two branches of the Revenue to 1,500,000*l.*"—Courier—Saturday.

FINANCE.—The ministerial papers, discovering the futility of the hope of raising the stocks to a pitch that will allow of a reduction of the five per cents., begin to find out that their present price is perfectly agreeable to the financial fitness of things. Again and again we are gratified with accounts of the rapid rise of the revenue, and of the growing prosperity of the country. With every disposition to perceive the favourable side of things, when things really have a favourable side, we avow that a repetition of this heartless and artificial jargon, in the face of the many and heavy difficulties which at this moment are impeding the genial progress of the nation, fills us with disgust and contempt. It is impossible to take up a newspaper without encountering some dreadful account of wretchedness or despair, arising out of the misery created by want of employment. It is equally difficult to escape similar convictions of the growing demoralization of myriads from the same cause, connected with the disproportion between labour and its remuneration. And as to pauperism, to say nothing of overwhelming periods, its gradual and settled increase is truly frightful. But this is all the poor rates, say a tribe of sapient reasoners—wretched subterfuge! In Ireland there is no poor rate, and we refer our readers to a paragraph in an Irish paper, in regard to the paupers of Dublin, for the state of the case there. A humane association finds it necessary to parade two thousand miserables about the town with a cart, to beg provision for their sustenance; and an Irish journalist is quite delighted at their willingness to work for anything and be content. What a terrific sketch! whether regarded mentally or physically. No, the poor's rate, slovenly and morally injurious as it undoubtedly is, has been the ballast of the system, which would long ago have been upset without it; for it is the wasteful and unreflective speed of our national career, which has effected and is effecting so many fearful results. The surface has been smooth, the tide rapid, and these pleasant externals have served to conceal a countercurrent beneath, of the most dreadful and ominous tendency, but which is now perceived by all who can see, or who do not, in some shape or other, get paid for not seeing. Ministers say the people are revolutionary; if they asserted that facts were so, they would be nearer the truth. It is trite to say that man is the creature of circumstance.—Chester Guardian.

A new silver coinage is in great forwardness at the Mint, and will very shortly be issued to the public: it consists chiefly of crown pieces, said to be of a very beautiful dye, and will amount to 3,000,000*l.* sterling.

"At a respectable coffee-house (says a Correspondent) there is posted up, 'A Clergyman of character is desirous of undertaking Sunday Duty on'—What an inference!"

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.—The Recorder, it appears, is most anxious to extend the awful punishment of death to minor offenders,—nay, even to boys!—There are many persons, however, who differ with Sir JOHN SILVESTER on this point, and they will be gratified to see, by the following passage, that no less a man than Sir THOMAS MORE,—(who, we humbly conceive, possessed almost as much knowledge of human nature as our humane Old Bailey Judge)—was of opinion that frequent capital punishments were neither just nor politic:—“One day (observed Sir THOMAS MORE) when I was dining with him (the Cardinal of England) there happened to be at table one of the English lawyers, who took occasion to run out in a high commendation of the severe execution of justice upon thieves, who, as he said, were then hanged so fast, that there were sometimes twenty on one gibbet; and upon that, he said, he could not wonder enough how it came to pass, that since so few escaped, there were yet so many thieves left, who were still robbing in all places. Upon this, I took the boldness to speak freely before the Cardinal, and said, there was no reason to wonder at the matter, since this way of punishing thieves, was neither just in itself, nor good for the public; for as the severity was too great, so the remedy was not effectual; simple theft not being so great a crime, that it ought to cost a man his life, nor any punishment, how severe soever, being able to restrain those from robbery, who can find out no other way of livelihood. In this, said I, not only you in England, but a great part of the world, imitate some ill masters, that are readier to chastise their scholars than to teach them. There are dreadful punishments enacted against thieves, but it were much better to make such good provisions, by which every man might be put into a method how to live, and so be preserved from the fatal necessity of stealing, and of dying for it.”—Sir T. MORE.

A wag in the Morning Chronicle gives the following reason for the rise in the price of Milk:—“An Irish Milkman has, I think, satisfactorily accounted for the rise. It was in answer to a question from my landlady, a very notable woman, who asked him in my hearing, one day during the late very dry weather, the reason why the price of milk had “ris?” “By my soul, madam,” replied Pat, with a look of arch simplicity, “I believe it is altogether owing to the scarcity of water!”—This, Sir, also explains the true meaning of the extraordinary howl of all the milk carriers in the streets of London—mi-eau, which, be it known to “all my pretty maids,” signifies half-water.”

MARRIAGE.—Yesterday morning, the 10th inst. at St. James's Church, Mr. WILLIAM SAMS, of Pall-Mall, to HARRIET, third daughter of the late JAMES GRANT RAYMOND, Esq. of Chester-street, Grosvenor-place.

DR. HALLORAN.—We are informed by Dr. HALLORAN, that the Report of his Address to the Court, when sentenced to seven years transportation, for the alleged forgery of a frank, was erroneous, in representing him as having used the expressions of “cruel and unjust sufferings,” incarcerated in “a dungeon,” “infamous prosecution,” &c. The corrected Address, which he sent to the Editor, came too late to prevent the insertion of the other. A Correspondent, writing to us respecting this Gentleman, and recording some instances of his generosity, closes his letter with the following information:—

“The annexed Certificate has lately been handed to Lord STAMFORD, by a Gentleman, whose character is of the highest respectability, and needs no commendation I can offer:

“I hereby declare upon my honour, that I have been on the strictest terms of intimacy and friendship with the Rev. Dr. HALLORAN for a long series of years; know him to be charitable, generous, humane, and delighting in the most noble actions; neither do I consider him capable of wantonly wounding the feelings, or depreciating the character of any man.

“Oct. 5, 1818. JOHN H. BRIDGMAN, M. D.

BRITISH CLAIMS.—Although notice has some time since been given in the Gazette of the opening of the Commission to investigate the British Claims, the Commissioners now say that, though they attend for an hour or two in the day, they are not a constituted body, and cannot “go on” till the meeting of Parliament. Such conduct is severely oppressive to the Commercial community, as their claims have, either from the want of the understanding of a mercantile man, or some other even more reprehensible cause, never been investigated properly; while the claims of the Fundholders, which, according to the spirit and letter of the Treaty, are certainly not more entitled to consideration, have been treated with undue partiality. The French Government have at this moment liquidated more than half the amount stipulated, and this has been paid at so much per cent. on all the claims generally; but the English Commissioners still repose on their salaries, and, though a surplus will eventually be received, they continue to entertain the prejudice against the Commercial claims instilled in their minds by the French Commissioners, who took objections to them on no principle recognised by the Treaty, but justifiable, perhaps, in them, at a period when it was their object to reduce the sum to be disbursed by France. Now this impediment to justice no longer exists; and the very heart and purpose of the Treaty, which was principally to redeem the losses of the British Merchants by sequestration and confiscation on the part of the French Government, will be utterly defeated, if the Commercial class do not invoke Parliament to appoint men willing, as well as able, to investigate their claims, and not to suffer a solemn Treaty, in their case alone, to “to keep its promise to the ear, and break it to the hope.” At present, it is too true, that nothing “goes on,” always excepting the salary of the Commissioners, amounting together to 6,000*l.* per annum, “volvitur et volvetur omne in ævum,” and, as the rustic fared, who rested on the bank for the river to flow by that he might cross, so will the Commercial world, if they wait for an expeditious conclusion of such a Commission from the Commissioners themselves, and do not turn, from them, to Parliament for aid and justice.—Morning Chronicle.

A Correspondent begs to ask “Mr. Justice PARKE, as Governor of a Public Charity in the Borough of Southwark, whether the appointment of the beadle's wife as Matron of the hospital is not in direct opposition to the will of the founder THOMAS GUY, and to the statutes, and consequently illegal—it being expressly ordained that the Matron should be a clergyman's widow in reduced circumstances?”—He adds, “Is it not singular that the present Chaplain was appointed in consequence of his consenting to give up his residence, and is not non-residence contrary to the intentions of the founder?”

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

STATE OF THE QUEEN.

The daily repetitions of the same story with which the columns of some papers are filled, have little of truth to recommend them. We are assured that her MAJESTY seldom sees the Princesses for more than a few minutes in the day, as she is soon exhausted by conversation, that for five weeks she had not admitted the PRINCE REGENT to her presence, until Wednesday or Thursday last, and then only for a few minutes. That she is free from pain while she leans forward, supporting her head by her arm on the table, and that having no presentiment of danger, she has not thought it necessary to desire prayers to be put up for her recovery in the Churches, nor is it believed that she has made a will.—Chronicle—Oct. 7.

The following Bulletin was issued yesterday morning:—

“The QUEEN has had several hours' sleep, by which her MAJESTY'S strength appears to be in some degree recruited.”

LITERARY NOTICES.

No. 44.

A MANLY and judicious letter, signed J. S. appeared in the Morning Chronicle the other day, respecting the article in the Quarterly Review on the Endymion of the young poet Mr. KEATS. It is one of several public animadversions, which that half-witted, half-hearted Review has called indignantly forth on the occasion. "This is the hastily-written tribute," says the writer, "of a stranger, who ventures to predict that Mr. K. is capable of producing a poem that shall challenge the admiration of every reader of true taste and feeling; nay, if he will give up his acquaintance with Mr. Leigh Hunt, and apostatise in his friendships, his principles, and his politics (if he have any), he may even command the approbation of the Quarterly Review."—We really believe so; but Mr. Keats is of a spirit which can afford to dispense with such approbation, and stand by his friends. We should have given the whole of this letter, but we have, since met with another in the Alfred Exeter paper, which is more elaborate on the subject; and we have not room for both.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.—MR. KEATS.

We have met with a singular instance, in the last number of the Quarterly Review, of that unfeeling arrogance, and cold ignorance, which so strangely marked the minds and hearts of Government-sycophants and Government writers. The Poem of a young man of genius, which evinces more natural power than any other work of this day, is abused and cried down, in terms which would disgrace any other pens than those used in the defence of an Oliver or a Castles. We have read the poetic romance of Endymion (the book in question) with no little delight; and could hardly believe that it was written by so young a man as the preface infers. Mr. Keats, the author of it, is a genius of the highest order; and no one but a Lottery Commissioner and a Government Pensioner, (both of which, Mr. William Gifford, the Editor of the Quarterly Review, is) could, with a false and remorseless pen, have striven to frustrate hopes and aims, so youthful and so high as this young Poet nurses. The Monthly Reviewers, it will be remembered, endeavoured, some few years back, to crush the rising heart of Kirk White; and indeed they in part generated that melancholy which ultimately destroyed him; but the world saw the cruelty, and, with one voice, hailed the genius which malignity would have repressed, and lifted it to fame. Reviewers are creatures that "stab men in the dark;"—young and enthusiastic spirits are their dearest prey. Our readers will not easily forget the brutality with which the Quarterly Reviewers, in a late number of their ministerial book, commented on the work of an intelligent and patriotic woman, whose ardour and independence happened to be high enough to make them her enemies. The language used by these Government critics, was lower than man would dare to utter to female ears; but Party knows no distinctions,—no proprieties,—and a woman is the best of prey for its malignity, because it is the gentlest and the most undefended. We certainly think that criticism might vent its petty passions on other subjects; that it might chuse its objects from the vain, the dangerous, and the powerful, and not from the young and the unprotected.

"It should strike hearts of age and care,
And spare the youthful and the fair."

The cause of the unmerciful condemnation which has been passed on Mr. Keats, is pretty apparent to all who have watched the intrigues of literature, and the wily and unsparring contrivances of political parties. This young and powerful writer was noticed some little time back in the Examiner, and pointed out, by its Editor, as one who was likely to revive the early vigour of English poetry. Such a prediction was a fine but dangerous compliment to Mr. Keats: it exposed him instantly to the malice of the Quarterly Review. Certain it is, that hundreds of fashionable and flippant readers will henceforth set down this young poet as a pitiable and nonsensical writer, merely on the assertions of some single heartless critic, who has just energy enough to despise what is good, because it would militate against his pleasantry, if he were to praise it.

The genius of Mr. Keats is peculiarly classical; and, with the exception of a few faults, which are the natural followers of youth, his imaginations and his language have a spirit and an intensity which we should in vain look for in half the popular poets of the day. Lord Byron is a splendid and noble egotist: he visits classical shores; roams over romantic lands, and wanders through magnificent forests; courses the dark and restless waves of the sea, and rocks his spirit on the midnight lakes; but no spot is conveyed to our minds that is not peopled by the gloomy and ghastly feelings of one proud and solitary man. It is as if he and the world were the only two things which the air clothed. His lines are majestic vanities;—his poetry always is marked with a haughty selfishness;—he writes loftily, because he is the spirit of an ancient family;—he is liked by most of his readers, because he is a Lord. If a common man were to dare to be as moody, as contemptuous, and as misanthropical, the world would laugh at him. There must be a coronet marked on all his little pieces of poetical insolence, or the world would not countenance them. Mr. Keats has none of this egotism—this daring selfishness, which is a stain on the robe of poetry. His feelings are full, earnest, and original, as those of the olden writers were and are; they are made for all time, not for the drawing-room and the moment. Mr. Keats always speaks of, and describes nature, with an awe and a humility, but with a deep and almost breathless affection.—He knows that Nature is better and older than he is, and he does not put himself on an equality with her. You do not see him when you see her. The moon, and the mountainous foliage of the woods, and the azure sky, and the ruined and magic temple; the rock, the desert, and the sea; the leaf of the forest, and the embossed foam of the most living ocean, are the spirits of his poetry; but he does not bring them in his own hand, or obtrude his person before you, when you are looking at them. Poetry is a thing of generalities—a wanderer amid persons and things—not a pauser over one thing, or with one person. The mind of Mr. Keats, like the minds of our older poets, goes round the universe in its speculations and its dreams. It does not set itself a task. The manners of the world, the fictions and the wonders of other worlds, are its subjects; not the pleasures of hope, or the pleasures of memory. The true poet confines his imagination to no one thing—his soul is an invisible ode to the passions.—He does not make a home for his mind in one land—its productions are an universal story, not an eastern tale. The fancies of Moore are exquisitely beautiful, as fancies, but they are always of "one colour;"—his feelings are pathetic, but they are "still harping on my daughter." The true pathetic is to be found in the reflections on things, not in the moods and miseries of one person. There is not one poet of the present day, that enjoys any popularity that will live; each writes for his booksellers and the ladies of fashion, and not for the voice of centuries. Time is a lover of old books, and he suffers few new ones to become old. Posterity is a difficult mark to hit; and few minds can send the arrow full home. Wordsworth might have safely cleared the rapids in the stream of time, but he lost himself by looking at his own image in the waters. Coleridge stands bewildered in the cross-road of fame;—his genius will commit suicide, and be buried in it. Southey is Poet Laureate, "so there is no heed to be taken of him." Campbell has relied on two stools, "The Pleasures of Hope," and "Gertrude of Wyoming;" but he will come to the ground, after the fashion of the old proverb. The journey of fame is an endless one; and does Mr. Rogers think that pumps and silk stockings (which his genius wears) will last him the whole way? Poetry is the coyest creature that ever was wooed by man: she has something of the coquet in her; for she flirts with many, and seldom loves one.

Mr. Keats has certainly not perfected any thing yet; but he has the power, we think, within him, and it is in consequence of such an opinion that we have written these few hasty observations. If he should ever see this, he will not regret to find that all the country is not made up of Quarterly Reviewers. All that we wish is, that our readers would read the Poem, as we have done, before they assent to its condemnation—they will find passages of singular feeling, force, and pathos. We have the highest hopes of this young Poet. We are obscure men, it is true, and not gifted with that perilous power of mind, and truth of judgment, which are possessed by Mr. Croker, Mr. Canning, Mr. Barrow, or Mr. Gifford, (all "honourable men," and writers in the Quarterly Review.) We live far from the world of letters,—out of the pale of fashionable criticism,—aloof from the atmosphere of a Court: but we are surrounded by a beautiful country, and love Poetry, which we read out of doors, as well as in. We think we see glimpses of a high mind in this young man, and surely the feeling is better that urges us to nourish its strength, than that which prompts the Quarterly Reviewer to crush it in its youth, and for ever. If however the mind of Mr. Keats be of the quality we think it to be of, it will not be cast down by this wanton and empty attack. Malice is a thing of the scorpion kind—it drives the sting into its own heart. The very passages which the Quarterly Review quotes as ridiculous, have in them the beauty that sent us to the Poem itself. We shall close these observations with a few extracts from the romance itself:—If our readers do not see the spirit and beauty in them to justify our remarks, we confess ourselves bad judges, and never more worthy to be trusted.

The following address to Sleep is full of repose and feeling:—

"O magic sleep! O comfortable bird,
That broodest o'er the troubled sea of the mind,
Till it is hush'd and smooth! O unconfined
Restraint! Imprisoned Liberty! Great key
To golden palaces, strange minstrelsy,
Fountains grotesque, new trees, bespangled caves,
Echoing grottoes, full of tumbling waves,
And moonlight!"

This is beautiful—but here is something finer:—

"— That men, who might have tower'd in the van
Of all the congregated world, to fan
And winnow from the coming step of time
All chaff of custom, wipe away all slime
Left by men slugs and human serpentry,
Have been content to let occasion die,
Whilst they did sleep in Love's Elysium.
And truly I would rather be struck dumb,
Than speak against this ardent listlessness:
For I have ever thought that it might bless
The world with benefits unknowingly;
As does the nightingale up-perched high,
And cloister'd among cool and bunched leaves,
She sings but to her love, nor e'er conceives
How tip-toe Night holds back her dark-grey hood."

The turn of this is truly Shakesperian, which Mr. Keats will feel to be the highest compliment we can pay him, if we know any thing of his mind. We cannot refrain from giving the following short passage, which appears to us scarcely to be surpassed in the whole range of English Poetry. It has all the naked and solitary vigour of old sculpture, with all the energy and life of old poetry:—

"— At this, with madden'd stare,
And lifted hands, and trembling lips, he stood,
Like old Deucalion mounted o'er the flood,
Or blind Orion hungry for the morn."

Again, we give some exquisitely classic lines, clear and reposeful as a Grecian sky—soft and lovely as the waves of Ilysus:—

"— Here is wine,
Alive with sparkles.—Never, I aver,
Since Ariadne was a vintager,
So cool a purple; taste these juicy pears,
Sent me by sad Vertumnus, when his tears
Were high about Pomona: here is cream,
Deepening to sickness from a snowy gleam;
Sweeter than that nurse Amalthea skim'd
For the boy Jupiter."

This is the very fruit of poetry,—a melting repast for the imagination. We can only give one more extract—our limits are reached. Mr. Keats is speaking of the story of Endymion itself. Nothing can be more imaginative than what follows:—

"— Ye who have yearn'd
With too much passion, will here stay and pity,
For the mere sake of truth; as 'tis a ditty
Not of these days, but long ago 'twas told
By a cavern'd wind unto a forest old;
And then the forest told it in a dream
To a sleeping lake, whose cool and level gleam
A Poet caught as he was journeying
To Phœbus' shrine; and in it he did fling
His weary limbs, bathing an hour's space,
And after, straight in that inspired place
He sang the story up into the air,
Giving it universal freedom."

We have no more room for extracts. Does the author of such poetry as this deserve to be made the sport of so servile a dolt as a Quarterly Reviewer?—No. Two things have struck us on the perusal of this singular poem. The first is, that Mr. Keats excels, in what Milton excelled—the power of putting a spirit of life and novelty into the Heathen Mythology. The second is, that in the structure of his verse, and the sinewy quality of his thoughts, Mr. Keats greatly resembles old Chapman, the nervous translator of Homer. His mind has "thaws and limbs like to its ancestors." Mr. Gifford, who knows something of the old dramatists, ought to have paused before he sanctioned the abuse of a spirit kindred with them. If he could not feel, he ought to know better.

COVENT-GARDEN.

WE were prevented from seeing Mr. FARREN in Sir Bashful Constant on Friday week by the performance of Mr. KEAN in Othello; but we saw his second appearance in that character on Monday, and his first appearance as Sir Anthony Absolute on Thursday; and they have both confirmed us in the opinion which we thought we should entertain of him, when he got out of the comparative disguises of old age.

Mr. FARREN's great merit is correctness, and even this is rather on the negative than the positive side. His conception of the author is sensible, but not deep; his manner is quietly strong; his enunciation excellent. He is never out in his part; he rarely does any thing foreign to it; he never commits himself. The chief passages, that have told in other hands, tell for the most part in his, and a great self-possession gives even to his omissions an air as if they were just what they ought to be, or rather, few people think of them at all. His effect is like that of a man in private life, who says little, but seems to think a good deal. He has a staid appearance of thinking himself in the right, or of having made very judicious conclusions—whether he thinks so or not; and it is taken for granted.

But all this is a little capital with a great credit. What Mr. FARREN wants as an actor, is richness and enjoyment. He makes one thought stand for ten; and seems to respect even that more than to relish it. He perceives more than feels; and in matters of genius, this is apt to stop on the surface. It is eye without hands and taste. He sees the part of the ball immediately before him; but what is under it, and about it, and inside of it, is comparatively lost. In Sir Bashful Constant, for instance, who repeatedly informs us that he is such a good-natured man at bottom, and who is christened after his exceeding modesty, he seems a really angry man in all the angry speeches, and is only abruptly bashful. When he practises a piece of bye-play also, it is in too much keeping with the immediate feeling at the expence of the general character. Thus, in the same part, when he anxiously tries to find out if any body overhears him, before he tells his bashful tale and shews what a very good-natured man he is, he goes to the door, and with his two hands and his whole collected force suddenly dashes it back,—which might have been half the death of any body listening.

We are sorry to differ with some of our brother critics; but the Anthony Absolute we cannot but consider as a total failure. Mr. FARREN was outrageously Absolute, to be sure; and in one or two scenes, he was sufficiently significant on a gentler subject; but Sir Anthony in the hands of his unrivalled representative DOWTON, has a vein of the genial running through him, which warrants him and his son in referring to the kindlier days of his youth, and makes us fancy that he could have been at that period what the young Captain is at present. Mr. FARREN in this character is crabbed and formal, with abrupt starts of the reverse. Peevishness as well as passion seems to be part of him; whereas the inflammable old boy, in the hands of DOWTON, is Anthony as well as Absolute, and always appears to be as agog for a joke as for a quarrel. Besides, DOWTON's face, person, and voice, are all in better character, and of a higher order of the comic. They are the jolly old knight, who is angry not because he is full of mere irritability, but because he does not want to be disturbed from his ease, and from his infinite stomach for being satisfied. Mr. FARREN, with his long person, half shut eyes, crabbed voice, and an aspect at once youthful, dry, and caustic, looks in it like a ready-made old bachelor.

In short, we conceive Mr. FARREN upon the whole to be a more than useful actor, but not, as some suppose, an actor of genius. We understand, it is true, that he is young; and he may therefore yet surprise us with more talent than we can at present discover; but neither his faults nor even his merits appear to us to be on the side of youthful promise, which is proverbial for running into exuberance. We are, we confess, in the minority on this occasion; and sincerely hope that Mr. FARREN may have all the benefit from that circumstance, which may keep his confidence unimpaired, and enable us to find ourselves mistaken if we are in the wrong.

Mr. CHARLES KEMBLE again surprised us, in The Way to Keep Him, with the new vigour which something or other has given to his comic acting. He has certainly during his late tour got some of the French wines in his head, or been drinking the winy influence of the French Comedy; and there is no knowing how very pleasant a good-natured Englishman becomes with a little grafting from the Southern sprightliness. He did not appear however to so much advantage in the Rivals. And what a falling-off was the whole piece from the performance of the same comedy at Drury-lane. JONES is a pleasant fellow; but to put him into Sir Lucius O'Trigger after JOHNSTONE, is to make one animal, whether inferior or superior, perform the part of a totally different one,—a butterfly, for instance, of a dromedary. LISTON is an excellent humourist, but then he is always Liston, and BANISTER was Acres:—and with all our habitual respect for Mrs. DAVENPORT, and her warm-faced industry in digging her comic emphasis,—we remember Miss POPE—Miss POPE! Who could come up to her unconscious mistakes and old gentlewomanly resentment in Mrs. Malaprop? Comparisons, to be sure, are odious; but so is criticism,—is it not, Mr. FARREN? Here we have been finding flaws in your clever acting, when for aught we know to the contrary you may be one of the best and pleasantest fellows on the face of the earth.—What! You cannot return the compliment?—Well.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—At the following paragraph in the Theatrical Article of your last number I was much struck:—"We have admired Mrs. SIDONS, been infinitely amused with LEWIS, been sore with laughing at MUNDEN, been charmed with Mrs. JORDAN; but we never saw anything that so completely held us suspended and heart-stricken as Mr. KEAN's Othello."

That Mr. KEAN's Othello is not to be excelled is very true; but in mentioning the above celebrated performers, why, Mr. Editor, was JOHN KEMBLE omitted?—It is true, I have heard, that while Mr. KEMBLE was Manager of Covent-garden Theatre, you offered him a Play of your own writing, which he returned to you, it being so very like some other piece (the name I forgot) that he could not venture to bring it forward; but surely your private feelings cannot have dictated the present neglect, nor induced you to write so ungraciously of Mr. KEMBLE, as you have done for many years past?

Having been frequently informed by those who have been in your company, that you are always willing to give publicity to criticisms on your conduct as a writer or an Editor, I can have no doubt of seeing this letter in your next number.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Z.
Oxford-street, Oct. 6, 1818.

[We insert the above letter as containing one out of many specimens of the misrepresentations which a writer encounters who would be impartial, whatever pains he may take to draw the line between public difference of opinion and private malignity. We need not add, that the alleged report about the play is a fabrication.—The other day the Editor heard that some body was very angry with him once for writing in the Scourge! a publication, which, we believe, used to lash the air at him, like the Satirist and the Quarterly Review.—Exam.]

ENGLISH OPERA.

The following farewell address was spoken on Monday night by Mr. HARLEY:—

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—As I frequently have the happiness to make you laugh, I scarcely know how to present myself on so melancholy an occasion as that of bidding you farewell. The Proprietor, however, having deputed me to perform the funeral obsequies of the season, you will, I trust, excuse me if I should not acquit myself on so solemn a business with the usual and becoming gravity. The Proprietor, Ladies and Gentlemen, has redeemed the promise he made at the close of last season. He has exerted every effort to merit a continuance of your favour, and has been amply repaid by a season of unprecedented prosperity,—notwithstanding the serious drawback which the strength of the company has sustained by the long and severe illness of Miss KELLY, who is now so happily restored to us. In less than four months no fewer than 13 new Pieces and Revivals have been brought out; and it is no small boast, in the present state of theatricals, to say, that the novelties produced have, without a single exception, been sanctioned by your entire approbation. Thus encouraged, the Proprietor desires me to assure you of his continued efforts to conciliate your favour; and though the unexpected limitation of his English Opera license to four months only has shackled his means of providing you amusement, he hopes that his theatre may still be kept in your friendly recollection, and that, without infringing on the supposed rights of patent monopolies, he may occasionally be enabled to invite you here, with such performances and exhibitions as the law allows. The Proprietor, Ladies and Gentlemen, tenders you, through me, his warmest acknowledgments; and in my own name, and the names of all the performers, whom you have so kindly honoured with "lots" of applause, I beg to offer you "lots" of thanks and "lots" of good wishes, till we meet again."

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 11.—MR. GURNEY.

"It is my way to consider men as they stand in merit, not according to their fortune or figure."

Tatler, No. 34.

THE observation is considerably older than the time of MANDEVILLE, author of the Fable of the Bees, that talents and attainments rather below than above mediocrity, are much more useful to a man, who wishes to thrive and grow rich in society, than abilities and knowledge of the highest order: this is less paradoxical, and consequently more intelligible at first sight, than many other positions in that most clever of all clever books, where we are in every page startled by apparent absurdities and contradictions so ingeniously reconciled, that whereas in the outset we laughed at the author, in the end we pity ourselves. The remark above quoted is true in every situation and employment of life. Genius is a most unsaleable commodity, while mediocrity is the real philosopher's stone. Looking round among our connections and acquaintances, we shall be sure to find those best off in the world, not who have the most, but who have the least genius, and who, perhaps, without quickness enough to be aware of the deficiency, unconsciously make up for it in some other way, being gifted with qualities of a much more profitable kind: if they are dull, they are the more fit for drudges; and as society is at present constituted, much more is to be accomplished by patient perseverance in old courses, than by any of the highest and luckiest hits of inventive talent. STEELE observes, "that it is the misfortune of persons of great genius to have their faculties dissipated by attention to too many things at once;" they are "every thing by fits, and nothing long;" they are the "schemers and projectors of the world, who put forth plans of improvement, which are ridiculed, but which when carried into execution by mechanical industry, become the delight and glory of mankind."

Of course the pursuits of commerce call into action but few of the better qualities of our nature: men of genius will seldom condescend to engage their faculties in low barter and petty traffic; but some portion of talent is necessary, and we can most of us recollect instances of merchants and tradesmen, who, having gradually acquired wealth, afterwards retired into the country to enjoy their gains, as far as such men are capable of such enjoyments: yet it will almost invariably be found, that those who have the finest country houses and the gayest equipages, are those who have shewn even less talent and possess less general information than their rivals in trade. The same may be said of the arts: in painting, for example, a man who can produce smooth flattering portraits, but just resembling the originals, and so like each other as to be destitute of all distinguishing character, is knighted by Princes, visited by nobles, cheri des grands, aimé des belles, and dispatched to a Congress of assembled Potentates; while a historical painter, who deals with the imagination as well as the mechanism of his art, can neither find purchasers for his pictures nor patronage for himself. It applies no less to what are called the liberal professions. Divines who fatten upon lucrative livings (not referring here to honours but to emoluments) are the "round oily men of God," who, with very moderate gifts of intellect, slide into the good things of this world, never presenting any points of opposition. Physicians of abilities and enterprise above the ordinary level, incur the charge of being quacksalvers and empirics, while those who only plod in the steps of their predecessors, without attempting any improvement in a science so obviously in its infancy, are esteemed most sagacious and infallible.

Although in the law it has more frequently happened, from various causes to which on former occasions reference has been made, that men of first-rate abilities have forced their way forward in spite of all the resistance of prejudice and envy, and have now and then secured ample fortunes, yet even here mediocrity has its advantages, and those exclusive, peculiar, and of no slight importance. For instance, a Barrister who has plain good sense enough to know that he has not commanding talents, such as will compel the Court to listen to him with patience, and Attornies to give him briefs, will make himself master of all the arts of conciliation; will never attempt to resist the declared opinion of their Lordships, however absurd it may appear, but will patiently submit to whatever they shall dictate; the ear of the Court having been thus obtained, it is soon known who is the favourite Counsel, and without any considerable display on his part of the ingenious art of hugging, (though never backward to shew his skill in that way) business will flow into his hands almost unsought for. It is too obvious to need proof, that a man of true genius will never condescend to such low practices and artifices, and if he succeeds, as I have said, it is in despite of obstacles which other men have neither the courage to meet nor the talent to surmount.—In the same way, a man of mediocre ability prudently adopts all means to countervail his defects: he supplies the place of eloquence by diligence; he reads his instructions with great attention and industry, and by prudence and wariness, endeavours to divert if he cannot combat the attacks of his antagonists.

I am aware that there are many persons in London, and in the country too, as far as the home circuit extends, who consider Mr. GURNEY a Counsel of first rate talents: I am not one of his unqualified admirers; and though I think him a good advocate, I am very far from being of opinion that he deserves the epithet of an able one. Circumstances have greatly contributed to bring him forward; or he would probably still have continued behind the Bar; from whence he was taken only about two years ago: he was made King's Counsel at a most fortunate time, when Sir W. GARROW either had retired or was about to retire, and when the ill-health of Mr. TOPPING, independent of his defects and deficiencies, had rendered him altogether incapable of competing with Mr. SCARLETT. At this period, Mr. GURNEY, who had often made himself useful in government prosecutions of all kinds, came forward, and as it was known that he had the ear of the Court, and that Mr. MARRYAT (who obtained a silk gown at the same date) had not, he immediately obtained a considerable share of business, principally as the rival of Mr. SCARLETT: when the latter was secured on one side of a cause, Mr. GURNEY was most commonly retained on the other. Yet they were by no means equally matched in any respect; Mr. SCARLETT certainly being a man of very eminent talents and attainments, and Mr. GURNEY's principal recommendation being that mediocrity, and some of its useful concomitants, of which I have before spoken. Among those concomitants is that easy, conciliatory temper, which is not easily ruffled, and which seems to take all possible pains to make friends not only of the Judges but of the Solicitors: he has the good sense to perceive in the words of PASCAL, that les hommes se gouvernent plus par caprices que par raison, and he is very careful to accommodate himself to them: at least he used to be so, though I have some reason to think that he at present presumes a little upon his rank and the quantity of business he has obtained, and now and then relaxes a little of his anxiety to please those to whom he is indebted for his briefs, though he has as yet lost none of his apparent respect for the opinion of the Court, whether it do or do not accord with his own. No man will deny that great deference ought to be shewn even to an intimation from the Bench, but it may be and often is carried to such an excess as materially to interfere with the due administration of justice. For the same reason that he is conciliatory, Mr. GURNEY is patient and industrious to the last degree: he spares no trouble in reading and noting all the particulars communicated by those from whom he receives his instructions; and when he is called upon to address a Jury, he usually provides himself with the principal topics, cut and dried, and registered in short-hand, on one of the blank leaves of his brief. He has besides the advantage of being a very expert short-hand writer, which gives him the appearance, to those who are not aware of the facility, of being not only a more accurate, but a quicker man than some of his opponents.

In one respect, let me do the subject of this article the justice to observe, that he exceeds most of those with whom he has to contend. I mean the extreme prudence that he invariably displays in the conduct of a cause: as he makes himself well acquainted with the facts, and the nature of the evidence to support them, he is seldom taken by surprise: this remark applies to his own case only; but in attacking that of his adversary his caution and wariness are sometimes in his way; he is too much afraid of committing himself and his client, and he therefore leaves undone what it is obvious to every one else might be accomplished, had he courage to make the attempt: thus it by no means unfrequently happens, that a fraudulent and designing witness escapes detection, unless the Attorney has been able previously to sift out some suspicious circumstances, and to communicate them to the Counsel, which warrant him in putting questions which he would otherwise never have hazarded. The faculty of looking through a witness at a glance, and of letting him know that you look through him, is certainly a gift which may be improved by habit; but I do not think that Mr. GURNEY ever possessed this important qualification of an Advocate even in a slight degree; and perhaps from a knowledge of this deficiency has arisen the extreme and sometimes injurious caution of which I have spoken. Were not this intuitive faculty a gift and not merely an acquisition, it is not very easy to account for the total absence of it in Mr. GURNEY, as from his long practice at the Sessions and at the Old Bailey, among the most depraved of mankind, he would otherwise have attained it to some perfection. On this account, it will be concluded that he is by no means a good examiner of a witness excepting in one respect; that his great care leads him often to put a question very ingeniously, and to wind round and beat about a point with considerable skill, because he trembles for the consequences of coming to it at once. There are however few men who have a better mode of making a witness tell a long, complicated story, full of minute details, with regularity and clearness.

As a speaker he possesses but little that is remarkable excepting a facility, (in part mechanical from the rapidity with which he writes short-hand, and thus puts all the main facts before his eyes at one view) of giving a Jury a distinct knowledge of the case he has to bring forward in evidence: he arranges all the particulars historically, and is always extremely accurate as to dates. At the same time, I ought to allow, that I have sometimes heard him forcible, if not eloquent, and if his general observations be not of a very novel character, the gravity and sagaciousness of his look frequently imposes a common-place upon his audience with much of the effect of originality. This observation, and indeed all I have said about his mode of speaking, cannot be illustrated better, than by a reference to his celebrated address on bringing the horrid case of Chalcraft and Chennel before a Jury at the late Surrey Assizes: all his introductory remarks were as trite as he could well make them, but his detail of the facts was perspicuous and convincing.

Mr. GURNEY is considered in the profession a tolerable criminal Lawyer, but nothing more: he certainly never affects to be learned either in principles or precedents; and whenever, in the course of a cause at Nisi Prius, a point arises, he always endeavours to avoid it, and to throw the weight of the argument upon the shoulders of his junior: in this respect he forms a contrast to Mr. SCARLETT, who never shrinks on such an occasion, but seems to take pleasure in grappling with and overcoming the difficulty. As to the general information of the individual whose qualifications are under discussion, I do not feel myself very competent to speak: all I can say is, that if he seldom betrays ignorance, he never displays knowledge; and I apprehend that his life has been too actively employed to enable him to acquire much beyond what he may have learnt from the conversation of those by whom he is surrounded.

AMICUS CURIE.

[Mr. Sergeant COPLEY will be the subject of No. 12.]

SIR R. GIFFORD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—The Criticisms on the Bar, which have been inserted in your paper, are not only amusing but instructive, and the Author of them appears well calculated for the task he has undertaken. I cannot agree with him however in all the remarks which he has made in his criticism on the present Solicitor-General; he acknowledges indeed that he may have been rather partial, and this circumstance in my opinion has led him to hazard an assertion, which I am apprehensive is not grounded on fact. I subscribe readily to most of his statements, and admit with him, that "though his (the Solicitor-General's) elevation was not to be expected so early, it was considered eventually certain." That has been the opinion of the Bar almost from the time of Sir R. GIFFORD's first appearance in public.

What I am desirous of pointing out to the Author of the Criticism, as an erroneous representation, is the following sentence:—"In accepting the office, this praise is due to the Solicitor-General as well as to his colleague, that he did not disgrace himself by deserting the principles he had through life maintained, though, in the first instance, those principles may have been settled or influenced by some consideration of his future success." I knew Sir R. GIFFORD some years ago, and I have been acquainted with those who have subsequently been intimate with him; and their opinion as well as my own has been, that his political principles were liberal, and, if I may use the expression, that he was inclined to what is called Whiggism. In all probability the uncommon energy and zeal, which he has exercised in the pursuit of his professional studies, may have absorbed the whole of his time, and rendered the subject of politics to him a matter of indifference. Some of his friends however have regretted, that he should have allied himself to the present administration, defending as he must do all its measures, (e.g. Lord SIMON'S famous Circular), and they have reluctantly admitted, that his acceptance of place has been attended with the sacrifice of character. That he was raised to his present situation from his legal knowledge and acquirements I firmly believe; and if Sir R. GIFFORD has upon conviction abandoned opinions, to which he was at one time supposed to be friendly, and has since honestly and conscientiously supported different opinions, I dare not censure, though I may regret the change. By your taking notice of this letter, Amicus Curie will have an opportunity of correcting me, if I have been led into an error.—I am, Sir, your's, &c.

A LOVER OF JUSTICE.

Westminster, Oct. 6, 1818.

The above remarks are submitted to your notice in consequence of the circumstance alluded to in a note to the criticism on Mr. Serjeant LENS, which reflects the highest honour on that sound Lawyer and upright man; and I hope with Amicus Curie to see him at no distant period fill the situation of Lord Chief Justice in the Court of King's Bench. There is no gentleman at the Bar in every respect so well qualified for it, nor one who is less likely to be influenced by the spirit of party.

FINE ARTS.

COUNTESS OF ST. VINCENT'S MONUMENT, CAVERSWALL.

[From the Lichfield Mercury.]

The lovers of the arts will be gratified to hear that the County of Stafford is enriched by another exquisite specimen of the brilliant genius of CHANTRY.—In Caverswall Church, less than thirty miles north of Lichfield (whose Cathedral is the depository of the most excellent of this great sculptor's productions) the Earl of St. Vincent has erected a Monument, to the memory of his late Countess, which is inferior to the cenotaph at Lichfield, for want of the same interest of circumstance only; in beauty of execution it cannot be surpassed. The design is a female figure in the attitude of prayer; the drapery is so disposed, as to present a veil forming straight folds on the forehead, and flowing over the shoulders with a flexibility and airiness that astonish; it appears as if settling again after a recent motion of the body it encloses; the whole person is delicately and beautifully traced through its light habiliments; but the arms, which are exposed and crossed on the breast, defy description. If on a first view, it should be possible for the visitor to divest himself of the general effect, and descend to minute examination, we would point out the form and position of the left hand and arm as deserving the highest admiration—there is also a most touching expression in the inclination given to the head; the face bowed towards the earth, bespeaks humbleness of spirit, whilst the mien, suffused with meek tranquillity, denotes the confidence of hope. The critic gazes and forgets his office; he looks as if observing not the type, but the reality; his mind is occupied not by wonder at the artist's skill, but by the warmest interest for the scene he witnesses; in the fever of sympathy he almost exclaims, "Oh heaven, hear her prayer!" The delusion past—he bursts forth in extacy at the sculptor's power, but grudges the check to his own imagination; he unwillingly exchanges even the redundancy of pensive sensibility for the acumen of critical research. Such is the power of art, but such in the highest degree is the power of the sculptor's art. That stone, insipid, hard and shapeless, should be so fashioned as to portray the lineaments of death, is wonderful—but that it can express the very workings of the soul, that it can seize upon and command the feelings beyond any other of man's performances; would not have been credited, were it not that our own senses have borne convincing testimony to the fact. The monument has unavoidably every disadvantage of light and situation. The figure kneels on a square base, on which is the following inscription:—

"Sacred to the Memory of MARTHA, Countess of ST. VINCENT, who was eminently pious, virtuous, and charitable: she departed this life on the 8th day of February, 1816, aged 75 years, and was at her own desire buried in the Tomb of her Parents. This Monument was erected by her surviving Husband."

HINTS RESPECTING BANK-NOTE IMPROVEMENTS.

[From a Correspondent.]

The lengthening list of Bank prosecutions at the Old Bailey for forgery, in every passing Sessions, is like the growing mass of snow which rolls down the precipice—a growing mass which humanity herself stands shuddering to look upon over the brink. Where all this will end is a question yet to be solved, but the eyes of the public are directed to what may be the report of the Commission appointed by the Crown to search for a remedy. That attempts at forgery should at once and entirely cease under any system, after the creation of such a school for the crime, no reasonable man can expect; but that no good can be done, one should think none would hazard the assertion. Let the strongest obstacles to committing the offence be used which they can find; such being neglected for what is notoriously weak and defenceless, would be like insisting that there is a given quantity of crime in the world which no circumstances can either add to or diminish. But suppose, through some strange perverseness, all had agreed from the early days of simplicity to the present hour to continue the cottage latch as the only fastening to their dwellings, will any one say that in this metropolis there would not be more house-breakings than there are now committed? The barricading of doors and windows is taken all possible pains with, not with the belief that from so doing there can not be a single house broken into (for there will always be some housebreakers) but to make the number of depredations as small as possible; and any relaxation in such system of precaution every one knows would bring abundant increase of crime; revert at once to the latch of ancient days in this great city and you would create endless housebreakers, although the penalty be death. To those who fell and suffered death for the offence to which they had been tempted by an abandonment or neglect of the common cares of civilized society, much commiseration would be due; and the vast extension of evil would in such case bring a heavy moral responsibility upon those who had so failed in guarding the avenues to crime. That the Bank of England should have gone on for so many years without trying to make forgery difficult, one is struck with surprise at: they seem to have been under an illusion by taking one view of the subject, for ever and ever the same, drawn from sources of prejudice, and not the most impartial. The Engraver of the Bank being the only practical man they have, and always at the elbow of the Directors, will never fail (whoever he may be) to possess the power of biasing their opinions and decisions in that department: whatever may threaten to curtail his interests, or put down his power, will it not be met by his hostility? His best strength at imitations, or that failing, the utmost in others he can call to his assistance, may be put in requisition to shew the Directors the folly of thinking well of schemes presented at the Bank which might save its credit, its purse, and the lives of men! The late Engraver there, Terry, was said to be a great critic and of good address in these matters; and probably imagined that the error, if any there were, received a full remission from the dispensations of his favourite Prophet: * he was a disciple of the famous William Huntingdon. The present Engraver of the Bank, a scholar of Terry's, being called a man of very good talent to boot, has had it in his power, if he chose, to play off a much more able game with the same cards. What a pity however that Terry did not in his lifetime consult the great Prophet he followed, on what turned out to be so speedily coming to pass in his own earthly province? This sage would then have learnt of the Prophet, that the time was at hand when it would cost his masters 30,000*l.* in one year for prosecutions, 20,000*l.* within a few odd pounds in the first quarter of the next year; and that in a succeeding month of the same year (September 1818) thirty eight persons would be arraigned in one Sessions and one day at the Old Bailey for forgery upon the Bank of England! This vast source of revenue interests many, and among them certainly not the most disinterested class of beings. Will not some of them say with Alderman Curtis—"We like things very well as they are," and be now at work like the mole in dirt and darkness to keep them so? be at work to prevent—not the forgery, but the application of means for its discontinuance. To be serious on this painfully serious subject, let the humane and charitable among the Bank Directors, and there are many of them, nay all, who must certainly be grieved to the soul at the present state of things—men whose names are to be found in almost every great and noble institution of their country,—I say, let these persons reflect on their having so long submitted to these gauzy delusions—delusions which have cost themselves dearly; but what has it not cost their species, in agony and tears, in banishments and death?

* This man, Huntington, in the rage of his zeal against all but the Elect, penned the following inscription before his death for his tomb-stone, and ordered it to be inserted thereon:—"Here lies the Coal-Heaver, who departed this life July 1, 1813, in the 60th year of his age; beloved of his God, but abhorred of men. The Omniscient Judge, at the grand assize, shall fairly and impartially, in the confusion of man, pronounce; for the Lord and his own people shall know that there hath been a martyr among them!—W. H. S. S."

LEGAL QUESTION.

MR. EXAMINER.—As your Correspondent Eunomus appears to differ with me materially upon the point, whether a suppressio veri amounts to perjury, or comes within the scope of the oath administered to witnesses, I am induced to offer some observations, and to bring authorities in support of my former opinion.

It cannot be unimportant to ascertain the precise point at which perjury begins, or to define the exact limits within which a witness is legally or morally confined, or to what length he may venture, without thrusting his head and arms into a pillory.

The doctrine which Eunomus endeavours to establish appears to me to be erroneous and dangerous—as calculated to be "a snare to the unwary," and liable to be used as a pretext by the evil-disposed witness. His construction of the oath is, that the witness does not swear to disclose or speak the whole truth, but merely that what he does please to say shall be the truth. In answer to this I will call Archdeacon Paley, who, in his Moral Philosophy, chap. 17, says—"The witness swears 'to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, touching the matter in question.' Upon which it may be observed, that the designed concealment of any truth, which relates to the matter in agitation, is as much a violation of the oath as to testify a positive falsehood, and this whether the witness be interrogated to that particular point or not."—Blackstone, a more legal and orthodox authority, observes, vol. 3. Comment. 372,—"The oath administered to the witness is not only that what he deposes shall be true, but that he shall also depose the whole truth; so that he is not to conceal any part of what he knows, whether interrogated particularly to that point or not."—It seems therefore admitted, that in this respect "silence is equivalent to falsehood;" but whether such perjury or "sin of omission" be cognizable by law, may perhaps admit of a doubt. "A man (says Blackstone) may frequently, in foro conscientie, incur the guilt, and at the same time evade the temporal penalties of perjury."—The offence of concealing truth may be one for which the law leaves the offender

"to heaven,

"And to the thorns which in his bosom lodge

"To prick and sting him."

I agree with Eunomus that perjury, by the suppression of evidence, does not come within the scope of the Act of Elizabeth, which being a penal statute, must be strictly construed, and falsehood in express words only is within this statute. But there are numerous cases of perjury, not within the meaning of the Act, which are nevertheless punishable by common law; and among the rest "falsehood in knowledge or intention" is considered to be perjury. Now, by the designed concealment of a fact by a witness, he intends to be understood that he has stated all that he knows and the whole truth, according to the oath taken, which is false both in knowledge and intention, and therefore appears to amount to the crime of perjury at common law.

As every person is liable at some period or other of their lives to be called upon to give evidence, it is important that they should know what is required of them by law and by their oath—that they may not run the risk of confining their heads by their confined ideas of what is law—by not disclosing the whole truth; "for," says Paley, "if it be inquired of a witness why he did not inform the court so and so, it is not a sufficient, though a very common answer, to say, 'because it was never asked me.'—I am, &c.

EGOMET.

MR. EXAMINER.—Having given a place in your publication of yesterday to the communication of Eunomus, you may perhaps be induced to oblige me by the insertion in your next number of the following observations, for the information of Eunomus and of your correspondent Egomet.

Perjury is defined to be, mendacium cum juramento firmatum, and is, in the words of Sir Edward Coke, "a crime committed, when a lawful oath is ministered by any that hath authority to any person in any judicial proceeding, who swears absolutely and falsely in a matter material to the issue or cause in question."

Hawkins, in his Pleas of the Crown, describes the offence to be, "a wilful false oath by one, who being lawfully required to depose the truth in any proceeding in a court of justice, swears absolutely in a matter of some consequence to the point in question."

Sir Edward Coke goes on to state, that an oath is an affirmation or denial by any Christian of any thing lawful and honest, before one or more that have authority to give the same, for the advancement of truth and right, calling Almighty God to witness that his testimony is true.

To this, though not immediately relevant, may be added, according to Bracton, that a man may swear the truth and yet be perjured; of which, the case put by himself is sufficient evidence; that if a Jew shall swear, that Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, he will commit perjury; for though he swear the truth, yet inasmuch as he swears that which in his conscience he does not believe, he is guilty of the crime.

It is held, that a voluntary oath, or in other words, an oath "not material to the issue or cause in question, though it be false, and the taker of it incur the guilt in foro conscientie, does not subject the party to the temporal punishments for perjury.

It may be clearly laid down, from the above authorities, that to constitute the crime of perjury, there must be an actual deposition either affirmatively or negatively; and that the merely refusing to depose, after being sworn, is nothing more, than if the witness had refused to be sworn to give evidence; and is punishable, in like manner, by commitment and fine, as being a great contempt of court.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JUVENIS.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

On Tuesday, another case of considerable importance to the public came on to be heard before Mr. BIRNIE.—George Alder, a coal-merchant, appeared to a summons, to answer to eight informations, charging him with sending eight waggons, loaded with coals, to the house of the Hon. Lady Drummond Smith, in Piccadilly, without the vender's ticket, signed by him, as to the sorts of coals that were sent to the purchaser's, countersigned by the meter; to which the defendant pleaded not guilty.

Mr. ANDREWS stated the case, observing, that the legislature, in passing the Act of Parliament, had in view to guard the public against the imposition of one sort of coals being substituted for another, which was very necessary, when it was known that a sort of coals, called Wall's-end, was far dearer than any other kind. The Act directed that it should be certified as correct by the vender, for which he was answerable; but to guard against imposition by the vender, in certifying one sort of coals for another, the Act directed that the certificate or ticket should be countersigned by a meter, meaning the meter who was stationed at the wharf from whence the coals were sent out, and who is understood to have meted the coals when they were measured.

Mr. HUMPHREYS, the solicitor, attended for the defendant, and took several legal objections, which were overruled.

Wm. S. Savage, under butler to Lady Eliza D. Smith, of Piccadilly-terrace, attended, and stated, that on the 25th day of August, eight waggons, loaded with coals, came to her Ladyship's house, and he received some of the tickets, all of which those concerned in carrying on the information had got possession of; and a vender's ticket, one of them for 37-sacks of coals, being shown to him, he identified it as one of those which were received at Lady Smith's house on the 25th day of August last.

John Ogle, a labouring meter, stated that he was meter at St. Bride's wharf in August, and recollected that he meted the eight waggon-loads of coals on the 25th of that month. He admitted that he did not countersign the vender's tickets of any of them; he was not asked to do so, nor, in fact, did he know that it was his duty to do so, not having any such directions, as he had observed, in the book of instructions which he had received when he was appointed a meter, and which he then had in his hand. This was considered a very extraordinary statement, as the act of Parliament is explicit upon the subject.—The Magistrate desired to look at them, and, on examination, instantly discovered the directions for signing the vender's ticket.

The MAGISTRATE stated himself to be satisfied that the case had been made out, and some conversation then arose as to the amount of the conviction, the act stating that it is not to exceed 20*l*.

Mr. ANDREWS said, he was instructed by his client to say he should not take any of the part to which he was entitled, but wished it to be applied to some public charity.

The Magistrate fixed the penalty at 10*l*.

Mr. HUMPHREYS gave notice of an appeal to the Sessions against the conviction.

The other seven informations were about to be proceeded on, when Mr. Humphreys prayed an extension of time, as his client had been served with the summonses only on Saturday night. On this ground the hearing was postponed.

On Friday the investigation was resumed respecting the filling up the vender's tickets, with the countersigning of the meter's name. The first information called on, out of the seven unheard, was for the delivery of 38 sacks of coals at the house of Lady Eliza D. Smith, on the 25th day of August last, at her house in Piccadilly-terrace, without the vender's ticket being properly signed.—W. Savage, the under-butler of Lady Eliza Drummond Smith, recollected Mr. Bradfield, who brought the information, calling upon him, and saying, he came from Mr. Kendall, the butler, who had given him permission to see the tickets sent in with coals, and in consequence he showed them to him. Mr. Bradfield asked him whether he had any objection for him to take and examine them. He assented.

Mr. Bradfield identified the ticket, as having received it from Savage on the 25th of August.

John Ogle, the labouring meter, who was stationed at the wharf from whence the coals were sent, called St. Bride's wharf, admitted that he had not countersigned the vender's ticket to Lady Eliza Smith, of 38 sacks; in fact, the ticket was not signed by any person. He admitted that he had never countersigned a vender's ticket, nor had been called upon by a merchant or dealer in coals to sign a vender's ticket, since he had been a meter. He confessed his ignorance upon the subject, and that he did not know that it was his duty to sign them till last Tuesday, when the examination upon the first information took place: he also admitted that he had discovered that he was liable to a penalty of 20*l*. for not counter-signing the vender's tickets.

Mr. HUMPHREYS urged that the delivery of the vender's ticket had not been proved on the 25th of August. His client was a very young man, and having only succeeded to his father's business about two or three years, that he was totally ignorant that it was necessary to have the labouring meter's name countersigned to the vender's ticket, and no fraud could possibly be intended.

Mr. Baker, one of the chief Westminster meters, was present, and called upon to state the practice. He stated, that the meters belonging to his office countersigned the vender's tickets, and they could correct any imposition of substituting one sort of coals for another, by looking at the ship's certificate.

The MAGISTRATE observed, he was sorry the penalty fell upon the vender, and not the meter: he was informed that it was not too late for that proceeding, and that it was going on.

The Magistrate inquired if all the informations were to be proceeded upon.

Mr. HUMPHREYS said, he had offered to plead guilty to all, or pay 15*l*. and 10*s*. each on the six other cases; then there would be something for costs, as it was in the Bank of England case.

Mr. ANDREWS said he would agree to this if Mr. HUMPHREYS would abandon his appeal on the first conviction, which he agreed to.

Mr. Bradfield said, he should give his share of the conviction-money to the Royal Fever Hospital and the Humane Society. He added, he was determined to expose the conduct of the meters.

UNION-HALL.

On Thursday, Mr. Anthony Wagstaff, in the firm of Wagstaff and Co., bed and mattress manufacturers, Mini-street, Southwark, was brought before the Magistrates under the following circumstances:—Between ten and eleven o'clock of the morning of Thursday, Mrs. Sarah Chamberlain, applied to Snow the constable, in a state of extreme agitation, and implored him to go with her to the warehouse of Mr. Wagstaff instantly, for that her son was being murdered: he went to the warehouse: upon entering, he perceived the body of a young man laid upon a quantity of flax; there was no appearance of life, and the blood was streaming from the nose, eyes, and ears. He was carried to Guy's Hospital upon a shutter.—Mrs. Chamberlain said, on Wednesday the prisoner engaged her son, a young man, of 18. One of the materials upon which he was working being tow, he left off in the evening, to avoid using a candle, and in order to complete his day's work, went to the warehouse on Thursday morning, and continued his business till ten o'clock, when, having performed what he considered to be a day's work, he applied for his wages, which so exasperated Mr. Wagstaff, who insisted that he should continue his work the whole of Thursday, that he seized a large stick and attacked him in a furious manner. Several persons hearing the cries of young Chamberlain, ran to his mother, and informed her that her son was being murdered; she arrived just as the prisoner had knocked down her son, with his head against a beam, and saw him stand upon his neck until the blood gushed from his nose, ears, and mouth; she then sought the assistance of an officer, while Mr. Evan Palmer, of White Cross-street, and several other persons, whom the cries of young Chamberlain had attracted to the spot, prevented the prisoner from escaping; he offered considerable resistance to the officer, but was ultimately overpowered, and secured by handcuffs.—The Prisoner said, that the young man refused to quit the premises, was extremely violent, and commenced the affray by striking him.—The young man's recovery being considered extremely doubtful, the prisoner was remanded.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

DREADFUL CATASTROPHE.—We are concerned to record the melancholy fate of Mr. Wilkie, at Bonington, in the parish of Ratho. On Monday last, that gentleman, having just returned from his ride, proceeded to loosen the girths in order to take off the saddle, when his mare, a spirited animal, turning suddenly round, bit him in the belly, and lacerated him in a shocking manner. Medical assistance was called in, both from the vicinity of the place and from Edinburgh; but, notwithstanding all their efforts, Mr. Wilkie died on Tuesday evening, after enduring the most excruciating agony. The same animal bit one of his farm-servants severely some time before, but he soon after recovered. A few years ago, a brother of Mr. Wilkie lost his life by an infuriated ox.—Caledonian Mercury.

On Tuesday morning, between one and two o'clock, a fire broke out in Tooley-street, Borough. So rapid was the progress of the devouring element, that before the engines could arrive, three houses, consisting of a pork-shop, corn-chandler's, and a grocer's, were entirely destroyed, with the whole of their contents. Two fine young women, one 15, the other about 20 years of age, we lament to state, perished in the flames.

On Friday evening an inquisition was taken at St. Olave's workhouse, on the bodies of Cordelia Hubbard and Ann Maitling, the females who lost their lives in the dreadful conflagration in Tooley-street.—William Haynes, one of the patrol, stated, that at two o'clock on Wednesday morning he saw the smoke issuing from the top of the door. Witness burst open the door. Mrs. Carter, wife of the watchmaker next door to Mr. Hillpack's house, which was on fire, was then up removing her property. Witness assisted, and returned back to the other house afterwards, when he perceived a woman in the act of throwing her child out of the window; he caught the child in his arms, and a lamplighter coming by at the moment, lent his ladder and got out the woman. Soon after the door was opened, people showed themselves at the window, but the flames having got ahead, the front fell all at once.—Mr. Edward Palmer was present when the first body was found. One of them was the daughter of a lodger on the first floor, and the other was the niece of the landlord. They slept together in the front attic: there was nothing but the trunk of the body; the skull was close to it. The other body was found in the stair-hole, in the same mutilated state. Neither could be identified. The evidence of Mr. Hillpack, who kept the house, and his wife, described the manner in which they escaped with great difficulty from the back parlour in which they slept, but they could not account for the origin of the fire.—Verdict—Accidentally burned to death.

About four o'clock on Tuesday morning another fire broke out in the workshop of Messrs. Johnston, cabinet-makers, situated at the back of several houses fronting New Bond-street, between Union and Brook-streets, and the workshop, with the whole of its contents, soon became a prey to the devouring element. The back part of Mr. Perry's, glass-manufacturer, the premises of Mr. Davies, East India shawl warehouse, and Mr. Calloway, upholsterer, were observed burning with the utmost fury before an engine could stop its devastation. The extensive room of Mr. Phillips, the eminent auctioneer, was totally destroyed. Several other houses are also greatly damaged. By the arrival of a number of engines, and by the prompt exertions of the firemen, its dreadful ravages were prevented extending to the front of these buildings. The loss of property is very considerable.

A few evenings since, the house of Mr. Horder, corner of Printers'-street, Blackfriars, was robbed of property to the amount of about 300*l*.—Mr. Horder had been absent during the day, and returned about 9 o'clock. On knocking at his door, he heard much confusion, with strange voices within the house. He ran to the adjacent watch-house to procure assistance. On his return he found the door open, and the persons gone. When he entered he discovered every thing in a state of disorder. The desks and drawers were rifled, and the rooms stripped. The maid-servant was absent; but a char-woman whom she had engaged to take care of the house, while she went out to visit her sweetheart, made her appearance in great agitation. The story she told was, that the servant left her in the care of the house in the early part of the evening. Soon after she heard voices, and listening, she heard a person call out, "Are you gone out yet?" Apprehending she would be murdered, she crept into the coal-hole, where she remained locked up until the return of Mr. Horder. The servant girl, on her return, appeared astonished, and declared that she knew nothing of the robbery; but suspicion falling upon her, she was taken into custody. The person she had been to visit was also secured, as was likewise the char-woman. The whole underwent two private examinations before the Magistrates, but nothing decisive could be proved against them, and they were discharged.—Among the property, of which Mr. Horder was plundered, were the following articles: one gold watch, ten silver watches, one metal watch, several gold chains and seals, four dozen of silver spoons, four massy silver candlesticks, a silver waiter, and many other articles of plate, a number of ancient gold and silver coins, from 60 to 100 guineas in gold, a considerable quantity of jewellery, together with several valuable dresses and other articles.

Wednesday night, as a gentleman's carriage was passing through the Marsh-gate, in Westminster-road, the inhabitants were alarmed in no small degree by the violent screams of a youth, and the loud cries of persons calling to the coachman to stop the carriage, which was caused by the following circumstances:—A youth had climbed up behind the carriage, and while it was going at a brisk rate, his feet slipped, and he fell upon some iron spikes which were driven behind on the foot-board; the spikes ran into his legs, and his head struck upon the ground; he was dragged in this situation a considerable distance along the road. The cries of the passengers who saw the youth in this dreadful condition, caused the coachman to stop his horses, and the unfortunate youth was taken off the spikes severely injured. He was carried to a surgeon in the neighbourhood.

On Thursday afternoon, Master Charles Smith, a fine youth, 16 years of age, son of John Smith, Esq. of Enfield, met with the following accident:—He took a ride out for pleasure, on his favourite poney, in the forenoon, and on his return home he was thrown from his horse, his foot sticking in the stirrup; the horse took fright, and galloped off at full speed, dragging the unfortunate youth after him on the road, his head dashing against the stones, and no person being near to stop the horse for upwards of half a mile. When stopped, he was quite dead.

The Mayor of the Commune of Arleuille has sent an account of the death of a woman aged 111. Barbe Racault was born on the 22d of January, 1707, and was married at the age of 12. She had been constantly employed in the labours of the field. She was remarkable for frugality and temperance; never had recourse to medicine, and preserved to the last all her mental and bodily faculties. The Sub-Prefect of Montluçon, wishing to have the portrait of this old woman, employed a female artist to paint it, who, in order to obtain a proper light, placed her in her old arm chair near the door of her cottage. It is probable, that sitting in a draught of air affected her, for on the second day she took a fever, and eight days after, the 17th Sept., died in the 112th year of her age. She has left a numerous family. One of her daughters is 87.—French paper.

SUPERSTITION—ITS CIVIL AND POLITICAL CONSEQUENCES.

Now that Superstition has made an attempt to rear her fierce and loathsome head again,—that humanity has been again shocked and insulted with the public news of a man's having been tortured by the Inquisition,—and that the Holy Alliance, though still professing to act upon religious grounds, is openly avowed to be directed against the political expression of popular opinion,—it has become doubly worth while to keep a watchful eye upon the movements of the old monster. Her shapes are of different degrees of the horrible in different countries; but wherever there is inhumanity, practical or theoretical, and a bad opinion of the SUPREME BEING however disguised, there her influence is to be recognized; and by seeing the excesses to which she can go in some places, we may be aware of all the proportionate mischief she will do in the rest.

The reader, upon seeing the following horrible account, will exclaim—"But no such abominations can get into Europe! The Inquisition, to be sure, is a dreadful thing, but then it is despised and abhorred out of the pale of the Spanish court; and it is impossible that Europe should suffer any results of superstition like these!"—True. No such abominations, we believe, can get into Europe at large. The Inquisition is certainly both despised and abhorred, though we fear that the Spanish legitimate "necessity" of it is maintained by Allied Personages whose names would sound very unpleasantly to the English reader. Yet thanks to the growth of much-abused philosophy (whose fruits the cunning and half-witted pluck, and then pretend they came out of their own orchard), superstitions much less atrocious than these in point of physical practice cannot be perpetrated in general under that calm and holier shade. But did not the reader see, the other day, in the news from Germany, that since the degrading and bewildering return of superstitious fears, human beings were absolutely sacrificed by a fanatical sect as atonements? Does he not remember this? And though we are undoubtedly not of opinion, on that account, that such practices will become extensive, yet we repeat, the same proportionate bad opinion of the SUPREME BEING, however disguised even to men's own hearts by their fear, is the inevitable source of all the proportionate tyrannies that the worldly artifice and other-worldly bigotry of the powerful can inflict upon us.—But we anticipate. The reader will see the link in the chain presently.

The account we allude to is contained in the Journal of the American Missionaries at Bombay, and is as follows. We beg the reader to keep in mind, while he peruses it, that the Hindoos are by nature one of the gentlest and kindest people on the face of the earth, and literally would not hurt a worm; for they believe in the metempsychosis. They think it barbarous even to eat meat. And yet see what cruel slaves can be made of them by dint of persuading them that there is a God who can be cruel too and inflict the most horrible tortures.—The Italics are our own:—

"We have witnessed," (say the Missionaries) "a horrid specimen of the Hindoo religion. It was at a village, called by the natives Kamatapoor, i. e. the town of the Kamatees, who are a Telinga people, from the opposite side of the Peninsula. The affair took place at the temple of Kandoba, or Kandel Roa, an incarnation of Mahadave in a human form, in which character he destroyed the demon Manimal. To this god, two persons, a man and a woman of low caste, made a vow. The man, as was said, made his vow, and performed it, for the purpose of obtaining greater bodily strength and vigour, and the woman that she might obtain an offspring.

"The vows were performed by making offerings to the idol, and by torturing themselves before the temple. The affair began with music and dancing before the door of the temple; or rather by a barbarous jangle of harsh-sounding drums and pipes, and by a sort of beastly play, somewhat resembling the plays of dogs or monkeys.

"After this, the offerings were made. They consisted of a small quantity of boiled rice, a few small cakes, several kinds of colouring stuffs or sacred paint, burning of incense, and a drink-offering of toddy, an intoxicating liquor taken from the palm tree, besides a number of other things, which were all placed on a little spot of ground previously figured by red lines variously intersecting one another.

"After these offerings were made, the sacrifice of a kid was performed. The person who principally officiated at the sacrifice was an old man, almost naked, with long black hair hanging frightfully over his shoulders and face, around his loins a broad belt strung with a number of bells, also bells around his ancles, and a heavy hempen rope for flagellation in his hand; making altogether a very horrid appearance. The kid was brought, and waved around the spot where the other offerings had been made. It was then seized by the demon-like man, who began to run round the car, which was the engine of torture; and at the same time to tear open with his teeth the throat of the kid, and to suck its blood. While he was doing this, the clang of music, the yell of the people, the crowding, howling, and pushing around him, exhibited a horrid and diabolical scene. After the monster had thus torn the kid and drunk its blood, he was caressed and reverenced by the people as a superior being; and they were as eager to touch him, as though the touch of him was sufficient to communicate some invaluable blessing.

"The car just mentioned consisted of two cart-wheels, upon the axis of which was perpendicularly erected a pole ten or twelve feet in length. On the top of this perpendicular pole another pole, of about 25 feet in length, was so fixed horizontally, that, by means of ropes fastened to one end of it, the opposite end might be let down to the ground, or elevated at pleasure to the height of about 20 feet. Near the end of the pole to be thus elevated was fastened on it a cloth, or a kind of canopy; and directly under this canopy was fastened a rope for suspending the person voluntarily devoted to torture.

"All things being made ready, a young man, loaded with red and yellow paint, came forward. Preceded by musicians, and followed by a train, he began to circumambulate the temple, making a circumference of about 30 rods. After going round the temple several times in this way, two iron hooks, having each two prongs thrust through the skin and principal muscles on the small of the back, were made fast to the end of the pole which was let down near the ground. Instantly the ropes at the other end were pulled, and the poor frantic creature was drawn up to the height of about 20 feet, and there fastened. The music struck up, and a noisy group seized the ropes fastened to the car, and drew it six times round the temple, making the circumference as before-mentioned; the man at the same time scattering the dust of chunda-wood on the crowds under him. When he was let down, the people manifested the same eagerness to touch him, as they did before to touch the monster who had sucked the blood of the kid.

"After this man had performed his vow, a female was suspended on the hooks, and drawn round in the same manner. She seemed to manifest greater fortitude and contempt of pain than the man; for, while the weight of her body was entirely suspended on the hooks in her back, she voluntarily flung herself about by a variety of action, which must have greatly augmented her sufferings.

"After she had been drawn five times round the temple she was let down, and led away amidst the congratulations and applauses of the multitude. Thus the scene closed. Several others, it was said, stood bound by their vows to the same idol, to inflict the same tortures on themselves in the course of a few days.

"Here the Christian may behold something of the degraded, deplorable, perishing state of the heathen. How hard their bondage to Satan! How wretched their present condition!"

Now the Missionary has here expressed himself like a human being. He has expressed himself as any other human being would, in whose country actions like these, whatever may be its superstition, are prevented by better knowledge. For observe, it is not superstition that ever prevents a bad thing, however it may arrogate to itself the pretence:—it is knowledge that prevents it.—that very knowledge against which superstition in so many ways sets its face, at the very moment it has the impudence to use its suggestions. The Missionary, naturally, we dare say, a good and kind man, expresses himself with as much horror of these actions, as an inhabitant of the Loo-choo islands would, or even a common mercenary European, or a slavish Turk. He does not think, that although Mahadee, Mahadeva, Mahadave, or whatever they call him, "destroyed the demon Manimal," this is the proper way to prove his anti-demonism. He thinks it demon-like in his worshipper to exhibit ferocity, and suck the blood of even a kid. He calls him a "monster" for so doing, and is astonished that the people can "reverence him as a superior being." He also calls another of his worshippers "a poor frantic creature" for suffering himself, in honour or fear of this god, to be drawn up to a height with torturing hooks and pulleys (one of the Inquisition punishments, by the way); and he seems to have no words left to express his astonishment and horror at a female's acting with a still more intrepid stupidity, and voluntarily flinging about her hooked and suspended body. Finally he thinks it the Christian business to protest against such Gods and their worship. He would overturn them if he could, in spite of the ill-name and even execrations he might get from the priests, the ignorant, or the malignant, for his attempts at so doing. He calls such sufferings and such notions of God, no better than a "bondage to Satan," though he sees that the sufferers themselves protest against "the demon Manimal," and undergo these very tortures out of an alleged gratitude for the demon's overthrow,—a strange inconsistency, to be sure; as if an anti-demon could contemplate with any calmness human beings undergoing demoniacal tortures. In short, he thinks that even on account of the wretchedness of their "present condition," they should by all means be rescued from such an idle and degrading superstition. It is his firm and most serious philanthropical and religious opinion, that a faith which produces such monstrous notions of God and such tortures of his creatures contains the unanswerable proofs of its own falsehood; and ought, through every contumely and peril to his particular self, and by all quiet and persuasive means, to be overturned for the honour of the one and the happiness of the other.

We agree with him most heartily. Most heartily and most devoutly do we agree.—But this is not all which the Missionary says:—no, it is not all:—one more observation of his remains to be mentioned, which makes us stop and think a little, and ask how far even this apparently kind-natured man is not himself under a horrible mistake in religion, extremely necessary to be got rid of for all the very same reasons, more or less, which tell him to overturn the other.

We record the remaining observation with a feeling of sorrow and shame at the extraordinary inconsistencies into which human weakness is betrayed:—

"Here the Christian," says he, "may behold something of the degraded, deplorable, perishing state of the heathen. How hard their bondage to Satan! How wretched their present condition! And, alas! what must soon be their condition in ETERNITY, unless that Gospel is preached to them, which is able to make them wise unto salvation, through faith in CHRIST JESUS!"

What sort of a Deity this is, which the belief of this converter of deplorable and degrading superstition would make of the great and good Spirit of the Universe, and which, he tells the already-tortured Hindoos, will torture them to all eternity, if they do not believe in him instead of the "cruel" Mahadeva, we leave our readers for the present to consider.—We shall resume the subject, and follow it into its political connexion, next week.—We gladly turn, as usual, for refreshment, to the sight of the trees, and the sunshine, and human faces.

CASE OF DON DIEGO CORREA.

Don Diego Correa, Ex-Captain of the Regiment of Ciudad Rodrigo, confined in Ceuta for the term of ten years, to his Excellency the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the King of Great Britain at the Court of his Catholic Majesty Don Ferdinand VII., claiming the sacred asylum and immunity established by the civilized nations of Europe, and the rights of mankind, violated by the Governor of Gibraltar, with the view of vindicating his insulted honour, and redressing the wrongs he has sustained.

SIR,—If a Chief of the Iroquois Indians, or a Turkish Pacha, were legally accused for a crime committed against any individual in society, such an event would seem consonant with his general habits, his stupidity, and ferocity; but that an enlightened and noble Englishman, the Military and Civil Governor of a place of the first order, such as Gibraltar, should commit the horrible excess in which General Smith is fully implicated, is an occurrence that must alarm the most unfeeling, and excite concern in the most demoralized Government, as I shall proceed to prove by undeniable facts.

On the 14th of May, 1814, at nine in the morning, I departed from Cadiz, with the requisite passport from the Governor and Captain-General, Don Cayetano Valdez, with the intention of embarking at Gibraltar for the Isle of Teneriffe, my native country, there to regulate my private affairs, which I had abandoned in order to go spontaneously and at my own expense, with my two young and only sons, to defend the just cause of the nation. I purposed to return to the Peninsula precisely at the expiration of the four months allowed in my leave of absence, as stated in the passport to which I refer.

On the 15th I landed, under the permission communicated to all the passengers by Fernando Pavia, Superior of the Monastery entitled Nuestra Señora del Carmen,—obtained from the respective authorities. A Spanish Gentleman, Don Antonio Puiblanck, and myself, lodged at the hotel kept by Mr. Collins.

I had quietly taken up my residence in Gibraltar, I walked in the streets, frequented the public places, solely intent on prosecuting my voyage; but on the 17th at night, when I and my companion, having retired to our apartments, were about to repose under the inviolable safeguard of hospitality and the law, we heard ourselves called, and were roused by a knocking at the door of our dwelling; the persons pretended that they were some of our Spanish friends, who wished to speak with us; on admitting them, under this impression, we were surrounded by officers of justice, and military with fixed bayonets. To the officers I firmly but mildly remonstrated, using the protestations that seemed necessary on so critical and unforeseen a conjuncture; but with menacing expressions they seized the portmanteau containing all my papers, money, and apparel, and we were led away like delinquents accused of heavy offences, and delivered to the principal guard of the place.

A similar escort immediately arrived with Don Santiago Aldama, of the Commerce of Cadiz, and Don Manuel Azerbal, one of the Editors of the Redactor General of that place. The surprise which I felt at occurrences so improper, and so foreign to the intelligence, integrity, and good faith of the British nation, and their Constitutional Code, formed in my mind a striking contrast worthy of a scrupulous and detailed description, to the shame and exposure of those who caused it; for on that fatal night they violated the most sacred regulations of social life, and all the principles that guarantee individual liberty and security against the machinations of oppression and tyranny, so repugnant to the laudable pride of the English people and the dignity of their Government.

On the following day two officers, a peasant, and another person who was called an interpreter, presented themselves in my apartment. The highest in rank interrogated me, alleging the most strange and ridiculous charges, the most remarkable of which were the following: "Whether I was an enemy to the English, and wrote against them? Whether I was a friend of the Duende de los Cafés of Cadiz?"—My precise answer was, "that I had been an enemy of all who were enemies of my King and country; that I had manifested my patriotic opinions by the dissemination of analogous principles; that I had known the Editor in question solely as a public writer."—From these illegal investigations the result was, that I had not arrived as a fugitive or a delinquent, nor had I offended against the orders of the garrison, nor had any thing appeared to throw suspicion upon me.

This informal and unauthorized act (which I again contradicted) being concluded with an examination of my papers which they unduly retained, taking possession of my passport and other testimonials of my class, state, destination, and procedure, despising my reiterated protestations, they transferred us to a gloomy and loathsome dungeon, placing centinels at the doors and windows. Aldama was left at full liberty. He is now residing in London, and Azerbal in Buenos Ayres. In this dungeon we were kept separate until we were officially delivered over to the master of a barge as convicts, in which character we were presented to General Arostegui, Governor of Algeiras, who sent us under an escort to Chelanga, where a strong detachment of cavalry was waiting for us, who placed us at the disposition of the Commandant of the Guard of the Land Port of Cadiz, from whence we were transferred by the Adjutant Ruano to the public prison, and immured separately in miserable dungeons.

At day-break we were ironed, and, together with other unknown unfortunates, were taken by a party of cavalry to the Carraca. On alighting, we were accompanied by the populace to the Casa Presidio, which is overlooked by the four towers. Here I was more heavily ironed, and fastened by a strong chain to a bar of iron like a wild beast; I was placed, totally without communication, in a filthy and unwholesome cell, where I remained seventy-five days without being allowed a bed, a rug, or a bench to rest or lie down on; the atrocity being carried so far that I was not allowed the smallest aliment. To the compassion of the unfortunate men who surrounded me I owe the preservation of my existence.

As his Majesty's Minister of Grace and Justice, Don Pedro Macanaz, used every effort through his personal interest to have me sacrificed with impunity, General Smith, , and , co-operated toward my total extermination. The process was substantiated without the legal and requisite forms which natural and positive right prescribe and the laws of the kingdom point out, because without paying due attention to the reasons and proofs on which my defence is supported, and to documents of the greatest import, they condemned me to the inmitigable and disgraceful punishment of ten years' imprisonment, with costs; a magnanimous recompense for the most devoted patriotism!

In execution of this unjust sentence, they took me on the 18th of November last, by violence, from the infirmary of the prison of Cadiz, and sickly as I was, they embarked me along with a promiscuous crowd of delinquents: on the 18th, after suffering a violent tempest, and all the inconveniences resulting from such a condition and such circumstances, they placed me, without any intermission or indulgence, among the chained convicts, and compelled me from morning till night to that public hard labour in which those prisoners are employed who are not of a distinguished class.

The reiteration of evils so enormous, and the continuance of toil so degrading, impaired my physical and agitated my moral condition: I was obliged to be sent to the military hospital to recover my debilitated health, and experience the fatal and disastrous climax of outraged feelings and honour.

Resigned to adversity, and satisfied with the faithful testimony of my conscience, I suffered without the slightest relief, reduced to half a loaf of allowance bread, ten ounces of vegetables, and half an ounce of oil, the miserable daily sustenance of the exiled wretches who are buried in chains and dungeons, either for the expiation of their faults, or through the caprice and arbitrary will of evil-disposed men, without any piety, who abuse power and authority to persecute the innocent and the helpless.

In a state so deplorable and prejudicial to my reputation, my interest, and my family, who are suffering under abandonment and orphanhood, a strange novelty has occurred, which is, that in consequence of remonstrances made by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to King Ferdinand VII. on the 19th of last month, the four Americans were restored from this place to Gibraltar, who fled in 1814, namely, Don Juan del Castillo, the Canon of Chili, Don Juan Rosio, and Don Juan de Ayala, who, as principal promoters of the revolution of Caracas, were considered as offenders, and were given up at the instance of Governor-General Butron, by the English General Campbell.

An occurrence so unexpected and so favourable, joined to the noble origin of my cause, encourages me to invoke the just protection of your Excellency as the legitimate representative of the British Government: I shall add some succinct observations, which the impartial judgment of your Excellency will deign to weigh according to the nature and importance of the subject, and the events to which I may be subjected by the machinations of my inhuman adversaries, the arbiters of power and interest.

It is artfully imputed to me, Sir, that during our glorious revolution against that which has covered the whole world with tears of blood, I manifested my opinions and thoughts through the medium of the press, contravening the upright intentions of the Government of Great Britain. No pamphlet or periodical work will be found containing such maxims, at an epoch so much affecting the interests and relations that had been established between the Spanish and British Cabinets. In both there exist various copies of the proclamation, which I drew up and circulated when holding a commission from my Government in the United States of North America, refuting the machiavelian pretensions of Madison the President, which coincided with those of his protector Bonaparte, since both aimed at annihilating by insidious means the irresistible power of the two great nations which dissolved their rash projects. The refutation of the incendiary and defamatory libel published in Philadelphia by the faithless Don Jose Alvarez de Toledo,—the notable occurrences with the commander of the British brig of war the Variable, when I proceeded to the Isle of Providence, in 1812, which I stated in Cadiz to the Ambassador, Sir Henry Wellesley, are unequivocal proofs of the delicacy of my mode of proceeding. Actuated by the same principles, I refrained from making a manifestation of my particular services directed to the benefit and welfare of my country and the British nation, offering to verify them personally by unanswerable documents.

The disturbances excited by the English Commissary, General O. M.— and General D.—, confirm the statements here made. Partial events have not given good Spaniards occasion to criminate the reputation of a wise and upright government like that of Great Britain. The inexorable enemies of the tyrant of Europe have followed the path of order and rectitude.

No objection can be taken to my having efficaciously defended my native island, or at my having obtained particular distinction from the royal justice of Charles IV. when the memorable Admiral Nelson attempted to invade it with an armed force. The prudent and generous British nation knows how to distinguish and appreciate merit, talents, and virtue, and to value those well-deserving Spanish soldiers, who, with the sacrifice of their fortunes, persons, and lives, have saved their captive King and their country in the last extremity. In the twenty-five years that I have followed the honourable career of arms, I have religiously fulfilled my obligations and duties in an irreproachable manner. I, and my sons, Lieutenants in my own corps, following my advice and example, have through numerous wounds sprinkled with our blood the field of glory and immortality, without any other incentive or remuneration than the general felicity of my nation, which generous blood has not been able to save me from being treated with the most dreadful ignominy and cruelty, or to cleanse the stained minds of my rivals, criminally jealous of my ardent love for the King and the country.

Sir, the result of the legal process and my destination form a convincing testimony that I have not been accused of having attempted any thing against the life of the King or the safety of the State, nor does any other crime enter into the question. The discussions and debates that arose in the House of Commons in February, in which the honourable members Messrs. Whitbread, Golburn, &c. took a part, pronounce the most disinterested and honourable panegyric on my labours, capable of falsifying the sinister, fictitious, and unfounded informations of General Smith, to elude the heavy charges that lie against him, and which he has to answer before a justificatory tribunal.

In short, the national humanity, good faith, and honour, imperiously require that your Excellency, by your own functions and character, should institute and promote a matter of such transcendent importance, giving their full force and vigour to the remonstrances made, in order to redeem me from a situation so shameful and indescribable. The efficacy and promptitude with which they were urged saved me from dying (without being heard) by a public and dishonourable execution, according to what had been projected by the cruel and faithless Minister Macaniz and his auxiliaries, who is now paying the penalty of his incalculable errors.

I have the honour, Sir, to represent to your Excellency and to transmit herewith part of the authorized testimonials of my civil and military conduct, certifying this letter; which I direct to your Excellency by the post, in order that it may not miscarry; and I have the pleasing consolation that it will come to the hands of your Excellency for your information and government, remitting another of the same tenor to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, assured of his goodness and benevolence.

I pray Heaven to keep your Excellency many years.
Canta, Dec. 23, 1815.

of the King of Great Britain, &c.

BONAPARTE.

LETTERS FROM LORD BATHURST.

(EXTRACT—H. LOWE.)

Downing-street, Jan. 5.
SIR,—I have received and forwarded to the Earl of Liverpool the sealed packet enclosed in your despatch, which professes to contain the observations of General Bonaparte upon certain extracts from a report which appeared in the Morning Chronicle, of a speech which I had occasion to deliver in the House of Lords upon the subject of his treatment at St. Helena.

Although Count Bertrand's conduct gave you fair reason to infer that the packet contained nothing upon which it could be necessary to require your observations or reply, and thereby induced you so far to deviate from your instructions as to transmit it unopened, yet, as it is found, on perusal, to contain a general complaint of "your treatment of General Bonaparte, not only from the time of your arrival at St. Helena to the latest period to which any thing I said could have referred, but continued, by a note at the close of it, up to the very day on which it was delivered to you," I consider it my duty, previous to my laying it before the Prince Regent, to transmit to you a copy by the first opportunity.

Had the General delivered the packet to you unsealed, as the regulations (he knew) required, for the purpose of being transmitted home, I should by this time most probably have been enabled to lay the charges and your answer fully before the Prince Regent. The delay which must now take place has been altogether occasioned by the disingenuous conduct which has been practised upon you; and although it is difficult to understand what advantage General Bonaparte could have expected to derive from it, if his object had been the fair investigation of his case, it will, I am sure, in the event of any other sealed letters being sent to you for transmission, prove to you the expediency of not permitting any feeling of delicacy to interfere with the strict execution of your instructions.—I have the honour, &c.

BATHURST.

(EXTRACT—H. LOWE.)

Colonial Office, Downing-street, Jan. 1.

SIR,—I have received and laid before the Prince Regent your despatch, No. 89, in which you transmit various communications which have passed between yourself and Count Bertrand, relative to the restrictions imposed upon General Bonaparte, and the possibility of admitting any further relaxation.

From a review of the papers transmitted by you, it appears that the complaints advanced by General Bonaparte against the restrictions imposed upon him may be comprehended under two heads:—

1st, He complains, that the contracted extent of the limits within which he may take exercise, unaccompanied by a British officer, and the posting of sentinels round Longwood at sun-set, debar him from taking exercise; and 2dly, That his intercourse with the inhabitants is subject to your intervention; and his correspondence with them subject to your inspection.

As Count Bertrand has admitted that the first head of objection has been obviated by your recent extension of his former limits for exercise, and by the other arrangements which you considered yourself authorised to adopt, it is not necessary that I should advert particularly to that part of the discussion, further than to express my approbation of the relaxation in this particular, to which you have, out of regard to the health of General Bonaparte, been induced to accede.

Considering it, however, not improbable that (notwithstanding the acquiescence of Count Bertrand in the existing arrangement with respect to the sentries) the posting of them at sun-set may again be brought forward as a cause of complaint, I deem it advisable to acquaint you by this opportunity, that the utmost degree of indulgence which can be consented to, would be to defer posting them till nine o'clock during the heat of the summer months, and that only under the condition, that General Bonaparte should at that hour be seen by the officer at Longwood, with a view of ensuring his being in the house at the time when the guards are stationed round it.

The second head of complaint, viz. the restriction imposed upon his intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants, is one upon which there can be but little prospect of satisfying all the pretensions advanced by Count Bertrand. It cannot escape your observation, that these demands cannot be represented as interfering in any way with his taking exercise: his declaration that he would not take any, unless they were conceded, was an attempt to abuse the interest you had taken in the preservation of his health. With respect to correspondence, I confess I see no practicable alternative, but that of adhering to the regulations already in force, or admitting an untrained communication between General Bonaparte and the inhabitants, on all subjects and for all purposes. A permission to send and receive sealed letters, whether under colour of private business, or under any other pretence, is incompatible with the situation of a prisoner of war, and is liable to the greatest objections, as such a relaxation of the existing rules would in effect be to abandon one of the best securities against a successful attempt at escape. You will, therefore, on this point, adhere to the instructions under which you have hitherto acted.

With respect to intercourse with the inhabitants, I see no material objection to the placing it upon the footing recently suggested by Count Bertrand, as it is one which he represents would be more consonant to General Bonaparte's wishes. The Count's proposition is, that a list of a given number of persons resident in the Island should be made out, who shall be at once admitted to Longwood on the General's own invitation, without a previous application being made to your Excellency on each invitation. You will therefore consider yourself at liberty to accede to the suggestion of Count Bertrand, and you will for the purpose desire him to present to you for your approbation a list of persons, not exceeding 50 in number, resident in the Island, who may be admitted to Longwood at seasonable hours, without any other pass than the invitation of General Bonaparte; it being understood that they are on such occasions to deliver in the invitation as a voucher, with their names, at the barrier. In giving your approbation to the list, you will, as far as is consistent with your duty, consult the wishes of General Bonaparte; but you will let it be clearly understood, that you reserve to yourself a discretionary power of erasing from the list at any time any of those individuals to whom you may have found it inexpedient to continue such extraordinary facility of access, and you will take especial care that a report be always made to you by the orderly officer, of the several persons admitted to Longwood upon General Bonaparte's invitation.

With respect to the visits of strangers who may arrive at St. Helena, General Bonaparte has not expressed much solicitude for a change in the existing regulations; his reluctance to gratify the idle curiosity of strangers is a natural feeling, to which every attention should be shown; and it is satisfactory to know, that under the existing regulations, the General is protected from all rude intrusions of that description; as no stranger, although he has received your Excellency's permission, can be admitted at Longwood unless he has received that of the General also. I am aware that in giving your permission you have shown great delicacy; but after what has been again stated on this subject, you will, I am sure, be inclined to be still more select, confining the permission to those whose situation, character, or acquirements, are such as to render it probable that General Bonaparte might take an interest in their conversation.

It only remains for me to desire, that you will take a proper opportunity of making known to General Bonaparte the final decision upon the several points transmitted home for consideration.

I shall be sincerely happy if the relaxations which you have already made, and which you are hereby authorized to make, should in any degree tend to reconcile General Bonaparte to the situation in which he is placed, and induce him to adopt a course of life more suited to his comfort and his health; but should he, as Count Bertrand has declared that it is his purpose to do, decline taking necessary exercise within the limits which he now admits to be adequate, unless the restriction upon his correspondence is removed, his Majesty's Government will only have to regret, that the attempt made to diminish the privations to which he is necessarily subjected, should be frustrated by his own determination to impose upon himself restraints much more severe than any against which he has most vehemently remonstrated.—I have the honour to be, &c.

BATHURST.

NOTES APPROVED BY NAPOLEON.

(FIRST LETTER.)

The storeship Barkworth cast anchor on the 5th of May in the roads of St. Helena, and on the 9th of May, Sir Hudson Lowe sent to Count Bertrand, without any accompanying letter, the subjoined extracts from Lord Bathurst's correspondence.

On the 17th of October, 1817, Count Bertrand sent to Sir Hudson Lowe a sealed packet addressed to Lord Liverpool; it contained observations on the speech which Lord Bathurst delivered in Parliament on the 18th of March, 1817. The packet was sent sealed, because the Emperor Napoleon had added the following words:—"I approve of these observations, and I desire they may be laid before the Sovereign and the people of England." But if Sir Hudson Lowe had insisted on the packet being opened, Count Bertrand would have broken the seal in his presence, and presented it to him open. It can be proved, that Sir Hudson Lowe made himself acquainted with the contents of the packet. There was no need to communicate these observations to Sir Hudson Lowe, since they were made in answer to a speech publicly delivered by the Minister in the month of March, 1817. The voluminous compositions of insults, calumnies, and outrages against the French at Longwood, which are conveyed by every courier from St. Helena to London, are not communicated to the French until the English Government has deliberated on them. A communication made by a party interested is an act in itself unjust. If, therefore, these observations have not been communicated to the Prince Regent, so much the worse for the British Government, for the English nation, for its boasted constitution, which is now so much slighted, and for the liberty of its people. Assuredly the like would not have happened in Russia, Austria, or even in Constantinople.

It would be just that the complaints of the French should be submitted unsealed to Sir Hudson Lowe, if Sir Hudson Lowe's complaints were communicated, previously to their departure from St. Helena, to one of the French officers, in order that the calumnies, misrepresentations, and falsehoods they contain might be pointed out.

(SECOND LETTER.)

At length, after a lapse of two years, it is known in London, that the hours for walking during the summer season in this country are from five to seven in the evening. Consequently, the custom of stationing guards at six o'clock has been once more resorted to. Sir H. Lowe, without putting a stop to this practice, has given written orders to the guards to allow the French to pass till nine in the evening, and he every day gives verbal orders that they shall not be permitted to pass after six in the evening. Sir Hudson Lowe pursues his old course. It would appear that he has confidential instructions at variance with his public instructions.

Can it be supposed that a prisoner of war, quartered in any town in England, France, Russia, or Austria, would not be allowed to write to his banker, his friend, or his mistress, residing in the same town, without his letters being submitted to the inspection of the Governor of the province? This code is not that of nations, but of Lord Bathurst, who is quite unacquainted with military affairs. It is false that this could have any influence on the means of escape; since the inhabitants may be spoken to without witnesses, there can be no danger in writing to them. The object of this measure is at variance with that which existed in 1815, and during the first half year of 1816; it is to vex and insult by a thousand ignoble and mean details. But Sir Hudson Lowe is no stranger to such acts; to inspect the dirty linen of the ladies of Longwood is with him a most important occupation.

Fifty individuals, consisting of the principal inhabitants of the island, and officers of rank in the army, may freely maintain communications with Longwood. This removes all difficulty with respect to the passes: but within a month from this day, the 2d of June, this arrangement has not been observed, and Sir H. Lowe has caused the subjoined proclamation to be posted up. The Colonel of the 66th has received orders to direct such of his officers who were accustomed, when they met the Countess Bertrand on the road, to stop and converse with her, to cease doing so, and even to avoid meeting her. In consequence of this order, several individuals have avoided passing along the road, though they have all manifested the utmost indignation at such conduct. During the month of April, the Emperor quitted his apartment four times, to spend half an hour under a little tree about thirty toises from his house. In May, Sir Hudson Lowe ordered a gardener, a private of the 66th, and a picquet sergeant of the artificers, to follow him at some distance, and not to lose sight of him whenever he walked in his garden. The Emperor was thus forced to abstain even from this little exercise. The gardener and the sergeant of the artificers, instead of confining themselves to the orders they had received, assumed the functions of police-officers, and stopped persons even under the windows of Longwood-house. Such was the effect of the arrival of Lord Bathurst's despatches, that whilst they appeared to permit unrestricted communication with a circle of fifty individuals, the tyranny of Sir H. Lowe became twofold. His conduct must be authorized by some instructions in opposition to those he has publicly received.

This is mockery. Napoleon wished to receive in society the Austrian and Russian officers who are on the island, the Baroness Stormer, as well as the strangers on board of vessels that put in here, as was the case in 1815 and 1816; but in 1817 it was declared, that he would prefer to receive no person to submitting to the silly and degrading formalities which Sir Hudson Lowe had invented, and in particular, that of receiving only such persons as that officer might be pleased to send—that is to say, persons blinded by false prejudices against the French. This mockery, under such circumstances, is exceedingly base.

Lord Bathurst is very ill informed of what passes in this country. The reason is plain. He receives his information from an unfaithful and passionate agent—a declared enemy, whose rancour chokes him. The conversations which this officer relates, are nothing but a tissue of falsehoods: the precaution of having his relations attested by one of his dependents, proves nothing except his own low cunning. There are a hundred examples of the false turn which this officer has given to every thing. One only need be cited. On the 2d of February, 1818, four months after he had read the observations on the speech of Lord Bathurst, he sent, without any reason, to Count Bertrand the account of the conversation he had had, according to his statement, with Napoleon, in May, 1816, on the building of a house—the whole story is an invention. It was a piece of unexampled effrontery, having for its object to obtain a pretext for saying, that this false conversation, which formed one of the topics of Lord Bathurst's speech, had been communicated to Count Bertrand.

Mr. Ellis was presented to Napoleon in July, 1817. He neither saw his bedchamber nor his inner apartments. During the conversation there was no question of any subject in contention respecting St. Helena. Count Montholon did not converse with him on any thing relative to the establishment at Longwood, notwithstanding that Mr. Ellis, in his work on China, has presumed to set himself up as a judge in all these questions, as if he had made a counter-inquisition on the spot respecting the matters in dispute. He has not done honour to his character in this instance. He must have belied his own conscience to please the Ministry: but all that is said in the four or five paragraphs on this subject is fabricated, and has not come from his pen.

If during the 24 months that Sir Hudson Lowe has been here, the Emperor has not gone out, the reason is, that he could not, without exposing himself to be the victim of the criminal views meditated by that officer. If insulted by the sentinels, that would have provoked scenes which might have rejoiced the London libellers if the result had been tragical. Sir H. Lowe had no right to make restrictions, nor to change what existed before his arrival. As the character of this officer is well known, if he have the right to make restrictions, which the Bill only grants to the English Government, it is evident that he will ever take a pleasure in fresh outrages, in forming new restraints, in inventing conversations, and in getting false witnesses. Napoleon must shut himself up within the walls of his residence, to protect himself from the abuse of authority exercised by this man. If the object of those who sent Napoleon to this country, the most frightful and the most insalubrious in the universe, had been doubtful, the choice of Sir Hudson Lowe, his continuance in office for 3 years, though hundreds of British officers who have been in this Island might and must have informed the Government of his odious conduct, would remove all uncertainty on that point.

PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it has been ascertained, that a present had been delivered to an inhabitant of this Island, in the name or on the part of one of the foreign persons under detention at Longwood; which present was soon afterwards returned, in consequence of the person to whom it had been delivered becoming sensible that his acceptance of it, unless with the Governor's knowledge and authority, would have been a breach of the Proclamations in force. The Governor, however, deems it expedient, in enforcement of the above said Proclamations (with reference also to the general injunction contained in the warrant, dated 16th April, 1816), to give public notice, and public notice is hereby given, to all officers, inhabitants, and other persons whatsoever, residing on, or resorting to this Island, that they not only are interdicted (as by the Proclamation of Oct. 17, 1815) from holding any correspondence or communication with the foreign persons under detention on it, except only such as may be regularly authorized by him, and (as further, by public notice of the 11th of May, and Proclamation of the 28th of June, 1816), from receiving, delivering, or rendering themselves the channel for the conveyance of any communication whatsoever, from or to the said persons, without his express authorization; but where any unauthorized communication shall have been, or may be conveyed, or attempted to be conveyed, it behoves all those who are acquainted with it, to give the Governor immediate information of the same (or the nearest civil or military authority, should the case so require), in order that the necessary steps may be taken thereupon, under pain of being considered otherwise as privy to the same, and held answerable accordingly.

Given at the Castle, James's-town, this 16th day of May, 1818.
Hudson Lowe, Lieut.-General,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

The Morning Chronicle publishes the following letter, without vouching for its authenticity:—

TO THE EMPRESS MARIA LOUISA, &c.

MADAME,—If your Majesty will deign to recollect the conversation I had with you in 1814 at Grosbois, when seeing you there, unhappily for the last time, I related to you all that the Emperor had experienced at Fontainebleau, I venture to hope that you will pardon me the melancholy duty which at this moment I fulfil, in making known to you that the Emperor Napoleon is dying in the most dreadful torments, and in the most prolonged agony.—Yes, Madame, he to whom, by both divine and human laws, you are united by the most sacred ties—he whom you have seen receive the homage of almost all the Sovereigns of Europe—he, over the fate of whom I have seen you shed so many tears when he quitted you, perishes by the most cruel death, a captive on a rock in the midst of the ocean, 2000 leagues from the objects of his dearest affections, alone, without friends, without relations, without intelligence of his wife or of his son, without any consolation.

On and since my departure from this fatal rock, I had hoped to be enabled to see you, in order to give you the recital of his sufferings, being very certain of every thing that your generous soul is capable of; my hopes have been deceived. I have learnt that no one can recall to you the Emperor—can point to you his situation—can tell you the truth—can approach you—in a word, that you are in the midst of your Court as if in a prison. The Emperor was aware of this in his moments of anguish, when, to give him some consolation we spoke to him of you, often has he replied to us, “Be fully convinced, that if the Empress makes no great effort to alleviate my sufferings, it is because she is surrounded by spies, who prevent her from knowing any thing of what I suffer, for Maria Louisa is virtue itself.”

Deprived, then, of the happiness of an interview with you, I have since my arrival here been seeking the means of communicating to you this intelligence: it is only now that a sure opportunity has offered, and I hasten to profit by it to write to you this letter, full of hope and of confidence in the generosity of your character, and the goodness of your heart.

The tortures of the Emperor may still last for a long period; it is time to save him; the present moment proves very favourable; the Sovereigns are assembling in Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle; the passions appear tranquillized; Napoleon is far from being an object of apprehension; he is so unfortunate, that great minds can, with respect to him, only interest themselves in his fate. Under such circumstances, will your Majesty condescend to reflect upon the effect which may be produced by an important step upon your part; such, for example, as going to the Congress to solicit a termination of the torments of the Emperor—to supplicate your august father to unite his efforts with yours, in order that the custody of Napoleon may be confided to him, if policy does not yet permit him to be restored to liberty.

Were even such a proceeding not entirely to succeed, the lot of the Emperor might be still considerably ameliorated? What consolation would he not experience in seeing you act thus; and you, Madame, what would be your happiness? How many praises, how many benedictions would you acquire by conduct such as this, which is prescribed to you by religion, by your honour, and your duty; conduct that your greatest enemies can alone counsel you not to adopt. It would be said, the Sovereigns of Europe, after having conquered the Great Napoleon, abandoned him to his most cruel enemies, those who would make him die of the most prolonged and most barbarous torments; the duration of his agony reduced him to request more speedy executions; he appeared to be forgotten and without help, but Maria Louisa was true to him, and his life has been preserved.

Ah, Madame! in the name of what you hold dearest in the world, of your reputation, of your duty, of your future happiness, do every thing to save the Emperor; the shade of Maria Theresa commands you to do it.

Pardon me, Madame, pardon me for daring to speak to you thus; I have expressed without reserve the sentiments with which I am penetrated in your favour; I wish to see you the first of all women.

Your Majesty may condescend to recollect, that on the journey to Amsterdam, when I remained behind ill, I should have perished for want of care had not your Majesty, informed of the circumstance, sent to me your own Physician, with orders to bestow on me all the resources of his art; you saved my life. Madame, the recollection will never be effaced from my heart, and I think I cannot better testify my gratitude than by having the courage to write to you this letter.

Condescend to permit me, Madame, to lay at the feet of your Majesty the homage of the profound respect with which I am, Madame, your Majesty's very humble and very obedient servant, (Signed) The General GOURGAUD.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 12.—A Courier arrived last night from Aix-la-Chapelle, has brought to the King the news, that on the 9th of this month the Duke of Richelieu, Plenipotentiary of his Majesty, signed, with the Plenipotentiaries of Austria, England, Prussia, and Russia, a Convention, by which the Army of Occupation will have quitted the French territory by the 30th November. The sum which remains to be paid by France, conformably to the 4th Article of the Treaty of the 20th November, 1815, is definitively fixed at 265 millions, of which sum 100 millions will be acquitted in Inscriptions on de Rente (5 per cent. stock) at the price of the 5th inst.—Moniteur.

GERMANY.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, OCT. 10.—His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and our King, will leave this city on the 16th, to review their troops forming part of the Army of Occupation, and will then go for a very short time to Paris. His Majesty the Emperor of Austria will not quit Aix-la-Chapelle.—Thus the principal negotiation, relative to the departure of the Army of Occupation, is terminated. There are other important matters reserved for the decision of the Congress. The conferences continue daily alternately at Prince Hardenberg's and Prince Metternich's. The result is each time laid before the Allied Sovereigns.—It is confirmed that the Army of Occupation will soon pass the frontiers of France. Russia and England especially insisted on the departure of the Army of Occupation.

EAST INDIES.

A Supplement to the London Gazette was published on Monday, containing two additional dispatches from India; not indeed of any great interest, but serving to fill up the narrative of the late military events in that quarter. One of the dispatches is from General Munro, the other from General Marshall. The former is dated on the 11th of May, from the Camp before Singapore, and announces the carrying the outworks of that place, and the complete defeat and dispersion of Bajee Row's remaining infantry, about five thousand in number, together with six or seven hundred horse. These forces were commanded by a Chief named Gunput Row, who was wounded in the action. Another Chief, named Victul Punt Pattiah, was killed, as were several of less note. General Marshall's dispatch contains the Field Army Orders of the 6th of March, congratulating the troops on the successful termination of their services against the fortress and town of Hattrass, which event led to the surrender of Moorsaun and eleven other forts.—No intelligence is communicated by these advices, as to what had become of the late Peishwa.

The Continuation of the Remonstrance addressed to FERDINAND VII. by Don ALVARO FLOREZ ESTRADA, next week.

A. F. R. next week.

We like the feeling which we believe really dictated T. L.'s Ode to NAPOLEON; but perhaps he will think, on reflection, that the example he is affording the world of his fatal mistake, in quitting liberty for sovereignty and a good ambition for a bad one, is already severe and striking enough. It is not the time for men, as well as jackasses to kick the old lion.

We can hardly think our friend A.'s subject worth the trouble he has taken with it.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, OCTOBER 18.

EVACUATION OF FRANCE.—CONGRESS AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

A Moniteur arrived in the middle of the week with the official notification of the Convention mentioned in our last.

The Journal de Paris observes, that the sum would have been 140,000,000 francs for each of the last two years, but the Allies consented to give up 15,000,000, leaving it as stated. The Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, it is said, wrote to review their troops on the 19th or 20th instant (to-morrow or next day), upon which they would march to their respective destinations. According to another account, the review of the Russian and English troops, together with some small contingents, was to take place yesterday near Valenciennes. It is stated in one of the papers, that six regiments of English infantry are destined for India.—For India! of course their destiny will be to help the perplexed gentlemen in Ceylon and other places, and finally put down the native princes, who had got a notion into their heads that legitimacy is the same thing in the East as the West. The abominable, inconvenient fellows!

The Ministerial papers now refer triumphantly to the evacuation of France, and ask whether it is not a convincing proof that the Allies regard Louis's government as a stable one. They may; but in the first place, it does not follow that what they conclude must be certain. The united Gothic and Dandy Promise-Breakers are not the profoundest of men. The chance-conquerors, whom BONAPARTE used to baffle and beat so, and whom "the strong-armed English spirits" saved from the consequences of their own promise-breaking and vicious arrangements, may be mistaken.

In the next place, Louis's government may be stronger than it was, because his family have been too weak and too much disliked to be suffered to ruin it by their own arbitrary wills. If they can manage to play any tricks, their danger is now greater than ever. It is not the Bonapartists alone that are to be feared by them in case of additional discontent, as the hireling papers insinuate. There is a considerable party in France, who guard freedom both against BONAPARTE and the BOURBONS; and these are the men whom the Allies really dread, because though they may be inferior in point of numbers to the Bonapartists, they are identified with the best and most essential spirit of the French Revolution, and might lead the Bonapartists themselves and their military strength into the best revolutionary channel. It is these men who are to be conciliated; and we shall most probably see some popular acts of Government just now. BONAPARTE thought the same, when he returned from Elba, and threw himself into their arms accordingly, with great promises of better behaviour. The Allies and their servants laugh at these promises, and say he never meant to keep them:—and unquestionably, it must be allowed, that on this point, if on no other, they have some reason to think themselves good judges. But whether BONAPARTE meant to keep his promises or not, it would have been to the interest both of his fortunes and greatness of fame to do so; and he could afford to acknowledge himself in the wrong, for he is a man of genius.

In the third place, the withdrawal of the Allied troops was extremely desirable for Louis on this account,—that their continuance was a great drawback on any popularity he might endeavour to acquire. It was a great expense and a great provocation; though, by the way, we cannot see why the French should have been so mortified at the sight of four allied armies with their contingents keeping them down. Had we been a Frenchman, we should certainly have said to ourselves when we walked abroad, "There are four of those men necessary to keep me down:—two or even three, I find, cannot do it;—there must be four to every Frenchman."

Fourthly and lastly, and perhaps we should add, above all, the Allies wish to get their troops out of France the very first moment they can persuade themselves it is at all safe, for this alarming reason;—viz. that the troops themselves have begun to be "infected" with liberal sentiments, and to find out that Northern Princes have no more right to be self-sufficient, and arbitrary, and promise-breaking, than Southern. The King of Prussia has had some specimens of this spirit in the conduct of the students and others who have served in the army; and playing the absentee and being surrounded with his army are always ticklish points with a Russian Emperor.

We regard then the evacuation of France by the Allied Armies as a proceeding necessary for all parties; and as to Louis's family, if they can be kept in the back-ground, they may be endured; if not, or if the Allies themselves be not very cautious of going to war with each other, a few patriots round a table of green cloth will settle the matter at a moment's notice, and it will be a moot point whether a government entirely of their own is established, or whether young NAPOLEON does not come back under the added influence of Austria. It would be curious to see the English Ministers put to the perplexing alternative of either letting NAPOLEON out of his prison as the only means of raising a counter-confusion, or still keeping him there, out of a still greater dread, and so helping to secure his dynasty.

Meanwhile the Assembly at Aix-la-Chapelle does not seem to be very sprightly or cordial. The Emperor of Russia, whose patronage, movements, sayings, and appearances, are watched with an interest painful to think of by those who would see their fellow-creatures governed as they ought to be, by themselves, is said to have been very gracious and hand-squeezing to the King of SAXONY, the most respectable Sovereign on the Continent, and the head of the most respectable and liberal princely family. The next news that we hear, is, that his Russian "patron" takes arm-in-arm walks with his plunderer the King of PRUSSIA. His Russian Majesty is also said to be wonderfully particular in wearing but one order at a time,—this order too, in general, being the Swedish order of the Sword. This, at first sight, looks well for BERNADOTTE; but then was not the order given him by GUSTAVUS? or was it not given him by both? Here is a crust for the Quid-Nuncs!—His Imperial Majesty has been honoured with a visit by our illustrious countryman CLARKSON, the first and most indefatigable mover of the Abolition of the Slave Trade. He was very gracious of course, and we dare say is inclined to do any thing that will not interfere with "legitimacy," or hinder princes from being the sole practical dictators of whatever good or harm they please. Mr. OWEN, another excellent person, presents his memorials with less success. They go to too alarming an extent of charity and amelioration. The Kings and other personages, with the exception of the Emperor of AUSTRIA, (who evidently keeps aloof, and is the most popular and hurried man when he appears) have balls and other parties, more solemn than sprightly. They seem to move round my Lady CASTLE-REAGH as the Moon of this legitimate midnight; and her husband's loving and half-starving countrymen will be delighted to hear that her Ladyship's head-dress is the admiration of all the rich and great beholders for its sparkling wealth, having been covered on one occasion with diamonds to the value of four millions of francs. The diamonds were surmounted with three white feathers, "which seemed intended," says the astonished reporter, "to reach the very clouds." This, we conceive, is in high compliment to her husband's taste, which is at once so lofty and so light. The ladies of NAPOLEON's court had a low trick of resembling the Greeks.—The dances, it seems, in most request at Aix-la-Chapelle, are Polonaises, a kind of stately stepping,—which is judicious. There is a talk already of dissensions among the High Contracting Parties; and no doubt there is a good deal of jealousy and heart-burning among so many conflicting and wrong interests. A dispute between Baden and Bavaria about the succession to the former's throne is said to have openly enlisted some of the Sovereigns on different sides. But be this as it may, they will all endeavour to keep as long as possible just now out of a war, for the common sake of "legitimacy;" though we are far from thinking that they can do so for any great length of time. The wish to keep down liberty alone will by and by force them into wars,—to say nothing of their own follies and bad passions.

It is said that the Russian Emperor has represented to Congress the impropriety of keeping in his present excessive and unhealthy imprisonment a man who has been acknowledged by all the Sovereigns but one, and is allied to others. He might add, a man who had let them keep their thrones over and over again, and among his inferior qualities possessed great ones. But this would not be "legitimate" reasoning. Nothing is yet whispered of the result of this representation, but it is said to occupy considerable attention. The thing is a great dilemma to the Parvanimous.

"Persons worthy of credit confidently state, that the Emperor ALEXANDER has caused a Note to be given in, in which he requires of his august Allies, that NAPOLEON might be conducted from the island of St. Helena to a more healthy place. His Majesty, it is said, insists upon the moral necessity of acting with more consideration towards a man whom Sovereigns have treated with upon a footing of equality, and who is allied to one of them. According to these same reports, the Emperor of RUSSIA adds, that his humanity and religious principles actuate him to consider it a duty to require, that NAPOLEON should no longer remain in an island where he must infallibly perish. The result of this demand, which appears to be supported by the Emperor of AUSTRIA, is not yet known."—Private Letter in the Courier.

One branch of the projected discoveries in the Arctic Regions, has failed for the present: we say, for the present, because we understand the attempt will be renewed next year, under circumstances more likely to be successful, as arising from observations made during the recent navigation of those seas. It is in the endeavour to reach the Pole, that we have been defeated; the last accounts from the North West discovery ships being in the highest degree satisfactory.—On Thursday, Mr. FISHER, an officer belonging to the Dorothea, Capt. BUCHAN, arrived at the Admiralty with dispatches, announcing the return of that ship and the Trent sloop. It appears that the highest latitude they attained was about 80. 30., in 12. east longitude. They attempted to proceed to the westward, but found the same obstructions, from an impenetrable barrier of ice, as impeded the progress of Captain PHIPPS in 1773. We are sorry to learn that one of the ships has sustained considerable damage, having been caught between two floating ice-bergs, the collision of which was so great, that she was lifted completely out of the water. Her irons were all forced, and her ribs broken; and we understand it has been with great difficulty she has been able to make port.—Courier—Saturday.

The Casts sent to Mr. HAYDON from Russia by his Excellency M. OLENIN, have arrived safely in the Thames.

Account of the Conference between the Emperor of RUSSIA and General MAISON, at Aix-la-Chapelle:—

The EMPEROR.—Well, General, the evacuation of France is decided, and your country restored to her independence. I love to persuade myself that after having shown such fortitude in her reverses, she will not conduct herself worse under more fortunate circumstances.

General MAISON.—Your Majesty's hopes will not, I am sure, be disappointed.

The EMPEROR.—I wish to see France for two years to come, in order to ascertain how she demeaned herself in the new order of things about to be established. Some persons pretend that the majority of the French desire to return to the regime which existed before the Revolution. What do you think?

The GENERAL.—Some persons who have been soured by misfortune, and some others who may be seduced by ambitious ideas, may have tried to extol that system, but the majority are very far from being of that opinion—quite the contrary.

The EMPEROR.—I believe it. As to myself, I am a friend to liberal ideas. I feel that nations must be delivered from arbitrary power. I have already done it in my kingdom of Poland; I shall extend the benefit to my other States. In France, what is done is irrevocable, and if it were necessary, new guarantees must be found against the return of the past. It is particularly necessary to prevent all attempts against national property. However, I have full confidence in the wisdom and judgment of the King of France. I am equally persuaded, that if the Prince, his brother, shall one day ascend the throne, he would follow the same march, and maintain the constitutional institutions. This is also the opinion of the Duke of Wellington. I repeat it, that I wish France to be great and strong—this is necessary to the well-understood interests of all powers. I give you my word of honour, General, that I have no other sentiments, and you may believe me, for I am an honest man.—(From a Letter from Aix-la-Chapelle.)—Courier.

The letter on SUICIDE, in this day's Paper, was originally intended for insertion in the Morning Chronicle, and addressed to the Editor of that Paper; but from some excess, perhaps, of caution, he politely declined it. We need not point out to our Readers what is very evident,—that it is the production of no ordinary hand. Neither shall we controvert any of its reasoning, which has a much wiser humanity in it than the cheap and ready-made argument in favour of "making examples" which is generally more unfeeling in sentiment than charitable in provision. We shall merely mention two points which we conceive the writer to have lost sight of. One is, the physical morbidity which is very often the impatient excitement to suicide, and which medical advice, or even a good stout fit of exercise, might correct or render patient; and the other, that although suicide is never committed "in sport," it is not unfrequently committed in sullenness, and that too for ordinary reasons. Young persons have been known to kill themselves, in order to bring anguish and remorse on a survivor, probably for a momentary quarrel. Yet here too, let us never forget, that young persons also have been driven to suicide by foolish and tyrannical treatment.

It is said in a German paper, that Mr. Baring has cleared by his different French loans upwards of 1,800,000*l.* sterling.

The French say, that the diamonds in which Lady CASTLERAGH has appeared at Aix-la-Chapelle are worth four French millions—167,000*l.*

The son of a most respectable Citizen of London on Friday put an end to his existence, by cutting his throat. The cause his friends have not the most remote idea of.

A clergyman in the county of Essex has lately resigned two valuable livings into the hands of the diocesan, the Bishop of London; alleging, that he could not conscientiously hold them any longer, dissenting from many articles contained in the Liturgy of the Church of England. The Bishop, knowing how much the circumstances of the clergyman would be reduced by the loss of his livings, in the handsomest and most friendly manner, before he would accept the resignations, endeavoured to remove his scruples, and to prevail upon him to retain his livings, but without effect.—Sun.

On Sunday week, a young couple attended at the Parish Church of Leeds, for the purpose of being married. The ceremony had already commenced, when the intended bridegroom after apparently deliberating for a moment or two, exclaimed, "I will not ha' thee after all;" and immediately left the church. The situation of the fair one, thus deserted, may readily be conceived.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

STATE OF THE QUEEN.

The following Bulletin was issued yesterday:—

"New Palace, Oct. 17.

"The QUEEN continued in a state of ease throughout yesterday, but her MAJESTY has passed a less comfortable night. The symptoms of her MAJESTY's disorder remain the same as for some time past."

The residence of the Princess of WALES in Italy is on the sea-shore, near Pesaro, and between 30 and 40 miles from Ancona. Her Royal Highness having no English and very few foreign visitors, has patronised the building of a new theatre at Pesaro, at which she passes her evenings as often as it can be kept open; but the population of the place is so small, that the audiences do not support the performers, few as they are, and the company could not exist without the Princess's subscription. The theatre is supposed to have been built chiefly at her expense: she has a stage box there, to which she is attended, with some form, by her suite, including young AUSTIN, who is treated by the inhabitants of Pesaro with a degree of ceremony astonishing to an Englishman. The Princess has not yet found a purchaser for her seat at Como. Baron BERGAMO, who is steward of the Household, drives a curricule and pair in the English style, attended by a groom.—Daily paper.

An increase of revenue, without any addition to taxation, is certainly a prospective benefit; because, in that case, the old revenue may be raised while taxes are remitted. We think, now that the facts are come forth, Government will rather regret that its agents have so blazoned during the year the supposed increase, that the real one will hardly be thought commensurate with the expectation raised. Four millions and a half added to the income is an item on the right side of the account; but when one thinks of the existing expenditure, and the positive inferiority of the revenue to that expenditure,—under these points of view, it is but a small item.—Times.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 310.

DRURY-LANE.

MR. YARNOLD from the Bath theatre made his first appearance here on Wednesday in the musical afterpiece of My Spouse and I. The reader will have a sufficient acquaintance with this piece, if he bethinks himself of his old friends a bad guardian, a good farmer and his wife, a rustic lover and his mistress, a young lady escaping in disguise, a sailor, and a rightful heir. The sentiments however are good and cordial, and sometimes not ungracefully or unhumourously expressed; and with the help of some good acting from OXBERRY, HARLEY, Mrs. HARLOWE, and some of her usual kind-voiced singing from Mrs. BLAND, who still "pipes away as if she should never grow old," is altogether not unentertaining. Mr. SMITH's performance of a sailor is almost too good, in one respect, to be good enough:—it is so exactly a sailor, neither more nor less, that like wax-work, it looks at once too real and easy to be a work of genius. It has not sufficient relish of itself, nor variety and artifice of colouring, nor, in short, that kind of skill which contrives to unite imagination with nature. Mr. SMITH looks like a real sailor just pitched out of a seventy-four. He treads as if he were on an undulating deck, and hangs his curled hands as though the habitual ropes had just left them:—he has a good base voice, which he does not manage in a higher style than might be expected of a favourite roarer of Lovely Nan:—his face is dark and thick, and looks as if it would bear a thump from the thickest rope in the Vengeance:—he has a strong relish of a pigtail and trowsers, and presents altogether that appearance of laxity lying ready for tightness, which is so peculiar to the treaders of decks. All this would be excellent, if it were a little more imaginative and humorous; but as it is, it does not go beyond correctness, and is nothing more than a common sailor would be, if he could take the stage for a deck. It is very good however as far as it does go; and Mr. SMITH is naturally a great favourite with the galleries. One almost expects a press-gang to lie in wait for him as he goes off.

The new performer is of a middling class, but may become useful, and perhaps agreeable. His best symptom is, that he seems to enjoy the passages that afford occasion for a little stage-play;—his worst symptom,—that when he sings he forgets his character, especially during a song in parts, when he puts on something of that didactic and solemn appearance which singers in rooms are so apt to give into. He appears young. His person is slender, his features petty but not disagreeable; and above all, his voice seems good, and capable of taste if not of much power.

COVENT-GARDEN.

The Barber of Seville, a piece taken from one of the sprightly productions of BEAUMARCHAIS, has been revived here for the purpose of uniting with it some of the music of PAESTELLO and ROSSINI, and introducing Mrs. DICKONS again to the stage after her absence on the continent. The music is well adapted by Mr. BISHOP, and affords some of the best specimens of those two composers, one of whom is full of sentiment, and the other of animal spirits. Mrs. DICKONS also, who was a good singer before, is much improved in her tones and powers, though the upper part of her voice is still somewhat harsh and reedy. She also acts remarkably well for a singer, and is undoubtedly a great acquisition to the stage. But altogether the piece does not seem to make any great impression, at least it did not on the night we heard it; though the evident effect of the German and Italian compositions, with which the Opera has lately improved our national taste for music, will doubtless be somewhat further assisted by it; and its bringing out is creditable to the Managers. The truth is, that with the exception of Mrs. DICKONS, the singers do not very well feel what they are about; and there is one extremely awkward and ridiculous circumstance in the adaptation of the performance, which is this,—that in default of the lover's (Mr. JONES) being able to sing, his valet (Mr. PYNE) is obliged to sing for him. That exquisite air, for instance, to which For tenderness formed was set, and which is so full of a graceful and affectionate earnestness, is sung by the valet; and in addition to this inconsistency, Mr. PYNE himself, though not a bad, is not a refined singer. Mr. LISTON too, who has no voice at all, is obliged to take his part in the singing; and even Mrs. DICKONS, with all her sweetness and facility, has not got rid of the old error of overloading an air with ornaments. The verse of the air just mentioned, which she sung in answer to Mr. PYNE's, was tricked and flounced over, till the whole melody disappeared; and we really prefer, at any time, the heart and sentiment of PAESTELLO to the vocal millinery of the greatest singers in Europe.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 12.—MR. SERGEANT COPLEY.

"The worth of all men by their end esteem,
And then due praise a due reproof them yield."

Spenser's F. Q. B. II. C. 2.

MANY persons express astonishment, that of all the practising Lawyers that ever obtained seats in the House of Commons, so very few have succeeded as parliamentary orators. It is here to be understood, that by a parliamentary orator is not meant a mere debater, who catches at points and quibbles about words—who instead of meeting any great question of public policy upon enlarged and fair grounds, confines himself to haggling at particular expressions, and dwelling upon insignificant and unfluencing trifles*. For such a task no man is often fitter than a Barrister who has attained a plausible volubility; but a parliamentary orator is a being of quite a different order—whose talents and attainments are of a totally different class, and are applied to a totally different purpose. The truth however is, that the English Bar can never be the school of genuine eloquence: a young man, when he puts on his paraphernalia, however wide may be the sphere of his knowledge and however enlarged his views, must be content to narrow his mind and his matter to a small circle: when he obtains business (if that ever should happen) it will be impossible for him to employ and give effect to general principles. Such an opportunity scarcely occurs in a century, or if it do occur, he will probably not be allowed to avail himself of it: the facts of the particular case, and the little technical points arising out of them, are all he can look at: he cannot travel beyond his tether, or out of the four corners of his record, and must go over the same ground again and again, without the hope of finding any thing new. At length it becomes habitual; the action of his faculties is limited to so small a compass, that they are at last incapable of wide and general operation; as a man who all his life has been engaged in casting the shuttle, is ultimately rendered incapable of hurling the bar: the strength originally given him is paralyzed, or rather his elastic muscles are stiffened and contracted. To a certain extent, this is no less true of those Lawyers who do not practise themselves, but are frequent, not to say constant, attendants upon our Courts: they listen to others, and acquire the same modes of thinking, from an unconscious though active principle of imitation. The wonder therefore is not, that Barristers do not succeed, but that they ever have succeeded.

Besides the impediment just mentioned, there is another equally operative, if not equally important: Counsel, when conducting a cause at Nisi Prius (for before a Jury a man's real merits are best estimated) think it necessary to keep their eyes open to all sides; not to attend solely to what they find in their own brief and to what their own witnesses will prove, but as far as possible to anticipate what is to be offered and established by their antagonists: the less it is necessary to do so the better, because it is always considered a proof of weakness, if not in the Counsel, in the case; and an excessive caution in this respect, (as I had reason to observe last week when noticing Mr. GURNEY) often occasions defeat; for I am persuaded that not a few verdicts have been lost by causeless apprehensions that they might be endangered. But if it be necessary in our Courts, it is surely very seldom required in our

* Exactly such a man, for instance, was the late Mr. PERCEVAL, who sometimes thus gained a petty and temporary triumph over his antagonists on the Opposition side of the House—even over WHITEHEAD,—

"Whose mighty heart disdained to stoop so low," as such a push-pin kind of controversy.

Legislature: the purpose in the one case is to convince a Jury often by taking advantage of their weaknesses and their prejudices, or in plainer terms, by imposing as much as possible upon their understandings; but is or can this be the purpose of a Senator, who is addressing himself not to any particular set of men, but to the whole country; who is not confining his views to petty facts and points concerning the interests of two contending tradesmen, but applying his intellect and his learning to the discussion of a great national question, and to the application of principles affecting perhaps not merely one state or community, but the whole civilized world? This is the proper field for genuine eloquence—this its proper school: here may be displayed and employed all the power and majesty of language—all the comprehensiveness and vigour of thought—all the fruits independent of the bare facts of learning; all that wisdom which is the joint produce of reflection, reading, and experience. Here it is, that the anticipation of objections for the mere purpose of replying to them is not only useless, but injurious, excepting in some few especial cases: here it is, that all the arguments to enforce and illustrate ought to be concentrated: the opponents ought to be left to discover their own objections and to support their own arguments: the tide should only set one way: in great rivers, shoals and quicksands are produced by the eflux and reflux of the waters,—by their return and stoppage,—and in great speeches the weaknesses and errors are occasioned by the checks and lets given by the orator himself to the unresisted progress of his eloquence.

One great fault therefore of Lawyers, when they obtain seats in Parliament and start as politicians, is, that instead of pressing forward what makes for their own side of the question—by urging point after point, and driving wedge after wedge with increased force (like the seven progressively sturdy anvil-men in the 4th Book of the Fairy Queen:) instead of adding new strength and acquiring a fresh impetus at every step, they pause, and turn out of their direct course, to answer something which they fancy might be urged against them. This error not unfrequently arises from a sort of apprehension, that if those topics were not adverted to, it would be said that they wanted sagacity or shrewdness to discover the arguments on the other side; from an affectation of quickness of perception and a pretence to foresight, when no man but a fool could suppose, after an orator has made an able address in favour of one position, that he was totally ignorant of the points from which it could be assailed. Of course this rule is general and liable to exceptions, particularly with practised speakers in Parliament: to refute by anticipation is sometimes important, but to a young man, and especially to a young Lawyer, who wishes to attain the character of an orator in the House of Commons, nothing can be more detrimental. It is generally quite enough, for any individual, however powerful his intellect and however extensive his resources, to manage one side of a question; to apply his whole force and energy to that only: his speech will then be much more effective and convincing; as the massive swords formerly employed by our ancestors, requiring the strength of both arms to wield them, were much more destructive than the paltry bodkins with which some of their adversaries furnished either hand, and attempted, first on one side and then on the other, to prick some paltry hole in a part where the armour was least vulnerable.

Mr. Sergeant Copley came into Parliament late in the last Session, after the principal questions regarding the Habeas Corpus Act and other important matters had, I believe, been decided; but I well recollect one speech made by him upon the Alien Bill, and, if I am not misinformed, he previously offered a few observations upon a matter almost exclusively legal. Of the first the newspapers gave but a very imperfect account, and of the last they said nothing at all; but I was fortunately present when the debate upon the Alien Bill took place, so that, making due allowances for a maiden speech, I could form some estimate of the sort of style of address Mr. Sergeant Copley would adopt, or more properly speaking, pursue; for he carried into the House of Commons precisely the manner almost peculiar to our Courts of Justice.

It is well known that he was educated, commenced his career, and ran a considerable part of his course, as a Whig, and that like many of those who differ from their antagonists chiefly in being out instead of in, he has thought fit of late, in consideration, as is said, of certain invitations and promises, to change his party if not his politics. I refer to this circumstance not as anything extraordinary, nor to draw down upon him the further enmity of those with whom he formerly professed to think and certainly acted; but merely for the purpose of remarking, that the plan he has pursued in this respect is such as might be expected from his well-known prudence and sagacity. Every ambitionist, whose sole object is private and political advancement, without regard to the means, must know that the surest mode is to begin in opposition to those whom he intends to join as soon as a fair opportunity is afforded: if a pamphleteer wishes for a bribe, he must be next to an idiot if he write in support of the Ministry from whom he hopes to receive it: he ought to attack them with all his weapons, and he will soon attract their attention: as a friend, he would be insignificant and unnoticed, like the gnat in the spurious poem attributed to VIRGIL; but even a gnat, as an enemy, is formidable, and means must be taken to get rid of him. So with young Lawyers; if they start on the ministerial side in politics, they are passed over and neglected; though they seize every occasion to extol and eulogize, their pains will be thrown away; but let them begin life as opponents to the men in power, and in case of a change of Ministry they stand fair for rewards, and in case of no change they are marked men to be tempted with the first offer that is likely to be successful.

Whatever contempt I may feel for the conduct of Mr. Sergeant Copley as a politician, it is impossible for me to feel anything like contempt for his talents as an Advocate: they certainly are of the first rank, and well entitle him even to a larger share of business than he at present enjoys. I well recollect, before he was made a Sergeant, feeling a conviction that he could command success, and would ere many years had elapsed be at the head of his profession: my principal doubt was which would take the lead, the present SOLICITOR-GENERAL or Mr. Copley, although they are men whose minds are of a different structure, and therefore in some respects not to be compared together: the attainments of the former are, I apprehend, much more deep-laid and solid; and Sir R. Gifford has besides a more logical and argumentative head; but in legal learning, Mr. Sergeant Copley is not thought by any means deficient, and his opinion is always listened to with deference by the Bench: but he is a man of labour, and his knowledge does not appear to be very applicable on a sudden: he requires more time for research and arrangement when he is entrusted with an argument; and although it may be very learned, and the points generally well disposed, it has not that perfect symmetry and proportion of all the parts, like an architectural structure, for which the exertions of Sir R. Gifford in this kind are very remarkable: the SOLICITOR-GENERAL has besides a most admirable method of putting a point, which of itself is sometimes equal to an argument, and renders the task of enforcing and illustrating almost unnecessary. Yet if Mr. Sergeant Copley's acquaintance with the more complicated and difficult branches of the law be not so profound and systematic, his knowledge upon other matters extremely useful to an Advocate, is much more extensive and varied. I hardly know a man at the Bar who avails himself so often of the advantage afforded by a regular education, and by reading, not confined to the mere dry pursuit in which he is engaged: he is much more than a Lawyer, which I believe Sir R. GIFFORD is not: he is apparently well read, not only in the historians but in the poets of his country, at least in such as come within the reach of individuals who have not made the belles lettres their main study. On this account, at Nisi Prius he shines with peculiar brightness in contrast with the prosings of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, or the arrogant ignorance of Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN.—OWEN FELTHAM, in his Resolves, well says that "arrogance is a weed that ever grows upon a dunghill;" and Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN is one more proof of the truth of the assertion. With sufficient confidence in his own strength and powers, (which is far removed from presumptuousness, and without which no man will be successful at the Bar, and scarcely in any other situation) Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY is not without diffidence towards such as he ought to acknowledge his superiors: it would be next to impossible for any man but Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN to treat his Brother LENS with disrespect; and Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY, when I have had an opportunity of seeing them engaged on opposite sides, always shews a remarkable degree of deference and regard for Mr. Sergeant LENS and his opinions: there can scarcely be a stronger contrast than between a cause managed by Sergeants BEST and VAUGHAN and by Sergeants LENS and COPLELEY. I do not say that I have not heard Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY, when employed against other antagonists, violent and perhaps coarse in his expressions, but not until he was compelled to combat them with their own weapons, and to meet their occasional vulgarity by a retort which, besides its coarseness, frequently had severe sarcasm or keen wit to recommend and redeem it.

Notwithstanding I think highly both of the talents and attainments of the subject of the present article, as a speaker he is by no means all that could be wished: perhaps the best and the best known specimen was given by him as one of the Counsel for Watson on his trial for high treason; and it was in the mouths of all who heard it, that it was delivered with almost unintelligible velocity: his volubility is excessive, and indeed this is the greatest fault of his addresses: on that occasion it was said in excuse, that as his leader Mr. WETHERELL had occupied so much time, he felt it his duty to compress as far as possible, and to include a great deal of matter in small compass. To a certain extent the remark might be just, and it may be true also, as I believe it is, that he always has some persuasion of the kind upon his mind: he never appeals to a Jury without talking infinitely too fast, by which he not only loses his impressiveness, but his hearers have scarcely time to reflect for a moment upon one position, before they are hurried on to another. Be it remembered, too, that he seldom offers any thing that is frivolous or unnecessary—nothing that does not mainly conduce to the point at which he is aiming. Of course this excessive rapidity prevents the due emphasis and force that ought to be given to particular words, and on this account some would fairly enough complain of a degree of monotony in his delivery. With all this injurious rapidity, however, which it would be supposed must unavoidably interfere with precision, Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY's periods are formed not only with correctness, but with great nicety and exactness: his sentences are frequently long—too long for perspicuousness—but they are not involved in parentheses, and are always complete: each is well constructed, with a due relation and proportion in the clauses—and they are not by any means deficient in variety, which is the common error of those who are not interrogatory and colloquial speakers. On the whole, what he says is better to be read than to be heard; and if the stenographic art could exactly follow him, very little alteration and correction would be required before his speeches were given to the printer.

It must be allowed, that Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY's manner is not the most happy: as there is a little monotony in his voice, there is a great deal of it (if I may so say) in his look; for the expression of his countenance is nearly always the same: his brow is somewhat scowling, and he has that kind of forehead which a physiognomist would say indicated great foresight and penetration; so that his eye is overshadowed: more especially as the light is usually managed in our Courts in the Metropolis, where it falls directly upon the top of the head, and gives a heavy shade to the whole countenance. His action is also wanting in variety: he makes but little use of either arm, and almost none at all of the left: the right, when employed, is commonly only swayed up and down in a sort of time-beating mode, and the principal use of it seems to be to mark when the speaker arrives at particular divisions or points of his sentence. He generally keeps his figure in quite an erect posture, which is a degree or two better than the habit some Barristers have acquired of swaying backwards and forwards like a blind singer in the street.

There is no part of the duty of an Advocate in which Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY is more dexterous than in the discussion of a point of evidence while a witness is in the box: he possesses considerable acuteness and great ingenuity, and he appears more at home upon the law of this subject than some others: they are matters rather of nicety than of research. As an instance, I would mention his struggle against the disclosure of certain official communications in a cause of Thorpe v. the Governor of Upper Canada *. He is also a very shrewd and close examiner of a witness, but he has not the knack of throwing him off his guard by that appearance of unconcern which Lord ERSKINE used so successfully to assume; for Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY always seems too intent upon what is about to fall from the witness to put on any kind of disguise of that sort. AMICUS CURIE.

* On this occasion, Lord CASTLEREAGH was present on the Bench, and seemed much gratified by the display of talent on the part of Mr. Sergeant COPLELEY: not long afterwards the latter came into Parliament.

ON SUICIDE.

[The following article was originally intended for insertion in the Morning Chronicle, and addressed to the Editor of that paper; but he politely declined it.—Exam.]

Sept. 18, 1818.

SIR,—There are few things that give me more pain, in the perusal of your very liberal publication, than the remarks I every now and then meet with on the subject of suicide. In your paper of the 4th ult., for example, I meet with a paragraph, the concluding sentence of which runs thus:—"If the law against this act, so wisely provided by our ancestors, were strictly and constantly carried into practice, would not the number of self-destroyers be exceedingly lessened?"

Now, whether I consider myself as a legislator, a moralist, or a lover of mankind, I am equally deterred from sympathising with the feelings of the writer of this paragraph.

Criminal law, I apprehend, so far as it is the creature of an enlightened and unprejudiced mind, has nothing to do with our conduct but negatively—to censure in us those actions by which we interfere with the rights, the possessions, or the lives of others:—If I take away the life of my neighbour. I shall be amenable to the law; but what has the law to do with my discretion as to myself? I shall be punished if I maim my neighbour, and it would be quite as reasonable, and much more practicable, to punish me for maiming as for killing myself. In a state well constituted, and ruled by the principles of true freedom, I may remove myself from one place to another, or migrate to the other side of the globe without controul, and it is just as unfair that the laws should attempt to restrain me, if my mind prompts me to quit this scene of things altogether.

I think it is Soame Jenyns who has remarked, that there is not a syllable, either in the Old Testament or the New, that says, thou shalt not kill thyself. The silly tale of "human life being like the condition of a sentinel on duty, who commits an offence if he quits his post before he is relieved," is the invention of those who would be wise above what is written. Soberly and impartially speaking, the power over my life with which nature has endowed me, is a talent committed to my discretion. Christ says, "If thy right eye offend thee (or cause thee to offend), pluck it out; and if thy right hand, cut it off;" and the Being that made us has with equal clearness endowed us with the empire over our own life or death. The two tables of the law of Moses are commonly said to contain our duties to God and to our neighbour; and Christ has sanctioned this distribution.

I am far from intending to infer from all this, that we are in morality entitled to exercise this empire in a capricious and unreflecting manner. It is a momentous power that is intrusted to us, and we are not to exercise it without deep reflection. But I do say, that nature has gifted man with the awful discretion, at each epoch of his life, whether he shall live or die; and I affirm that law has nothing to do with his use of his natural powers, so long as he does not invade the privileges or security of his neighbours.

To make the reasoning complete, let us suppose that the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," is to be construed largely, and not strictly and in its most obvious application, and that "the Everlasting had fixed his canon against self-slaughter." This will after all amount to little. There is no sect of Christians except the Quakers that infer from the sixth commandment that we may in no case put our fellow-man to death, in self-defence, by criminal process, or in war. And there is as little plausibility in affirming the rule universally in suicide, as in my duty to my neighbour. In the one case, as in the other, the course of nature has committed to me a momentous power, in the exercise of which I "should be as holy as severe."

The writer of the paragraph that has called forth these animadversions, has in one part done excellently well. He tells a story of a poor mechanic, starving for want of work, who meditated suicide, and a benevolent Coroner who gave him employment, and by that and other means reconciled him to life. As much of that, Mr. Editor, as you please! I pity the poor wretch, in ordinary cases, who is driven to self-destruction; I deplore the state of society, which in so many instances seems to leave to its subjects no other choice, than to starve, or to perish by their own act. Oh, yes! assist by all means such as are driven to this dreadful extremity; soothe their minds; assuage the bitterness of their feelings; by all gentle and tender means bring them back to the preference of life. This is the office of the genuine philanthropist!

Let us reflect on the state of the man that is driven to suicide. Life has no longer any charms for him. He looks on every side, and every thing appears to him clothed in black. His feelings are worked up into the bitterest state of agony. One of the deepest and most powerful partialities with which nature has endowed us, is the love of existence. Neither sickness, nor old age, nor in many cases poverty, nor infamy itself, is able to extinguish it within us. The voice of the human heart in ordinary cases, under these circumstances, still is, Let me live! Banish me to the remotest part of the world, condemn me to unceasing hard labour, condemn me to perpetual imprisonment; but suffer me to exist! I have heard of people running needles and sharp-pointed instruments into their flesh; I have heard of their inflicting deep gashes upon their limbs, and all for wantonness; but I never heard of any one who killed himself for sport. No; the suicide is in the most emphatical sense serious; and has suffered attacks of mental distress to which no tongue can do justice, before he proceeds to this extremity. When I approach a person who from a succession of miscarriages and sorrows, is weaned from life, and meditates suicide, I feel indeed awe-struck and afflicted; in what Sterne calls, "the venerable presence of misery." Willingly would I soothe his afflictions, and bind up the wounds of his heart; but for worlds I would not insult over and menace him, and least of all, with the wretched threat of being buried in a cross-way, and having a stake driven through his body. If I did, and he had any thing of the spirit of a man in him, he would smile with derision at the impotence of my denunciation and the hardness of my heart.

We say, What right has a man to kill himself? I beg leave to retort this question with another,—What right have you to compel a man to live, when all the impulses of his soul call upon him to die?

If Paul, previously to the cruel and inhuman death to which Charles the Twelfth subjected him, had put an end to his own existence, what impartial man but would have commended the deed? I hold that there is no law of morality or religion, which obliges a man to die with tortures by the hand of the executioner. I doubt greatly of the enormity of the offence, or whether it is an offence at all, when a man withdraws himself by suicide from the death, in any form, to which the laws condemn him. The moment the law takes up arms against me, I am in a state of war, and with infinite odds on the other side. If the community puts me in prison, it is their business to keep me; it is mine to get away if I can. These are the conclusions of common sense.

It is a very ordinary thing for the relatives of a human being, in contemplation of all the circumstances in which he is placed, to wish him dead. How is he to be blamed, if it happens that he concurs with them in that wish? And the man whose life is desirable neither for himself nor others, how shall he be condemned by a just tribunal, if he puts an end to it? As the venerable Algernon Sidney has said,—"I have ever had in my mind, that when God should cast me into such a condition, as that I cannot save my life but by doing an indecent thing, he shews me the time is come wherein I should resign it."

The thing to be particularly regretted is, that men often put an end to their existence for a temporary suffering, which if they had had patience with, they might again have become useful and happy members of society. This has repeatedly happened to persons whose suicide has been prevented, or who have been recovered from the effects of suspended animation. But I know of no remedy for this. Every man is the judge of his own sorrows, and what it is that he can endure. There is a senseless parade of wisdom in the common saying, "It will be all the same a hundred years hence;" which, if it could have the effects it proposes, would only serve to turn us all into a gallery of marbles. But life in reality consists in a perpetual stream of present moments and sensations, and each man must judge how much present misery and agony he can sustain. It is the purpose of ethical wisdom to teach us to live in the future; but it is only a small portion of this wisdom that the best of us can hope to reduce to practice.

I should be sorry, however, that these few paragraphs should have the effect of reconciling any man to what is in many cases so doubtful an act. I write for those who live, and not for those who die. Every man who lives in society must regulate himself to a certain degree by the opinions and prejudices of that society. There are countries, we are told, where the law enjoins a man to marry his sister. In this country, the man who should live in a state of sexual connection with his sister, cuts off both her and himself from the roll of the living, and renders both from that time forward useless, and worse than useless. In the same manner, the common opinion of our countrymen fastens a slur on the suicide, and every one hangs the head and hides the face, whose father or near relative has committed this act. It becomes therefore every one who is tempted to it, to consider the disgrace he will bring on those he loves, and to examine himself how far he can triumph over his sufferings, and how far he can, and how far he ought, to sacrifice himself and his own impulses out of tenderness to survivors. It is a generous reflection; and whoever has the courage to obey it, will infallibly look back upon his having done so with the sweetest sense of self-approbation.

ATTICUS.

POLICE.

QUEEN-SQUARE.

On Saturday week, a German, named Thomas Losch, about 44 years of age, who belonged to the 60th regiment, but now an out-pensioner of Chelsea College, was charged with the murder of Mary Ann, his wife. She is represented to be about 27 years of age, was tall, and seemed to be a woman of prepossessing appearance.—Richard Clark, stated, “I live at No. 1, Jew’s-row, Chelsea, and am a tailor. Last night, between six and eight, I was standing at the gate of Lawrence-court, and the wife of the prisoner was talking with a Mrs. Ross, the prisoner was standing by his wife’s right side, about a yard from her. The prisoner was accusing his wife of being given to drunkenness, but talked with a mild voice. His wife replied, that if she were so given, it was owing to his driving her to vice all day for his benefit. I saw the prisoner put his right hand to the right side of his waistcoat for a minute, and kept fumbling about, and without speaking to his wife, he rushed between Mrs. Ross and her, and I saw the prisoner make a violent plunge against his wife on the stomach with his hand. The blow could be heard. Immediately his wife received the blow, she staggered back towards me, and exclaimed, “Oh! my God, I am murdered: will any body take the knife out of me?” She then fell down and repeated the same words. I saw the blood stream down from her. The prisoner stood with his hands down, and said he was not going to run away, and that any man might take him that liked. The prisoner was taken into custody, and I understand his wife died at five this morning.”—The prisoner having heard this evidence deliberately read over, the Magistrate asked him if he wished to say any thing respecting this melancholy occurrence? The prisoner replied, with perfect coolness and apparent indifference, “I would not wish to say any thing at present.”—The prisoner was then removed from the bar.—The Magistrate asked Maybank if the knife had been found? Maybank produced it, saying it had been found by a woman named Harrowby. It is an old dessert knife, with a white handle, the blade of which is about five inches long.—Richard Maybank, constable of the night, gave the following account of the transaction:—On Friday night the prisoner was brought to the watch-house, and without the slightest promise or suggestion, the prisoner admitted having committed the act. He said his reason was, that he saw something in his wife’s conduct that he did not like. Maybank then looked him up, and went in quest of his wife, and ordered her to be taken to St. George’s Hospital. The wound was six inches long from the abdomen upwards, and nearly the whole of her intestines were protruding through the wound. The cries of the unfortunate creature were too appalling to be described. She was taken to St. George’s Hospital in pain the most excruciating, but she did not long survive. During the time Maybank was at the hospital, a woman brought him the knife. He then returned to the watch-house, and before he produced the knife to the prisoner, asked him what kind of a knife it was he had perpetrated the act with? The prisoner replied, that it was a long knife with a white handle. Maybank then showed it to him, and the prisoner said, “I am sure that is the knife, and now I am happy!” While he was being conveyed to the office, the culprit stated that he overheard a conversation which took place between his wife and a man. In the course of which, she said she would go home with him (the prisoner) and wait with him until he was asleep; and then she would get up and return and continue with him (the person with whom she held the conversation) all night; and that he, the prisoner, having a knowledge of her infidelity, was determined to thwart them in their criminal views, and hence he had resolved upon the commission of this deed. It was also mentioned, that he had contemplated the performance of the horrible act for nearly a fortnight. He is about five feet seven or eight inches high, and very far from being well looking.—After the examination, he was escorted to Tothill-fields’ prison. The prisoner did not manifest the slightest agitation during his examination, but appeared perfectly composed, and stated, that although he knew his situation to be very awful, he was perfectly satisfied with what had happened.—[An Inquest was on Monday held on the body of the murdered woman. The evidence brought forward corroborated the above details, and a verdict of Wilful Murder was recorded against Losch, who was afterwards committed to Newgate to await trial.]

GUILDHALL.

On Monday, Wm. Brown, a lad about 18 years of age, was brought before Mr. Alderman WATTMAN, charged with uttering a 1*l.* forged note, with intent to defraud the Bank.—Thomas Lloyd said, he resided in Aldersgate-street, and sold groceries. On Saturday evening, the prisoner came to his shop and selected a few articles, in payment for which he tendered a 1*l.* note. Witness, suspecting it to be bad, asked him how he came by it? He replied it was a very good note, but his other answers were equivocating. Witness advised him “not to trifle with his neck,” at all events, but tell the plain truth. The prisoner then said, that his name was Smith, that he was a watchmaker, and resided in Barbican. This story was not believed, and a person known to the witness, then in the shop, agreed to go with the prisoner and ascertain the truth of his story. It proved to be false; the prisoner was immediately conveyed to the watch-house, and the note deposited with the constable. The witness afterwards gave his charge.—The officer produced the note, and Mr. Christmas the Bank Inspector, immediately pronounced it forged.—Alderman WATTMAN desired the witness to look at the note again strictly. It seemed to him well executed, and he had been made acquainted with numerous mistakes respecting Bank notes. He had himself known clerks of the Bank to take in payment forged notes as good, which subsequently proved bad.—Mr. Christmas said, that he was ready to admit this—“Clerks might make a mistake, but it was impossible for an inspector to do so.” He could tell almost at a glance whether a note was good or bad!—A gentleman in the office denied this, and said he had known an instance recently where three out of five in the inspector’s office declared a note to be good, while the other two pronounced it bad!—The individual who conveyed the prisoner to Barbican, thence to the watch-house, and who could alone speak to the identity of the note about to be passed by the prisoner, being absent, the latter was remanded.

One of the porters of the Belle Sauvage Coach-office, Ludgate-hill, was fined 20*s.* and costs upon his own confession, for the overcharge of a parcel, directed to a gentleman of the same neighbourhood, from Farolam. The charge in the way bill was 1*s.*; the defendant fabricated a new ticket, and charged 1*s.* 8*d.* besides 3*d.* for portage.—Mr. Alderman WATTMAN said, this was one of the greatest evils he knew, and he almost hesitated whether, in such cases of vice fraud, he should not order the Proprietors of Coaches and Inns to be brought to the office for punishment, instead of the porters. In the present case, however, the Proprietor had, it appeared, made out a legal ticket, and the defendant had feloniously altered it.—Mr. HARVEY, the defendant, admitted that the alteration was a transmissible offence, but prayed the mercy of the Court towards his client. This (with the exception of enforcing the fine) was bestowed, and the defendant was dismissed with a strong admonition.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Tuesday an Inquest was held at the Fleet prison, on the body of James Learwood, whose death was occasioned by his being struck with a tailor’s sleeve board.—Charles Johnstone, a prisoner, said, on Saturday, about five, he was standing six feet from the window, opposite to it, saw the deceased fall from the shop-board, (deceased was a tailor.) Witness saw him working a few minutes before. Stepping up to the window, saw a man, named Daley, beating deceased with a sleeve-board. Witness called out for assistance, and said to Daley, "In the name of God, don't you kill the man;" upon this Daley seized the deceased, turned him upon his belly, and seizing his thigh, said; "D—n your eyes, you rascal," and struck him three or four times with his sleeve-board, he then threw down the sleeve-board, and sprung through the window, and swore he had not given him half a threshing. Witness believes Daley was sober at the time; would have entered the room, but thought it dangerous so to do.—William Graves, another prisoner, saw Daley standing outside the window, near the room of the deceased, and heard him say he had struck the deceased three times on the breech with the sleeve-board, and swearing, said he would not forget it in a hurry; had he not been an old man he should have beat him worse, but being an old man he did not like to strike him. Witness heard Daley say, that deceased had behaved very ill, by not giving a letter he had found, to him, instead of giving it to Lewis, who keeps the chandler's shop. After this, Daley, in a passion, jumped into the room of the deceased, and abused him respecting the letter. Daley had charged deceased with having given two letters to Lewis, but witness knew to the contrary, as it regarded one. Deceased denied having found any letter belonging to Daley, nor had he given any to Lewis. As witness was leaving the room, Daley said, "he had not done with him yet."—Some medical gentlemen who examined the body of the deceased found coagulated blood between the pia mater and dura mater, and also blood in the ventricles of the brain. This, which appeared to be the effect of external injury, they considered to be the cause of his death.—After a few minutes' consultation, the Jury returned a verdict of Wilful Murder against John Daley.

An Inquisition was taken on Saturday week upon the body of Mr. Davenport, wholesale ironmonger and merchant, at his house, No. 29, Bread-street, Cheapside.—The deceased was about 30 years of age; his wife was at Brighton for the benefit of her health. On Thursday evening the deceased had a small party of friends to supper. One of the gentlemen was examined by the Coroner: he stated, that the deceased was well in health on Thursday night, and was remarkably lively and spirited; he ate a hearty supper; he retired to bed about one o'clock on Friday morning; in consequence of his not coming to his breakfast at the usual time, the servant went to his room door and called to him, but received no answer; she was alarmed, and informed a young man who was servant to the deceased; he went to his room, and found him dead in bed. A Surgeon was called in, who said the deceased had been dead some hours. It appeared, that during the night the deceased had endeavoured to emit something from his stomach, which lay very heavy, it is supposed, and produced his death.—Verdict—Died by the visitation of God.

An Inquisition was taken on Thursday at the Alfred's Head, London-road, Southwark, on the body of Mr. John Russell, wholesale linen draper, in Friday-street, Cheapside, who fell out of a window while asleep.—Verdict, "The death of the deceased was caused by his involuntary act, in getting out of his chamber window, and falling to the ground during the time he was asleep, or in a state of delirium."

A man of the name of Jacob Negus was on Wednesday brought to Hutton-garden Office, on a charge of vagrancy, being found begging in the streets, and sleeping in the open air; he was sentenced to seven days imprisonment in the House of Correction, in order to be passed to his parish. Previous to his being sent to prison he was secured in the back lock-up-house of the office, and there, with a piece of black tape, he contrived to suspend himself from one of the iron bars of his window: the prisoners in the next cell hearing a kind of guttural noise gave the alarm: Wm. Read cut him down in sufficient time to preserve his life; after being sufficiently recovered, he was removed to prison.

Tuesday night the house of Lady Chambers, at Putney, was broke open; the robbers entered by a parlour window on the ground floor, and finding a poker in the room, made use of it to break open a pair of folding doors, which were fastened, and prevented their passage to the interior of the mansion. They carried off a variety of articles, principally wearing apparel, and also a writing-desk, which was afterwards found broken in pieces at the lower part of the lawn. The thieves not having proceeded to any other than two apartments, it is conjectured that they made a precipitate retreat, in consequence of the barking of the gardener's dog.—The same night the house of the Rev. Mr. Canvatt, at Putney, was entered and plundered of a number of books.

During the temporary absence of the family on Sunday afternoon, the house of Mr. Middleton, William-street, Newington, was entered by means of skeleton keys by some robbers, who carried off a considerable variety of linen, also a watch, &c.

Saturday week, as Mr. Bowles, of Spalding, and his nephew, were shooting near Crowland, the dog sprang a covey of partridges, which flew into an adjoining field. The nephew, in his eagerness to follow them, jumped over a hedge. The uncle, Mr. B., following very quick, unfortunately his piece went off, and lodged the contents in the body of the youth, who is only 16 years of age. Surgical assistance was immediately obtained, but he died in a few hours.

A daring attack was made on Tuesday night, at the early hour of ten o'clock, by a gang of thieves, upon the Rev. Mr. Vickery, curate of St. Paul, Covent-garden, as he was passing that end of St. Martin's-court next to Leicester-square. After giving him a violent push, one of the villains snatched his gold watch, with gold chain, and two valuable gold seals, out of his pocket, and ran off with it; but, upon the cry of "Stop thief!" being made, he was pursued into Bear-street, and, with another of the gang, secured and taken to the watch-house. The fellow threw away the watch as soon as he was taken, and it was picked up by a person passing at the time.

On Thursday se'night the Hon. J. S. Cocks, M.P. for Hereford, while shooting near Eastnor-castle, met with an accident; after having discharged his gun, in the act of re-loading it, the powder from his flask was ignited by part of the wadding that remained in the barrel, and the whole exploded. Fortunately he escaped with a trifling injury to his right hand.

Mr. Barnes, who kept an academy in Hoxton-square, having removed from his house to another in the neighbourhood, sent his servant on Monday night, to secure the shutters of the uninhabited house, on the inside; as soon as she entered, two men seized her: and after treating her exceedingly ill, forced her up to the garret door, and tied a cord round her neck, which they fastened to the key-hole, and left her hanging. A baker living next door heard a great noise: and he and Mr. Barnes went in and found the maid hanging. The baker held her whilst she was cut down; she was in a very exhausted state, and a few minutes more would have deprived her of life; but a medical gentleman having used proper means, soon succeeded in restoring her. She then gave the above account of the horrid transaction. Search was made after the ruffians, but without effect.

CASE OF ROBERT DEAN.

We postpone the conclusion of our last week's subject, in order to say a few words upon one which has just agitated the public mind. Nor is it unconnected with the other, as the reader will perceive.

It is astonishing to see the crimes and misfortunes which daily occur, for want of a knowledge of the elements of our nature. Individuals commit and suffer them, aggregate bodies commit and suffer them, and lastly, the law itself commits and suffers them; and why do they all do so? From nothing but a kind of superstitious half-enquiry, which makes them recognize the weakness of human nature only to lament instead of strengthen it; which makes them punish angrily what they have legislated for badly; and which, partly from vanity and partly from despondency, allows them to refer the effects of a remediable ignorance or disease to the visitations of a supernatural wisdom or temptation.

And yet a case sometimes occurs which bewilders the common-place notions on these subjects. A murder, for instance, arising from revenge or avarice, they understand; but a murder arising from no motives of the ordinary description, and yet not committed in consequence of ordinary insanity, only confuses and sets them wondering. And it well may, seeing the infinite beggings of the question with which education sets out, both civil and religious. We begin with having the use of our understandings superseded, and end with making wonders and mistakes that keep us floundering in a slough of worldliness and despondency. We dare not open our eyes; and the natural consequence is, that we fear all sorts of invisible things. We repeat by rote that we are naturally criminal instead of uninformed, and thus we make ourselves ready for the perpetration of crime. We are made to think the easiest of things the most difficult, and we find them so. We are frightened, and then told to do our duty. We are encumbered with a heap of artificial guilt, and we bear the remorse of real. Finally, we are taught to consider our misinformation, our fright, our artificial guilt, our ignorance of every thing, moral or physical, not as so much proof that we want something better, but as so much proof that we cannot have it; and yet in the mean while, we punish one another bitterly for not having it! In things of little importance, we soon see our way out: we will not suffer the least ordinary trouble if we can help it: we will have patent snuffers, instead of the old ones. But in things of the highest moment, which want the very greatest knowledge we can reach to,—then we must beware of it:—it is a snare, a presumption, a useless effort;—and this despondency, which if ever there was devil's work upon earth, would seem to shew it most visibly, we regard as coming especially from Heaven:—Knowledge proves itself every day to be our only real good; Superstition, at every inch of the moving of her mask, shews herself stupid and hideous; and yet Superstition and Ignorance shall tempt, punish, and tempt again twenty times over, while Knowledge is obliged sometimes to beg and sometimes to dare its way through the very crowd which it comes to rescue.

To the particular case before us. Here is a young man, who commits a murder on the body of a child whom he was fond of, and whose fate he laments with perpetual child-like tears. It is evident that this is no common murderer. It would seem that his nature is not bad or malignant. Yet he commits a murder; and it is asked, partly in wonder, and partly in scorn of any extenuation, why should he do that? This man, it is added, is so depraved, that having resolved to kill a young woman who would not receive his addresses, and not liking from some cause or other to kill her, he kills a little innocent child rather than not satisfy his diabolical propensities. It is said indeed that he had been a drunkard; but then "in wine there is truth"—drunkenness brings out the real nature of a man; and in short, he himself thought so ill of his own horrid propensities that he expressly attributed them to the devil. "Thoughts of a dreadful description," says he, "entered my mind, and must have proceeded from the devil." And after he had committed the miserable deed, he says, "In an instant I imagined that I was in the midst of flaming fire, and the court appeared to me like the entrance of hell." Here is enough to set all those unhappy, or if happy, those callous people the Methodists preaching and triumphing for a month to come. "Here," will they say, "is a confession,—an acknowledgment,—an undeniable conscious fact:—the poor lost drunken sinner, whom we will go and comfort nevertheless (and this, by the way, is the least they can do), says, himself, that he was instigated by the devil; the law says so too; and we see, that the commission of his crime was followed up by a vision of hell-fire, in the midst of which he seemed to be standing."

Yes, the law does say so; and we will add for our own parts, the more shame for the law so to say. We will speak out at once. The man is a victim to ignorance,—to ignorance, in two shapes. To ignorance in not knowing how to free himself from the effect of his drinking or other habits; and to ignorance, in believing himself under a supernatural and hardly resistible impulse instead of a natural and remediable one.

First, the drinking. It appears from the evidence on the inquest, that Dean was in the habit of drinking; for the unhappy mother of the poor little child on being told that he must have gone for a soldier, said "It is a good thing if he has, for he is a drunken fellow, and fit for nothing else." Whether this drinking had been of long continuance, whether it was of an ordinary idle description, whether it was to drown superstitious fears, or whether it arose from the pangs of disappointed love, we are not told. It is a common vice in this climate, and neither sufficiently controuled in it's ordinary causes, nor sufficiently excused in it's extraordinary. It is laughed at and unforgiven with almost equal injustice. But be this as it may, it is the physical effect of a habit of drinking to create a great want of excitement. The nerves are shattered, and want collecting. They are called up again by the usual means, and they are shattered the more. The want of excitement increases in a frightful proportion. Some of the most extraordinary and excellent men, who have been by early weakness of constitution or by still more venerable misfortune led into this habit, have been so tortured during their efforts to leave it off, that they have cried out and beaten their heads against the wall. They would willingly have rushed to the liquor, like a frantic horse to his trough, or rather like a stag into the water from his pursuers. But their wisdom has been still greater than their want, and they have prevailed. Poor Dean was ignorant as well as drunken, and he gave way. The excitement of drinking itself, owing to additional causes of morbidity, at last became not enough for him; he wanted something still more occupying to the mind, still more collective of his nerves as if for a blow, still more satisfactory to his thirst for sensation, nay, still more exciting even to his sense of sympathy; and having no resources of intellect or imagination,—nothing out of the pale of what the commonplace world and worldliness offered him, he committed a murder upon a child, whose fate drowns him in tears.

And what were these additional causes? We know not, for the most part; but this we know, that among them was superstition. That was his other ignorance. Yes, superstition itself was his other incitement. That was his moving and his instigation. The Devil goes about, says Superstition, by the permission of a good and all-merciful Being, to tempt people to their eternal destruction. "Moved and instigated by the devil," says the law. Dean took them at their word; he felt himself too weak and unhappy to be a match for so tremendous a being, who destroys even the majority of God's creatures; he committed a murder; and Superstition will now take upon itself to punish, what the Law will take upon itself to punish.

We do not mean to vilify the law, still less to say that the poor unhappy man ought not to be comforted. Let him be comforted by all means, by the less superstitious the better, but by the superstitious rather than none at such an extremity. It is the very least that Superstition can do for it's victims. With regard to the law, we respect many of it's provisions, especially in this country and America; but it partakes of many of the errors of common society, both past and present, particularly of those sanctioned by authority; and even where it may not put much faith in it's own sayings, the simple and ignorant may. An awful lesson to custom! For want of the better knowledge which education might here give him, Dean knew nothing of his own physical nature, and it's healthy and unhealthy tendencies; and he went to Superstition, when a physician might have cured him. For want of the support which this knowledge would have given him, he was left alone to his fears and horrors, which Superstition and the saying of the Law, as well as the want of excitement, turned into more dreadful and irresistible temptation. He was frightened at his misery; it held him bound and trembling; he felt that in proportion as he did a thing difficult to resolve upon, he should gratify his torturing nervous irresolution; he chose the deed that should most shock, grieve, and supply his mind with a counter-terror, to balance the one which continually fretted him with it's very oneness; he resolved upon perpetrating,—but Love, who is "as strong as Death," and whom we are not ashamed to recognize amidst these horrors, held back even his mad and impotent hand from that; and he perpetrated the next worst thing he could think of. He was weak, desperate, frightened, uninformed; he knew not how to cure himself or be cured; he became fascinated in his diseased wonder; morbidity shook him, ignorance bewildered him, fear threw him headlong; and he plunged into his imaginary entrance of hell like the bird into the serpent's mouth.

It would be difficult to know what to recommend in the treatment of a criminal like this. His case is decidedly mixed up with temporary delirium; but then so may every desperate action be said to be. We are most decided enemies of the punishment of death in every instance; it is found not to deter, and it ridiculously attempts to make up for one loss to society by another;—and yet again it might be cruelty to such a man to let him live, or at least would take a long time and a good deal of instruction of no ordinary kind to reconcile him to useful life and comfort; though such a treatment, we are persuaded, is the one that would be just towards every species of error in a proper state of society. The best way would be, if possible, to dispose of such persons in what might be called Useful Bedlams, where they might at once be treated by the physician as wanting his help, turned to account by the community as capable of rational industry, and ultimately set free, with testimonials that they had worked out the lamentable flaw in their history. To argue that this would be an additional temptation to commit such crimes, would only be returning to the ignorance with which they are viewed originally. On the contrary, it may be asserted as a maxim which moral and physical history have both set beyond a doubt, that in proportion as the severity of punishment and of contumely is lessened, and all humane remedies put in their place, defiance is lessened in the cases of physically healthy vice, and desperation in those of unhealthy; and take away these two causes of offence, and you destroy the worst of it's mistakes and the saddest of it's impulses.

CASE OF DON DIEGO CORREA.

To his Excellency General George Don, Governor of Gibraltar.

GENERAL,—I have the pleasing consolation of knowing that I may with the greatest safety place in your hands the enclosed packet, to be forwarded as addressed, to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of England.

With the highest gratitude, General, I pray heaven to preserve your Excellency's life many happy years.

Fortress of Ceuta, Dec. 23, 1815.

DIEGO CORREA.

To his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

SIR,—The civilized world observes with astonishment the scandalous violation consummated by General Smith, which is confirmed by the vouchers transmitted through the Governor of Gibraltar, General Don, to the hands of your Royal Highness.

I am perfectly convinced, Sir, that neither the upright Government of Great Britain, nor the magnanimous and just character of your Royal Highness, can remain insensible to the appeals of humanity and justice which incessantly claim the sanctuary of the laws, setting forth my actual state, my case and destination, and praying the desired remedy.

I devoutly pray the Almighty to guard your Royal Highness's important life many happy years.

DIEGO CORREA.

Prison of Ceuta, Dec. 23, 1815.

To the Right Hon. Lord Grenville, Member of the House of Lords, &c. &c.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR,—The honourable and generous feelings of a Noble Lord can never be more strongly interested than when reason, honour, and justice, are offended and afflicted with impunity.

The legal vouchers, which with this honourable opportunity I transmit to your Excellency, will inform you circumstantially of my case and my cruel destination; and I do not for a moment doubt that your Excellency will bring before the House, with the same earnestness and efficacy as in February last, the unheard of and horrible ingratitude with which a most devoted Spaniard has been remunerated, solely for redeeming his captive King, and defending the just cause of the nation.

The marks which characterize these eternal truths are indelible. They are scars, most excellent Sir, received on the field of immortality, sprinkled with the innocent and generous blood of three victims immolated on the altars of impiety, which incessantly appeal to heaven and the rectitude of virtuous beings for their just vindication.

I pray the Almighty to extend the life of your Excellency.

Prison of Ceuta, Jan. 1, 1816.

DIEGO CORREA.

To Don Diego Correa.

MY DEAR SIR,—On the 8th inst. I received your letter, dated the 23d December last, with the accompanying documents.

I have to inform you that in March, 1815, the Ambassador of his Britannic Majesty at this Court made the strongest representations to the Spanish Government in your favour, soliciting your release; but I regret to inform you that these efforts have been unavailing.

In answer to the Ambassador's representation, the Spanish Government said that you had fraudulently introduced yourself into Gibraltar, the Governor of which place ordered you to be arrested. That the Consul of Spain, apprized of this, claimed you, in order to extend to you the requisite protection which the Governor denied, though he immediately gave you up to the said Consul, making him responsible for his conduct.

The Spanish Government added, that they did not consider you as a delinquent who had been claimed by the Consul of Spain, but as a Spaniard apprehended by the Governor of Gibraltar for having fraudulently introduced himself into the place. That they did not class you as a criminal who had taken refuge in the territory of a foreign power, but as one of those who required punishment either from the British Government, in whose territory the offence was committed, or from the Spanish, to whom it lawfully belonged to punish you. You were given up to the latter as to a competent tribunal.

These are reasons on which the Spanish Government acted in declining to attend to the representation of the British. Under these circumstances, I cannot renew such a remonstrance, until I receive orders from the Government of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, nor can I flatter you with the hope that the remonstrances of my Government will be attended with any happy result.

Heaven keep you many years.

CHARLES R. VAUGHAN.

Madrid, Jan. 1816.

MOST RESPECTED SIR,—Notwithstanding that your Excellency announces to me, in your esteemed letter of the 9th, that you cannot flatter me that any remonstrances on the part of the Government of his Royal Highness will be attended with any happy result, I must, for the honour of truth and justice, implore you to make the following representations apposite to the case.

The four American individuals (classed as criminals by the Spanish Government) introduced themselves into Gibraltar under assumed names, as is proved by the investigatory process, to which I refer. Your Excellency reclaimed them in the name of the Prince Regent, and without regard to the enormous charges alleged in the accusation against them, they were given up in that place to the disposal of your Excellency.

The Spanish gentleman, Don Antonio Publauch, arrested in my company in Gibraltar, to whom it was imputed as well as to me that we had introduced ourselves fraudulently from the prison of Cadiz (where we were) went forth at liberty, and embarked for London, where he now resides. The British Government reclaimed him also.

Don N——, sentenced to eight years imprisonment, in November, 1814, escaped from the prison where he was confined in Spain, and got into Gibraltar under an assumed name, where he remains.

Don Joseph Romero, accused before the tribunal of the Inquisition, fled from this place, and passed on board a British ship of war at anchor in the bay, whose Commander landed him in Gibraltar, where he resides.

Don Santiago de Aldama, a native of Madrid, against whom the Fiscal of his cause had demanded capital punishment, fled from the Castle of St. Sebastian, was admitted into Gibraltar, from whence he proceeded to London, where he has taken up his residence.

And I, Sir, may not I with just grounds flatter myself that neither the upright Government of Great Britain, nor the magnanimous and just character of his Royal Highness, can be insensible to the eternal claims of humanity and justice, which demand the sanctuary of the laws, describing my actual state, my case and destination, and soliciting the required remedy.

If the universal tyrant of Europe, declared, by the decree sanctioned at Vienna, an outlaw without royal character and dignity, for the sole fact of having sheltered himself by hoisting the flag of a British ship of war, has been able to obtain the sacred asylum of hospitality and good faith, how can I for a moment doubt, that in consequence of my exposition addressed to your Excellency on the 23d December last, and the documents accompanying it, my person shall be liberated for the vindication of my outraged honour, and for the redress of atrocious wrongs, if his Royal Highness the Prince Regent do but merely demand it?

I am not a delinquent, according to the construction of the original process and your Excellency's statement; nor did I fraudulently introduce myself into Gibraltar under an assumed name and appellation, as it has been insidiously imputed to me by General Smith, in his illegal information given to his safe conduct without contradiction from a legitimate quarter, to the irreparable injury of a true Spanish patriot, who has given such repeated proofs of his zeal for the just cause, confirming them by his conduct civil and military, yet decidedly sacrificed by the most unheard of and criminal machinations.

But if my reasonable hopes should prove illusory, in the opinion I have formed of the integrity and benevolence of the British Government, &c. I shall end my days, condemned unjustly to a civil extinction and a shameful exile; the claims of a virtuous father of a family will penetrate the most hardenable heart; and those to whom I have given birth and afforded an example will invoke with their tender prayers the God of vengeance, inflamed by the glowing ashes enclosed in my tomb.

I pray heaven, Sir, to extend your life many years.

Prison of Ceuta, Jan. 2, 1816.

DIEGO CORREA.

To his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

SIR,—The respectful supplication, with the vouchers, which on the 23d December last I submitted to the royal beneficence and innate justice of the most benign of Princes, through the hands of the present Governor of Gibraltar, General Don, and the Ministry of State, make known the violent and illegal proceedings of the Ex-governor General Smith, with the circumstances of my case, and my cruel destination.

The magnanimous heart of your Royal Highness will be moved at the moment, when the sublime royal penetration of your Royal Highness shall perceive the wrongs inflicted on my honour and reputation; and you will not peruse with indifference the melancholy answer and prognostication of your Highness's Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Madrid, which I have the honour to address through the same medium to the high consideration of your Royal Highness, on whose uprightness alone depends my liberty or my extermination.

May the Divine Omnipotence extend and preserve the important life of your Royal Highness many years for the solace of afflicted humanity.

DIEGO CORREA.

Garrison of Ceuta, Jan. 27, 1816.

To his Excellency General George Don, Governor of Gibraltar, &c.

GENERAL.—On the 23d December last I had occasion to remit to your Excellency a sealed packet, addressed to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of England.

The Gentleman who took charge of it assured me, that he delivered it personally to your Excellency, which I believe.

I request, General, that on receipt of the adjoined second packet, which I transmit to your Excellency through Senior Balini, English Consul in Algéiras, for the same object, you will be pleased to answer me with the opportunity verified to you by his Excellency, the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Royal Highness at the Court of Madrid, on the 9th of the present month.

As these answers are purely official, and tend to my justification and redress, I cannot do less than trouble the consideration of your Excellency, which I do with the greatest regret.

I pray heaven to keep your Excellency many years.

Ceuta, Jan. 27, 1816.

DIEGO CORREA.

To his Excellency Lord Grenville, Member of the House of Lords, &c. &c.

MOST EXCELLENT LORD,—By my supplicatory letter of the 1st instant, and the legal vouchers, your Excellency will have been apprized of my state, case, and destination.

I most respectfully entreat your Excellency, that, on reading the annexed faithful copies, your Excellency will take into your humane consideration the melancholy prognostication announced in the answer given me by his Excellency the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent at the Court of Madrid.

This new incident inspires me with the pleasing belief that your Excellency will, for the sake of truth and justice, which I invoke from your Excellency, do me the favour to be my protector against the artifices of my rivals; signalized in all their productions and their tortuous intrigues.

My Lord, I most sincerely implore heaven to guard the important life of your Excellency many happy years.

Prison of Ceuta, Jan. 27, 1816.

DIEGO CORREA.

To Don Diego Correa.

SIR,—I have received your letter of the 26th January, and I beg you to be assured, that the Government of his Britannic Majesty has already used endeavours for your liberation, but in vain. I cannot renew these instances without express orders from my Government, nor do I think they will now be of any avail. However, I shall apprise my Government of the letters which you have been pleased to address to me; and remain your obedient servant, &c.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 19.—The following passages are contained in a circular addressed by the Prefect of La Mouselle to the Mayors of the Communes under his authority, to announce to them the departure of the allied troops:—"In announcing to you this happy event, for which Frenchmen are indebted to the wisdom of the King and to their own conduct, I do not doubt, Sir, that the inhabitants of your commune will, in the expression of their joy, preserve that dignity which they have shown during a period of sacrifices and suffering. They will be anxious that foreigners should separate from them like guests, and that they may go and attest to Europe, that France, equal in adverse or prosperous fortune, supported their presence without degradation, and witnessed their departure without insult.—You will be careful, Sir, to maintain that good harmony which has hitherto subsisted between the inhabitants and foreigners, and you will authorize that the troops of the Allied Powers (whether they be those which have occupied this department, or those passing through to return to their country) be treated with attention; you will instantly suppress all expressions of joy which may appear injurious, and you will vigilantly watch that no excess be committed. The orders of the King are positive on this subject; you are responsible for their execution."

OCT. 20.—The friends of the King and of France will learn with deep regret the loss they have experienced; they have to deplore the death of a learned and virtuous man. M. Bertrand de Molleville, Minister of Marine under Louis XVI., who displayed the most sincere proofs of his zeal and fidelity to that unfortunate Monarch, died yesterday at the age of 74. He was the author of several esteemed works on the French Revolution. It is said that he has left several unpublished productions, which his heirs propose publishing, and which are extremely curious.

The Royal Literary Society of Warsaw, in its sitting of the 20th of June, 1818, proposed a prize, consisting of a gold medal and 100 ducats (50*l.* sterling), for an historic eulogy on General Thaddeus Kosciusko. The Society gives two years for the task. The work may be written in the Polish, Latin, French, English, German, or Italian languages. The authors, on sending their manuscripts to the Literary Society of Warsaw, shall also send a sealed billet, containing respectively their names, places of residence; and the epigraphs which may be placed at the head of the composition.

Demons have re-appeared at Einsidien (canton of Schwitz), but their triumph has been very brief. The operation of exorcism was performed in front of the chapel, and in the presence of numerous pilgrims. Out of three hundred and three devils, which had been influenced by the fancy of taking up their residence in the body of a woman, 300 were expelled without any difficulty. The three others, more tenacious, resisted for a long time, and only yielded after the most painful efforts, and the application of all the powers of exorcism. This operation is a happy augury of the progress of reason!

GERMANY.

VIENNA, OCT. 4.—Eye-witnesses relate, that the parting of the Duchess of Parma from her son, at Rosenberg, was extremely affecting. The Duchess promised the young Prince to come and see him again in two years. It was observed that the Princess appeared very much depressed for some days preceding her departure.—The Memoires of Count Las Cases, on the residence of Napoleon Bonaparte at St. Helena, are read here with much interest. Public opinion on this occasion decides strongly against the conduct of the English Governor, Sir Hudson Lowe.

STATE PAPER.

TREATY FOR THE EVACUATION OF FRANCE.

In the name of the Holy and Indivisible Trinity:

Their Majesties the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of all the Russias, having repaired to Aix-la-Chapelle, and their Majesties the King of France and Navarre, and the King of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, having sent thither their Plenipotentiaries, the Ministry of the five Courts having assembled in conference, and the French Plenipotentiary having made known, that in consequence of the state of France and the faithful execution of the Treaty of November 20, 1815, his Most Christian Majesty was desirous that the military occupation stipulated by the fifth Article of the said Treaty, should cease as soon as possible, the Ministry of the Courts of Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, (the names of the Powers you will see are placed in the alphabetical order), after having, in concert with the said Plenipotentiary of France, maturely examined every thing that could have an influence on such an important decision, declared that their Sovereigns would admit the principle of the evacuation of the French territory at the end of the third year of the occupation; and wishing to consolidate their resolution in a formal Convention, and to secure at the same time the definitive execution of the said Treaty of November 20, 1815, their Majesties named (here follow the names of the Ministry), have agreed upon the following articles:—

Art. 1. The troops composing the Army of Occupation shall be withdrawn from the French territory by the 30th of November next, or sooner if possible.

Art. 2. The strong places and fortresses which the said troops now occupy, shall be surrendered to Commissioners named for that purpose by his Most Christian Majesty, in the state in which they were at the time of the occupation, conformably to the 9th article of the Convention concluded in execution of the fifth article of the Treaty of Nov. 20, 1815.

Art. 3. The sum destined to provide for the pay, the equipment, and the clothing of the troops of the Army of Occupation, shall be paid, in all cases, till the 30th of November next, on the same footing on which it has existed since the 1st of December, 1817.

Art. 4. All the pecuniary arrangements between France and the Allied Powers having been regulated and settled, the sum remaining to be paid by France to complete the execution of the 4th article of the Treaty of Nov. 1815, is definitively fixed at 265 millions of francs.

Art. 5. Of this sum, the amount of 100 millions of effective value shall be paid by an inscription of rentes on the great book of the Public Debt of France, bearing interest from the 22d of September, 1818. The said inscriptions shall be received at the rate of the funds on the 5th Oct. 1818.

Art. 6. The remaining 165 millions shall be paid by nine monthly instalments, commencing with the 6th of January next, (Note —I formerly by mistake named the 26th of December, of the present year); by draughts on the houses of Hope and Co., and Baring, Brothers, and Co. In the same manner the inscriptions of the rentes, mentioned in the above article, shall be delivered to Commissioners of the Courts of Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, by the Royal Treasury of France, at the epoch of the complete and definitive evacuation of the French territory.

Art. 7. At the same epoch, the Commissioners of the said Courts shall deliver to the Royal Treasury of France the six obligations (engagements), not yet discharged (acquittés), which shall remain in their hands of the 15 obligations (engagements) delivered conformably to the second article of the Convention concluded for the execution of the fourth article of the 20th November, 1815. The said Commissioners shall at the same time deliver the inscriptions of 7 millions of rentes, created in virtue of the 8th article of the said Convention.

Art. 8. The present Convention shall be ratified, and the ratification exchanged at Aix-la-Chapelle, in the course of 15 days, or sooner, if possible, in the faith of which the respective Plenipotentiaries have herewith signed their names, and affixed to it their seal and arms.

Done at Aix-la-Chapelle, the 9th of October, in the year of Grace, 1818.

[Here follow the signatures of the Ministers.]

We have found the above Treaty conformable to our will, in consequence of which we have confirmed and ratified the same, as we do now confirm and ratify it for our heirs and successors.

[Here follow the signatures of the Sovereigns, with the specifications of the different years of their several reigns.]

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, OCTOBER 25.

THE Morning Chronicle of Friday says, that before Mr. GALLATIN left London, he had concluded a treaty by which all the chief points but one in negotiation between this country and America were happily settled. The boundary which has been in dispute ever since the SHELBURNE administration, is now fixed: an arrangement has taken place as to the American right of fishing on the coast of Newfoundland: the intercourse of American vessels with the British West Indies has been provided for: and the only unsettled point is the famous one respecting the mutual right of the search and seizure of native seamen,—which is to be referred by Mr. GALLATIN to his Government. We thought there would be no war just now with America, if our Ministers could avoid it. Kingly Government cannot afford the risque.

The Treaty for the Evacuation of France has arrived. The preamble, with a legitimate ingenuity, attributes it to the desire expressed by the French King, so that the people, it is hoped, will consider him as at once the author of a pleasant thing, and the only mediator for them with his brother Sovereigns. The Sovereigns are cunning; but the people are wiser.

The reports of secret misunderstandings among these hopeful arbiters of destinies, have been strengthened by the following curious paragraph in the demi-official paper the Courier, which talked so much the other day of their unanimity. But, poor fellow, he is obliged to talk, and what is worse, we are obliged to listen:—

For several days past a great movement has been observed among all the persons attached to the suite of the Emperor FRANCIS. Two extraordinary couriers were dispatched yesterday from his Imperial MAJESTY'S residence. The Emperor ALEXANDER went there twice in the course of the morning, as did also the King of PRUSSIA. When the former came away, his looks were remarkably serious and thoughtful. These two Sovereigns, it is reported, have lately had some warm discussions upon the subject of the dispute between Bavaria and the Grand Duchy of Baden. The Emperor of RUSSIA has declared strongly in favour of the Grand Duke of BADEN. If the assertions of some persons who have much intercourse with the Austrian Cabinet, may be believed, there is not such a cordial unanimity between the Sovereigns upon all points, as is imagined. It is certain, that in the hotel of the Emperor of AUSTRIA, they talk pretty freely of the little friendship that is felt towards the Prussians.

It is here said that the chief point in dispute is the question between Baden and Bavaria; but it is added, that the Austrian authorities talk pretty freely against the Prussians; and when we hear that there is not such a cordial unanimity upon all points as is imagined, we may very fairly, under the circumstances, for all read many. The mere mention of some of them will render the disputability obvious,—such as the jealousy of the Prussian power, which has been stepping into the place of the old German emperorship;—the dislike of seeing the revived power of Prussia giving itself so many airs;—the influence of the BONAPARTE family, still visible in Bavaria, and secretly felt in many other places;—the contempt of the unpopular Bourbon Dynasty on the part of the late Empress of France, and their endeavour to return it;—the situation of her husband NAPOLEON;—&c. &c. and lastly, conscious wrong and promise-breaking on all sides. Here is enough in all conscience to make the whole set run to loggerheads again; and so they would next week, if they did not fear the advancement of liberty.

An article from Milan, agreeably to what we said of the Russian Emperor last week, and his inclination to cultivate the good will of the intellectual and liberal, provided his own dictatorship be left untouched, gives an account of the abolition of vassalage in Courland. This measure, observe, he put in practice on his way to Aix-la-Chapelle. Yet the notion of an abstract right is guarded against. The abolition is put in the light of a favour conceded by his Majesty at the request of the Courland Nobility; and after service at church, "a scene succeeded," says the account, "which represented the Russian Sovereign in the fairest light, as the father of his people, or, as the world in its infancy called Princes, as the shepherd of his people. He caused the assembled peasants to be brought before him, and discoursed to them in person, explaining what his goodness had given them, and the proper use of it. The worthy deputy of the country, Count Charles Von Medem, interpreted the discourse of the Emperor, who graciously heard the reply of two of the peasants." With all due reverence to old Homer, the phrase of "shepherd of the people" is a bad though a legitimate metaphor. It is true, a political commentator once justified it, by asking whether shepherds did not fleece their sheep, and send them now and then to be slaughtered;—but in sober gravity, these are not the times for the grave application of such phrases. There is a great difference between a shepherd and his sheep, but none such that we know of between one man and others. Let rulers have respect, and in order to have it, let them deserve it; but in times when despotism is seeking how it can creep back upon us, even through the medium of its better actions, let us not hear of phrases which are applicable to barbarous times only, and which make out kings alone to be men and nations to be cattle.

The Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle will afford some flattering matter for the King's Speech at the opening of Parliament. Lord CASTLEREACH will return with perhaps an order or two more than he possessed before, and a few snuff boxes and portraits set in gold and diamonds. Lady C. will have to tell with ecstasy how she danced with ALEXANDER, Emperor of the Russians, Lord WARRINGTON, and the Duke of KENT. It will make her Ladyship's stature as tall as her teachers. The dandy Lords dangling at the tail of the British secretary, will be sworn in as supporters of his Lordship's wise measures, and impressed with becoming awe for the bright representative of Majesty!—Stamford News.

The States-General of the Netherlands were opened on the 19th inst., with a long speech from the King in person. The topics are those which might have been anticipated, and are touched in the usual form of Royal communications to an assembled Legislature. His Majesty speaks with apparent satisfaction of the late decision relative to the allied troops in France. He paints in cheerful and flattering colours the internal state of the kingdom, and expresses his confidence in the success of certain measures which he hints at, for equalizing the public receipt with the expenditure.

On Tuesday or Wednesday of the last week, his Spanish Majesty sent down to the Captain-General a list, comprising the names of 60 persons, who were suspected by the King, and who were to be sent in consequence under escort to several distant towns of the kingdom. This blow, however, was not struck, for two reasons—first, because there were not troops enough in readiness to compose the several escorts; and secondly, on account of the interposition of the gracious influence of the Queen, who also remonstrated with him, that such attempts were only calculated to increase the number of discontents. The King then recalled the list, and tore it into pieces. The opinion already general in the smallest villages is against the Government; and even the most insensible of the people say that it is not possible to endure such grievances much longer. A politician of the time of the reign of ELIZABETH and FERDINAND said, "that when people dare to talk, they also dare to execute."—Private letter from Madrid.

MILITARY FLOGGING.—In Brunswick, says a German Paper, where stripping and flogging have been introduced as well as in Hanover, this punishment was lately to be inflicted on several soldiers. One of them, who in an altercation with one of his officers, whose comrade he had formerly been at school, proceeded to strike him, was sentenced to 1000 lashes. As he was being conducted to the stake to which he was to be fastened, he stabbed himself to the heart with a concealed knife.

THE LIVING POETS.—In the able and otherwise just article upon Mr. KEATS's Endymion, which we inserted on Sunday fortnight, a paragraph upon the other living poets escaped our attention, which we certainly should have omitted for more reasons than one. The truth is, that we were in a great hurry at the time, and in rapidly looking to the main part of the subject, our eyes so literally glanced over the paragraph in question, that we were surprised upon meeting it at our own breakfast table. To say nothing of our other reasons above alluded to, the writer is mistaken in thinking that the peculiar and individual characters of the writings of such men as WORDSWORTH, MOORE, and BYRON, can injure the survival of their poetry. That very circumstance, though certainly not necessary to the lasting nature of poetry, will nevertheless be among the preservatives of theirs, as we have observed on a former occasion. It is to Mr. KEATS's poetry what particular companionship is to solitude,—both excellent things, when genuine; and we are mistaken if he himself does not partake more of both than his intelligent critic supposes.

A Correspondent has called our attention to a pamphlet which has just appeared on the subject of the infamous publication known by the name of Blackwood's Magazine. It is entitled "Hypocrisy Unveiled and Calumny Detected." We are very happy to hear from our Correspondent, but it is quite impossible we can take any further notice of the poor callous or unhappy coward to whom he alludes; and agreeing with the pamphlet as we do in many things, we are nevertheless of opinion that it would be much better in the various eminent persons in whose company we have had the honour of the self-betraying abuse in question, to let it die the quiet and inevitable death of scorn.

The Courier says—"It is at length decided, that Lord ELLENBOROUGH retires from the high judicial station where he has so long and so honourably presided over the public administration of justice in this country. The state of his Lordship's health, we regret to add, is the immediate cause of this determination on his part." It adds, that "he will be succeeded, we understand, by Mr. Justice ABBOTT."

The helmets of the Life Guards are shortly to be exchanged for large hair caps, similar to those worn by the Grenadiers of the Foot Guards. The present helmets are found to be particularly inconvenient.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

STATE OF THE QUEEN.

HER MAJESTY'S disorder, (says the Courier) appears to be resuming most of its former distressing symptoms. Her appetite has almost entirely left her again; the cough and sense of pain on the side are again troublesome, and render the Royal Patient extremely restless; whilst, at the same time, the slightest motion has a tendency to produce these alarming spasms on the superior viscera, which have heretofore threatened her speedy dissolution. Under these unfavourable circumstances, her MAJESTY'S sleep is consequently broken and unrefreshing; and of course her exhaustion is extreme.

HER MAJESTY has suffered so much for the last three days, and the exhaustion arising from the want of sleep is so great, that the most serious apprehensions are entertained of her approaching demise. She has more than once miraculously recovered from symptoms almost as threatening as the present, but it is obvious that each return of the malady is accompanied by increased weakness, and consequently the case becomes more hopeless.—In this state we do not trespass on public feeling in announcing what we understand to be the determination of Government on the demise of the QUEEN. If the event should take place speedily, Parliament, which stands prorogued to the 12th Nov. would be further prorogued to the 24th Nov. then to meet for the dispatch of business; and it is understood that Ministers have resolved to propose to Parliament a greatly diminished establishment for the King at Windsor. All the ostentatious splendours of royalty, which, under the severe visitation of Providence, are rather a mockery than a token of respect, are to be withdrawn—every attention to his MAJESTY'S bodily health, and to all the comforts that kindness can confer, will be administered—and the care of the Royal Person is to be committed to the Duke of York, who will have an additional allowance to his income for this service. There may be strong arguments advanced against the next in succession to the Prince REGENT (who has the command of the Army), having also the custody of the King—but the intimate fraternal affection which subsists between the REGENT and the Duke, serve to quiet the minds of the public, as to the danger of any jealousy arising between them. This reduction of the Windsor Establishment, is, together with that of the Army, a part of the efficacy of that demonstration of national feeling, as to the enormity of our expence, which was displayed at the General Election; and we rejoice at it.—Chronicle, Friday.

THE EDINBURGH REFLECTOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

22, Anderson's Buildings, City-road, Oct. 24, 1818.

SIR,—I request a small space in your paper of tomorrow, for the purpose of refuting a slanderous attack contained in the New Times of this day, against a publication with which I am principally connected. A writer in that Journal, under the signature of “A Loyal North Briton,” has thought proper to insinuate, that the Edinburgh Reflector is actuated by a “spirit of sedition” and “principles of anarchy,” and to assert that it is “fast spreading poison” among its readers in the Scottish metropolis. The insinuation and the assertion are alike false; the “Reflector” is indeed opposed to the present system of mal-administration and misrepresentation; but it is as far from being a vehicle for seditious doctrines or unconstitutional principles, as “The New Times” is from being distinguished for truth or decency.—I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

J. A. WILLIAMS.

COMMON HALLS.

MR. EXAMINER,—Allow me, Sir, to enquire what is the reason, when a motion is to be submitted to the Livery, the mover is called upon first to submit it to the Lord Mayor for his sanction?

If it proceeds from merely a custom, and has no positive right, does it not render the meetings of the Livery completely nugatory, in the event of the Chief Magistrate objecting to a proposition being put to them? When questions are proposed in the House of Commons, it is not customary for the Members to enquire of the Speaker if they meet his approbation or not. The same rule (if I mistake not) is adopted in the Common Council. Why then should the Livery be placed in a different situation, and the Lord Mayor first decide, if the motion has his concurrence? The Speaker has only to decide if the Ayes or the Noes have it; the Lord Mayor, in the Common Council, declares if the question is carried in the affirmative or the negative: why then take a greater extent of power, when he presides at the Common Hall?

Suppose, Sir, when the Common Halls were convened for petitioning the Legislature against the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, as well as against the Indemnity Bill, that instead of Mr. Alderman Wood, Sir Wm. Curtis had been the Chief Magistrate, (his opinions on those measures being previously known) and the resolutions entered into on those occasions had been handed over for his Lordship's assent or otherwise, and he had decided against their being put, and dissolved the Hall, would not the Livery, in such a case, have been placed in a very humiliating situation?

If it is an indubitable right of the Chief Magistrate's, let it be shown; if not, “reform it all together;”—“it is more honoured in the breach than the observance.”

DRURY-LANE.

BARQUHAN'S Comedy of the Recruiting Officer was performed here on Tuesday, but produced little effect. The play itself, though sprightly for the first three Acts, seems as if it began to be tired of its own animal spirits during the two last. The importance of a conjurer, whose profession is assumed by Serjeant Kite for the purpose of assisting a lover, is an obsolete thing now-a-days, at least generally speaking; and the very sprightliness of the rest of the piece is so intermixed with broad double meanings, that a good deal of it was obliged to be cut away. Thus, the jovial rakery of the author, which depends for effect upon its uninterrupted face, was baulked and made silly; and in fine, as if it was resolved that nothing should contribute to its success, some of the actors were indifferent ones, the others seemed perplexed with what was left them to say, the audience were dull, and even Mrs. MARDYN, in her beau's attire, dropped her voice now and then, and handled her switch as awkwardly as the text. In a word, the piece was altogether too broad for the present state of manners and taste, the vices of which lean towards the sordid and hypocritical rather than the debauched. The actors themselves felt as much; and it is no wonder if the audience felt with them. The best part of the performance was the acting of MUNDEN and KNIGHT in the two recruits, which was a perfect varying picture of rustic astonishment, doubt, credulity, terror, and vanity. MUNDEN's face is as potent as ever.

FARQUHAR was one of those men, who, more sprightly and witty than deep, and with excellent natural dispositions, just see far enough into the common-places and hypocrisies of society to despise them, become hopeless of making them better, and so, too cheerful to play the weeping philosophers, and too frank to conceal any thing, make a gay compromise with the merrier and more social-looking vices, and help in fact to continue the whole error by getting sympathy as bad a name as antipathy. He has the same air also, in his plays, of a conventional townmanliness and a certain young valuing himself upon his intercourse with the sex, which is to be found in those of two greater predecessors, BEAUMONT and FLETCHER, the former of whom died at thirty-two. FARQUHAR, we believe, died at twenty-nine or thirty, at the very time his Beaux Stratagem was going through the first nights of its performance. He was very much beloved, and shewed the fineness of his nature in his behaviour towards a wife who really loved him but who had pretended to be worth money. He realized the love if not the money, and behaved to her with an unabated tenderness, for which she must have adored him. This indeed was making a compromise to some purpose; and if he had not taken at it's word a world which he despised, and grown hopeless as well as his inferiors, his love of sympathy, which he degraded in his dramas into mere dissipation, might have opened his eyes to discover "the soul of goodness" in things which he found evil, and which he left so.

This revival was followed by another on Thursday, in which the love of the sexes is equally ill handled but in a very different manner,—that of the Distressed Mother, translated by AMBROSE PHILIPS from RACINE. It is French all over, that is to say, dramatically speaking,—pompous, frigid, and ranting. Instead of the grand elemental feelings of the Greeks, who half in sublimity and half in superstition talk like the creatures of a newly created and passionate world, sincere and awful, all things, with the usual modesty of the old French system, are brought down to the pitch of the Court of Louis the 14th. The French were too much occupied to go to Nature, and so Nature must come to them; and all the "vasty spirits" of poetry and passion shrink themselves into coats and bag-wigs, as the devils in MILTON's Pandæmonium did into pigmies. The persons "Madam" it away, like the ladies in the Beggar's Opera.

There was nothing prominent in the performance but the acting of Mrs. WEST in Hermione, and of KEAN in Orestes; and they were both dreadfully maltreated by their own dialogue, KEAN in particular. When he had made some "good hit," as the phrase is, a most frigid common-place with an Ah or an Oh in it remained for him to speak, and seemed to mock what had gone before. It had just the effect of a man's going to sit down in a dignified manner, and plumping upon a chair too low for him. Mrs. WEST was very effective in her declamation, and may prove a formidable rival for Miss O'NEIL. It was of the very best kind, interspersed with such touches of the natural as would suggest themselves to a woman of taste and feeling in these times of the stage. Her dress was also as correct and classical as her under garments would allow it to appear. Yet the play would perhaps have been damned, had it not been for KEAN's acting in the mad scene, which turned the doubtful temper of the audience into such a fit of transport, that they would not hear any more after his being carried out, and called for him after the dropping of the curtains. A repetition of the piece was given out for Saturday amidst great applause and shouting; but we think it cannot possibly be a favourite.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A piece of the old mysterious, murdering, Newgate Calendar sort, has been brought out here, which our readers will excuse us from attending to. The plot of it in the daily papers is enough. Its name alone (Proof Presumptive) contains a world of criticism. It is said to be a translation by Mr. C. KEMBLE. We are glad that it is a translation, though sorry that he is the translator.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 13.—MR. JERVIS AND MR. RAINE.

*Nomen habet, et ad magistri
Vocem quisquis sui venit citatus.*

Mart. L. 4. E. 30.

WITH respect to the two gentlemen whose names stand at the head of the present article, I am much in the situation of the person of whom MONTAIGNE speaks, when he says (Essais, L. II. chap. 14) "C'est une plaisante imagination de concevoir un esprit balancé justement entre deux pareilles envies;" for it is really a matter of some difficulty with me to decide with which of them I shall begin: the same lively and facetious author goes on to illustrate what he advances, by supposing a man between a ham and a bottle, "avec egal appetit de boire et de manger;" which is again something like my case; for one of the individuals, whose merits or defects are under discussion, in several particulars may be said to resemble a ham, and the other a bottle, if not of small beer, assuredly not of the briskest and brightest Champagne. For instance, MR. RAINE may be considered both salt and savoury, though now and then too coarse and too high; and MR. JERVIS is not unlike a bottle of table-ale, with but little body and fulness, but with much of the spirit and uppishness, if I may so say without any reference to temper, belonging to more generous and intoxicating liquor: at the same time, the flavour is not unpleasant, and it may and does go down very well in places where they are more thirsty than in the metropolis, or (to quit my simile) where speeches are not so plentiful. But the question is, with whom I shall begin, and though the usual course is to eat before we drink, I shall here reverse the order of things, and commence with MR. JERVIS, because he claims precedence on the ground of seniority, having obtained a silk gown, by patent, I think, in the year 1806, when LORD ST. VINCENT, who is his uncle, was at the head of the Admiralty:

*Dum in dubio est animus, paulo momento luc,

Ter. Andr.

From the mere mention of this circumstance, it will perhaps be concluded, that MR. JERVIS's merits only did not entitle him to this distinction—a distinction which very few King's Counsel enjoy; for the patent of precedence gives him an advantage over his rivals, because he can undertake the defence of a person accused of any crime and prosecuted by the Crown, without the expensive licence that must otherwise be obtained. It is to be taken for granted that a little ministerial and family influence was employed, since the talents and qualifications of MR. JERVIS are by no means such as to enable him to extort honours and command business. Yet let me in the outset make a remark, in which I shall be confirmed by nearly the whole Bar, that he has always had to work up hill in the profession: he never has possessed the ear of the Court of King's Bench, and if he has ever succeeded in convincing the minds of the Judges, it has been by overcoming difficulties and repelling objections much more frequently started and supported by the highest authorities, than by the Counsel who were opposed to him: that both sides have been heard cannot be denied; but one side was heard principally from the Bench, the other from the Bar. Mr. JERVIS, however, possesses both patience and perseverance, and if he be not the closest reasoner in the world, he can make an argument intelligible; and without shewing disrespect to the Court, I have sometimes seen him much more laudably pertinacious, than men of higher talents but of more timidity. I have several times had occasion to protest against the tame submissiveness which some Advocates are not ashamed to expose in public; but this praise is, I think, above all due to Mr. JERVIS, that he more correctly than any other man draws the line between that deference which is due to superiors, and that mental degradation which is due to no man. Whether the unusual obstacles he experienced in the Court of King's Bench led to the determination, or whether it was induced by a prospect of additional business, I know not; but within the last three or four terms he has confined his practice almost exclusively to the Court of Exchequer, where in consequence of his patent he is enabled to conduct the defence of such persons as chiefly, in revenue causes, are prosecuted by the Attorney-General. For this reason, his name is not now so familiar with the public as it used to be when he sat in that Court, the proceedings of which are almost exclusively reported in the newspapers: he only appears there now, when his presence is required in consequence of some proceeding arising out of country business.

On the Oxford circuit, however, there is no man better known or better liked: his chief rival is Mr. DAUNCEY, of whom I spoke a week or two ago; and if the latter be thought the abler man, the former is considered by far the most gentlemanly advocate, and is much more approved if not admired both by Suitors and Solicitors: he and Mr. DAUNCEY generally divide the practice, one being engaged on one side and the other on the other, though of the two Mr. DAUNCEY certainly has the advantage. In my criticism upon this latter gentleman, I mentioned that he was a great talker, and I added, what is liable to misinterpretation, and has in fact been misinterpreted, that Mr. JERVIS could talk a little: I ought rather to have said, that he was a moderate talker: he speaks nearly as fast and as long as Mr. DAUNCEY, but he never ventures to take the same liberties with his cause or his auditory: he endeavours to talk to the purpose, and does not travel out of his road in all directions merely because he thinks himself vastly entertaining. The great objection to be made to Mr. JERVIS's addresses is, that there is such a laxity about them, such a want of coherence of parts, a want of nerve, sinew, and tension; he does not say bad things, so much as he puts them in bad places; he does not arrange and digest what he has to offer, and he does not succeed in making his points tell in consequence of a looseness of phraseology and a want of precision, vigour, and strength, in his language. For this reason he sometimes fails to secure the attention of the Jury, who are weary of following him from one end of the cause to the other, and from one fact to another, without order or system, long before he arrives at the conclusion of what he feels it his duty to offer. Yet he is by no means an inelegant speaker—indeed he seems to have studied his manner and appearance; and as he is a gentleman in his conduct and in his feelings, he never launches out into the gross abuse and needless coarseness closely bordering upon vulgarity, for which his more immediate rival on the circuit is sometimes celebrated. He always seems deeply interested for his client without measuring the exact proportion it ought to bear to the fee he has received.

One advantage Mr. JERVIS possesses over Counsel who are in other respects his superiors, is a great command of his temper: he is not easily ruffled or thrown off his guard; and he can bear a joke, even though it be not of the most polished kind, with equanimity. On this account, he is able sometimes to cope with an insolent witness when other men would make appeals to the Court for protection: mere impudence is very easily baffled by a man of coolness and quickness, even if his talents be not of the first order: into this coolness and controul over himself he has been tolerably disciplined in the Court of King's Bench, where, as I remarked, I have often seen them put to a very severe test: he is naturally of a mild, tranquil deportment, and such men usually display sufficient firmness when the occasion demands it. I do not apprehend that he has any pretensions to be considered a profound Lawyer, and he does not attempt to plume himself upon attainments he does not possess.

Of Mr. RAINE, I am aware that very little is known in the metropolis: he is, I believe, the son of the late head Master of the Charter-house, and he bears the reputation among his friends of being a good scholar: it may be true, and very likely is so; but no man who had ever heard him speak would have supposed that he had even a slight acquaintance with classic or any other literature. Though he very seldom obtains a brief in London, he is a very constant attendant in his place in Court, where his absence would of late often be more convenient, in consequence of the crowded state of the table from the recent batches of King's Counsel. But if his absence would be more convenient, it would not be more agreeable, for he is reckoned a most good-natured man, and distributes his puns and his franks (as a Member of Parliament) among his surrounding friends, with great liberality: the former are the more plentiful, and the latter usually the more acceptable: his wit is not very discriminating nor fastidious, and he has seldom resolution to let an occasion slip on which he can torture some poor word into a double signification. Although this is his chief occupation in Westminster-Hall, I have seen him now and then engaged in a cause, where he might have distinguished himself had he chosen to do so; he did not however appear to think it worth while to give himself any trouble, and scarcely to take the most ordinary pains in the opening of the facts and in the examination of the witnesses. He was in some degree in the right, for had he exerted himself ever so much, and been ever so much approved, he would probably now come into the field too late in the day, when the ground is occupied by more popular rivals.

This is not by any means the case upon the Northern Circuit, where Mr. RAINE is employed by many of the country Attornies: there he has established, to a certain extent, a reputation, and he endeavours to keep it up, and to make a further progress, by doing his utmost for such as entrust him with their briefs: this therefore is the proper situation for measuring his talents, while a very erroneous standard would be formed from his practice in London.

It may easily be supposed, that Mr. TOPPING and Mr. SCARLETT engross a very great proportion of the business: they are commonly adversaries; but now and then a rich and cunning suitor will take care to retain both of them in his favour, and then Mr. RAINE is employed to oppose them, probably with the assistance of Mr. Sergeant HULLOCK, a hard-headed, straight-forward north-countryman, with a very strong brogue and a stronger understanding. Mr. RAINE however leads, as considerably senior, and I have heard him on such occasions make very strenuous and effective speeches: in some of the country towns he is preferred by a few even to the two great men of the Circuit, and it cannot be denied that he has with a certain class, what the knowing ones term, a taking way with him: he is undoubtedly very shrewd, and in causes not obviously above his capacity he acquits himself to the satisfaction of all parties, and not least to his own: without being presumptuous or assuming, it is obvious, when he has gained a verdict or made a good address, that he sits down in very good humour with himself. It is notorious, I believe, that in Yorkshire there are more horse-dealers than in any other county of England, and as horse-dealers are usually also skilful in the pugilistic art, it follows that at the Assizes the causes regarding horses and assaults are tolerably numerous. Now to do Mr. Raine justice, I do not think that there is a man at the Bar who knows how to conduct a horse-cause better than himself, who is more up to the tricks of the trade, and to the manœuvres it is necessary to practice. Actions relating to insurances on shipping are now generally considered a distinct branch of the profession, and those that are connected with the soundness or unsoundness of horses ought almost to be looked upon in the same light: they are quite distinct in their nature from other suits, and distinct principles and precedents are applicable to them. Mr. RAINE seems to have made them his peculiar study, and they are seldom brought before a Jury without his being retained either for the plaintiff or the defendant. He has the terms of art and slang of the stable at his tongue's end, so as to make himself easily intelligible to the witnesses, and if they prevaricate or commit perjury (which is by no means uncommon) he possesses considerable art in their management or detection. He has a most knowing look, and a shake of the head, when he rises to cross-examine, or when he does not obtain a direct answer to a question, which alarms even a practised witness, and makes him believe that the Advocate is much more in the secret than he is in reality. To the Jury also he appears so scientific, so well acquainted with the subject, that they cannot but hesitate in deciding against his judgment.

He is certainly a forcible and a pointed speaker, but most unselect in his phraseology, and very careless about offending the ears of his auditory by vulgarisms and expressions that may be very proper when talking to a witness in his own language, but are altogether misplaced in a speech: he addresses himself to the question, and argues it in a plain, though in an acute and often convincing style. With regard to his classical attainments, I am not aware, as I have said, that he ever gives his audience the slightest glimpse of them. What he may be in private, I know not; but judging from his public life, I should be inclined to say, that elegant learning was never more completely thrown away.

AMICUS CURIE.

NOTE.—I did not see the letter of A Lover of Justice, until after my last article was printed, or I should have thanked him before for his well-meant endeavour to set me right in a matter of fact, which he seems to imply, I misstated, because Sir ROBERT GIFFORD is a favourite of mine. I do not know which ought to be most obliged to him, the subject of the article or the writer. A Lover of Justice asserts that Sir R. G. was a Whig in the early part of his life, and that his principles were liberal: my information is however different, and I still believe it, and I shall not think that the cause of Justice will be served in a case like this, by crying into private history and raking up all the little ambiguous anecdotes of a young man's life.

FINE ARTS.

The following article appeared in the principal daily papers of Monday:—

NEW CROWN PIECES.

The Order in Council for the coinage of the New Crown Pieces (the first that have been struck during the present extended reign) has at length been issued. This coin will complete the series of the new silver monies. The obverse is impressed with the effigy of his Majesty, with the inscription Georgius III. D. G. &c. and the reverse has the figure of St. George encountering the Dragon, surrounded by the Garter; the edge of the pieces marked in raised letters with the words

Dieus et Tutamen, and the year of the King's reign. The head of the King is modelled in the antique style after the character of the Greeks, and combines, with the gracefulness of the design, the best and most pleasing likeness of his Majesty that has yet appeared upon our coins. In lieu of the Royal Arms, which afford no scope for the ingenuity and talents of the artist, the subject of the legendary tale of St. George and the Dragon has been adopted for the reverse, and is a well chosen and pleasing allegory, suited to the occurrences of the times. The figures introduced into this noble and simple composition are not drawn according to the old manner, with all the stiff heraldic emblems and trappings of the 14th century, but are pure and classical studies from the finest models of the ancients, exhibiting in the muscular anatomy of the human form all the attributes of power, which pourtray the heroic deeds represented in the sculpture on the bas reliefs of the Elgin Marbles, or in the engraving of the famed medals of the Emperor Trajan.

In the image of the Tutelary Saint of England mounted on a spirited horse and trampling on the fallen Dragon, whose body is pierced by the spear which has been broken in the encounter, while the hero prepares to renew the attack with the sword, is displayed an obvious allegorical representation of the genius and valour of Britain triumphing over the demon of anarchy and despotism. Justly described as our glory and defence, (Decus et Tutamen), this beautiful coin will transmit to posterity a record of the great and brilliant events, which, under Providence, have led to the restoration of peace and happiness throughout the world.

The design and engraving is by Pistrucci, who has lately been employed at the Mint. In speaking of the original design for the crown piece modelled by Mr. Pistrucci, the late celebrated Mons. Viscount of Paris, whose judgment and taste in the monetary art of the ancients are unquestionably of the first description, compares it with the chefs-d'œuvres of the ancient masters, describing the excellence and composition of the style to be unexampled in modern times, and equal to the most brilliant works of the Greeks and Romans.

In the art of engraving the steel dies for the coinage, Mr. Pistrucci has also shown himself equally eminent. To give a high relief to the impression on both sides of the piece has hitherto been considered as impracticable in the fabrication of coin, and it has therefore been the custom to keep the reverse as low as possible, consisting of some inferior device, in order that all the effect may be given to the obverse. But in the present instance the relief both of the head and reverse is so managed, that the machinery of the Mint has been applied with success to produce a bold impression on both sides, and by that means to render the coin, in the reverse as well as in the obverse engraving, uniform in beauty and effect.

The fabrication of this coinage, by means of some improvements which have been recently introduced into the machinery of the Mint, has been effected in a very superior manner. The universal practise of sizing the blank pieces to their proper weight with the file or scraper, was highly detrimental to the beauty of the coin, by causing deep abrasions to appear on the surface. The new crown-pieces are untouched by the file or scraper, and the adjusting process is performed with a greater degree of accuracy than has hitherto been attained; by a very ingenious mechanical instrument, which reduces the bars and fillets to an uniform thickness, and causes the pieces to be produced of their given weight, without the assistance of any manual operation.

The very great difficulty of having the raised letters upon the edge of coins which are struck in the collar, has hitherto prevented the Royal Mint, as well as the foreign Mints, applying the same to the fabrication of monies intended for general circulation. The crowns of former monarchs have the raised letters; but the pieces being struck out of the collar, are neither perfect in the circle, nor uniform in size with each other. To produce the raised letter on the edge of the coin, it is necessary, in order to free the piece from the collar, that the latter should consist of various parts, constituting what the French call the virole brève. Medals and specimen-pieces are frequently struck in the virole brève; but it was reserved for the British Mint to accomplish the task of fabricating a whole coinage, which should have the raised letter on the edge, and at the same time be struck in the collar.

When we consider what a mere fractional attention has been paid to the Fine Arts by our Government, and especially to that part of them which has to do with almost the every day's concern of every person in the kingdom—the public Mint,—when we consider how unartist-like and mean have been the coin it has issued for a century past, as if the Muse of tasteful Invention and Design was ashamed to shew her beautiful face on coins devoted by millions to the usual purposes of Legitimacy,—we confess we were not a little surprized at seeing, on the whole, so elegant a Reverse as that on the new Crown Pieces just issued. It is however a foreigner alone that has been employed to engrave the new Crown; and though we admit, that from the neglect of the Numismatic Art by Government, our Medalists have not yet arrived at that excellence which the superior taste existing in foreign States has induced abroad, yet our native Artists have shewn an ability in the execution of Medalic busts, that might and ought, we think, to have been stamped on the Obverse of this new Coin. Mr. MUDIE, who in his Grand Series of Forty Medals commemorating English Victories, &c. has done more than forty of our Governments, who indeed till now have done nothing, for the promotion of Medal Engraving, has sufficiently shewn how capable our Artists would have been to have engraved the head of the King on the new Crown. Mr. WEBB has actually, in that Series, engraved his Majesty's effigy in a superior manner; for while it has great delicacy, which we admit Signor PISTRUCCI's has, it has characteristic touches, and good filling up of the facial outline, which the able Italian's has not. The heads are both, however, much too young. We like too, in Mr. WEBB's, its greater relief; the Italian Artist's is insipid and flat; for while there may be a heavy degree of relief disproportioned to the size of the object, there is, on the contrary, a vapid want of relief, which, like the face in the Obverse before us, looks as if it had been worn away, or that it had sunk to nearly a level with the field. In employing English as well as foreign Artists in the Grand Series of Medals, the projector and proprietor of it has done that justice to his countrymen, which their abilities in the engraving of Busts, and the nationality of the subject, demanded. The present Reverse, representing St. George slaying the Dragon, has considerable beauty and power of design and engraving. It has too a proper firmness in the touches and outlines, yet withal due dexterity and neatness. The character of terror would, we think, have been improved by an increased size in the Dragon, while the general arrangement or composition would have been pleasing.

The official circular, announcing the character of the forthcoming Crown, has a mixture of truth and error, in high-sounding phrases of eulogy, that necessarily excited suspicion of its being one of those ignorant bespeakings of the approbation of the public abounding in a hired press. We were therefore really prepared to expect much less talent than has come forth in the coin, and were agreeably surprised to find that the Master of the Mint had some reason for his exulting and applauding tone. Delighted perhaps at having at last hit upon what he has been so long and so profusely paid with 3000*l.* a-year for not doing, he was impatient to forestall that approbation, which he was too well advised not to know would at any rate be in part at least bestowed. We say advised, for we have been credibly informed, that Signor PISTRUCCI was dispatched to Paris to advise with the distinguished French Artist and late Master of the Mint, Baron DENOY, respecting the new Crown. "This Coin," says the Circular, "will complete the Series of the new silver monies." When we look at the beautiful Series we have referred to, and then recollect the few mean coins here called a Series, an involuntary smile arises at the ignorance or vanity of the phrase. "In lieu of the Royal Arms," says the Circular, "which afford no scope for the ingenuity and talents of the Artist, the subject of the legendary tale of St. George and the Dragon has been adopted for the Reverse, and is a well-chosen and pleasing allegory, suited to the occurrences of the times." This may be Mr. WELLESLEY POLE's opinion and every other sinecurist's, who, while the numerous artizans and turned adrift sailors are starving, get large sums in consequence of "the occurrences of the times;" but he may be assured, that the suffering people of England think very differently.—"To give a high relief to the impression on both sides of the piece," adds the Mint Circular, "has hitherto been considered as impracticable in the fabrication of coin, and it has therefore been the custom to keep the Reverse as low as possible, consisting of some inferior device, in order that all the effect might be given to the Obverse. But in the present instance, the relief both of the Head and the Reverse is so managed, that the machinery of the Mint has been applied with success to produce a bold relief on both sides." This is so entirely false, that we never saw an obverse with less relief. Less it could hardly have to be visible. "It was reserved for the British Mint," concludes the Circular, "to accomplish the task of fabricating a whole coinage, which should have the raised letter on the edge, and at the same time be struck in the collar." This also is a palpable falsehood. We have before us a Crown Piece of CHARLES II. in 1662, on both sides of which, round the face, are inscriptions, and on the edge the identical motto, "Decus et Tutamen," which was furnished by Mr. EVELYN to Sir PHILIP LLOYD, then Master of the Mint. We have also a 6 and a 2-Franc French piece by the veteran Engraver DROZ, where there is a lettering on the same part on which the Garter is seen on the new Crown, and also on the same part of the Reverse, while the edge has too an inscription, most delicately executed, forming a contrast to the very coarse and unfinished style of the lettering on the edge of the Crown. These Franc Pieces were the current coin, too, not of a great Empire, like England, but of a petty Principality in Germany, Neuchâtel, with BERTHIER, whose head is on the Obverse, as its Prince. What a sad thing for a Master of the Mint to have no one about him friendly enough to caution him against thus exposing his want of information!

To conclude for the present, we apprehend, from all we have heard and seen during the Mastership of Mr. WELLESLEY POLE, that whatever other arts the Hon. Gentleman may excel in, he is very little acquainted with those of design. DENOY, the Director of the French Imperial Mint, was not appointed on account of family or senatorial or military connexions, but because he was not only a man of sense and a distinguished connoisseur, but even possessed considerable executive talents as an artist. NAPOLEON never put ignorant men into posts of eminence; but in this country, it is influence,—too often servile, crooked, and corrupt influence,—not talent, which elevates to office. The consequence is, that native merit is neglected, the arts languish, and the national character is tarnished.

R. H.

We understand that, by order of Government, the further issue of the new crown pieces to the public has been restrained, on account of the introduction into the die of the name of the Italian artist who executed it. The several banking-houses in town have each received a supply to the amount of 100*l.* The remainder will all be sent back to the Mint to receive the impression of the altered die.—Times.

This is an awkward incident for the Master of the Mint, marking as it does his blundering speed and ill taste. The name of "Pistrucci" was placed in such a conspicuous situation on the coin, as to be quite offensive to even a common eye; yet it passed Mr. WELLESLEY POLE's, and the coin was issued. By whose better judgment it has been recalled, we know not; neither is it stated how much this piece of vanity in the Artist, and want of discernment in the Patron, will cost the nation.

AN ANCIENT SUPERSTITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—Turning over the leaves of a book entitled “On Ancient Superstition,” I was very much struck with the following account, principally from the odd mixture of refinement and barbarity that it exhibits; and should any of your readers be aware of any thing parallel, either in ancient or modern times, it may be interesting to the public. The period that the history refers to seems to be about A. M. 2186, or 1818 years before Christ. It appears that in a wealthy and populous empire, wherein, after the custom of the Heathens, a community of Gods with the neighbouring nations obtained, that the worship of one mightily grew and prevailed, not only so far as to become the object of pretty general and sincere worship, but to obtain human sacrifices, notwithstanding it was the national boast, and indeed its truth appears to be admitted by their contemporaries, that they excelled other nations in their expece and care for the alleviation of human suffering. This superstition seems not to have been extinct in our Saviour’s time, for the name that he employs, “Mammon,” was that of their Idol. The principal temple was in the metropolis of the empire, where there was a large establishment of High Priests and Scribes, some of whom seem to have been like the Pharisees, “who for a pretence make long prayers;” and some like the Sadducees, who, in their worship of the God of this world, “deny that there is any resurrection.” They had Lawyers also and Judges, who bore a considerable share in the forms of worship, and without whose ministry, indeed, the more solemn parts, according to the custom of the country, could not be executed. These were more or less zealous for their Idol; some grudging him the number of his victims; others wishing to sacrifice little children, lest their God should withdraw from them a pocket handkerchief now and then, if they so far slumbered in their worship as not to guard their pockets. It is recorded, that a struggle once arose in the minds of the High Priests, between their fear of offending their Idol by withholding human sacrifices, and their fear that the humanity of the people should be so far outraged, that “their craft, whereby they had their wealth,” should be endangered: this led to strange contests between the zealots and their victims,—the latter wishing to appeal to the feelings of the people by avowing themselves to have incurred the horrible penalty,—the former hoping to conciliate their Idol by securing to him as many victims as possible—the criminal avowing his guilt—the Judge conjuring him to be innocent. Some surprise may be felt at the High Priests’ wishing to decline their victims, as it appears from a table of fees at the end of the account, that the executioners charge for each criminal was but very trifling; but this being a religious sacrifice, the mode of executing it was not a little remarkable. A rope being fastened round the victims neck, and conveyed over a wall, was required to be pulled by the population of the city, and as the co-operation of some and the acquiescence of all was necessary, the fear of losing their victims altogether was not without foundation. The very remote period to which this account relates, will prevent some of its details from obtaining credit, for who can believe, at this time of day, that the most trifling and worthless articles were, by the influence of this superstition and through faith of believers, considered equivalent to large masses of the precious metals?—that these magical symbols were designedly rude and inartificial, that the power of imitating them should be enjoyed by inferior workmen, and the honour of furnishing victims for the Idol not be confined to persons of talent, who, from their other engagements, might neglect the opportunity? The remarkable success of this part of the scheme, and the fear that the people would not pull the rope, induced the High Priests, after fifteen years unremitting endeavour to find excuses for continuing the above system, to consent to an alteration in the mode of deliberating upon it. When I come to the result of this, you shall hear again from

MORE SLANDERS OF THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—Your readers will probably recognize the following paragraph, as having occupied a conspicuous place in an article on Mr. Morris Birkbeck’s “Notes on a Journey in America,” in the last number of the Quarterly Review :—

“With regard to friend Morris, we understand that during the late war he held the lease of a farm, at a rent of about 500*l.*, which was worth three times that sum: that on its expiring he had it renewed at a rent more nearly approaching its real value, when the sudden change from war to peace having reduced the demand for produce, and consequently the value of land, to rid himself of his engagements and his country at the same time, he threw up his farm un beau matin, and, laughing in his sleeve at the humorous trick which he had played his unsuspecting landlord, set out on a land speculation in the back settlements of North America.”—P. 55.

The following is a real statement of the circumstances to which the Reviewer alludes, on the authenticity of which you may rely :—

Mr. Birkbeck held a farm under Lord Onslow, on lease, at a rent of 1,200*l.* a year. He left England with the full knowledge of Lord Onslow; and his son was, with his Lordship’s sanction, and after a particular inquiry into his competency, left behind to manage the farm. Lord Onslow having intimated an opinion that the rent at which the farm was held was beneath its real value, Mr. Birkbeck jun. said, that if his Lordship could find a tenant at an advanced rent, he would willingly give up his interest in the lease, (of which about 14 years were unexpired,) on receiving an adequate compensation. The lease has since been relinquished to his Lordship for the sum of 2,000*l.*, another tenant having offered 1,500*l.* a year for the farm.

This, Sir, is only one of the many misrepresentations with which the article abounds; but as it so deeply affects the moral character of Mr. Birkbeck, I have thought it my duty, as his friend, to lay it before the public. They will judge, from this specimen, of the spirit in which the whole article is written, and of the reliance to be placed on statements coming from such a quarter.—I am, &c. G.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

On Thursday, George Edwards was indicted for publishing a libel against Hannah, the wife of — Greaves.

Mr. ALLEY observed, that the prisoner had, from what motive it did not appear, written and exhibited in several places a most wicked, scandalous, and indecent libel, casting the foulest reflections upon the character and conduct of Mrs. Greaves; and instead of expressing any contrition for what he had done, when a remonstrance was made to him, he went from place to place, and seemed rather to boast of it. Under these circumstances the prosecutor thought it necessary to bring the case before a Jury, and to refuse the offers of a compromise which had been made.

Mr. Greaves stated, that he was landlord of the Brown Bear public house, Bow-street. In consequence of having seen a paper written by defendant, he remonstrated with him, and defendant did not deny the fact, but told him it was done for “a bit of fun.” An associate of the prisoner, who was implicated in the transaction, was indicted and found guilty for it last session. [Here the libel was handed in to the Jury, it being considered of two indecate a nature to be read openly in Court.]

Mr. ARABIN, for the defendant, said, that to save the time of the Court, he would admit the libel.

The Jury returned a verdict of Guilty, when the CHAIRMAN, after a suitable admonition to the prisoner, said, that the sentence of the Court was, that he be confined in the House of Correction for 12 months.

Thomas Norwich was indicted and found guilty of stealing a box-coat and a waistcoat belonging to John White, the coachman to Mrs. Garrick, relict of the celebrated David Garrick. The prosecutor, who is a very old man, being asked by a gentleman from the Bench how old Mrs. Garrick was, answered, that she was 106 years in August last.

On Friday, at an early hour, the passage leading to the Sessions-house was much crowded by persons, in the expectation of hearing the trial between Mr. Henry Hunt and Mr. Lee, the High-Constable, in consequence of some proceedings arising out of the Westminster Election; but, after waiting a considerable time, they began to disperse, it being announced that Mr. Hunt had declined proceeding further in the affair.

W. Clarke, a respectable-looking old man, was indicted and found Guilty, for indecently exposing himself in Hyde-park. He was sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

POLICE.

UNION-HALL.

MOST ATROCIOUS MURDER.

A murder of a most atrocious character was perpetrated on Friday se'night. The following are the particulars, as stated in evidence on Saturday:—John Forester, a constable of Aldgate, stated, that he had been directed by the Lord Mayor to bring before the Magistrates a young man named Joseph Williams, whom he had taken into custody on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of Mary Halbert, daughter of Mr. Halbert, of Thomas's-street, Kent-road. The prisoner and another man, named Robert Dean, were in the service of Mr. Tyrrell, engraver, Church-row, Aldgate, and lodged together. On Friday night, Mr. Tyrrell received information that a murder had been committed on a child by Dean, in the Kent-road, and that the prisoner had been seen in his company a short time previously. Mr. Tyrrell immediately sent for Forester, and directed him to go to the lodgings of Dean and Williams, and take the first who came home into custody. Williams returned about nine on Friday evening, and Forester secured him.—Sarah Williams, grandmother, to the murdered child, residing with Mr. and Mrs. Halbert, stated, that her grand-daughter was about four years and a quarter old. On Friday evening Robert Dean came to Mr. Halbert's about seven in the evening, accompanied by the prisoner. They afterwards went out together, and in about a quarter of an hour Dean returned alone. He had always appeared remarkably fond of the child. She was playing in the street when Dean returned, and Mrs. Williams called her in, and told her that Mr. Dean was come. She immediately left off playing, ran to Dean, and upon his taking her up, put her arms round his neck. He then said that he should buy her some apples, and took her to a shop for that purpose; not returning home immediately, Mrs. Williams went out to look for the child, and observing her in Dean's arms with an apple in her hand, she was about to return, when Dean requested her to go and purchase some articles for him. She did as he had requested, but had not been in the shop more than two minutes when she heard a cry of murder, and saw a great number of persons run towards her daughter's house. She made all possible haste to the same place, and upon arriving there saw the child being supported by her father, and the blood streaming from a dreadful wound in the throat. Dean was gone. The unfortunate infant languished about half an hour and expired; and another wound was then discovered on the lower part of the stomach. The circumstance occurred about eight o'clock, or a quarter after.—May, the officer, upon hearing of the transaction, went to the residence of the parents, for the purpose of inquiry. He arrived a little before nine, the child was then dead, and Mrs. Halbert in a fit. The evidence given by Mrs. Williams corresponded with what he heard upon the spot where the murder was committed. Some other circumstances came to his knowledge, which appeared to explain in some measure the motives of the murderer for the perpetration of the horrid deed. During the visit of Dean on Friday, Mrs. Halbert chided him, in terms of great severity, for having formed some improper connexion with persons of depraved character, and for squandering away his money upon his immoral associates. He appeared to be extremely hurt, but said nothing that indicated an intention of taking revenge. About eight o'clock Mrs. Halbert was horror-struck on perceiving her child staggering into the room where she was sitting, with a dreadful gash in her throat, from which the blood flowed in a torrent. The poor little infant faintly cried "Mother, Mother!" and fell down. Dr. Walshman and two medical men were sent for, and did every thing for the little sufferer that could be performed.—Williams said, that he parted with Dean at the Surrey Theatre between seven and eight o'clock, and had never seen him since. Dean said at parting, that he intended to go into the Borough. Dean had not been home to his lodgings since Wednesday. Prisoner could not account for his conduct; he appeared a steady and good tempered man when sober, but was extremely ferocious when intoxicated; but he was not aware that Dean was inebriated on Friday; he knew nothing of the murder himself until informed by Forester, who took him into custody.—Several persons came forward to prove that the prisoner was at a considerable distance from Thomas's-street at the time of the murder, that he spent the evening with some friends of great respectability, and went to his lodgings at his usual hour. He was discharged.—Dean is five feet eight inches high, Roman nose, full face, and rather handsome.

On Tuesday, at an early hour a report was spread throughout the Borough, that Dean was in custody, and would undergo an examination. An immense crowd of persons assembled about Union-hall Office. About five o'clock on Tuesday morning, a young man accosted Joseph Myatt, constable of St. Andrew's, Holborn, stating that he was a murderer, and was desirous of surrendering himself; the constable was astonished. He requested the applicant to be more explicit; the young man said he murdered a child at Newington. Your name is Dean, said the watchman; I am that unfortunate man, he replied. He was then taken into the watch-house and properly secured. During his continuance there he was asked by Myatt, whether at the time of the murder being committed he was in a state of intoxication, to which he answered he was never more sober in his life. At seven he was taken to Giltspur-street Compter, and information of his surrender was sent to May, the officer. May waited upon the Lord Mayor, and received directions to take the prisoner to this office. The Coroner and Jury had in the mean time assembled at the Rockingham Arms, Newington, to take an inquisition on the body of the child, and the Sitting Magistrate considered that the most satisfactory mode of proceeding would be to send him immediately before the Coroner. At noon the coach arrived at Union-hall office, containing May, the prisoner Dean, and Myatt the constable, who proceeded to the Rockingham Arms, followed by about 2,000 persons. The unhappy parent of the child was standing at the door of the Rockingham Arms when the prisoner descended from the coach; but he soon became known; the moment his eyes were fixed on the person of the prisoner, his countenance grew pale with rage, his eyes flashed fury, and with the rapidity of lightning he darted upon the culprit, and but for the timely interference of the officers would have avenged on the spot the immolation of his child. One hand of the prisoner was fastened to May's, and with the other he covered his eyes, nor once dared to meet the glance of the wretched father. The following is the evidence taken before the Coroner:—

Mrs. Mary Halbert, mother of the deceased, stated, that her mother went into the street, and saw the deceased in Dean's arms at the top of the court in Thomas's-street; Dean asked witness's mother, if she would go to a chandler's-shop, and purchase him some tobacco, which she consented to do; and while she was gone on the errand, something impelled witness to rise from the chair; she felt a kind of internal alarm, and she, without any motive, ran into the court, and met the deceased near the house door; she reeled towards her, and appeared to have a red handkerchief round her neck. Witness took the deceased into her arms, and the blood gushed from her throat all over her clothes; the deceased put out her arms, and then dropped down as if she had expired or fainted; witness awoke her husband, and said "Our child is murdered!" the husband replied, "You are mad surely." He took hold of the deceased, and seeing that she was dying, he ran into the court and said "Who did it?" Witness told her husband that "Dean had done it, she was sure;" and she then informed him that Dean came in while he was asleep, and went out with the deceased, with the professed intention of buying her an apple.

[It was at this period of the evidence that the murderer was brought from Union-hall police office; several thousands of persons had collected round the house where the Jury were sitting, and would have torn the delinquent to pieces, but for the spirited intervention of the Police. The witness ran to the window of the Jury-room, from whence she had a view of the person of Dean, as he was sitting in the hackney-coach; she screamed most loudly and terrifically, "That is the murderer of my dear child; Oh, the villain! Oh, the murderer!" &c., and fell into an hysterical fit; she was removed into another room by a surgeon who was present. Dean was placed in a room adjoining the Jury-room.]

Joseph Williams, the brother of the last witness, being sworn, gave a long statement, which bore no further upon the question than to show that Dean was in unsettled and distressed circumstances.

Mrs. Sarah Williams, the mother of the above witnesses, and grandmother to the deceased, deposed to the same effect.

Mr. Weston, surgeon, stated that the wound was sufficient to inflict death.

Joseph Myatt, sworn. About a quarter of an hour before five o'clock that morning, a man, who said his name was Robert Dean, came to the watch-house of St. Andrew's, Holborn; he said that "he came to surrender himself, for he was a murderer, and could not hold out any longer;" witness asked him what murder he had done, and he said, "He had murdered a child over in the Borough;" he seemed very much agitated, and asked leave to warm himself; witness told him that he might if he thought proper; witness took him from thence to the Poultry Compter: on the way witness conversed with Dean, and asked him how he came to commit the dreadful act? Dean replied, "Why, the devil was over him." Dean begged that he might be well used in prison; witness promised he should; Dean said that he was, during the whole of Monday last, lurking about Bow-street Police-office, in hopes that some one would recognize him, but as no one did, he had not courage to resign himself up; he had been wandering about ever since he committed the crime; and he went to a chapel in Moorfields, and heard a sermon preached, which so afflicted his mind, that he resolved to surrender himself up to justice; he said he was quite sober when he committed the act. Dean appeared perfectly composed when he gave the above relation.

The Coroner having said a few words, the Jury returned a verdict of—Wilful Murder against Robert Dean.

The Coroner issued his warrant for his committal to Horse-monger-lane gaol.—Before Dean was removed, the Coroner ordered the constables to bring him into the Jury-room. He was brought in handcuffed.

Mr. JEMMETT asked which was Robert Dean?

Dean burst into tears, and in great agitation said, "I am that unfortunate man."

CORONER.—I am sorry to see you charged with such a horrid crime.

Dean (beating his forehead in great agony with his right hand) said, "It is a dreadful thing surely."

CORONER.—It is my duty to commit you; I have issued my warrant, and I hope you will think of your awful situation, and may God have mercy upon you.

Prisoner (writhing with agony).—"I hope he will."

The prisoner was then conveyed in a hackney-coach to Horse-monger-lane Gaol.

A case-knife was found in the court where the murder was committed, which is supposed to be the instrument used by Dean to effect his purpose; it is about eight inches long, with a white handle, and is the property of Mr. Halbert; it is in the possession of May, the officer.

CONFESSION.—During the time the Inquest was held, Dean was placed in a private room. Dean whispered to May, that if he were left alone he would relate to him the whole particulars of the dreadful transaction. Every person present left the room, and the prisoner then made the following confession:—"On Friday evening last, I met a young man named Joseph Williams, with whom I had long been intimate at Mrs. Halbert's house. I had long been acquainted with a young woman, named Sarah Longman, daughter of Mr. Longman, at the Grapes, Chancery-row, Aldgate; my affection for her was extremely great; I had for some time past corresponded with her. A dispute unhappily arose; I wrote to her upon the subject, expressing my regret at the unfortunate rupture; described the very great regard which I entertained for her; implored her to consent to a reconciliation; and begged that she would write me an early answer. She never replied to my letter. Her father called upon me, and wished that the connexion might be discontinued. These circumstances had an indescribable effect upon my mind; I was miserably unhappy, was incapable of attending to any business, and gave myself entirely up to despair. I endeavoured to prevail upon her to renew the correspondence. I felt that I never could be happy in this world without her, and determined to leave it. Thoughts of a dreadful description entered my mind, and must have proceeded from the devil. I felt that I should leave the world in a state of happiness if I could murder her, and determined to perpetrate the deed. I had been from home two days, business not being very brisk; and on Friday evening I called to see Williams, at Mrs. Halbert's, and we both came out together, and walked in company as far as the Surrey theatre; we did not go in. I told Williams that I wanted to see a gentleman in the Borough, and should go that way. We parted, and I returned to Mrs. Halbert's. After talking in a very friendly manner with the family, I asked for a knife, and they supposing that I wanted to cut some bread, gave me a case knife. I took an opportunity of concealing it unperceived in my pocket. I shortly after went out with the child to buy her some apples, which having done, I returned to the court. A sudden thought came over my mind that if I murdered the child, who was innocent, I should not commit so great a crime as in murdering Sarah Longman, who was older, and, as I imagined, had sins to answer for. In a moment I pulled the knife out of my pocket, put the child down out of my arms, held her head back, and cut her throat; in an instant I imagined that I was in the midst of flaming fire, and the court appeared to me like the entrance of hell. I ran away, not knowing where I went, or what I did; I wandered about in a state of distraction, until I surrendered myself up at the watch-house.

Dean has been ever since his commitment entirely absorbed in meditation. He requested that a Bible and prayer-book, which were found at his lodgings, and had been taken possession of by May, the constable, might be given to him; the books were delivered, and he has incessantly employed himself in the perusal of them. He weeps very much, and speaks in terms of great affection of the child which was sacrificed by his hand.

ANOTHER DREADFUL CASE.

William Edmunds was on Monday brought before the Magistrates by Edward Padder, headle of Putney, charged with attempting to murder Mary Edmunds his wife, Mary his daughter, a child seven years of age, and Sarah Dyer. On Monday the 12th instant, as Mrs. Sarah Massey, of Putney, was passing the residence of the prisoner, she heard a cry of "Murder;" being extremely terrified, she was afraid to go in, and went past the house about 23 o'clock; a woman named Dalton then came running out, and in a state of dreadful agitation informed her that Edmunds was murdering his wife and child. She was upon the point of going to seek assistance, when the prisoner's daughter ran out of the house, pursued by the father, who overtook and struck her a blow on the neck with something which he had in his hand, but the distance prevented her from seeing what description of weapon it was that he used; he continued to pursue the child for several yards, and then fell down. Mrs. Massey carried the child to the nearest house (Mrs. Dalton's); she had a dreadful wound on the back of her neck, from whence the blood flowed in torrents; and after delivering her to Mrs. Dalton's family, she went in search of some person to assist in securing the prisoner. She met Mr. Stephens of Putney, who went immediately to Edmunds and saw the prisoner lying on the ground, fast held by Mrs. Edmunds and a young man named Dyer. He held a clasp knife, opened, in his right hand, and after much struggling they succeeded in disarming him. Mrs. Edmunds was then bleeding very much from a wound. A messenger was despatched to Padder: upon his arrival he found the prisoner in custody of Dyer and Stephens, and was informed, that besides wounding his wife and daughter, he had inflicted two dangerous wounds on a female named Dyer, one on her neck, and the other on the back part of her head. The parish officers being induced to consider that his horrible conduct had been occasioned by insanity, directed that he should be taken to a mad-house. Their orders were carried into execution; and subsequently receiving information from the keeper, that his conduct had been rational, and his mind apparently composed, they gave instructions to conduct him before the Magistrates, that the case might be investigated. It was stated by Padder, that the wounded parties were unable to attend for the purpose of giving evidence.—The Prisoner, upon being interrogated as to his motives, said that he was perfectly unacquainted with the transaction; he was subject to fits.—The Magistrate observed, that it was necessary to have the opinion of some medical men as to the state of the prisoner's mind, and it was also indispensably necessary to have the evidence of the wounded parties. The prisoner was remanded.

In addition to the above particulars, we hear that it is the opinion of Mr. Smith, the surgeon, that the wife and child of Edmunds are doing quite well, and out of danger. It seems also, that Mrs. Dyer (who is the wife of a very respectable market-gardener, residing at the back of Edmund's cottage) is also going on favourably, but from the complicated nature of the wounds upon the head, cannot be considered safe for some time. Mrs. Dyer is between 40 and 50 years old; and it is solely by her determined courage and exertions that the lives of the wife and child are saved. Attracted by the screams of the family, she burst into the house, and found Edmunds with his wife under his arm, and deliberately cutting her throat, the blood flowing profusely. In an instant, Mrs. Dyer seized Edmunds to rescue the poor woman from his hands; she struggled with him and had her hand cut by his knife. The wife escaped, but Edmunds succeeded in knocking down Mrs. Dyer; he then cut her through the muscles of the back of the head to the bone, causing a deep and extensive wound; in the mean time, one of Edmund's children (an interesting little girl of about seven years of age) ran out of the house, crying for assistance. Edmunds then left Mrs. Dyer, and overtook his child, whom he also cut through the muscles of the back of the head, to the extent, in length, of three inches and an half. At this moment Mrs. Dyer, although bleeding very much from her first wound, again seized him to save the child from being murdered, when he struck at her with his knife, and inflicted a wound of three inches in length on the left side of the head, laying bare the skull, and dividing the artery; with his exertions he fell, and the husband of Mrs. Dyer, and other persons, coming to her assistance, they pinned him down with the knife grasped in his hand, but sticking in the ground, until his hands and legs were tied, and he was completely secured. Edmunds is only 39 years of age, and has the character of having been a very quiet inoffensive man, when well, and not at all addicted to drinking; he has always supported his family, and brought up his children, without any parochial assistance, by having worked as a jobbing painter in the neighbourhood, and by the produce of two or three cows, which he has kept on the common. When very young, he was in the navy, and from some hurt he received in the service, he has for many years complained of a distressing pain in his head, which in spite of every assistance ended in epilepsy; lately he has been very sombre and religious. On the morning of his dreadful attempt to murder his family, he was quietly breakfasting with his wife and children, and reading the Bible, when he suddenly formed, without any provocation, his dreadful determination of sacrificing them.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

A case of an extraordinary nature occurred on Friday at this office. A gentleman who resided at Bluns-row, Bayswater, represented a day or two since, that a person had been engaged in his family as a female servant; after this person had been there a few days, a man-servant, who had a spark of affection for a female who had resided there some time, informed him, that the person lately received into his service was a man, and not a female, and that he had seduced the maid. Upon this the gentleman re-narrated with the person, who declared that she was a woman; the gentleman insisted upon this doubtful being immediately quitting his house, and threatened to investigate the matter; but the culprit promised to quit the kingdom. A few days afterwards the gentleman missed several articles, and his suspicion naturally fell upon the person he had lately dismissed. Upon inquiry, he learned that a correspondence was carried on with a person residing in Strutton-ground, Westminster; he went there, and, to his astonishment, saw the being he suspected, and said, "You monster, are you still in England?" Upon this statement, the Magistrate granted a warrant against Samuel Watson, alias Samuel Watson. Plank and Jefferies went to Strutton-ground, knocked at the door; the person inside was some time ere she opened it, during which Plank heard some one say, "Sally, the officers are after you." The person of whom they were in pursuit jumped out of a window, ten feet from the ground, at the back of the house, and escaped. The following morning, the woman who lived in Strutton-ground inquired of the officers what charge was against her; they replied, "Only a trifling affair; she is charged with being a man." "Oh! Oh!" replied the woman, "if that's all, I'll find her out, for I know she's a woman;" and she accordingly produced the woman on Friday morning. The evidence, as regards the felony, was adjourned until Tuesday. This woman had persuaded a young female, who resides at a wholesale jeweller's in Good-street, Soho, that she was of the male sex, and had actually gained the girl's affection. What the object of the woman could be in thus misleading this girl, as well as the whole of her conduct, is altogether unexplained.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

For a week past the water in the well of the Duke of York public-house, at Brompton, Kent, has been affected with so nauseous a taste and smell, that it became unfit for use; and within the last few days the smell at the well had become so exceedingly offensive that no one would go near it. On Saturday morning a soldier was lowered down, but before he arrived at the bottom he was almost overpowered by the fetid effluvia, and called out to the men who were lowering him to stop. Having waited a few seconds and recovered himself, he proceeded till the bucket touched the water, when, leaning over its side, he, with infinite horror and dismay, discovered a naked human body floating on its back. Terrified in the extreme, and almost reduced to insensibility at the horrid sight, he called to the men on the bank of the well to draw him up. One of his comrades then went down with a sheet, and having folded it round the dead body, it was drawn up; the soldier, however, nearly fell a sacrifice to his exertions, he was so affected by the foul air, that he lost his senses just as he came within the reach of the bystanders, who caught hold of him, and prevented him from falling into the well. The body proved to be that of a woman about 37 years of age, named Donnelly, the wife of a soldier lately discharged from the 98th regiment. She was far advanced in pregnancy, and being completely naked, it was immediately suspected that the woman had been murdered. A Coroner's Jury was summoned, when it appeared that in the early part of September, the 98th regiment, to which the husband of the deceased belonged, arrived from Halifax. Donnelly was then quartered at the Duke of York; he came there accompanied by his wife and two children, and was lodged in a room at the back of the house, the window of which is about five feet from the well in which the deceased person was found. The woman was about twelve years older than Donnelly; she was very much attached to him; but was extremely jealous, and frequently evinced that passion when he spoke to another female; their quarrels consequently were frequent. On the night of the 17th of September, their conduct became desperate; Donnelly forced his wife towards the well, and threatened to throw her into it; her screams brought persons to her assistance, and she was released from his violent efforts to force her towards the well's mouth. The whole of that night, however, she lay in the open air on the steps, where she was found next morning with her clothes wet through. She was advised to go to her apartment, which she did, and in the course of the day she became reconciled to her husband. On the following Saturday night she was at the club-room at the Duke of York in apparent health and spirits; after that time she was not seen alive by any one in the house. On Sunday morning, the 20th Sept., Donnelly came down from his apartment, and sat in the tap-room with his two children, but without his wife; inquiries were made after her, and he said that she had gone the preceding night on a visit to her friends; he did not know when she would return; that she had taken 3*l.* to defray her expenses, &c. To other inquiries, he said that she was gone off with another man. A female, who went into his apartment on the day after Donnelly's wife disappeared, stated, that she found every thing about the room in the greatest disorder; the clothes of the deceased were scattered about in all directions, and she observed marks of blood upon the bed-linen. Donnelly remained at the Duke of York after the deceased was missing for more than a fortnight, and frequently conversed about his absent wife without the least emotion. He said she was gone off with a fellow, and would not trouble him again, and since that period he has cohabited with another woman. The Jury returned a verdict of "Willful Murder against William Donnelly, the husband of the deceased," and a warrant has since been issued for his commitment to the county goal.

It was a Mr. Ridley, a shoemaker, in St. Paul's church-yard, who put a period to his existence on Friday week. It appears that his mother was occupied in the kitchen, which is situated on an upper floor, and suddenly she was alarmed by a noise in the apartment below, resembling the throwing down of a quantity of water. Supposing the servant girl had met with some such accident, she immediately went down to the room, and on opening the door, perceived her son stretched out upon the floor, and weltering in his blood. By the side of the unfortunate man lay a razor, the instrument of his self destruction. The floor was literally deluged with blood; and the instrument had been applied with such determined force, that it was stopped only by the vertebrae of the neck; in every other respect, the head was entirely separated from the body. An inquest was held, which returned a verdict of homicide.

An inquest was taken on Friday, in Hill-street, Berkeleysquare, upon the body of Mrs. Ann Rowden, aged 64 years.—It appeared from the evidence of a medical Gentleman, that on Wednesday morning the deceased dropped down and expired. The deceased resided with her daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Merrick; he is a master-furrier, residing at No. 4, Farm-street, Berkeley-square: the deceased was dependent upon him for support; lately he had been in great distress, and could not support his family; to relieve him, she applied to the parish for assistance; the parish officers offered to receive her into the house, but would not allow her any thing out; she expressed an aversion to going there. On Wednesday her son-in-law was arrested for 15^l, and taken to a lock-up house. The news so affected the deceased, that she instantly expired, leaving her daughter with six children, the eldest of whom is only nine years of age.—The Coroner and Jury said, that a more unfortunate case had not recently come within their knowledge, and they expressed an intention of doing something to relieve the family. Verdict—Died by the Visitation of God.

Friday morning a middle-aged man was found in Hyde-park, with his throat cut in a frightful manner; there appeared little signs of life, and he was carried to St. George's Hospital, where he was recognized to be a person of the name of James Ouy, who resided in Carrington-street, May-fair, and was formerly in good circumstances. A short time ago he lost his wife, and was left with several small children, without sufficient means of support, which has lately reduced him to a state of the most miserable despondency. On Friday morning, with the last two-pence in the world, he purchased one pennyworth of milk and a pennyworth of bread, and having divided it amongst his children, he kissed them, and having taken a last living leave, he hastened to the Park, and with a razor he committed the above act.—He lies now without the least chance of recovery in the Hospital.

Tuesday week, the wife of Mr. W. Kirby, a farmer, of Hanging Grimstone, Yorkshire, intending to mix up brimstone and cream of tartar in treacle, most unhappily mistook a quantity of arsenic, which had been in a tea-pot for seven years, for the cream of tartar, and gave the mixture to her three children and a maid-servant: two of the children expired shortly after, and the other, with the servant-maid, are not expected to escape.

On the 2d inst. a woman at Dunstable observing a great smoke proceeding from her neighbour's chimney, sent her daughter to inquire the cause; a person said, she was locked in the room, (where the smoke proceeded from,) and could not get out, as she could not find the key of the door; the girl informed her mother, and upon procuring assistance, broke the door open, and found a female, about 22 years of age, in the act of burning the pieces of flesh of her new-born illegitimate child; the entrails were consumed previous to breaking the door open. The skull was lying by the side of the mother, divided into four parts; the body, arms, and legs, were cut in pieces of about three inches, for the purpose of consuming in the flames. It appeared that the mother beat the infant's brains out against the post of the bedstead, and then proceeded to dissect the body! A Coroner's Inquest sat next day, and returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder," against the mother, Hannah Saphell, a native of Dunstable, and who was fully committed to take her trial.

On Saturday week, about two in the morning, some villains broke into the house of Mr. Leftwich, baker, in Paradi e-row, Rotherhithe. They entered through the bakehouse into the shop, from whence they stole 4*l*. 15*s*. in copper; they then proceeded up stairs, broke open the chamber-door of Mr. Leftwich, and while himself and wife were buried in sleep, took from under their bed a box, and rifled it of 250*l*. in Bank-notes. An adjoining room, in which one of the shopmen slept, next became the scene of their depredations, and without disturbing the man, who slumbered as soundly as his master and mistress, they unlocked a bureau, and took out 97*l*. in notes, and 16*l*. in silver, and made off unmolested with their booty. On Wednesday Mr. Leftwich received an anonymous letter, informing him that several of the larger notes which had been stolen, having become useless to the holders in consequence of being stopped at the Bank, he would find them to the amount of 100*l*., either in the pond, or under the bridge, at China-hall-fields, Rotherhithe. Mr. Leftwich, accompanied by some friends, went to the spot described, and in the midst of some stinging nettles he found a small parcel, covered with canvass and tied with rope-yarn, which was found to contain 100*l*. in Bank-notes, and a watch, of which he was also robbed. The letter further informed him, that the gang which broke open his house consisted of six men, and it was their intention to have murdered every person from whom they experienced resistance.

On Tuesday the Maidstone Coach that leaves this town for London at three o'clock in the afternoon, was upset in going out of Malling. The coach was overturned as it was going down the hill from West Malling into the turnpike-road, at the same place where another coach met with a similar accident a few weeks ago, and where the road is very dangerous. The consequence was, that Mr. Morgan, an eminent engineer of London, had his arm broken, a Mr. Greig received a concussion of the brain, a female servant going to service was severely bruised, and the coachman was very seriously injured. We have been informed by a most respectable Magistrate who saw the accident, that at the time it happened the coachman was not driving by any means furiously, but that the accident was occasioned by the state of the road. All the injured parties are in a fair way of recovery.—Maidstone Gazette.

On Wednesday one of the men at work on the repairs of the church, at the corner of Gracechurch-street, was precipitated from the top, and literally dashed to pieces. It was considered he was dead before he reached the ground, which was covered with his blood.

MARRIAGES.

On the 21st inst. George Ranking, Esq. jun. to Jane Frances, daughter of the Rev. Wm. Buckle, Vicar of Pyrtton and Shireburn, Oxfordshire.

On the 20th inst. Mr. Lethargie, of Pall-mall, to Ann, eldest daughter of Mr. Ayres, Stratford, Essex.

On the 20th inst., at Whitburn Church, David Barclay, Esq. son of Robert Barclay, Esq. of Bury-hill, Surrey, to Maria Dorothea, sister of Sir Hedworth Williamson, Bart. of Whitburn-hall, Durham.

DEATHS.

On the 13th July, at Frankfort on the Maine, in his 65th year, Sir John Whitley O'Carroll, Bart. formerly Lieut-Colonel of the Yorkshire Militia.

On the 16th inst., at Stanwell, in consequence of a fall from his horse, John Hall Harris, Esq. late of Caius College, Cambridge.

On the 17th instant, at Frompton, aged 47, Mr. John Porker, late of Great Newport-street.

On Saturday week, in his 44th year, after a few days illness, Mr. James Beman, of Woodstock-street, Oxford-street.

On Tuesday, Thomas Mangles, eldest son of T. Lys, Esq. of Took's-court, Chancery-lane, in the 22d year of his age.

On the 22d, of a rapid decline, aged 20, Ellen, second daughter of the Rev. Dr. Nicholas, Ealing.

By a private letter from Boulogne, dated Saturday week, we are extremely sorry to be informed of the lamentable premature death of Mr. David Cock, printer, who was drowned off the above place while in the act of bathing. The circumstances attending his unfortunate fate are nearly as follow:—Mr. C. and Mr. Ogilvie went into the water to bathe, when, by the rapidity of the current, they were carried a considerable way out to sea, and although both expert swimmers, were unable to regain the shore. Captain Bushnell, of the Vigilant packet, seeing their perilous situation, immediately went with his boat to their assistance, but only in time to save Mr. Ogilvie, who had nearly perished. Poor Mr. Cock was not so fortunate; for, being quite exhausted, and before assistance could reach him, he, alas! sunk to rise no more: his body has not yet been found.—Mrs. Cock, who accompanied her husband to Boulogne, is so affected with the melancholy catastrophe, that it is doubtful whether she will survive him.—A more tender husband, parent, and sincere friend, was seldom to be met with. A numerous acquaintance will bewail his melancholy fate, to whom it is unnecessary to describe his amiable qualifications. Many indigent individuals have lost a charitable and humane friend.

Mr. Shaw, the owner of the horse Woodark, which started for the plate at the late Stafford races, went to that town last week, with the intention of hunting; and, after eating a hearty supper, died while in the act of unbuttoning his gaiters.

On the 13th instant, at Handsworth, Staffordshire, in the 116th year of her age, Ann Smallwood, widow. She was born in 1702, the year Queen Anne came to the throne. She was the mother of 15 children, the eldest of whom, now living, is 80 years old. She had been nearly blind a few years, but all her other faculties she retained to the last.

SUPERSTITION—ITS CIVIL AND POLITICAL CONSEQUENCES.

WE resume our observations of the week before last.—Our readers remember the pitying account giving by the Missionary, of the shocking religious tortures practised upon themselves by some Hindoos; and they certainly have not forgotten the conclusion, in which he says, that if the said Hindoos do not come over to his humaner opinions, they will be tortured to all eternity! * It is no wonder such preachers get few or no proselytes,—which is particularly the case in the Indian peninsula. We have seen a book which professes to give an account of the Danish Missions in that country, and which really does so, we understand, in all its essentials; though the dialogues with the natives are not in the exact order in which they occurred. The best idea of it we can give the reader is this,—that it is such an account as might be given by a humorous Methodist of the attempts of Hindoo Missionaries to convert us; that is to say, supposing such an anomalous personage as a humorous Methodist to exist, and such a courtesy extended to the Missionaries of other countries by the polite and impartial nations of Europe, who claim it themselves. And why do the Indian Missionaries convert so few? For an obvious reason,—because the Hindoos are already both civilized and superstitious enough to dispense with the information given them by these gentlemen. Those who could form them to a finer kind of existence, have not the zeal for converting them; and those who have the zeal for converting them, bring no manners or intellect which they do not find surpassed in their own gentry. So invariably does knowledge, and not superstition, bring about any change for the better in a nation, that the only places where Missionaries ever succeed are those in which they have every sort of intellectual advantage over the natives, as in some of the South Sea Islands; and even in these instances, the conversion is very suspicious, and will be found to be considerably backsliding, without plenty of little presents and commodities. “I am your good son in the faith,” says one of their kings in a letter which was published in one of the magazines;—“I am your good son in the faith; send me, I pray, a few more hatchets.” And in some of those islands, the new dogmas themselves are evidently great stumbling-blocks, especially where the native faith is not of so threatening a description. Mr. MARINER, in his ingenuous and entertaining account of the people of the Tonga Islands, who with the occasionally better wisdom of their simplicity often put him to the blush for his sophisticated countrymen, informs us, that when they were told of the doctrine prevalent among us about eternal fire, they expressed an unaffected pity, and said it was, “a very bad thing for the Papalangis” (the clothed people); but they had no idea that it could ever touch themselves. ST. XAVIER, the old Roman Catholic Missionary in India, with all his fervent piety and his well-attested miracles to boot, the account of which DAYDEN has translated, appears to have left behind him no effects of his zeal whatever. Doubtless the people merely took him for a strange foreign gentleman exceedingly in the wrong.

* The subject has called to mind a similar absurdity on the part of a Missionary, whose nature nevertheless appears to have been unequivocally mild, and who would doubtless have shuddered to put one of his flock to a millionth part of the torture, for a single moment, which he had been taught to believe could be inflicted by God to all eternity. We allude to old EGEDE, who concludes his description of Greenland with a lamentation over the eternal destiny of a people, whom he describes as the happiest and most innocent in the creation! There was but one thing among them which the worthy Missionary looked on as at all vicious, and this was the total freedom of both sexes from jealousy, or rather an over-charitable custom which he thought should have made them feel it. He accordingly told them so; upon which all those who believed of him, felt their happiness and innocence very judiciously diminished!—See a late republication of this amusing work, printed for Messrs. ALLMAN.

But there is one thing extremely well worth attending to in all these missions; and that is, “the prostration of will and understanding” which every dogmatist of every religion demands from those whom he addresses. A Roman Catholic goes among Protestants;—he demands of them a prostration of their will and understanding. A Protestant goes among the Hindoos; he demands of them a prostration of their will and understanding. And if a Hindoo were to come among the Protestants, he would demand—No, not a Hindoo; for his nation is remarkable for being the only one which thinks that God is pleased with a diversity of religions; an opinion, for which they have at any rate more ground than for believing in such a thing as eternal punishment.

But if the Hindoos do not believe that they have the same right to claim a prostration of the will and understanding as Messrs. HIGGS and BLENKINSOP, they believe that their own priests have a right to claim it of them; and here we come to the great and universal perniciousness of those religious dogmas, be they what they may, which first put out the light of human reason and then present the DIVINE BEING to our eyes in a fierce and fiery shape. For in proportion as we are subjected to that false notion of what is great and good,—in proportion as we fear, and cower down and kneel out of a feeling of terror which we would vainly disguise to ourselves,—in proportion as we think the world “a vile world,” it’s CREATOR a being of mercies impossible to comprehend, and a future state of happiness the only attainable one and by very partial and slavish means,—in proportion, in short, as we are taught to worship mere power in others, and to decry all reason, goodness, hope, and the very claim to justice, in ourselves,—in that identical proportion are we ready prepared for all the impositions, theoretical and practical, which worldly power chuses to lay upon our shoulders.—

The dissatisfaction which the Methodists and others feel with the present establishment may be objected to us; but this only shews us one kind of bad power dissatisfied with another,—the priestly oligarchy with the civil. Where priests have obtained the temporal power, they have shewn themselves the most fierce of worldly exactors. We need not refer to Rome. CALVIN, as far as he could, lorded it in as bigoted a way as any one; and in the instance of the Hindoo superstition before us, we see into what cruel and mad self-inflictions one of the most humane people upon earth may be trampled by priestly tyranny. It is the nature of priestcraft to put every thing on a principle of obedience. The bigots and the conspirers with bigots would have us obey them, not themselves justice; and if they can succeed in giving us a fearful and inhuman notion of the GREAT and GOOD SPIRIT of the UNIVERSE, the transition from the greater prostration to the less is easy. Accustomed to submit implicitly, instead of enquiring and improving, every thing becomes dispensation,—a mystery which is to be received with humility; and from thinking we have nothing to do but to believe that the SUPREME BEING is such an one as he is described, and his describers the favourites they pretend to be, the next thing is to submit implicitly to them. Thus the Hindoo priests tell the people they must torture their bodies to propitiate the DIVINITY; the Methodists and others tell people they must torture their souls; and the framers of Holy Alliances come in and say they belong to them, and must not attempt to give any more trouble to the Anointed.

Yes; this is the sum and substance of the Holy Alliance, which after being proclaimed as a thing entirely pious and Christian-like, in the teeth of those who instantly detected it, is now impudently avowed by the very same men to be a treaty for security against political disturbances. The amount of it, translated into the vernacular, is this:—"We, the great potentates of Europe, who were frightened at the power of a greater, and so often flattered him, were at last enabled to overthrow him by dint of the promises we made you all, and your consequent help. We have succeeded by the help of the "God of Armies;"* and though somewhat frightened at first by our very success and its magnitude, we plainly see, on that very account, that you could really have had no hand in it; and so our promises are null and void. We are the evident favourites of heaven; obey us as it's viceregents; look upon us as the oracles and instruments of it's inscrutable and therefore not to be canvassed dispensations; receive at our hands what good or evil we chuse to give you; and do not pretend to make us act otherwise, any set of you, in any quarter, or we shall unite our irresistible arms, and put down your impiety and disloyalty."

Does any one doubt that this is the meaning of that really impious production the "Holy Alliance?" We refer him to the Courier newspaper of some weeks back.

Does any one, in the happy simplicity of his liberality, think it impossible such a doctrine as "prostration of the will and understanding" can be preached by any decent persons in a nation like this? We refer him to the Right

* One of the many strange designations given to the SUPREME BEING by the followers of him who protested against every species of violence, even the justifiable.

Reverend the Lord Bishop of London, whose very words they are. While the excellent Mr. BENTHAM was writing upon the perniciousness of the present system of religious education, and shewing in a most awful and unanswerable spirit of argumentation how it trained up the mind to habits of gratuitous paltering, hypocrisy, terror, and every abject vice, these words came upon him as if the system had made it's own voluntary confession. Not that it was expressed, says Mr. BENTHAM "in the character of a disorder—an epidemic disease—of which the existence ought to be deplored, and, if possible, the continuance prevented. No: but in the character of a consummation devoutly to be wished, and to the acceleration of which the utmost exertions of the official instructors of the people ought to be directed. Prostration of the understanding and the will—these are the words—the very words—expressive of the state of mind regarded by the Right Reverend Author as being "indispensable to proficiency in Christian instruction." Now, says Mr. BENTHAM, in a subsequent passage, "a mind in which the understanding and the will are prostrate—no matter before what—is a mind in the lowest state of debility, which, without a corresponding debility of body, can have place. Not more than the corporeal, can the mental part of man's frame be at once in a state of weakness and in a state of strength. If to "question" any thing that is set before it is regarded as a sin,—if to "learn," without questioning, any thing that is set before it is regarded as a duty,—set before it, with the customary threats in the back-ground, the Catholic Catechism, it is a Catholic mind;—set before it the Koran, it is a Mahometan mind."*

Yes; and set before it a Mahometan despot, it is a Mahometan slave;—set before it Holy-Alliance despots, it is an Allied European slave.

INDIAN ATROCITIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

"Is there no glory but oppression? No prosperity but fraud?"
PINCNEY'S Oration*.

SIR,—In my two preceding articles, I have dragged to light the extirpation of different Indian nations on the coast of Malabar, in which service I was employed, and I have also touched upon the demoralization of the British character in India, exemplified in the cruel policy of the Company, and the atrocious conduct of their servants. Referring to those details of horrid massacres, I may borrow still further the language of the American orator—"Was eloquence nerveless because it pleaded for humanity, and had conviction abandoned the luminous energy of truth." "Imagination startles at the bare conception of miseries," entailed, I say, on the natives of India. They are exemplified in every portion of the history of British power in that country, in the trial of Warren Hastings, and in almost every writer on the subject. Even the very agents employed to execute those atrocities have exposed them to the world. "They are acknowledged in the proverbial corruption and profligacy of the system of Indian Directors and their agency. They are witnessed in the wars of pride and conquest and avarice, which they are continually waging, and in the consequent exactions which are practised to support them;—in that disgraceful system, which has for its object the aggrandisement of individuals, and the debasement of the human species. “They are seen in the slaughter which has ravaged the plains and crimsoned the waters of India.”

It is worthy of observation, that my former unanswered statements respecting that cruel system of extirpation pursued towards the Nairs, are abundantly confirmed by Lord Valentia, who, be it remembered, writes with a bias of obligation and delicacy on the subject, because (as may be collected from his Travels) of the many civilities he received from the Company's Government; and yet his authority would enable me to swell out the enormity of these transactions.

Now, my attention is called to the late despatches from India, respecting the deposition of our faithful friend and ally, the Peishwa, whom I had the honour to serve, for a period of four years, as an officer attached to the Poonah subsidiary force, being then in command of a company of the 2d battalion 3d regiment Bombay native infantry. Having also held important commands in that country, and in particular in the province of Ahmednugur (the present seat of war) which, with a strong fortress of that name, being our principal military depot in the Deccan, and a detachment of 300 men, were entrusted to my charge, I am enabled to speak with authentic local knowledge upon this subject.

The following extracts are from a work entitled, “Marquis of Wellesley's Notes relative to the late Transactions of the Mahratta Empire.”—In page 11, of the Appendix, after giving the origin and descent of Bajee Row, the present Peishwa, the writer proceeds:—

“During the reign of the second Madhoo Rao, the present Peishwa and his brother were confined in the Fort of Juneer, near Poonah. After a calamitous reign of six years, during which Bajee Rao, the present Peishwa, was deprived by Deulat Rao Scindia of the exercise of his authority, kept in a state of the meanest degradation and restraint, and afterwards deposed by Jeswunt Rao Holkar, and in October 1804 compelled to abandon his capital of Poonah and to take refuge in the British territories, the Peishwa, by the treaty of Bassein, was restored to the full enjoyment of his rights and legitimate power, on the foundation of the support of the British Government. The treaty of Bassein being exclusively of a defensive nature, imposes no restraint upon any state or power which shall respect the rights and possessions of the British Government and its allies; and to maintain that treaty is equally the duty of his said Highness, his subjects, feudatories, and allies. The result of these considerations, combined with facts and arguments of the conduct of the British Government towards the Peishwa, towards the Nizam, and towards all its allies, demonstrates, in the most satisfactory and incontrovertible manner, that in concluding the treaty of Bassein with the Peishwa, the views and intentions of the British Government have been just, amicable, and moderate;—that the real and legitimate power of the Peishwa is effectually secured by that alliance; and that under his engagement with the British Government, the Peishwa may confidently expect to enjoy that tranquility and security, accompanied by respect and honour, which he has never experienced under the oppressive influence of his own subjects, or Feudatory Chieftains, and which he could not have attained by the aid of any other state or power.”

“The government and person of the Peishwa have long been placed under degrading subjection to the oppressive controul and unwarrantable usurpation of Dowlet Rao Scindia, who had remained with a numerous army in the vicinity of the Peishwa's capital for a considerable period of time.”—P. 23.

Compare these views of this enlightened statesman, and the following extracts from the Treaty of Bassein, with the real state of things succeeding the event of that Treaty, and with the proclamation of the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone, from the Bombay Gazette, March the 11th, entitled “Deposition of the Peishwa.”—(Vide Examiner of 27th September.)

Preamble to the Treaty of Bassein.

“The contracting parties have determined to enter into a general defensive alliance, for the complete and reciprocal protection of their respective territories, together with those of their several allies, &c. against the unprovoked aggressions or unjust encroachments of all or any enemies whatsoever.”

“Art. 4. And for the regular payment of the whole expense of the said Subsidiary Force,* his Highness Rao Pundit Purdaun † assigns and cedes in perpetuity to the Honourable Company all the territories detailed in the schedule annexed to this Treaty. ‡

“Art. 19. It is finally declared, that this Treaty, which according to the foregoing articles is meant for the support and credit of his Highness's Government, and to preserve it from loss and decline, shall last as long as the sun and moon shall endure.”

Much as has been said about the degraded state of the country and military despotism established in France since the battle of Waterloo, let us compare that with the situation of the Peishwa after the Treaty of Bassein.

A brigade of 5000 British troops were stationed in cantonments upon a rising ground, which commanded the whole city of Poonah, besides a park of artillery planted immediately over his palace. A brigade of 5000 troops were likewise stationed forty miles distant from Poonah, at Leroor, which was the head quarters. The above cantonments, as if the object of his resentment in the first instance, immediately upon the Peishwa's taking up arms against us, together with the British residency (a splendid residence) were burnt down and destroyed, and our troops compelled to retreat from Poonah, which we afterwards retook.

The country of the Deccan, during my several years residence there, presented every where a scene of wretchedness and total want of cultivation,—an abandonment by the occupiers of towns, villages, and hamlets. In some places, I have seen hecatombs of human bones strewed about the fields and near to towns and villages, the remains of those who had perished from famine pending our operations against the Mahrattas, when the peasantry, it is well known, followed our camp and subsisted themselves by picking grain from camel's dung, and eating it. Parents sold their children to us for a bag of rice, even under the idea that they were to be made slaves of. General Wellesley purchased hundreds, which he sent to a charitable institution at Madras. §

Such, to all appearance, the country remained during my four years residence. Towns, which were of considerable extent,—for instance, the Pettah of Ahmednugur,—which contained about 5000 houses, had fallen into ruins. Other towns, which contained an hundred houses, with magnificent churches and pagodas, displaying superb and scientific stone architecture, thus affording evidence of former population, were now so entirely deserted, it was difficult to find even one house inhabited.

Such was the picture of that once populous and richly cultivated country. You might travel 40 or 50 miles without seeing a human being or the mark of a plough.

To whatever cause this general depopulation and want of cultivation of the Deccan may be attributed, whether to the arbitrary system of the native government, or British system of extorting from the native Princes an immense revenue, is a question, I apprehend, but little attended to by the pampered diplomatic agents and civil servants of the Company, whose first object is to stretch to the full extent that collection of revenue with which they are en-

The following letters have appeared in the Morning Chronicle:—
TO THE GOVERNOR.

Longwood, this 19th of July, 1817.

SIR,—I have received the five cases you have taken the trouble to forward to me, containing a check-board, a box of counters, and two ivory work-baskets, sent from Canton by Mr. Elphinstone. The Emperor was surprised to see in your letter, that you conceived your duty required you should not deliver these articles. "If I acted," say you, "in strict conformity with the established regulations, I ought to abstain from sending them."

In this case, Sir, you would have done a gracious act in withholding them.

Permit me, however, to ask the meaning of your observation? Is it because these things did not arrive through the channel of the Minister? In the Minister's restrictions it certainly is stated, that Letters must come through that channel, but not such things as wearing apparel, busts, and articles of furniture. We have been constantly in the habit of receiving many things from the Cape, which have been sent for us. Besides Lord Bathurst, in his speech, and you yourself, in one of your letters, have indignantly repelled the assertion, that letters which arrived here per post, or by private hands, had been sent to London in order to be returned to this country. Hence, you neither can nor ever could be authorised to withhold such things as busts, articles of household furniture, books, and such like, not affecting in any shape the security of the detention.

It may be, perhaps, because the counters have a Crown imprinted upon them? But then, no regulation can exist of which we are kept in ignorance; nor are we aware, that we must not possess any article bearing the impression of a Crown. In that case, Sir, you must have some new sets of playing cards made, for those we have bear Crowns upon them. Our linen and small residue of plate are frequently sent to the town, and they are all marked with a Crown.

But whence emanates this regulation, which you assert to exist? Is it from your Government, which alone by the Bill has the right of making any? Your Minister has declared in open Parliament, that no restriction had been imposed since those which had been printed and proclaimed to all Europe, and which were given to your Predecessor, and by him handed over to you. He added too, that you had not imposed any restriction, but merely adopted measures for their execution. Indeed you have not the right to impose any.

The Emperor wants no favour, Sir, nor will he be indebted for any thing to any man's caprice. But he has a right to know what the restrictions are which he is subjected to. Your Government, Parliament, and all nations, have the same right.

I therefore beg you, Sir, to communicate to us these fresh restrictions, and if any such do exist, they must be in contradiction of the assertion of Lord Bathurst, "that their only object is to ensure the security of the detention." The Emperor directs me to protest against the existence of any restriction or regulation, which shall not be legally notified to him before it be put in force.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient, &c.

(Signed)

LE CTE. BERTRAND.

To Lieut.-General Sir Hudson Lowe, Governor.

TO MR. RADOWICH, MASTER GUNNER ON BOARD THE SHIP THE BARRING.

Longwood, July 16, 1817.

SIR,—I have received the marble bust of young Napoleon. I delivered it to his father. It has afforded him the most delightful gratification.

I regret it has not been in your power to come to see us, and furnish us with some particulars, which, to a father so situated, must always be interesting.

From the letters you have sent, it appears the artist estimates the value of his work at one hundred pounds sterling. The Emperor has ordered me to send you a Bill of Exchange for 300*l.* sterling. The surplus is to indemnify you for the losses he knows you have sustained on the sale of your adventure, from not having been able to land; and for the annoyance which this event has occasioned you, simple as it is, and which must have entitled you to the good opinion of every sensible man.

Have the goodness to convey the Emperor's thanks to the persons who have had this obliging attention.—I have the honour to be, your very humble and most obedient servant, (Signed) LE CTE. BERTRAND.

P. S. I request you will be so good as to acknowledge the receipt of the inclosed Bill of Exchange.

The Chronicle of Wednesday gave another Letter from St. Helena, dated Longwood, Aug. 16, 1818, written by Count Bertrand to Las Cases. The following are extracts:—

"Things are materially altered since your departure. The vexations practised against the Emperor are increased to that degree, that they can only be considered as an attempt upon his life. You shall judge of this by the detail. You cannot but have read in the newspapers of the month of March, certain observations upon the speech of Lord Bathurst; but since then things have got much worse, and the hatred of the Governor of this country has no longer had any limits.

"When you left, the Emperor gave up riding on horseback, to avoid the snares and the insults prepared for him, by exposing him to the insolence of the sentinels; he has been since obliged to debar himself even from walking exercise, to avoid similar inconveniences. During the months of March and April the Emperor occasionally went out to come and see my wife; and sometimes, too, he used to seat himself fifty paces from the house, upon the bench which you know, where he would remain half an hour or an hour. They devised means to prevent this, and to oblige him to confine himself closely to his room. They were aware that was no difficult task. They appointed a soldier of the 66th for the gardener, and they stationed at my house a sergeant or overseer of the workmen;—both very useful at the house, either to remove any noxious weeds which might infect the air (for it is an impossibility to have a garden on such a spot as this) or to repair the house, which is in ruins, and admits the water upon every shower. All that appeared very reasonable; but the Governor invested these two soldiers with the power of stopping whomsoever they pleased, at the very doors, and under the very windows of the Emperor. From that moment he has never been out, and it is now upwards of a hundred days that he has not put his head out of the windows.

"This climate, this entire deprivation of exercise, and this miserable habitation, have impaired his health, so much so, that you would not know him again. Ever since the end of September, 1817, he has felt the first symptoms of the chronic hepatitis, which you are aware is mortal in this country. The good O'Meara attended him, in whom you know he has confidence. Sir H. Lowe, in the month of April, at the very time this Doctor was most necessary to him, reduced him to the necessity of giving in his resignation; and wanted to foist upon him Mr. Baxter, whom you all know. The Emperor refused to see any medical attendant. From the 10th April to the 10th of May, he was without a Doctor; and at last the Russian and Austrian Commissioners who were sent out here, being indignant at this treatment, gave the Governor to understand, that if the Emperor should die in that situation, they themselves would be at a loss what to say, if the opinion should prevail in Europe that he had been assassinated. It appears this decided the Governor to reinstate the Doctor, but there is no species of ill-treatment they did not make him suffer. They wanted to get him driven from the table of the officers of the 66th; but these brave soldiers disdain- ing to participate in so arbitrary an act, Sir H. Lowe himself gave orders to the Doctor, through the Colonel, to discontinue to mess with the said officers. He has written to London, and it is probable they will drive the Doctor away. The Emperor will receive no other; and if the Prince Regent or Lord Liverpool declined taking cognizance of this fact, he will die here of disease, deprived even of the assistance of his Doctor. The Emperor is, however, now very ill, and has been for two months. He rises at eleven o'clock in the morning, and retires again at two. True it is, that you are not aware of the situation we are in now; it can, in no instance, be compared with our situation in your time, and even then it was bad enough; and you sufficiently know this Prince, to induce you to use your influence to prevent any of the Emperor's family from coming out here. The spectacle of the humiliations, the vexations, the hatred he is a prey to, would be utterly insupportable, were his mother or any of his brothers to come and share them. Even Count de Montholon and myself, who are now the only persons with him, have been repeatedly pressed by him to go and release ourselves from the like treat-meant, and to leave him to himself. He assures us his agony would be less acute if he did not see that we also were the victims of this misery.

"Things have now come to such a pitch, that the foul linen remains several days to be searched by the Orderly Captain, and sometimes by the Etat-Major. This scene is not only highly indecent, but very humiliating to them; its only purpose is insult and outrage.

"In the month of June, 1816, a store-ship brought out a marble bust of young Napoleon. Sir Hudson Lowe directed that it should be thrown into the sea; he afterwards denied it, but we have a judicial attestation of it; for this act disgusted both Lady Malcolm, who was then still here, and all the Commanders of the store-ships, who were then here.

"After that, in the month of February last, the store-ship, the Cambridge, brought out two engravings or prints of young Napoleon, which he had purchased upon the quays at London. Sir H. Lowe had them bought, stating that he intended them as a present to the father; and when, a month afterwards, the Officer of that ship learnt the contrary to be the fact (viz. in order to keep them from him) they were no longer able to dissemble their indignation at such an act having been committed by an Englishman.

"All this conduct on the part of the Governor cannot be disguised or withheld from the British Government. If what the Emperor told Lord-Amherst were repeated in London; if they inquired of Captain Popleton, who was the Orderly Officer for two years, and whom you know; if they interrogated Colonel Nichols, of the 66th; if they asked Colonel Fehrzen, of the 53d, and many others, they must be aware of the base conduct pursued here.

"If the Emperor has any enemy in Europe who would have applauded the English Government if they had openly and publicly put him to death on board the Bellerophon, there can be none who will not one day load with imprecations and opprobrium the authors of his destruction, in so dastardly a manner."

NOTES WRITTEN BY THE EMPEROR ON THE BACK OF SIR HUDSON LOWE'S LETTER, DATED NOV. 18, 1817.

This letter, that of the 26th of July, and that of the 26th of October last, are full of lies. I have shut myself up in my apartment for the last 18 months, to shelter myself from the insults of this officer. My health is now impaired, and it no longer permits me to read such disgusting stuff. Send me no more of it.

Whether this officer considers himself authorized by verbal and secret instructions from his Ministry, as he has given it to be understood; or whether he acts from his own impulse, which one may suppose, from the care he takes to disguise it, I cannot but treat him as my assassin.

Had they sent out here a man of honour, I should doubtless have experienced less torment; but they would then have escaped that odium with which they will be branded by Europe and history, whom this artful man's sarraga of writing will not deceive.

NAPOLEON.

Longwood, this 23d Nov. 1817.

LETTER FROM COUNT MONTHOLON TO THE GOVERNOR.

SIR,—Dr. O'Meara quitted Longwood yesterday, obliged to abandon his patient in the midst of a treatment he was directing for him.

This morning that treatment has ceased—this morning a great crime commences to be carried into execution!

The letters of Count Bertrand of the 13th, 24th, 26th, and 27th of April last, leave me nothing to add. The Emperor will never receive any other Doctor than Mr. O'Meara, because he is his own, or some one who shall be sent out from Europe, conformably with the above-quoted letter of the 13th of April.

I have communicated the letter you wrote me yesterday; the one I now have the honour to write you is the substance of the reply I am directed to send you.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most humble servant,

Le Gen. Cte. DE MONTHOLON.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 22.—Lord Byron is still at Venice; he devotes his mornings to study, frequents the theatre every evening, and receives the visits of his friends in his box. He is employed on several new poems.

M. Cotter, Counsellor of the Royal Court, employed by the Ministry to collect information in England respecting the institution of juries, the liberty of the press, and other political subjects of high importance, has returned from London. It is said that he has brought with him valuable materials from his journey, which lasted six months.

Marble busts of Christopher Columbus, of Galileo, Hannibal Caro, and Tiraboschi, have been placed in the Pantheon of Rome.

VALENCIENNES, OCT. 22.—At ten o'clock this morning their Majesties the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, each in his carriage, proceeded to the camp of Farnars. They were accompanied by the Duke of Wellington, and a great number of General and superior Officers. They passed in review the Russian, English, and Prussian troops, and testified their satisfaction at the discipline uniformly observed by these troops, and at their excellent condition.

OCT. 24.—Yesterday, at the early hour of seven, his Majesty the Emperor of Russia took up the King of Prussia in an open carriage, and the two Sovereigns proceeded to Denain; they then mounted on horseback, as did also the Duke of Wellington; each of the three took his station at the head of their respective corps of the army, and went through a sham-fight, which lasted from eight in the morning until four P.M. The Russians were victorious; these brilliant evolutions took place under the auspices of a remarkable fine day; but unhappily some soldiers were wounded: amongst others an Englishman was horribly mutilated.—At five o'clock, the Sovereigns returned to Valenciennes, and gave several audiences; they afterwards dined, as on the preceding day, at the Chinese Pavilion, on the Place Verte: after dinner, his Majesty the Emperor of Russia received the Marquis d'Autichamp and General Dessolles, and conversed with them a long while. The King of Prussia went to the Theatre. At the conclusion of the play, the Duke of Wellington returned the ball given by the town the previous evening: the Sovereigns honoured it with their presence; they remained there until two o'clock in the morning: they will set off to-day for Maubeuge, but it is not yet known at what hour.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 1.

THE Emperor of RUSSIA, King of PRUSSIA, and Duke of WELLINGTON, have left Aix-la-Chapelle, and are by this time most probably at Paris. The Emperor of AUSTRIA remained behind, and continued to receive proofs of his being the most popular of the Allied Sovereigns. It is attributed to "his retired and unostentatious mode of life, joined to recollections connected with his family." These recollections are of course his relationship with BONAPARTE, who took great notice of Aix-la-Chapelle, and adorned it with public walks. The Sovereigns thought no doubt to render this circumstance of no effect by appearing not to think of it; but it is a great deal too late in the day for mere power to do away the ideas suggested by power of a different description, especially by any thing negative and supercilious. They only make its contrast more striking.

The various accounts of the manner in which the Allied Personages spent their time are amusing. The Emperor of AUSTRIA, as we have just seen, led the most retired life, and is said to be extremely fond of getting up private concerts. The other EMPEROR and the King of PRUSSIA were more abroad with their General Officers, and appeared willing to let the world see that they were the chief arbiters of destinies, for the present. But they too attended public concerts with great enthusiasm, and spectators were surprised at the extraordinary attention paid to Madame CATALANI, who was handed to a sort of throne by star-wearing Ministers, saluted with affability by Princes, and made a prodigious impression on my Lord CASTLEREAGH who stood by her side. We sincerely congratulate his Lordship on the love of music; and wish he would take to studying it philosophically, which might teach him to harmonize the hemispheres a little better. — At the concert alluded to, he seems to have got himself and his countrymen into one of his usual unthinking little hobbles, arising out of his exceeding propensity to be genteel. God save the King was struck up for Madame CATALANI to sing;—upon which his Lordship rises up, looking of course at once affable, loyal, and predominant; when lo! nobody rises up with him; and instead of Great George our King, the song turns out to be a compliment to King FREDERICK, whose name was substituted.—Mr. OWEN's departure for Paris is announced in one of these accounts. He could not get the Sovereigns to attend to him; and is perhaps going to try if they will be more gracious in a less official atmosphere. We fear not. The Emperor ALEXANDER, we think, really means well in some instances, and thinks he does good oftener; but every thing must be subservient to his dictation; and while he evidently wishes to have the applause of the liberal, he has not the courage to get it in any matters touching his own common place superiority. He must be King of Poland. Emperor and King like BONAPARTE,—and like BONAPARTE he must talk of his ipse dixit, as if it not only were, but ought to be, the settler of every thing; that is to say, under favour of heaven. Oh, yes; every thing is done under favour of Heaven, as we have shewn in our first Article. Hence the inconsistencies that continually appear in the actions of this Prince, and his strange display of the philosophic and the worldly, the simple and the frivolous. The other day, he, with his brother Holy Ally the King of PRUSSIA, together with the Duke of WELLINGTON, who undertook to read the French "a great moral lesson," must amuse themselves on their way to Paris with a sham fight; and so they played at soldiers,—the game which Kings are said to be so fond of. Now there is no great harm in a sham fight, and military manœuvres are good things when in season, and in keeping with people's professions. But either the Allied Sovereigns should lay down their ridiculous assumption of being so excessively Christian and unambitious, such very reverent followers of the anti-violent doctrines of Jesus,—or they should not be so fond of these military pastimes, of sporting uniforms and staff-officers, and keeping up all that "pomp and circumstance" of war, which has so notorious a tendency to keep up the love of it. But thus it is to have dogmas that shall enable men to dispense with conduct provided they have faith, and be at once most Christian and sacred Kings, and cut up the world at their pleasure. Mr. OWEN wishes to inform them that this is a bad way of improving things; and of course they cannot listen to him. Among the letters which came to them through the post-office at Aix-la-Chapelle, a writer at Strasburgh proposed to come and serve them in the ancient capacity of Fool,—the only medium, he said, by which the truth could get at them. The rogue is mistaken. Courts now-a-days are full of fools, with and without baubles; but we never hear that they advance any truths. For Heaven's sake however let us get out of the subject of this Ruling Dunciad a little, and leave it to expose itself, which it is doing in all quarters more and more.

The Court of France, as we thought it would, has been doing some popular things just now to conciliate matters when the troops have departed. Some additional regulations are to be proposed, at the meeting of the Chambers, for the improvement of the present system of Trial by Jury; and further securities to be added to the Liberty of the Press. At least so it is said. How far matters will be subsequently delayed, and the promises turn out to be of the legitimate order, we know not. The King has also taken off the sentence of proscription from six of the Frenchmen who were exiled after his second return to Paris. "We trust," says the Courier, "their future conduct will justify the lenity of their Sovereign." Good, and grand. We trust, also, for our parts, that their Sovereign's future conduct will justify their adherence.

Baron de STURMER, late Austrian Commissioner at St. Helena, has passed through the Hague, on his way to his Master at Aix-la-Chapelle. This is all the intelligence given by the French Papers on the subject; but private letters add, that he is going to deliver a report on the present state of BONAPARTE. It is remarkable that he should not have taken England on his way (for we have not heard of his arrival at any of our ports, or even of his intention to leave St. Helena), but should have at once landed in Holland. Should, however, the account prove correct, the Report of the Austrian Commissioner will put an end to the calumnies respecting the treatment of BONAPARTE.—Courier.

On Friday morning, between nine and ten o'clock, a magnificent spectacle presented itself at Dover, in the entrance into the harbour of 43 vessels, loaded with the first Division of the Army of Occupation of France. They consisted of 3,076 infantry and artillery, and 600 women and children; the men, some of whom had not touched foot upon British land for twelve years, were in the highest spirits on landing; the bands of their regiments playing the national airs; a vast concourse of spectators were on the quays to witness their arrival.

THE ARMY.—The number of men and officers proposed to be reduced amounts to upwards of 30,000. The three whole regiments of cavalry, with the staff corps of cavalry; thirteen battalions of infantry, with several independent companies; ten men per troop in the cavalry on home service; as many in each company of the foot-guards; fifteen privates per company in all the infantry regiments of the line, those in India only excepted;—such are the leading items in this process of reduction; the others are of secondary importance.

"Kew Palace, Oct. 31.

"The QUEEN has had several hours' sleep, but the symptoms of her MAJESTY'S disease remains unchanged."

It is said that the Meeting of Parliament will not take place till after Christmas.

Monday completed the Fifty-eighth year of the reign of our afflicted SOVEREIGN, an interval of regal tenure already two years longer than that of any Sovereign who ever sat on the British Throne: that of HENRY III. the nearest to the present in duration of any former reign, lasted very little more than 56 years.

The resignation of Lord ELLENBOROUGH having been accepted, Mr. Justice ABBOTT has been formally appointed Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench.—Sun.

Letters received yesterday morning from Harrington (Cumberland), state, several riots had taken place on account of the export of potatoes from Cumberland; two sloops loaded, and about to sail for Liverpool, had been attacked by the populace, who, after taking possession, plundered the vessels of their entire cargoes.

Petitions are now actively forwarding in the manufacturing districts against the Corn Laws. It has been calculated that the Corn Bill Tax is 6d. a day per head; 9l. 2s. 6d. a year each; 130l. 10s. on a man, his wife, eight children, and two servants; 54l. 15s. on a man, his wife, and four children; and 164,250,000l. yearly on a population of eighteen millions.

It has been calculated that the population of this country could stand on considerably less than a square mile. Allowing six men to a square yard, the mile would accommodate eighteen millions five hundred and eighty-five thousand six hundred men! Taking nine men, women, and children to the yard, one square mile would afford room for 27,873,400 human beings!

An affair of honour was decided on Saturday morning last, on the flats near Chester, between Sir J. GRAY EGERTON and Lord BELGRAVE. On the first fire Sir JOHN'S ball struck Lord BELGRAVE in the pistol-arm, but his Lordship was not wounded dangerously, and is doing well. The cause of the quarrel between the parties originated, we understand, in certain proceedings which took place the day preceding, at the Annual Election of Mayor, &c. for the City of Chester. A Mr. BARKER, in proposing Mr. EVANS, who is in the Grosvenor interest, as Mayor, made what were considered rather pointed allusions to some of the EGERTON party, and insinuated that they had been stimulated by Sir JOHN EGERTON himself. The insinuation was required by Sir JOHN to be disavowed by Lord BELGRAVE, who was present, but this his Lordship refused. The greatest confusion then arose in the assembly, and the Recorder was ultimately obliged to adjourn the Court. The meeting between Sir JOHN and Lord BELGRAVE was immediately afterwards arranged.—Daily paper.

The Lady of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY expired on Thursday night, at East Cowes Castle, the seat of JOHN NASH, Esq. She had borne a long and painful illness with exemplary patience and resignation.

Professor DITMAR, of Copenhagen, has published a learned dissertation, in which he endeavours to establish as certain, that the ensuing winter of 1818-19 will be very short and very mild.

A true Bill has been found by the Grand Jury at Hicks's Hall, against Lord RANELAGH and two of his servants, for an assault on and false imprisonment of Mr. WALLACE HALL.

OLD BAILEY.—Yesterday, John Fuller and another man were found Not Guilty on the charge of having wilfully murdered James Wakley. It appeared that the deceased, a fighting-man, had challenged Fuller to fight, which took place fatally for Wakley.—John Leonard, his wife Susannah Leonard, (recommended to mercy) and Susannah Farnillo (also recommended by the Jury to mercy) were found Guilty of uttering forged One Pound Bank Notes.

MR. KEATS'S Endymion.—We are happy to add the following valuable testimony to the various ones that have come forward on this occasion and shewn their contempt of the would-be authorities whom the public are so rapidly leaving behind them:—"It must be evident to all who are acquainted with the extent of the province of poetry, that there is a mountainous part of it where the atmosphere is too rare for common breathing; in other words, that a very high degree of poetical inspiration exists which cannot be made popular. Such we fear is the case with Mr. KEATS'S Endymion, which calls for a knowledge of the more erudite or second sense of classical mythology. Thus, in the Hymn to Pan, we are called to a glance not only of the more pastoral Deity, but to that typification of general nature, the great and mystic Pan, who, as an universal intelligence, formed one of the fine indistinct dreams of antiquity. Where this sort of apprehension has been acquired, the lines will be doubly relished; but even by the less informed, making a little allowance for the Arcadian cast of the scenery, the beauty and felicity of the rural imagery and painting will be duly appreciated. Mr. KEATS has evidently borrowed his taste from that school of which MILTON is the head, and those who are thoroughly acquainted with Lycidas, Comus, and the Faithful Shepherdess, will feel the Masters in the Disciple. We observe all this in the face of a contemptible piece of flippancy in the Quarterly Review, intended to put down the young aspirant, because, forsooth, his politics and friendships are not agreeable to the managers of that liberal vehicle. Injustice of this kind, too, may be ventured; first, because he is young, and hope, at such a season, may, with some temperaments, be depressed almost to annihilation; secondly, his subject cannot be felt generally, consequently the mob who wait for these quarterly oracles to tell them what to admire, may the more easily be wrought upon. How well principled and magnanimous all this! One thing, however, is comfortable, it is almost too late in the day for such sort of oppression to succeed, and in the present instance it has happily failed."—The Chester Guardian.

A retail tradesman, in a general way of business, at Uckfield, in Sussex, has lately died and left to his family the immense sum of 200,000*l.*, which he realized in the course of nearly half a century's plodding industry. His eldest son, to whom he has left 100,000*l.*, still pursues his father's trade.

SUPPOSED MURDER IN KENT.—No trace, it should seem, has yet been obtained, of the soldier who is supposed to have murdered his wife at Brompton in Kent. We understand that she was rather a large and strong woman, sufficiently so to have made it a very difficult task for her husband,—who was not above the common size,—to drag her from the room to the well, in which her body was found naked. Some therefore conjecture, that if he really was the murderer, he must by some means, have deprived her of the power of resistance, or even of crying out loudly, before he threw her into the well. It appears that though the room in which they slept was attached to the public-house, nobody heard the slightest noise, not even the crying of the two children, who, it may be imagined, would have been awakened and frightened, if their parents had been struggling with each other. The body had been so long in the well, that it could not be ascertained whether any wounds had been inflicted. Marks of blood were discovered in the room; and if the wretched woman did not throw herself into the well (which is not very likely, under all the circumstances) it seems most probable, that she was murdered before she was precipitated into it.—It is somewhat remarkable, that nothing is even heard of the two children, who were with their parents at the time of the catastrophe.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONNET

ON VIEWING THE SEA FROM CASTLE-HILL, HASTINGS, IN COMPANY OF A PARTY OF LADIES.

Oh! what a lovely sight now charms the eye;
There the proud vessels spread their joyous sails,
And here, in rich variety, the vales
Unbosom all their charms to the clear sky!
Beneath, where Beachey rears his lofty head,—
With rays of Phœbus that in mirth are playing,
The western breezes o'er the waves are straying,
And there in diamonds make their nuptial bed.
Oh! 'tis a scene where grief might find repose,
Revenge forgetfulness;—the balmy air
On gentle wings comes to my feverish eyes—
Friends, too, around me look their sweet surprise;
And wit and mirth, dispelling sickly care,
Keep here their court, and make harmonious close.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 312.

THE repetition of old Pieces, and the non-appearance of new Actors this week, have relieved us from the late numerous and in many instances unnecessary calls upon our attention. It remains for us, however, to speak of Miss SOMERVILLE and Mrs. T. HILL, one of whom has returned to the Theatre from the country, and the other, after appearing in a farce, is about to act in comedy. We shall do so after our present respite, next week. The chief novelty, meanwhile, is a system of fierce and feeble attack which has just started up against that excellent actor Mr. KEAN. We observe it in the Courier; but do not know whether it originates in that Paper, which is not in the habit of writing its own Theatricals. It is especially vague, foolish, and inconsistent; or we would take a little more notice of it. To write such things is bad enough, but to repeat them in the demi-official journal is really beneath any persons but that strange, self-betraying, and half-witted junto, who seem so anxious to show their angry want of sympathy with every species of talent and independence. But they have worn out their own fangs, and can only writhe harmlessly round the hand. Mr. KEAN may good-naturedly contemplate the poor creatures at his leisure, and he will see them drop off.

MR. JUSTICE BAILEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

"A Wit's a feather and a Chief's a rod,—
"An honest Man's the noblest work of God."

SIR,—In the appointment of a successor to the office of Lord Chief Justice, I perceive the public choice must fall upon Mr. Justice Bailey, who is not only duly qualified by his learning and seniority on the Bench, but in every respect deserving that exalted situation. It would be presumption in me to suppose that my obscure opinion could have any weight in a matter of so much importance, and Mr. Justice Bailey, who in all probability never heard mention of my name, might think it impertinent in me to attempt his praise, which ought to be promulgated by abler hands than mine.

Permit me to furnish you with an anecdote respecting that excellent man, as related to me by an Attorney who was in the habit of giving him briefs when a Counsel at the Bar. It happened by some accident, that a motion which Mr. Bailey was to have made escaped him, by which his client the Attorney was fixed with costs. Mr. Bailey no sooner perceived this neglect, than with a noble disinterestedness he acknowledged the fault was his, and that he alone ought to suffer for it, putting, at the same time, into the hands of his client a cheque upon his banker for the money. My informant proceeded to state, that, struck with astonishment at this uncommon generosity, he peremptorily refused the offer. Some years afterwards, however, falling under embarrassment, he wrote to Mr. Bailey, reminding him of the circumstance, and requesting the loan of 50*l*.—Here let the candour and sincerity of the man shine forth in its native colours. No sooner was he reminded of the past transaction, than, like a faithful trustee for another, he sent him the 100*l*. telling him there was no delicacy required, or difficulty in receiving that which belonged to him!

Another anecdote has been related to me, as a proof of the extraordinary mildness and humanity of his nature. The first time he had occasion, as a Criminal Judge, to pass sentence of death upon a culprit, when he came to the words, "until you are dead," his utterance failed him, and from a sudden nervous sensibility at the awful import of death pronounced even towards an offender, he shed tears, and could only articulate, "And the Lord have mercy on your soul."

Much as is the respect and reverence in which I hold the character of our enlightened Judges generally, the benignity of countenance and manner of Mr. Justice Bailey never fails to remind me of these lines in Milton:—

"His words here ended, but his meek aspect "Silent yet spake, and breathed immortal love
"To human kind, and in their dwellings peace."

I am, &c.

G. STRACHAN.

As Sterne says of the Franciscan Monk, "Had I met such a man as this upon the plains of Hindostan, though in the character of a Brahmin, I could have knelt down to worship him."

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

[The following letters have been sent us, in addition to the pamphlet mentioned in our last. We need not repeat what we said then upon a very loathsome subject; but we do not think, nevertheless, that we should be justified, on another's account, in refusing to open our columns to the correspondence.—Exam.]

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE SUBJECT OF BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

TO THE AUTHOR OF "HYPOCRISY UNVEILED."

SIR,—As it is no part of a manly disposition to use insulting epithets to an unknown enemy, who may perhaps have resolved to remain unknown, I shall not, at present, bestow any upon you. Long as you remain concealed, you are a nonentity; and any insults offered by me to a person in that situation might probably not be felt to carry with them any degradation to him, and certainly would not be felt as conferring any triumph upon me.

It is probable, however, that you will come forward from your concealment, when you feel that you cannot continue in it without the consciousness of cowardice. I therefore request your name and address, that I may send a friend to you, to deliver my opinion of your character, and to settle time and place for a meeting, at which I may exact satisfaction from you for the public insults you have offered to me.

JOHN WILSON,

53, Queen-street, Friday, 23d October.

TO THE AUTHOR OF "HYPOCRISY UNVEILED."

SIR,—I have no wish to apply epithets of insult to you till I know who you are. If you suppose yourself to have any claim to the character of a gentleman, you will take care that I be not long without this knowledge.—I remain, Sir, your obedient Servant,

J. G. LOCKHART.

23, Maitland-street, Thursday, October 22d, 1818.

TO JOHN WILSON, ESQ. ADVOCATE.

Friday, 23d October.

SIR,—The Note which I understand to have been forwarded to you by my Publisher, will have explained why I did not receive your communication till within these few hours.

If you be not a principal conductor or supporter of Blackwood's Magazine, you have no reason for addressing me. If you be not the author or furnisher of materials for an attack on Mr. M'CORMICK, which you yourself stated to be highly unjustifiable, and of which you denied all knowledge, upon your honour—If you be not the Author of a most abusive attack on your friend Mr. WORDSWORTH—If you did not, by an unfounded story, prevail with Mr. BLACKWOOD's former Editors to insert that attack—If you be not the secret traducer of Mr. PLAYFAIR, Mr. HAZLITT, and Mr. COLERIDGE—If you be not the wanton and cruel reviler of those Gentlemen named in my Pamphlet, with whom you had lived in habits of friendship—If you be not one of the principal vomitories of that calumnious and malignant abuse which has, through the medium of Blackwood's Magazine, been poured out on all that is elevated, worthy, or estimable—If you be not the writer of one or other of the Letters addressed in the name of Z. to Mr. LEIGH HUNT,—and if you did not take shelter under a quotation from Junius, and submit to be publicly stigmatised by him as a coward and a scoundrel—then you have nothing to say to me, for I speak only of the writer or writers who have committed these enormities. But if all or any of these things apply to you, in that case you have lost every claim to the character of a gentleman, and have no right whatsoever to demand that satisfaction which is due only to one who has been unjustly accused.

The cause, besides, in which I have engaged is a public one—It is that of right feeling against all that is vile, treacherous, and malignant. My vocation is not ended: I have pledged myself to the Public to watch your proceedings; and, if occasion shall require, to give a more ample exposition of your conduct and character—to inflict a more signal chastisement on your crimes. This pledge shall be redeemed. Do not think that I shall be deterred, by any threat, from discharging the duty I have thus imposed on myself, or that I shall be so weak as, by a premature avowal of my name, to deprive myself of the means.

Prove to the satisfaction of the Public that the charges which I have made are unfounded, or that they do not apply to you—Or, as you yourself ask of Mr. HUNT,—"Confess that "you have done wrong—make a clear breast of it,—beg pardon of your God and of your country, for the iniquity of your polluted pen,—and the last to add one pang to the secret throbbings of a contrite spirit," the first to meet your challenge, if then renewed, shall be, Sir, your, &c.

THE AUTHOR OF "HYPOCRISY UNVEILED."

P. S.—As Mr. LOCKHART obviously acts in concert with yourself, I have made the same answer to him which I now make to you.

STATE OF THE METROPOLIS.

October, 1818.

SIR,—The integrity with which your Paper has for years been conducted, is, I hope, a sufficient apology for my calling your attention, and through you that of your readers, to one of the most evident causes of misery and crime which darken the present day. I am the more induced to do this, from the general pain manifested in its dreadful effects, such as juvenile depravity, transportations, and hangings. That it is better to prevent than punish crime is admitted by all; let us see if we cannot add a little practice to our talk; success to me is certain; our pious Ministry, our Bible and Missionary Societies, our more rational friends to freedom and humanity, will surely all co-operate in the undertaking,—which is, to remove the incitements to crime that hourly present themselves in the thoroughfare from Covent-Garden to Piccadilly. “Aye,” I hear some one say, “this is the duty of the inhabitants;” so it is, but it is the duty also of every friend to his race. The inhabitants consist, for the most part, of persons who have had sense enough to “get forward,” as ‘tis called, but they are totally ignorant of what they owe their children, their servants, and society. Their ignorance cannot be shewn better than by imagining their interest to lie in the increase of prostitutes and thieves. Pray, Sir, do take the trouble of witnessing the low ebb to which some of your fellow creatures are reduced. Children exposing themselves to prostitution with all the daring effrontery of old and confirmed prostitutes; gangs of boys, regularly divided and headed by old and experienced pickpockets, disguised as butchers and mechanics: these press on at the narrow passes, particularly in St Martin’s-court, whilst the boys, being smaller, slip in between. This day-scene is horrid enough, but hell itself seems let loose at night. Crowds of prostitutes, destroying the minds of the lads who have just left the neighbouring manufactories, and who, fond of distinction, “flash” with their girls; the most horrid blasphemy, the most daring robberies: in short, the whole catalogue of crime is here held up to view. I know of nothing but the noise and language of the convicts in Newgate which equals it: language falls short of expression: you must, for one night, stifle your sympathy and witness it. But we have a vigilant police; so we have, but the vigilance is principally exercised over their little dominions—Parishes—in raising rates to support the present thriving and happy system of Government. What think you, Sir, of some of the Assessed Taxes in St. Martin’s Parish being raised twenty-five per cent., and such increase collected for the whole year.—Is not this a flourishing condition in time of profound peace?

Much more might have been said upon this important subject; but it is possible you may think I have already trespassed upon more important matters.—I am, Sir, with esteem, your WELL-WISHER.

P.S.—The Watchmen appear selected on purpose to prevent detection,—infirm old men, so inferior indeed as to be frequently turned out for a “Lark;” not only by thieves, but even by the women.

CASE OF JAMES LEARWOOD.

An erroneous statement having appeared in several papers respecting the situation of the unfortunate man James Learwood, who was killed in the Fleet Prison a few days ago, I shall feel obliged by your insertion of the following circumstances, conceiving such insertion may prove of public utility. The report of Learwood’s having been sent to an Hospital is totally void of foundation. The Doctors certainly gave but little hope of his recovery from the first; yet previous to the performance of the operation on his head, they decidedly stated, that the only remaining chance was by immediate removal to the Hospital: but this advice, (notwithstanding the humanity generally displayed by the Warden and other persons belonging to the Fleet Prison) could not be complied with, inasmuch as the severity of the existing laws against debtors does not allow their removal from prison to an Hospital, even when life is in imminent danger; therefore, had Mr. Nixon consented thereto, he would have subjected himself to the liability of paying the debt and costs for which Learwood was detained.—On hearing of the accident, and having had former knowledge of the deceased’s unfortunate situation, I called to see him the following morning, when I found him speechless, and in a state of insensibility to every surrounding object. At the suggestion of Mr. Woodroffe, the Clerk, I immediately went to Messrs. Swain and Sewell’s, ale-brewers in Holborn, Learwood’s plaintiffs; hoping to obtain their consent to his removal; which by their agreeing to, would have secured Mr. Nixon from damages as far as related to them; though still the Warden would have been liable in the case of detainers coming against Learwood during his stay at the Hospital; but this consideration would have been waved, through hope of saving life, had Messrs. Swain and Sewell attended to the humane request made them; but neither of the partners being at home when I called, I mentioned the unfortunate incident to two men on the premises, earnestly intreating them to acquaint Mr. Swain of it immediately on his return, which I found was expected about one o’clock. But Messrs. Swain and Sewell did not attend to my message, nor have they since made any inquiry concerning the unfortunate catastrophe.

There was something peculiarly hard and rigorous in the whole of Learwood’s case and imprisonment. This man, honest, industrious, and inoffensive in his practices and conduct, father of seven children, remained confined for more than two years in the Fleet Prison! In vain did he endeavour to obtain his discharge from the Insolvent Court; he was opposed by his detaining creditors on the score of concealment of property; and though he frequently petitioned the Court to be heard again, still his various petitions for that favour were unavailing, they being opposed and rejected through Mr. Sergeant Runnington stating, that there was an impression on the mind of the Court, that the prisoner had been guilty of a gross concealment. To those who were acquainted with Learwood’s distresses, this assertion appeared scarcely to be possible; as his wife had been long in a state of great bodily weakness, with very little proper support; and by obtaining even that little for her succour, he often found himself reduced to great difficulty in the provision of a breakfast or dinner for his numerous family: the small pittance he earned as a tailor in the prison, proving quite inadequate for those purposes. I frequently called, and even wrote more than once to Messrs. Swain and Sewell; representing to them the wretched condition Learwood and his family were in, the length of his imprisonment, and the extreme ill state of his wife’s health; and at that time Mr. Swain was not averse to a compromise, but even told me in unequivocal terms, that if Mr. Learwood would give up a dividend due to him, in the hands of Mr. Parker, woollen-draper, in the Strand, (the last remnant of all poor Learwood possessed in the world) he would immediately consent to his release: this was agreed to on the part of Learwood, but the evening Mr. Swain proposed accompanying me to Mr. Parker’s to have the matter arranged, professing himself a sincere friend and well-wisher to Learwood, the circumstance of Mr. Swain’s premises taking fire, prevented our going together: but on the strength of my information concerning the good disposition of his plaintiffs towards him, Learwood again petitioned the Insolvent Court, confident that no opposition would be filed against him, when, to his utter dismay and astonishment, he found his motion again opposed on the part of Messrs. Swain and Sewell; and when I called on those gentlemen, requesting an explanation of such conduct, I was informed, that the dividend in the hands of Mr. Parker fell far short of what they had expected it to be.—This treatment completely crushed every cherished hope in the meek spirit of Mrs. Learwood, who was a woman respectably connected, and well educated: from that time she drooped, was never seen to smile, and in a few days reached that bourne, from whence no traveller returns. This man himself never appeared to hold up his head afterwards, but became debilitated in body, and depressed in mind; and scarcely had a month elapsed since his wife's death, ere a fatal catastrophe put a period to his existence in this world of care and sorrow, leaving five children totally unprovided for, except by the mercy of providence disposing the mind of a benevolent public to make provision for their support; and I sincerely hope the humane feelings this recital may cause, will induce the charitable to deposit in the hand of Mr. Nixon, Warden of the Fleet, a small sum for the present support of these orphans: he is a man of the strictest integrity; and had it not been for the humanity he has already exercised towards them, they would not have known where to have procured a loaf of bread since the death of their parent; which sudden and unforeseen event has at length fully proved the fallacy of Mr. Sergeant Runnington's supposition; as so far from his having concealed any part of his property, the duplicates now found in his room sufficiently establish the fact, that he was obliged to pledge even his wearing apparel to defray the expences of his wife's funeral; and insufficient would he have found even that resource, had not his fellow-prisoners raised a subscription among themselves to aid him in his distresses. But to misfortune even the family of Learwood appear allied; as the father of the deceased met an untimely end some years ago, for being seated on the top of a stage coach going into the Belle Sauvage-yard, the gateway being low, and he neglecting to stoop, was killed on the spot; and his eldest child and only son having procured employment in the gardens at Claremont, took the death of the excellent Princess Charlotte so much to heart, that his health became considerably impaired thereby; although we should scarcely conceive a lad thus young, and thus circumstanced, would have possessed feelings of sufficient poignancy to cause so powerful an impression*.

It not being my wish to add to reflections on the rigour exercised by the plaintiffs towards the unfortunate victim, only merely to point out the dangerous consequences of carrying severity too far, I think it necessary to add, that in a legal point of view, Messrs. Swain and Sewell had a right to keep their debtor in prison; but in a civilized country, the laws of humanity ought undoubtedly to go hand in hand with those of justice; and therefore it gives me pleasure now to state, that in the course of my applications on behalf of the deceased, I called several times on Messrs. Aldridge and Collyer Smith (Messrs. Swain and Sewell's solicitors) praying their intervention on the part of Learwood, when Mr. Smith gave it as his decided opinion, that he ought to be discharged; and that the length of his imprisonment had made full atonement, even had he acted with the greatest impropriety of conduct.

It neither being my desire to cast any reflections on the conduct of the Commissioners of the Insolvent Court, I here declare that by thus stating plain facts and adding a few observations, I alone hope to draw the attention of the public to the amendment of those clauses relative to debtor and creditor in the Insolvent Act, now about to expire, previous to a renewal thereof.

The first point occurring to our observation from the foregoing statement of Learwood's case, must certainly be, the extreme and peculiar hardship a prisoner for debt labours under, when in cases of violent illness or serious accident, the keeper has it not in his power to remove him to an Hospital; not even after four medical gentlemen have given it as their opinion, that such a measure alone afforded a chance of preserving the man's life. This is, in many instances, placing a debtor in a worse situation than a criminal; for if illness overtakes him whilst in prison, he must there end his days, should a hard-hearted creditor refuse to discharge him; the rigour of the law not affording a debtor that advantage which is often extended to the most notorious criminal.

We are grieved on observing, that in this land of liberty one single Commissioner should be vested with so extensive and extraordinary a power, that he may, under a simple impression being made on his mind, send an unfortunate prisoner back to prison, there for years to linger out a miserable existence, deprived of every means of supporting and educating his children: not that we suppose Mr. Sergeant Runnington guilty of arbitrary practices or corrupt resolutions; but knowing that the wisest of mankind are liable at times to form erroneous opinions, we are naturally led to suppose such may have been formed; especially where so many cases are determined in one year by the judgment of a single mind.

We are informed, but with what degree of truth I cannot precisely say, that a pledge has been given by certain members of the Government, to a deputation of merchants and tradesmen petitioning for the repeal of Lord Redesdale's Act. It is scarcely possible to conceive that such could have been the case, but if true, it would certainly have been as well had no such pledge been given, till the subject had undergone a fair and impartial investigation during the next Session of Parliament: an Act such as introduced by Lord Redesdale, or one nearly to the same effect, appearing to be absolutely necessary under the existing situation of the country; it being granted by all parties, that at no period did the labouring classes ever find a greater difficulty to procure subsistence than at the present. Those who are not well-wishers to the Government ascribe the causes to a shameful lavish and waste of the public money, and to the barefaced corruption existing in every department of the State; whilst the friends of Government attribute the evil to an over growing population, and to the sudden change from the state of war to that of peace. But leaving its cause undecided, the effect is I think sufficiently clear for us to determine, that such an evil does exist, and therefore a remedy ought to be applied to rescue a numerous people from imprisonment, under calamities not within their power to prevent or controul.

JORGEN JORGENSEN.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

On Monday the Middlesex Sessions commenced at Hicks's Hall, FRANCIS CONST, Esq. the Chairman. The first case was the trial of Mr. Henry Hunt for an assault upon Mr. Vincent George Dowling, on the 8th of September. Before the trial came on, Mr. Hunt, who sat at the Barrister's table, rose and addressed the Court in the following terms:—"Mr. Chairman, I am here to stand my trial for an assault, and I have an application to make to the Court for my own protection. A person who sits opposite me has just made use of the following expression:—"I see the demagogue, Hunt, is first on the list; I hope he'll be transported." I therefore apply to the Court whether such language is to be tolerated, when applied to a man who is here brought before a Jury of his country. I understand the person is a Barrister. I do not know whether he is or not; but I appeal to the Court whether I am not to be protected from such language."

Mr. ALLEY, who was Counsel for Mr. Dowling, said, that any expression which might have fallen from his learned friend, who was a barrister, could not have been intended for Mr. Hunt's ear.

Mr. JESSOP, (who was the person alluded to, and who sat at the table, but was not dressed in his wig and gown) said, that he did not mean to be overheard by Mr. Hunt in any thing he might have said; whatever had been his conversation, it was not, he assured the Court, intended for Mr. Hunt's ear.

* This is the same youth of whom mention was made in several of the public papers immediately after the death of the Princess Charlotte (whose favourite donkies he had the care of) as having concealed himself for three days and nights, and would not return till he had been promised a sort of mourning. It appears that her Royal Highness had formed a very good opinion of the lad, and he could not bear the sight of the funeral.

Mr. Hunt.—I think you did address your language to me. It certainly was uttered loud enough to be heard by all round here.

Mr. ALLEY interposed, and desired that Mr. Hunt should not interrupt the proceedings of the Court by complaints of this kind.

Mr. Hunt.—I am addressing the Chairman, and not you, Sir; and it is to his instructions, not to yours, that I shall pay deference.

The CHAIRMAN.—Mr. Hunt, you must be aware that nothing can arise in your particular case which could justify the slightest indecorum towards you, standing as you do. The Court is always most anxious to accommodate every defendant, as far as it can be done with propriety; but, on the other hand, it cannot well take notice of private conversations, whatever they may happen to be; and I am sorry that the seat in which you sit had placed you near enough to overhear anything which might have been said by the gentleman opposite to you. It is true that the Court generally allows a defendant to sit at the table, either for the purpose of being near his Counsel, or any particular friend whose assistance he may want. I think, on reflection, you must be of opinion, that such expressions as those you have alluded to could not by possibility have been meant for the public ear. The gentleman to whom you ascribe them could not possibly have publicly hazarded them on the eve of a defendant's trial. I can give you no assistance under the circumstances that you say have occurred.

Mr. ALLEY.—Mr. Hunt, as you have thought proper to overhear a private conversation, and then make it the ground of a public complaint, you must now quit your seat and stand at the bar, as all other defendants usually do.

The CHAIRMAN.—I am very sorry that any thing should have occurred to have made Mr. Hunt's application, or yours, Mr. Alley, necessary.

Mr. ALLEY.—Mr. Hunt, you must go to the bar.

Mr. Hunt.—I again tell you, that I shall attend to the Chairman, and not to you.

Mr. ALLEY.—Then, if you choose to be insolent, I must move the Court that you be placed at the bar. The Court will exercise its jurisdiction towards you as it would to any other defendant.

Mr. Hunt.—I neither give nor take insolence:—I am addressing the Court.

Mr. SKETCHLEY (one of the Magistrates on the Bench).—I think Mr. Hunt ought to be put to the bar. It is an indulgence to allow a defendant to sit where he does; and after what has just passed, I think he had better change his place.

Mr. Hunt.—I shall bow with great submission to the decision of the Chairman; and as Mr. Alley has made this application, I, in my turn, ask of the Court to be permitted to remain where I am, as an indulgence, and not to be put to the bar, where I could have no convenience of taking notes of the evidence.

The CHAIRMAN interposed, and directed the Clerk of Arraignment to proceed with the trial.

The indictment was accordingly read, which charged Mr. Hunt with assaulting Mr. Dowling on the 8th September. Mr. Hunt pleaded not guilty.

Mr. ALLEY then rose, and in form repeated his motion, that Mr. Hunt be put to the bar.

The CHAIRMAN.—Then, as the motion has been made, Mr. Hunt must quit his seat, but I do not think it right he should be put to the bar, as he says he wishes to take notes—let him, therefore, remove to the end of the table.

Mr. Hunt bowed to the Court, and took his seat at the end of the table adjoining the jury-box.

Mr. ALLEY stated the plaintiff's case to the Jury. The offence with which the defendant stood charged was for committing an assault of a very aggravated character. The Learned Counsel said, that although he had a volume of instructions in his brief, showing the utter falsehood of Mr. Hunt's imputations upon Mr. Dowling's character, and explaining very satisfactorily a number of transactions not of very recent date, yet he thought it more proper to abstain altogether from matter which was not directly connected with the circumstance of the assault. The Learned Counsel then detailed them precisely in the manner they have been already stated to the public.

Mr. V. G. Dowling stated, that on the 8th of September he went to the shop of Mr. Clement, in the Strand, when he saw Mr. Hunt. Mr. Hunt immediately addressed witness, and said, "Well, Mr. Spectacle Spy, are you disposed to finish the horse-whipping you commenced in Covent-garden?" Witness answered, "I wish to have no altercation with you," and then turned round to leave the shop, when Mr. Hunt repeated his offensive expressions, and asked him if he was disposed to show himself a man and go out to fight him in the street; witness replied that he was unaccustomed to such exhibitions, and certainly would not; he also said, that he was not deserving the false imputations which Mr. Hunt had applied to him. Witness was withdrawing from the shop, when Mr. Hunt said, he would find an opportunity of thrashing him. Witness said he was there then, but would not settle the matter in the manner pointed out by Mr. Hunt. The latter then followed him out to the door, and struck witness a blow in the face, and said, "Will you resent that?" Witness replied, "Certainly not in the way you seem to wish; for I should feel myself disgraced by noticing any thing said or done by a man who has disgraced himself as you have." Several persons were outside the shop-door at the time, and Mr. Hunt introduced him to them as "Dowling, the Government spy." Witness gave no provocation whatever to Mr. Hunt. He only received one blow.

Mr. Hunt.—Did I not invite you out to prove yourself a man, and when you said you were unaccustomed to this mode of proceeding, did I not observe that that was extraordinary, for you were active enough at Covent-garden when you were surrounded by your constables, and what made you so cool then?

Mr. Dowling.—I recollect your saying something about constables, but what were the precise expressions I cannot now recollect. I had heard that you and your brother meant to assault me in the street.

Mr. Hunt.—Was that the only reason; did not your conscience tell you that you deserved it?

Mr. Dowling.—When I say I expected to hear from you, I mean that I thought I should hear from you in a different manner; I expected to have been called upon as one gentleman would call on another.

Mr. Hunt.—How do you mean?

Mr. Dowling.—Does not your conscience tell you?

Mr. Hunt appealed to the Court whether a direct answer ought not to be given to his question.

The CHAIRMAN replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Dowling then said, that after the public insult he offered to Mr. Hunt at Covent-garden, he certainly expected to have heard from him, in the only course that a gentleman ought to have resorted to.

Mr. Hunt.—You mean to fight a duel?

Mr. Dowling.—Most certainly.

Mr. Hunt.—Then the provocation you gave me at Covent-garden was with the view of getting me to fight a duel?—
A. Certainly.

Mr. Hunt.—Then when I called you out, you say, to fight in Mr. Clement's shop, did you hear me say I wanted to box you?

Mr. Dowling.—I inferred so certainly; for when you invited me out to fight, I could not imagine you meant to fight a duel in the middle of the day, in St. Clement's church-yard.

Mr. Dowling then admitted, that he had said he should feel himself disgraced by taking notice of a man so degraded as Mr. Hunt, and that the blow he received was a very slight one, which merely knocked off his spectacles—it did not give him the slightest injury. He did not recollect that Mr. Hunt, after he struck him, had said, that if he was so abominable a coward as not to resent a blow, it would be cruel to repeat it—no such expression was used in his hearing. He repeated his admission, that he went to the hustings to give Mr. Hunt that sort of provocation which he thought would induce him to resent it by resorting to a duel.

Mr. Hunt addressed the Jury in his defence. He made a clever statement, and justified his assault upon the strong and public previous provocation he had received from Mr. Dowling.

The CHAIRMAN summed up the evidence to the Jury with much impartiality. He observed, among other things, that Mr. Hunt had made a very able defence, but he had stated what he, as chairman, was bound to correct. Mr. Hunt had observed, that the assault here alluded to ought to be considered as part of that transaction which took place in Covent-garden. He endeavoured, therefore, to prove that Mr. Dowling was the first aggressor, and that he had merely retaliated the affront: but in this respect he was much mistaken. The affair in Covent-garden took place so long prior to this assault, that it was impossible to consider it as the same transaction. Mr. Dowling did admit, and this was a strong palliating circumstance, that he went to the hustings to make Mr. Hunt fight a duel with him. The Learned Counsel for the prosecution had very justly stated, that this was a gross assault, accompanied, as it was, by extremely provoking language; but the blow itself was very trifling. It was true, indeed, as Mr. Hunt had stated in his defence, that the damages would not be enhanced by the doctor's bill; but still it was an act which no gentleman could bear from another with patience. The blow itself was more degrading to the individual who gave it than to him who received it.

The Jury, after a short deliberation, found the defendant Guilty, and the Chairman passed sentence, observing, that under all the circumstances a fine of 5*l.* was considered as a sufficient compensation.

Mr. Hunt immediately paid the fine, and before he withdrew from the Court returned thanks for the candid manner in which he had been treated by the Court, and for the strict impartiality with which the Jury had been charged by the worthy Chairman.

THE KING v. NIGHTINGALE.

On Tuesday morning the Court was crowded at an early hour. The defendant, Mr. Geoffrey Nightingale, is an Officer in the Guards. The indictment charged him with having committed an assault upon Richard Dennison, by throwing a stone in at his window, thereby creating considerable alarm throughout the whole family.

Mr. Adolphus observed, that the gentleman at the Bar—for in spite of all that had happened, he supposed that was the only appellation he could allow—was said to be of high connexions in life; that very likely was the case; but was that any justification for this gross insult offered to a gentleman reposing quietly in the bosom of his family? Was it to be suffered, that in the middle of the night these nocturnal disturbers should unprovokingly create the most fearful alarms in a decent and most respectable family, enjoying themselves in their own society? He understood that this gentleman was the son of a Lady Nightingale; but even if he were the head of the Howards, he knew impartial justice would be done.

Richard Dennison stated himself to be a surgeon and apothecary, residing at the corner of Duke-street, Manchester-square, where he had lived for 40 years. On the 19th of August he was sitting at supper in his drawing-room, surrounded by his family and a few friends, when he heard a dreadful crash, like the report of fire-arms. The window-shutters were open, and the sash was down. The persons present were himself, Mrs. Sarah Dennison, his two children, Fanny and Emma, Mr. Thomas Butlin, Mr. Thomas Dickinson, and Mr. James Weald. Mrs. Dennison was sitting within a foot and a half of the window which was broken. While they were thus seated, a large stone came through the window, which broke two panes of glass and the window-frame. (Here the stone was produced by the witness, and appeared to be rather of a larger size than a common pebble.) A few seconds after the crash, witness opened the window, but saw no one, but heard the watchman cry out "I have got him." He then went down stairs, and found some one in the hands of the watchman, who subsequently proved to be the defendant. The defendant said his name was Capt. Nightingale, that he lived at No. 18, George-street, and added, that it was his friend who threw the stone, and who was rather inebriated. "Bring your friend, then, to-morrow," said the witness, "and explain the matter to me." He did not want a direct apology, but merely an explanation. The defendant, however, positively refused to bring forward his friend, alleging that his honour prevented him from doing it.

Mr. James Weald, a gentleman in a public office, was present during the whole transaction. At the watch-house the defendant seemed to be very indifferent about the matter, and used some slang words, which he did not now recollect.

Patrick Conner, the watchman, said, that he was about fifty yards from the house when he heard the crash. He caught the defendant running away, and cried out immediately, "I have got him."

Mr. ALLEY remarked, that the gentleman for whom he had the honour of being Counsel was the son of a Lady of high rank in life, and he himself filled a distinguished rank in the army. This gentleman had solemnly declared that he did not throw the stone, but that a friend of his, who was rather intoxicated, and whom he was taking care of, in one of his foolish fits did throw the stone in question. It was far from his intention to do any mischief or injury to any one; but it was done as a frolic merely, when in a state of intoxication. The defendant had refused to give up the name of his friend, and was willing to take all the blame upon himself. This conduct, he would maintain, was highly honourable and praiseworthy. He concluded with observing, that there was not one iota of evidence, excepting that of the watchman, to convict the defendant.

Mr. Nightingale rose to address the Court, but was prevented by the Chairman.—After some conversation, the Jury considered for a minute, and the foreman turned round to give the verdict, when Mr. Adolphus requested that it might be delayed for a few minutes, while he conversed with Mr. Alley.

The CHAIRMAN was not desirous that any punishment degrading to a gentleman should be inflicted; but most assuredly the offence was one which could not be lightly passed over.

Mr. Nightingale expressed himself willing to do any thing the Court might direct, but he would not acknowledge himself guilty.

An apology was then drawn up, which having been shown to the parties, Mr. Nightingale read in open Court. It was nearly as follows:—"No one can lament more than myself the fact having been committed, and I am extremely sorry for that or any thing else that might have given offence to the feelings of Mr. Dennison."

A fine of 50*l.* was also to be paid, and applied to a public charity.—A juror was withdrawn, and no verdict was of course given.

The CHAIRMAN then addressed Mr. Dennison, observing, that his conduct had been most praiseworthy during the whole transaction. The public, he said, were the more indebted to him for instituting this prosecution, on account of the rank of the party accused. With respect to Mr. Nightingale, he was happy that, at last, this course had been taken; and he could have wished that it had been adopted at an earlier period of the case. He really believed that the defendant had spoken the truth, when he said that he had not himself thrown the stone; but the more just and equitable mode of settling the matter would have been, to have brought forward the friend who actually did commit the fact.

WEST KENT QUARTER-SESSIONS.

John Curtis was charged with an assault on Mary Olivia Turner, a child, with an intent to commit a rape.

Mr. Adolphus stated, that Mr. Turner, who is a timber master's assistant, in the Dock-yard of Woolwich, had long been in habits of the closest intimacy with the defendant, who was overseer in the same yard. The latter had two children, and his wife, about three years ago, was at the point of lying in, and he could procure no habitation in which he might place his family. Mr. Turner took him into his house, until Mrs. Curtis's accouchement had taken place. Instead of being grateful for this act, the defendant pursued a line of conduct the most diabolical. He had not been long in the house before Mary Olivia, a child of Mr. Turner's under ten years of age, attracted his notice. He began by taking liberties with her person, which he continued with increased criminality for upwards of two years. During that period, the conduct of the defendant was such as we cannot pollute our columns by describing, and the narration of which, delivered by Mr. Adolphus with an evidently painful reluctance, caused involuntary exclamations of horror from many of his astonished and indignant hearers; we say astonished, because the recital was of that nature, that it was difficult to suppose the man existed who could devise and perpetrate such atrocities. The child, prevented by the defendant's injunctions, at first mentioned the affair to no one except Miss Muskett, a young female companion, a little older than herself. That young lady, at the expiration of two years, made inquiries of Mary Olivia Turner as to whether the defendant continued his abominable practices; and being informed that he did so, she, being by her own advanced age become aware of the evil tendency of the defendant's conduct, told the story to a woman, who communicated it to the parents. The father was at first inclined to hush up the matter, to prevent a public exposure of his child; but it being known to two or three persons, the story soon became a general theme of conversation. The dock-yard was placarded, and the defendant was universally execrated as the monster of the age. The father by this unfortunate publicity felt compelled to bring the matter into a Court of Justice, though it was with the greatest pain he did so. The defendant's offence was attended by every possible aggravation. He was a married man, and had two children of his own—he was in the house of his benefactor—the object of his brutality was the child of that benefactor—he had, by a series of acts, during a long period, done all in his power to defile the mind of an infant, to undermine every feeling of modesty, propriety, and morality, which it is for the welfare of society should be inculcated in the mind of a female. Mr. Adolphus having concluded his address by some animated observations on the criminality of the defendant, called

Mary Olivia Turner, an interesting child, about 13 years of age, who gave her testimony with great precision, and evinced a considerable degree of intelligence. Her evidence went to fully prove the facts stated by Mr. Adolphus: they were so inconceivably disgusting, that a repetition of them is impossible. It appeared that the defendant did not perpetrate the actual crime for which so many men have suffered. To add to the guilt of Curtis, it appeared that he had not confined his criminality to Miss Turner, but had on one occasion scandalously exposed himself to her, in company with his own children.

Mr. ANDREWS cross-examined her, but could elicit from her nothing to shake the credit of her testimony. In one part of the examination she burst into tears, and appeared much distressed by the questions of the learned Counsel.

Miss Muskett, a young lady of 17 years of age, deposed to the communication of Curtis's conduct being made to her by Miss Turner two years ago, and of her informing the child's parents of the circumstance.

Mr. Turner, the father of the child, deposed, that, previous to this horrible discovery, he and the defendant were on terms of the closest friendship, they having formerly been on service together. He was informed of the defendant's vile conduct on the evening of the 9th of July. The next day he went to his house, and charged him with his criminality. The defendant acknowledged that he had acted improperly, and expressed great contrition for what had passed, offering to make any reparation in his power. Witness told him, that the injury he had done to him by the destruction of his child's purity and innocence was beyond the reach of reparation. After loading him with reproaches, he left the house, and had not spoken to the defendant since that day. Witness, in the first instance, resolved to bring the offender to justice, but his wife prevailed on him to abandon his intention, she being at the time in a state of great nervous debility, (to which she was occasionally subject), and declared that to have her child exposed in a Court of Justice in such a case would deprive her of reason. The matter had since become so public, that he was induced to take the necessary steps for the punishment of the offender.

Mr. ANDREWS addressed the Jury on the part of the defendant.

The Jury deliberated for a short time, and returned a verdict of—Guilty of the assault with intent to commit a rape—which was, in fact, a verdict of guilty on all the counts of the indictment.

His LORDSHIP, in passing sentence on the defendant, observed, that he had been found guilty of an offence of a far more criminal nature than ordinarily came before a Court of Quarter Sessions. As a legal offence, it was one of a most serious nature, and in a moral point of view it was almost the worst that could be committed. His conduct was attended by every circumstance of aggravation; he had injured his benefactor, and having a family of his own, had endeavoured to effect the destruction of all moral principle in the mind of the child of him who had ever treated him as a friend. The punishment which the Court had it in its power to inflict was very inadequate to the defendant's guilt; but his Lordship hoped, that the imprisonment he would undergo would bring him to repentance of his crime. His Lordship then sentenced him to—two years' imprisonment in Maidstone gaol.

The defendant was a decently dressed man, short in stature, and we should suppose about 36 or 37 years of age.

SURREY SESSIONS.

THE PARISH OF CAMBERWELL v. WILLIAM PALFREY.

On Wednesday the defendant, a graduate of the University of Cambridge, was indicted for having walked in a naked state, in the day, on the banks of the canal, between Peckham and Camberwell, in which he had been bathing.

Mr. Whiffen was about 300 yards from the canal; saw the defendant at twelve in the day walking backwards and forwards naked for twenty minutes. Officers went and talked to defendant, but did not take him into custody. Several people were on the ground. A woman walked past on the opposite side while he was walking naked.—The defendant was, when naked, about 300 yards from the bridge: the bank was high, and people on the ground could see him as plainly as possible, and thought him mad.

Thomas Bull was stationed on the banks to prevent people from exposing themselves. Witness asked him whether he was not ashamed to expose himself, and desired him to put on his clothes. He replied he would not put on his clothes for any man living, and said he would smash them (meaning witness and a companion).

Mr. Goodwin said, the females of his family could see the banks of the canal. Several complaints were made by his father's tenants. Had seen persons in most indecent positions on the banks from the windows of his house.

Mr. COWLEY, for the defence, said, that men were not to be interdicted a healthful and beneficial amusement because indelicate women pass by; why should a great advantage be given up for a partial mischief, and that practice be done away with by which the lives of so many fellow-creatures were saved? Why should Surrey alone oppose this principle of humanity, and declare bathing to be against the law of the land? He called on the Jury to consider the consequences of a verdict of guilty to one who was respectable in society, and who had no other motive than that of a strong necessity, in the heat of an oppressive summer, to run the hazard of being accused of what he would startle to hear. He had several highly respectable persons to call to character, amongst whom were Mr. Stephens, son to the Master in Chancery. He conceived that if this squeamishness of seeing naked figures was to be listened to, there would soon be an end of our boasted Constitution!

The CHAIRMAN begged the Jury would dismiss what they had just heard from their minds; observed, that facts were not to be overturned by any speech, however brilliant; and declared that it was but a poor proof of delicacy in the defendant, to walk naked when a female presented herself, whose appearance should have made him instantly hide himself.

There were two counts in the indictment, making, however, no moral distinction as to the offence imputed.—The Jury found the defendant guilty on the second count, which verdict does not prevent an application to a higher Court.

Mr. COWLEY, in a speech of great length and vehemence, called upon the Bench to quash the indictment.

Mr. NOLAN.—Is it necessary to answer this?

CHAIRMAN.—There is not a Magistrate on the Bench who has the smallest doubt of the propriety of the verdict.

Mr. COWLEY.—Then I shall try the King's Bench.

CHAIRMAN.—You may take your ease any where you please." The defendant was informed by the Bench of the impropriety of his conduct, and in consideration of his having already suffered imprisonment, sentenced him to pay a fine of 1s., and to enter into his own recognizance, in the sum of 20l., to keep the peace for 12 months.

OLD BAILEY.

On Friday the following prisoners were arraigned for forgery, and pleaded Guilty to the minor offence of having forged notes in their possession, viz. James Turnor, James Close, John Carpenter, John Eagan, George Baker, Mary Hartnell, John Leonard, Susannah Leonard, David Crawley, Susan Farnillo, and Thomas Kirby.—They were sentenced to 14 years transportation.

MURDER.

William Losch was indicted for murdering his wife, Mary Anne, on the 9th of October.

Anne Daman lodged in the same house with the deceased. It was on a Friday night, 9th of October, between 7 and 8, when she was going out with a candle, the deceased came out, and asked her how she did. There was a man behind her, and witness asked whether he was her husband. The deceased replied in the affirmative; and the prisoner then came forward, and asked the deceased whether she would go home; she pushed him from her, and made no reply. He said, "Go home, Nance, for you are drunk." "If I am," she said, "it is prostituting my body for such an old fellow as you are." Witness observed something in the prisoner's hand, with which he immediately struck her in the side. The deceased cried out, "I am murdered; take the knife out of me." Witness was so frightened she could not speak or move. The deceased pulled up her clothes, and witness saw her bowels gush out. The prisoner said, "Here I am, take me to prison if you choose."

Richard Clarke saw the prisoner strike the deceased, who staggered back, crying, "I am murdered." She then pulled up her clothes, and said, "O my God, will no one take the knife out of me?" The prisoner did not attempt to go away.

The rest of the witnesses were merely in corroboration.

The Prisoner was called upon for his defence, but he said nothing; neither were any witnesses called for him.

The Jury without hesitation pronounced a verdict of Guilty.

The Recorder immediately passed sentence of death upon the prisoner, and he was ordered to be hanged on Monday next; his body was to be given to the surgeons to be dissected.

The prisoner seemed to be completely resigned to his fate, and retired without emotion from the bar.

CHARGE OF MURDER.

John Daley was charged with the wilful murder of James Learwood, in the Fleet Prison, on the 10th September.

Charles Johnson was a prisoner in the Fleet, and was so on 10th October. Learwood was a tailor confined in the Fleet Prison, about 50 years of age. About 5 o'clock on that evening, he was walking opposite Learwood's room, and he saw through the window the deceased fall from the shop-board. The deceased cried out murder. He saw Daley beating Learwood with a sleeve-board. The deceased was lying on his side on the ground at the time, and cried out, as if for help. During this time the window was shut, and witness opening it said, "Don't kill the man." He called some people up, and saw some blood or black on the left eye of Learwood. The deceased was lying on his back at this time, and the prisoner turned him on his belly, and stepped him on the breech six or seven times with the sleeve-board, saying, "Damn your old eyes, I'll teach you, I'll hit you on the rump." The prisoner was in a terrible passion, and jumped out of the window, saying, "D—n his old eyes, I have not half done with him yet."

William Graves recollected being called up by the last witness. The first thing he heard was Daley complaining that the deceased had given a letter belonging to him away. The deceased said that Daley had pulled him off the shop-board, and would not forget that in a hurry. Witness remonstrated with Daley, who had jumped through the window again, and said, "I have not done with you yet; and I will serve you out again, when I prove that you gave the letter to Lewis." Learwood said he knew nothing about it; and a person standing by said to Daley, "I think you have pretty well served him out as it is, for you have almost broken his leg."

Wm. Pacey said that after the beating of the deceased, prisoner cried out in the hearing of several persons, "I wish I had killed the old fellow outright."

John Mead was in conversation with the prisoner on the evening after the dispute. Witness said, "The poor man (meaning Learwood) is dying." To which prisoner replied, "It is time the old rascal, or scoundrel, was dead." Here the conversation ended, and the witness went away.

John Hargrave, a surgeon, was called in to see the deceased, on the night of the 10th of October. He found the deceased totally insensible. One eye was much discoloured; the muscles on the left side of the face were much distorted, and his tongue hanging out of his mouth. Witness, imagining he had received some severe injury in the head, bled him profusely. In one of his visits in the morning, a man came into the room whom he afterwards knew to be the prisoner. Witness said, "The man will not live 48 hours, he has received some severe injury;" and added, "I should not like to be in the situation of the person who caused it." Prisoner replied, "I am the person who caused it." Witness remarked, "I am very sorry for it;" to which prisoner rejoined, "So am I, but what can I do?" Witness advised him to procure the best medical advice he could. This the prisoner seemed very anxious to do. In another conversation he had with the prisoner, he (prisoner) said he did not strike the deceased in the head; but he supposed that he got a hurt by a fall from the shop-board. The witness replied, that could not be, as the floor was thickly carpeted. (He explained this by saying that there was thick hop-bagging under the carpet.) Prisoner then said that perhaps he had struck his head against the bed-post; to which witness replied, the bed-post was not near enough. Witness saw the body opened after death; there were three or four ounces of extravasated blood on the brain, and he had no doubt but his death was caused by an internal injury of the brain arising from an external injury: the only external violence which he saw was on the left eye.

The Prisoner in his defence, said, "My Lord, what I wish to impress upon your Lordship and the Jury is, that the room in which deceased was, was not carpeted all round; the carpeting was only in the centre. The prisoner then went into a detail of the circumstances, which were in substance, that having been informed that Learwood had picked up a letter which he had lost, he went in company with Dowdell, his informant, to Learwood's room. On going in, he upbraided him with having shown his letter to a third person. Deceased said, he thought it no harm. Prisoner called him an old rascal, and the other told him he lied. The deceased then attempted to get off the board, and in doing so he fell on the bare flags, and hurt his left temple. Prisoner helped him up, and asked him if he was hurt, adding, that if he were, he deserved it. Deceased then sat on the chair, and some other angry words arose, on which prisoner said, he would "serve him out," and cob him with the sleeve-board. He then took him by the arm, and struck him three or four blows on the breech with it, but never struck him on any other part; he had on all occasions been very kind to the deceased."

Mr. HARMER, the prisoner's solicitor, stated that he was present at the Coroner's inquest. Saw Hargrave give his evidence, in which he did not then mention a word about his second conversation with the prisoner.

Ten or twelve respectable witnesses were then called, who all concurred in giving him an excellent character, for a humane and kind-hearted disposition.

Mr. Baron GARROW summed up the evidence, and the Jury, after deliberating about ten minutes, returned a verdict—Not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter.

The prisoner, who is a genteel-looking man, about 36 years of age, conducted himself in a very composed manner throughout the trial.

ADMINISTERING SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS TO A CHILD.

Eleanor Bryan was indicted for manslaughter, in causing the death of Johanna Duggan, an infant, between five and six years old, by administering to her, on the 28th of September last, a large quantity of spirituous liquor, viz. a half-pint, which she said Johanna swallowed, not being aware of the consequences, and of which she died.

John Duggan, living in the parish of St. Giles's, is the brother of the deceased: saw the prisoner on the 28th of September: on that day his sister was in good health. On Sunday the 27th prisoner came into the house of witness's mother between 12 and 1 at night. Prisoner said she was locked out of her lodging, and had no place to go to. Witness's father told her she might sleep with the children; but she refused, as she did not wish to disturb them; she slept on the floor. The deceased rose early in the morning, and prisoner sent her for a quartern of gin, which her father and mother partook of. She afterwards went out for another quartern, which she also shared with some of the family. She offered witness a glass, which he refusing, she threw it over him into the bed. The deceased then said she was going to Covent-garden, and asked prisoner whether he was going also. Prisoner said, "Yes, Johannah, I shall take you to your father and mother." The child then went with her, and was brought home in a state of intoxication in about two hours after, and was very sick. She was put to bed, slept for a short time, and then got up apparently better; but getting very ill again, was again put to bed, where she became worse, and a doctor was sent for. The child grew still worse, and died that evening.—Prisoner acknowledged to witness that the child had taken two glasses of gin, one glass of rum, two pennyworth of peppermint, part of two pots of beer, and some wine.—Prisoner was always very kind to the deceased.

Catherine, the sister of the deceased, stated to the same effect, and added, that when she remarked to the prisoner, it was a shame to give a child so much spirits, prisoner replied that it was not, and that she would give her more when she got the better of that.

Thomas Wood, a publican, said, that the prisoner came to his house on the day mentioned. She called for one half-quartern of gin, which she gave the child to drink. She had no more.

Mr. Morgan examined the body of the child, and found the intestines dreadfully inflamed, and part of them in a state of mortification. He had no doubt but the death was caused by the inflammation.

The Prisoner said, that the child had tasted of every glass of spirits which her father and mother had in the morning. She only gave her one glass of gin, and did not think it would do her any injury, as her father and mother were in the habit of giving her spirits occasionally.

The Jury found the prisoner—Guilty of manslaughter.

Mr. Justice DALLAS called up the publican, (the landlord at the Rose and Crown, Broad-street, St. Giles's.) and thus addressed him:—"Sir,—You have conducted yourself in a very unbecoming manner, and deserve the severest censure of the Court. It is a melancholy thing to reflect, that a man of your description should calmly look on and see a woman, such as the prisoner at the bar, give a large glass of spirits to a child who was not capable of knowing the effects it was likely to produce upon her. You should not have suffered such conduct to take place where you could prevent it. It is to be feared that many disgraceful scenes take place at your house from the carelessness with which you permitted the act which was one cause of the unfortunate little infant's death. Your conduct is extremely reprehensible, and you shall not be allowed your expences."

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Sarah Watson, charged with felony, &c. at the house of Mr. Gregory, Elms-row, Bayswater, on Wednesday underwent a second examination; but there not being sufficient evidence against her, she was discharged.

On Thursday an application of rather a singular nature was made to the Magistrates. The applicant stated, that he appeared on behalf of Wm. Northey, Esq. He said that Mr. Northey's cart had been taken from his door by the Inspector of Pavements, because the ashes burnt at Mr. Northey's house were about to be conveyed to an estate of that gentleman's in the country. The Magistrate said, by the late Act of Parliament no one could use their own ashes; they were the property of the contractor; and if any person attempted to remove them, they were liable to the penalty of 10*l*. The Magistrate added, that the Earl of Coventry, Marquis of Worcester, and other noblemen, had been similarly situated, and upon inquiry they had found it necessary to comply with the provisions of the Act. The applicant paid 10*l*. into the hands of the clerk to await the conviction, and the cart was ordered to be restored.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I have observed in some of the papers an account of an accident that lately occurred, in which they state that my father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Ward, were thrown out of a gig at Barnes this day se'nnight, and both lay at Barnes Workhouse without hopes of recovery. This account is most materially wrong: it should have been Mr. and Mrs. Hall, of Broad-street, Golden-square, my wife's father and mother, who went out on the day stated with their horse and gig. At Barnes Common, Mr. H. got out, leaving his wife seated, and while doing something to the horse, the animal plunged forward. Seeing the danger of Mrs. Hall, he attempted to seize the horse, when he knocked him down and fractured his skull, and otherwise so dreadfully injured him, that in spite of the best surgical aid, he expired on Wednesday morning at ten o'clock. Mrs. H. was thrown out, and pitched on her head, which was most dreadfully bruised, but she was removed to her house the same day, and is now in a fair way of recovery.—Your very obedient servant,
2, Great Russell-street, Covent-garden. CHARLES WARD.

MURDER AT PORTSEA.—On Friday se'nnight a most atrocious murder was committed on the body of a man of the name of Huntingfield, aged 74, who lived in Orange-street, and was a shipwright in the dock-yard. The old man had retired to bed as usual, and in the morning, about 2 o'clock, a male lodger discovered his wife in the yard, partly undressed, and she not answering when he spoke to her, the man was induced to call the landlady. They found the wife on the stairs, who told them she had been robbed and her husband murdered by two men with their faces blacked. Suspicion has fallen on the wife, who had several marks of blood upon her clothes. She is in custody. The deceased had six or seven mortal wounds upon the skull, supposed to have been inflicted with a hatchet. The woman has been taken to Portsea from Portsmouth gaol, to view the body. She does not wish to see it, and has given three or four different accounts of the affair; at first it was said the old man had broken a blood-vessel in the night, by a fit of coughing. The deceased bore an excellent character, and the wife a very bad one.

On Thursday the Phenomena coach, in its way from London to Norwich, broke down, about a mile on this side of Bury; by which unfortunate occurrence Mrs. Brown, resident in London, had her neck dislocated, and she expired before any assistance could be afforded her; another passenger had his collar-bone broken, and a third sustained some severe bruises. The circumstance was purely accidental, occasioned by the breaking of the fore axle-tree. The carriage was proceeding at a gentle rate.—Norwich paper.

On Tuesday afternoon, about one o'clock, the inhabitants of Greystoke-place, Fetter-lane, were thrown into the greatest alarm, in consequence of a fire which broke out in the workshop belonging to Mr. Sadd, carpenter, which burned with such velocity, that in a short time the whole of the premises were in flames. Several fire-engines soon arrived, but unfortunately no water could be obtained for some time. The devouring element soon communicated with the house of Mr. Fletcher, tailor, and a Mr. Hawkings, cheesemonger, both of which sustained considerable injury, as well as the house of Dr. Milleur, and likewise Elam Chapel; but the whole of Mr. Sadd's premises, with all the property, was consumed. The fire was totally subdued about 2 o'clock. The damage done is very considerable. Mr. Sadd alone (it is said) lost property to the amount of 1,000*l*.

A child, eleven months old, was drowned in the flat of a butter firken, containing only a few inches of water, on Monday, in Calmel-buildings. The parents had put the child out of bed early in the morning to play about the room, and they were asleep when the accident happened.

On Tuesday morning, as Wyatt and Audley, constables, were passing along the road near Smith's-fields, Battle-bridge, several shot struck Wyatt about the head, which turned out to be from the gun of a young Gentleman named Wilmot, who was shooting sparrows, and he was taken for the assault.

The following fatal accident occurred a few days ago in the Lower-road, Deptford:—The two infant children of Mr. James Penny, of Deptford, were intrusted to the care of a youth, to be taken out in a small hand-chaise. The boy, fatigued with drawing the vehicle, requested permission of a man who was driving a cart with one horse, to fasten the chaise to the tail of the cart; the man consented, and it was attached accordingly. A few moments afterwards, a spirited horse, which was drawing a cart, took fright, galloped towards the little carriage, ran over it, and crushed it to pieces; one of the children was killed on the spot, the other was taken home bruised in a shocking manner.

No. 552.

DEATH OF SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY.

THE dreary season has indeed come upon us in a melancholy manner. The cheerful were beginning to laugh it away, the staid to meet it quietly, and the melancholy to bear it out, when the feelings of all were suddenly shocked and astonished by the violent end of this excellent person. Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY presented to the public mind the idea of a man so little liable to such a catastrophe,—something so firm, so reasonable, of so long and quiet a standing, so built up of habit, conscience, and reputation, so opposed to every thing vacillating, tumultuous, and subject to impulse,—and above all, he had just attained to honours so avowedly acceptable and complete, so flattering to his honest ambition, so useful to his efforts in the cause of mankind, and so calculated to stimulate even his industry in the coming Parliament, that if there was one man perhaps whom the world would have been the last to think of on such an occasion, it was he. Yet this representative, as it were, of quiet consistency has been hurried by his feelings into death; this long upholder of political hope has become the victim of sudden hopelessness; this admired and solid pillar of the public welfare has crumbled in one instant before their eyes, and its place is left a blank.

This shock naturally forces upon one's recollection two other appalling deaths, which have taken place in less than four years. In the violence of it, it resembles that of another eminent and independent Statesman, whose name we all know, yet all, out of reverence, forbear to mention; and there is a second point of similarity to it which it will be our duty to notice. But in the domestic nature of its origin, its very violence contains something of a gentleness, which serves to remind us of the other. The difficult birth of a child, and perhaps the additional pangs resulting from its death, though she nobly tried to feel and say otherwise, caused the lamented death of the Princess CHARLOTTE. We all know how the loss affected her amiable husband. The death of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY's wife caused his own. He had not the younger strength of Prince LEOPOLD, nor the healthier philosophy to be found among those who lead less irksome or artificial lives; and in a moment of desperation he dashed himself into his grave.

A ministerial paper, notorious for its want of delicacy and wisdom, insinuates that this was not sufficient to account for Sir SAMUEL's death; and when accused of malignity for saying so, turns round, with an air of injured innocence not unusual with a certain pitch of worldly perception, and retorts the accusation as a thing which could only be deserved by those who make it. This is all very good in the abstract; but a philosopher may have a right to make observations, and yet they may become very suspicious in the mouth of a hackneyed partizan; especially when we know very well, that if a celebrated person on his own side of the question had died in this manner, he would have been the last to breathe the least and most airy syllable out of the direct trade-wind of panegyric.

But leaving this writer and his associates to their usual task of imagining consolatory infirmities in other people, it is obvious to any one who really understands humanity, that a shock of this nature may be quite enough to overturn one of the best of mankind, under particular circumstances. A mere man of the world might not feel it, because he feels little or nothing; a hypocrite might talk of the sustaining consolations of religion, and an undoubtedly pious man might feel them; finally, youth and young health might soon get over it, and a wise man in advanced life who has passed his days in a natural manner, or was a very profound thinker indeed, or had great and available resources of imagination, might get over it by quiet degrees. But when we come to look into the particular mind, habits, and temperament of such a man as Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, the general impression produced by a lawyer's life and its apparently formal character, goes off; and nobody appears more likely to sink under this visitation than our late sensitive countryman.

It is understood, in the first place, that Sir SAMUEL was what is called a nervous man; that is to say, his organization was delicate, and things made a double impression upon him. Now under proper direction, and in a mode of life, calculated to render its delicacy a healthy one, this organization may be made productive of the greatest pleasure, because its tendency being then to the bright side of things, it will see that with double intenseness as well as the reverse under unhealthy circumstances. But in artificial modes of life, to which after all it can never well accommodate itself though habit may render them seemingly necessary, this tendency is extremely dangerous, especially if (contrary to the vulgar opinion) it has not many resources of imagination; for if imagination on the one hand may be supposed to create pains as well as pleasures to itself according as health or morbidity predominates, yet upon the whole, according to the natural impulse of humanity, it leans more to the pleasurable than the painful, and takes even a pride in summoning its numerous servitors to its assistance. One of the most painful of morbid sensations is the pressure of one idea upon the mind. It is the part of a great imagination to bring up its forces against it; and if a man sink under the effort, it is a proof, not of the overpowering strength of his ally, the imagination, but of the fierceness of his enemy, the disease. Men of great imagination have undoubtedly given way, but then they have been suffering under an almost incurable delicacy of temperament, like COWPER, or have had other unimaginative causes for their extremity, like COLLINS. It is observable that men of the very greatest imaginations, such as DANTE, and MILTON, have stood their ground amidst the most ruinous misery; and even if the argument respecting imagination be given up, another and more useful one remains, which is exemplified in the lives of those illustrious men as well as of livelier philosophers, and which is,—the leading of a life more according to nature than usual.

Now Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY was a nervous man on the side leaning to anxiety and irritability, and he had passed his whole life in the careful and unhealthy routine of the law, with a perpetual wear and tear on his spirits, and cooped up from air and exercise in the Courts. He was a nervous man, the most liable subject in the world to the force of habit; and every thing no doubt, good and bad, had become an almost indestructible habit with him, perhaps a necessity. It was an indestructible habit with him to go on pleading causes, and feeling anxieties for all sorts of legal events; it was an indestructible habit to coop himself up from air and exercise; it was an indestructible habit to go on from year to year increasing his nervous tendency, or at least keeping it in a state of perpetual soreness; it was an indestructible habit to vary his personal business in the courts with business of a more exalted and trying nature in the House of Commons; it was an indestructible habit with him to ponder upon human suffering and upon his little and slow means of diminishing it; it was an indestructible habit with him, in consequence of his artificial mode of life, now withering himself in sunless and unairy rooms by day, and now wasting away in late sleepless nights in Parliament, to make all the trouble and anxiety of these habits doubly troublesome and anxious; and finally, it was an indestructible habit with him, as his only solace, to look for his regular return home and for the sight of those dear domestic faces, which even if he might occasionally slide by with apparent indifference when taking up his books or his law-papers again, he nevertheless felt about him,—felt there and felt necessary to be there,—supporting him with arms round his spirit, with conscious love, and with a gentle certainty.

Now if such a man could have ill dispensed with even one of his bad or unhealthy habits (for any artificial mode of life however venerable by custom is but a kind of grave intoxication), how much less could he afford to dispense with almost the only refreshment he had in the world, or any one constituent part of it? His habits tended to make him additionally nervous and sickly:—here was an event calculated to press dreadfully on such a temperament. He does not appear to have had any resources of imagination, or any power of going for relief to the beauties of nature:—here was an event calculated to make him terribly sensible of his want of refuge. His only resource was occupation of some kind,—business; but having fallen sick, his sickness would not allow him to attend to it, and if it had, his most visible daily reward was gone; the brightest image in the vista of his dreary travail was taken away. Thus was he pinned and nailed down to a sense of his misery, and his thoughts growing fierce from hopelessness turned and beat on his brain like an anvil. Not enough in such a loss to account for the death of such a man! Why, good God! a man in a great state of morbidity shall yearn even after a thing of comparative indifference. He shall want to be here or there, to join his family or a friend, and look at every pore with impatience:—and shall a writer, whose angers, and astonishments, and placidities are at the command of a dull political party, come and stand over a catastrophe like this, and nauseate us with his courtly wonder? But no doubt the literary gentry in the ministerial interest are absolutely uneasy with the weight of their Christian virtues; and certainly, we have had some edifying specimens of the resignation with which Personages in high places regard the loss of their female partners in life, dead or alive. However, to turn aside from such precious humanists is to forget them.—There is one thing always attending on recollections of persons whom we have loved, which must have exceedingly affected a man like Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY. The kindness we have shewn them, however great, we cannot think enough, while every little opposition or even omission is magnified twenty fold; and it is sometimes difficult to persuade ourselves, in the teeth of the matter-of-fact and of the most decided opinions of our friends, that we took all the measures that could be resorted to in order to ward off the stroke of death. This reflection, coming upon a brain already heated with ill-health, anxiety, alternate hope and despair, and a dreadful watchfulness (for Sir SAMUEL, it appears, was several weeks without sleep) may be the last caustic drop that sets it in a flame; and in a sudden delirium arising from this complication of causes, a man makes a spring from under the intolerable weight of his anguish, and rushes from one fierce sensation to another and a final one.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY's exertions in the cause of legal and other Reform are well known; but hardly admit of any particular criticism. That they were sincere and useful, every body, we believe, will admit. That they were of the negative or pruning kind, rather than of any great original character in assisting the growth of human improvement, will perhaps be almost equally acknowledged. His departures from the beaten track, especially in religion, in which he was understood not to be quite orthodox, were bold as opposed to worldliness, but timid as compared with philosophy. We say timid, not so much because he did not depart more widely, as because he seemed uneasy and irritable at wanting more company where he went, and apt to be vexed both with those who did not go so far and those who went farther. There was an air of narrowness in his very liberality, and of a want of personal sympathy in his very philanthropy. He seemed either to want sufficient address of mind, or sufficient strength of nerves, to afford even to give way to his feelings. His virtue had something of the formal cut and lack-land dominion of the Genevese.

But a long practised lawyer, especially one of a delicate and anxious temperament, does a great deal even in setting his face against mere precedent; and nobody would think of disgracing the memory of Sir SAMUEL by comparing him for an instant with those time-serving and most timid men, who endeavour to brave it out to their own conscience by putting on a blustering aspect. He was as much above such men,—at as great and to them invisible height over their heads,—as he was superior to the approbation of the vulgar, great as well as small. It affords a remarkable instance of what the ministerialists regard as the beau ideal in government, that the Courier newspaper, which delights to interweave its unwilling praises of him with *but*s and *thought*s, accused him on Friday of having been too enthusiastic in his reform of the criminal jurisprudence!

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY was a sensible and impressive speaker, rather than a happy one. He had nothing of persuasion, abstractedly so called. He seemed too uneasy in his attempts to persuade himself, or rather in anticipating objection and opposition. His voice also was low and subdued, without appearing to be comfortable in its subjection. It was full of little starts, and catches, and breathless intervals. But his reasoning was clear and to the purpose, and he seemed painfully sincere. His look was very earnest and intelligent. We remember, when we first visited the Court of Chancery some years ago, a friend asked us if we could find out Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY from among the rest of his Bench; and we did it instantly. But the task, to say the truth, was not a difficult one. The faces of the lawyers who attend the Courts, generally speaking, present a mixture of dullness and care, that really amounts to the pathetic. They seem at once wrinkled with anxiety, neutralized with a forced indifference, and absolutely sodden and made pale with the want of vital air, exercise, and enjoyment.

Upon the whole, Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY appears to us to have fallen a victim to a sudden and great accession of disquietude, coming upon him in the decline of a long life of sickly and artificial habits. He was not a great man; but in answer to those who take a pleasure in telling us so, it may be said, that he was much superior to the little. He was a man anxious for the public welfare, unambitious in any vulgar sense, an intelligent speaker, an excellent lawyer; and if he had infirmities, not in his disposition, but perhaps in his temper, the best tempered men will be the last to strike at this sore place in his memory. In alluding ourselves to what was weak as well as strong in him, we trust we may refer to the general tone and opinions of this paper to prove that we have done it for a general good, not for a particular purpose; and that in rescuing his infirmities out of the hands of the malignant, we show indeed, but do not expose them. There have been greater and wiser men than Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY; but it is praise of which any memory may be proud, that he was beloved by DUMONT and respected by BENTHAM.

PARTICULARS RESPECTING THE DEATH, &c.

On Tuesday morning an Inquest was held at the Colonade public-house, Bernard-street, Russell square, before Thomas Stirling, Esq. on the body of the above much lamented gentleman. The utmost anxiety prevailed in the neighbourhood, and gloom pervaded every countenance.

C. Maybrey, surgeon, residing in Great Russell-street, deposed, that yesterday, the 2d instant, at two o'clock in the afternoon, he was sent for to attend the deceased, whose complaint, he was given to understand, was an internal hemorrhage. On entering the bed-chamber, he found Dr. Roget leaning over the deceased, who was on the floor; the servants were supporting him. The deceased held in one hand a sheet of paper, and a pen in the other, and appeared making an attempt to write. The hemorrhage from the wound had ceased, and likewise pulsation; but a slight vibration was perceptible in the region of the heart. The witness examined the incision, which was on the throat, and found it very deep, from which, and the considerable flow of blood, witness was of opinion death ensued.

sition, and, addressing himself to the Coroner, stated, that he had just received a note, which it was material should be instantly attended to. He handed it to the Coroner, who read it to the Jury. It was hastily written, in French, by Mr. Brougham, dated St. James's-square, entreating Mr. Dumont instantly to come to him, as he (Mr. Brougham) was unable to leave his room; but it was of the utmost and most pressing importance that he should communicate with Mr. Dumont before the inquest should be proceeded in. The latter gentleman stated himself to have been upon terms of the strictest intimacy with the deceased, and begged he might have time allowed him to attend to the solicitation of Mr. Brougham. The Coroner recommended Mr. Dumont to use all possible expedition, and observed, that in his absence they could continue the examination of the intermediate witnesses.

The above witness (Mr. Maybrey), in continuation, said, that there was a great quantity of blood on the floor, and a portion of it in a basin. The wound appeared to have been inflicted with a sharp instrument. There was a bloody razor lying by his side. This witness pulled from his pocket the sheet of paper, which he deposed was that held by the deceased. It was in different places smeared with blood. At the sight of it a start of distressing horror pervaded the inquest-chamber. The paper was blotted with ink; the words "Sir, witness," or "wishes," might be traced; but so illegibly, that much doubt prevailed as to the correct indication of the characters so construed. The remaining marks of the pen were feebly traced, and might be compared to those an infant would produce for its amusement.

John Knox, surgeon, residing at 65, Great Russell-street, deposed, that he was sent for to the residence of the deceased at half-past two. Mr. Maybrey, the former witness, had previously arrived. On witness's entrance into the bed-chamber, he found the deceased lying on his back on the floor. He examined the body, and found a large wound in the upper part of the throat, which had completely severed the wind-pipe. The blood had then ceased to flow, as also circulation in the wrist; respiration continued in an imperfect state until three o'clock. Witness was of opinion that deceased's death was occasioned by loss of blood, and the obstruction of breathing, from the separation of the wind-pipe. A considerable quantity of blood was on the floor, and some in a basin; a razor lay near the deceased, stained with blood.

CORONER.—Did he appear to have been shaving?

Witness.—Judging from circumstances, I should conclude that he had left his bed to commit the deed.

A notice was here read by the Coroner, signed Dr. Alex. Marcet, stating that such was the agony of mind of Dr. Roget, from the melancholy event, that it was impossible he could attend the inquest relative to the death of his late uncle.

The Coroner and Jury then proceeded from the inquest-room to the residence of the deceased, in Russell-street, for the purpose of viewing the body.

[Upon the arrival of the Jury at the house of the deceased, a considerable anxiety was manifested to gain admittance to view the body. Some of the reporters, of course, were among the number; but the Coroner prevented the intrusion, by threatening to commit any person who entered, except the Jury.]

Thomas Bowen said he was footman to Sir Samuel Romilly. He did not see his master from the middle of August last, until Sunday afternoon, when he arrived in town from the Isle of Wight. He looked well, and appeared in good health at the time; much better than could have been expected, from the domestic affliction which had taken place, and hearing that he had been unwell. Soon after he came in, he lay down on the sofa in the library, which was between four and five o'clock. Witness heard that the deceased was unwell from the loss of Lady Romilly, who died on Thursday night last; she had been unwell for a long time, and had a son and six daughters; the eldest, the son, was about 20 years of age; the youngest, a girl, between eight and nine. Sir Samuel appeared always exceedingly happy in his family; but the multiplicity of his avocations prevented his being much with them; he had scarce any time for enjoyment. Witness did not attend him on Monday morning, but knew he was indisposed and confined to his bed: when well, his general hour of rising was six o'clock, and of going to bed, eleven. Miss Romilly, Mr. William Romilly, Dr. Roget, and Mrs. Davis (sister of Lady Romilly), were in the house on Monday morning, as were also some of the servants (part being in the country); he could not tell who it was that attended Sir Samuel in his bed-room, with his breakfast, on that morning. Witness, about two o'clock heard a noise, like somebody falling on the floor, up two pair of stairs, and went up to ascertain the cause. The bed-room door of his master was open, and Dr. Roget was standing outside; witness was about to enter, and saw Sir Samuel (as he thought) coming towards the door, in the act of driving the Doctor out. It appeared, however, it was to keep him out, for he raised both his hands and fastened the door; he was then bleeding profusely. Witness did not then observe an instrument in his hand. The door was instantly burst open, and Sir Samuel was found leaning over the wash-hand-stand, his throat being cut, and the blood flowing from him profusely; a shirt and a blanket were about him; he was quite speechless, but he made several signs with his hand; he was given a sheet of paper, and pen and ink. Previous to entering the room, Dr. Roget told witness that the deceased had cut his throat. Miss Romilly, previous to the fatal act committed by the deceased, had been with him in the room, but he sent her down to the drawing-room, desiring to see Dr. Roget. It was during this interval he cut his throat. He kept a case of razors, in the ordinary way, in his room. There were two beds in his room, in one of which Dr. Roget slept. Witness asked the Doctor if he saw the deceased do the deed; and he replied, that he thought, upon going into the room when sent for, he was just throwing away the razor after inflicting the wound.

Mr. Stephen Dumont, of Geneva, stated, that he was one of the Representatives of the Council at Geneva, but had been in England previous to the restoration. I have (he said) been connected with Sir Samuel Romilly a great many years; my intention was to have spent the summer with my best friend, Sir Samuel, and his lady; but the state of Lady Romilly's health was such that she was removed to Cowes, in the Isle of Wight.—[Here the witness, in great anguish, said it would be better that he should read the letters he had then received from Sir Samuel. A letter was then read from Sir Samuel, dated from Cowes, 27th Sept. inviting Mr. Dumont to visit him there; saying, that he could not promise him any pleasure, as he considered Lady Romilly in a very perilous state, as the physicians did not say she was out of danger, and concluded thus:—"She is considered by her medical attendants in some danger. She is for the present a little better, and I take care neither to let her nor the poor children see the anxiety I feel, but it costs me a great deal; with all this, do not suppose I have not resolution to undergo every thing to preserve my health for my children's sake."—] This letter was followed by two others, informing Mr. Dumont of the state of Lady Romilly's health. And he then resumed his evidence as follows:—"I arrived in the Isle of Wight on the 3d of October, and Lady Romilly was well enough to spend a few hours in company; but Sir Samuel seemed to have no confidence, and notwithstanding that recovery he was in the same state of anxiety. Lady Romilly had a relapse, and was for some days in a great state of suffering. During that time nothing could equal the excruciating pains of Sir Samuel, but his fortitude and resignation. He was almost entirely deprived of sleep, and I saw he began to entertain the greatest apprehensions from that circumstance. Twice or three times he has expressed to me his fears of mental derangement. Once he sent for me in the middle of the night, at least at two o'clock in the morning, and spoke to me of a dream he had had full of horrors, and said that an impression had remained upon his mind as if the dream had been a reality. He asked me if I did not consider that as a proof that his mind was broken, and his faculties impaired. Conversations about his children generally restored a certain degree of peace to his mind, and sometimes he proposed plans for their education and future establishment. On Thursday, the 29th of October, about ten o'clock, while at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, he was informed by his nephew, Dr. Roget, for whom he always showed the same attachment as for one of his sons, that his lady was no more. I have omitted to say that the two sisters of Lady Romilly came on the Tuesday previous, and he said he could shed no tears when he saw them. He told me his brains were burning hot. He left Cowes with great reluctance the next day (Friday,) but he declared that he would be governed entirely by Dr. Roget and his friends. I accompanied him, and on Friday we slept at Winchester. He felt extremely exhausted. Dr. Roget slept in the same room, and Sir Samuel's night was extremely restless. The next morning I observed marks of great agitation, which he tried to subdue; he was constantly tearing his gloves, or the palm of his hand, scratching his fingers and his nose, and some blood came from his nose. When we arrived at an inn on the road, he told me that he could proceed no farther. We slept there, and he still slept in the same room with him. I had proposed to come to Russell-square, but to take some time for the present. He answered, that he was likely to be in the country for some time, and he was desirous of getting home and he proceeded; but I observed more violent signs of agitation still, more tearing of his hands and of his nose. In a moment that he was shutting his eyes and wringing his hands, I took the hand of his daughter and placed it in his hand; upon which, opening his eyes, and having perceived what I had done, he cast upon me an unutterable look of gratitude, and embraced his daughter. When we arrived in Russell-square, he made great efforts to compose himself, and went to his library, and threw himself upon a sofa, quite in a manner that was alarming to me; then for some moments he was joining his hands, as in a state of delirium, but he spoke nothing. A moment after he got up, took my arm, went round the two rooms, and appeared to me to be in the state of a man dying of an internal wound. One or two hours after, he desired to see Dr. Marcet, saying his nephew, Dr. Roget, suffered too much, and that he would give him the comfort of some medical friend's assistance. He wanted to consult him, particularly about a shower bath; thinking that would relieve the heat of his head; still he declared he had no head ache. I have nothing more to say upon that subject. After Dr. Marcet (it was Sunday when we arrived in town, about five o'clock) arrived, he would not quit him the whole night, but slept in the room; I slept in a room above him. About seven in the morning (Monday) Dr. Roget came to me in a state of extreme anxiety, telling me that his uncle was much worse, with a violent fever, uttering some expressions in a state of perturbation, and complaining that he was distracted. Dr. Roget immediately called Dr. Marcet, who came instantly, and they sent for Dr. Babington to join in a consultation. I asked Dr. Marcet and Dr. Roget if I could go and see my friend, and they desired me not to do it, saying the greatest quiet was necessary for him, and that he was only to have one person to attend him in the room. I went then to Holland-house, at Kensington, to see his three youngest children, whom Lord Holland had taken from school to his house, and to make some arrangements with respect to them. When I returned to Russell-square about half-past three, I found one of the servants in tears, and Dr. Roget in a state approaching to despair. My first feeling was stupor and astonishment, for I had never, during the whole month that I had passed with Sir Samuel, and dining most constantly with him and his son—and during the time the ladies were employed in business (during which time we had intimate conversations)—I never had any apprehension of the act by which he had lost his life. The intimate knowledge that I had of his high principles of duty—of his moral and religious fortitude—of his love for his country—and of his—(much affected)—of his parental affection, totally excluded from my mind every suspicion, or idea, of the catastrophe that has happened.

CORONER.—I dare say the Gentlemen are fully impressed with the state of Sir Samuel Romilly's mind, from the very clear evidence you have given, Sir. Indeed, it is impossible to conceive that a great mind like his could be directed by any thing but the immense weight of affliction which appears to have oppressed him. The circumstance of a mind like his, resting for so great a length of time upon the same melancholy subject, was sufficient, and likely to occasion mental derangement; and it is likely produced an inflammation on the brain, which led to the deplorable catastrophe: but we shall hear this from the medical gentlemen.

Alexander Marcet, of 23, Russell-square, Doctor of Medicine, said, he was in habits of intimacy with Sir Samuel Romilly, but did not attend him professionally. On Sunday evening, about half-past nine o'clock, he went to his house to see his nephew, Dr. Roget: Sir Samuel was sitting in the parlour with his family, and witness entered into conversation with him about his health. He complained of an extreme degree of lassitude, particularly about the extremities, where he suffered frequent and severe muscular pains. No attitude afforded him any comfort, and he sat in his chair in a state of great agitation. Although he refrained from describing the anguish of his mind, or giving vent to his feelings, it was obvious from his manner, as well as what he uttered, that he despaired of his recovery, in spite of all that was said to inspire him with hope and comfort. Various steps were recommended in order to allay his extreme state of irritation, but he objected to all in succession. He ultimately insisted on being allowed to go to bed, without making an attempt to produce relief, upon the ground that he felt he must have a wretched night, and that if he were to use medicines, it would only have the effect of taking away all confidence from his medical friends. Next morning, witness attended the deceased, with Doctors Roget and Babington; he found him considerably altered—his skin, which the night before was quite dry, was then bedewed with moisture. His mind appeared much better, and he seemed more free from bodily agitation. He was remarkably concise in his answers to all questions, and uttered nothing from whence any thing very unfavourable could be deduced as to the state of his mind. On the contrary, from all that witness and the other medical gentlemen could learn, it was evident that there had been increased and violent agitation of the body in the night. From the tranquillity of mind he appeared to enjoy in the early part of the night, Dr. Roget thought he had had some hours of sleep, but upon inquiry, the deceased himself declared he had none. Witness thought it was impossible to say to what consequences such a state as that in which he had found Sir Samuel might lead a man; but knowing him so well, and relying with such firmness upon his mind, he never could foresee the probability of the deceased being led to the commission of such an act. Such a catastrophe never occurred to his mind, but he nevertheless contemplated the symptom of his disorder with great alarm.

William Robinson, M.D. of Aldermanbury, said he was sent for to attend at the house of Sir Samuel Romilly, in consequence of an urgent note he had received from Dr. Marcet. He arrived between ten and eleven o'clock. Previously to his going up to the room of Sir S. Romilly, he had learned from Drs. Marcet and Roget all that had antecedently occurred; his visit to Sir Samuel was therefore short, and he found him in a situation corresponding exactly with the account he had heard. He had however a few questions to ask Sir Samuel, and those he answered with perfect distinctness, although he appeared thoughtful and reserved. He expressed to him his hopes, that from the change which had taken place in his situation, more especially the apparent quietude he had enjoyed in the night, and the perspiration he was under, that he would recover. He hoped a still further improvement would be manifested in the evening, when they would again visit him. Witness had applied his mind to a consideration, whether the circumstance of Sir Samuel Romilly's health and the state of his family—of his wife's decease, and the anguish this gave him—his broken rest—his own health and feverish state, together with all that had been related to him in the house, by his friends and relations, would lead to derangement; and was of opinion that, under all these sufferings, he must have been in a state of mental distraction.

The CORONER summed up the evidence, and put it to the Jury to say whether the evidence they had heard was not sufficiently strong to convince them that the deceased must have been in a state of mental derangement at the time he committed the fatal act which terminated his valuable life?

The Jury, without hesitation, returned the following verdict:—"We are unanimously of opinion that the deceased cut his throat while in a state of mental temporary derangement."

The body, when viewed by the Jury, lay in the manner described by the servant; it was extended as it fell from Dr. Roget, and nearly covered with blood. A sheet and blanket were over it, and the razor was lying at the feet of the corpse. The face was so much swollen, that his most intimate friends would scarcely have known it to be that of Sir Samuel.

The following further particulars respecting Sir Samuel and Lady Romilly are copied from the daily papers:—

It appears that Lady Romilly had long laboured under a complicated disease, which, by its quick and many changes, kept her anxious husband in continued agitation: flattered at one moment by gleams of convalescence, and shocked the next by symptoms of an ominous relapse. The very day after Sir Samuel had written to his friend Mr. Dumont, the following letter, which was read before the Coroner, he sent him the second note to relieve him from the anxiety which the first would occasion:—

Cowes, Sept. 27, 1818.

DEAR DUMONT,—I did not intend writing to you till to-morrow; but I cannot suffer Mr. Nash's letter to go without inserting a few lines in it. I need not say how happy we shall all be to see you. Your visit, however, will be one purely of charity; for I am afraid you will meet with little pleasure in it. Since I last wrote to you Ann has been worse, and certainly considered by both the medical attendants as being in some danger. She is at present a little better; but for myself I still apprehend the worst. I take care to neither let her nor the poor children see the anxiety I feel, but it costs me a good deal. With all this, do not suppose that I have not quite resolution enough to undergo every thing, and to preserve my health for my children's sake. I would not have you communicate my alarms to any one, but I could not suffer you to set out upon such a journey without ap-prising you of the real truth.—I am, my dear Dumont, with most sincere affection, yours,

SAMUEL ROMILLY.

Cowes, Sept. 28, 1818.

DEAR DUMONT,—I cannot, after my letter of yesterday, suffer this post to go without telling you that my dear Ann is better—not very considerably, but yet she certainly is better. I know your kindness and affection for us must have rendered my last letter alarming to you, and therefore I hasten to give you somewhat better news.—Ever, my dear Dumont, most affectionately yours,
SAMUEL ROMILLY.

It was not, therefore, till the month of October that the symptoms of Lady Romilly's case became so decided as to reduce her husband to unmixed despair of her recovery—and then the effect upon his heart was so poignant, that his frame was agitated to a burning fever, and he got no sleep but from the efficacy of medicine.

The late Lady Romilly was previous to her marriage one of the Society of the people called Quakers. She was sister to Mr. Galton, who is at this time an eminent manufacturer of arms, at Birmingham, and daughter to the once celebrated Miss Wheeler, afterwards Mrs. Galton, the "beautiful Quaker," who was so much admired in the early part of the life of his present Majesty.

The account of Lady Romilly and family (says another daily paper) is erroneous. Her maiden name was Garbett, as will appear from the announcement of her marriage with Sir Samuel Romilly, in the Gentleman's Magazine for Jan. 1798, vol. 68. p. 83:—

"January 3.—Married, at Knill, in the county of Hereford, Samuel Romilly, Esq. of Lincoln's-inn, to Miss Garbett, eldest daughter of Francis Garbett, Esq. of Knill-court."

We understand, that when Mr. Maybrey, the surgeon, entered the room, Sir Samuel was still alive, and looked earnestly at Mr. Maybrey; and after the lapse of a few minutes, his eyes grew dim, he fainted away, and expired. It was after he did the fatal act that he expressed a wish to write a letter; and the sheet of paper and pen and ink were given to him by his attendant.

The following anecdote of this most revered and lamented man has come to us from a very respectable quarter. We give it publicity with the more pleasure, that it not only tends to illustrate the mournful circumstances of his death, but casts an affecting and ennobling light on the moral excellencies of his character. It will, perhaps, be asked, what anecdote of his life would not tend to make his memory more esteemed, and his loss more regretted? He commenced his career at the Bar, a young man, liberally educated, with those high principles of honour, and that susceptibility of amiable and generous sentiment, which distinguished his life, but without paternal fortune, and, still more, with both his parents dependent upon his professional success. In this situation, he became acquainted with a young lady, the charms of whose mind and person won his affections. His conduct was worthy of his head and his heart. He declared his sentiments to the object of his affections; but added, that he must "acquire two fortunes" before they could be married; the first for those to whom he owed his first duty—his parents; the second for her. The lady knew how to appreciate his merit and his motives, and their vows were mutually pledged to each other. He entered upon his career of profit and honour with that assiduous energy which forms a chief feature of genuine talent. In a comparatively short period he realized a considerable sum, and with it purchased an annuity for his parents. Having put them in possession of this provision for their lives, he formally declared to them, that his obligations to them were now fulfilled, and he was about to enter into other relations, which must exclusively govern him in their turn. He began a second time with fresh spirit—acquired "a second fortune"—all within a very few years—settled it upon her on whom he had bestowed his heart, and married her. To lose Lady Romilly after an attachment so formed, and after years flown away in the tranquillity of domestic joy, disturbed only by the splendid pursuits of an ambition synonymous with virtue, was one of those shocks which must be left, undefined, to the imagination of such as know what it is to feel.

The melancholy intelligence of the death of Sir Samuel Romilly drew an immense crowd to the Chancery Court on Tuesday morning, in the expectation, as was evident, of hearing some public allusion to the character of him who was not less admired in his life than regretted in death.—The Lord Chancellor took his seat at a little after ten o'clock, evidently labouring under the effects which the melancholy circumstance had produced on his feelings. His Lordship remained in the Court but for one minute, and then retired. It was impossible to perceive any group of persons in whose faces more real sorrow was manifest than in those of the strangers who attended. There were several Barristers present, but they did not take their seats.—There was no business done in the Vice-Chancellor's Court.

The lamented death of Sir Samuel Romilly will cause a great distribution of business amongst the King's Counsel at the Chancery bar. A junior King's Counsel received on Tuesday 21 general retainers from Solicitors, who were in the habit of giving their briefs to Sir Samuel Romilly.

The death of Lady Romilly will be felt most severely by the unfortunate. Her Ladyship distributed 1,000*l.* per annum privately amongst worthy families who had been reduced by misfortune.

The late Sir Samuel Romilly is supposed to have annually netted from 16,000*l.* to 17,000*l.* by his professional exertions. Sir Samuel Romilly's law library is said to have been the most valuable of any possessed by the profession.

The remains of Sir Samuel were removed on Friday morning, at six o'clock, from his late residence, Russell-square, for interment in the family vault of Lady Romilly's father, at Knill, near Presteign, Radnorshire. The cavalcade consisted of six out-riders, a hearse and six, followed by a coach and six, with the butler only. An express was sent off on the death of Sir Samuel, to stop her Ladyship's funeral, till the arrival of his corpse; and it is expected the mournful ceremony will take place about Wednesday next. The interment of the remains of Sir S. Romilly is to take place at Knill, in pursuance of the directions contained in his will.

It is a singular circumstance, that in the parish church of St. Bride, Fleet-street, there is a simple undecorated tablet placed against the wall, on which there is an inscription to the memory of the great uncle of Sir Samuel Romilly, who died of a broken heart, seven days after the decease of a beloved wife.—The inscription is as follows:

"Near this place are deposited the remains of Mr. Isaac Romilly, F.R.S. Obiit 18th Dec. 1759, Ætat. 49; whose affable and humane temper of mind, joined to his goodness of heart, justly endeared him to all his friends; as did his great ingenuity and labour in forming his extensive and valuable collection of natural curiosities to the esteem of the learned; in the same grave with the remains of Mary, his beloved wife, whose sudden and unexpected death, on the 11th of Dec. 1759, in the 48th year of her age, greatly contributed to shorten the thread of his life; for they were an example of conjugal affection."

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 20.—Lieutenants-General the Marquises Dessolles and d'Autichamp, sent by the King to receive the Allied Sovereigns on the frontiers of France, arrived yesterday morning, and repaired to the Tuileries, to give an account of their honourable mission, and to announce the arrival of the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia. At half-past 12, the King of Prussia, accompanied by the Prince Royal of Prussia, and the Prince of Mecklenburgh, alighted at the Hotel Villeroy. The Emperor Alexander, accompanied by Prince Constantine, arrived at a quarter past two at Thelisson's hotel. The Duke of Angoulême, the Duke of Berry, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Bourbon, went successively to present their homage to the Sovereigns.—At five o'clock the two Monarchs repaired to the Tuileries. The Duke of Duras having announced the arrival of the Sovereigns, his Majesty rose, went to meet them, and embraced them with a lively affection. He then invited them to pass into his closet, where he conversed with them for a quarter of an hour. The Prince Royal, the son of the King of Prussia, and the Duke of Mecklenburgh, his brother-in-law, were afterwards introduced, and most graciously received. The Sovereigns then proceeded to the banquet saloon; the Emperor of Russia being on the right of the King, and the King of Prussia on his left. The Duchess of Angoulême was by the side of the Emperor of Russia, and the Duchess of Berry by the side of the King of Prussia. The other guests were the Grand Duke Constantine, the Prince Royal of Prussia, the Duke of Mecklenburgh, Monsieur, the Duke of Berry, and the Duke of Angoulême. After dinner the Emperor Alexander, taking by the hand the Duchess of Angoulême, and the King of Prussia conducting in the same manner the Duchess of Berry, returned to the state apartments. The King remained three quarters of an hour alone with the Emperor Alexander in his cabinet. His Majesty afterwards took farewell of the Emperor of Russia in the most affecting manner, regretting his precipitate departure.—The King of Prussia will pass some days at Paris. The Grand Duke Constantine will remain eight days. The Emperor of Russia left Paris at eight o'clock yesterday evening for Senlis, where his Majesty will stop during the night.—Moniteur.

Nov. 1.—We are this moment informed of the death of the Duke of Feltre, at his seat at Neuville, near Saverne, in Alsace. Marshal Clarke, the Duke of Feltre, descended of an ancient Irish family, was born at Landrecy on the 17th of Oct. 1765.

A Sieur C—— committed suicide last month at St. Brieux, Department of the Cotes-du-Nord. The superior ecclesiastics having, in the absence of the Curé, refused to give the necessary orders for the celebration of the religious rites on the interment of the body, the family applied to the Mayor of St. Brieux, and requested him, in virtue of the decree of June 12, 1804, to appoint another clergyman. The Mayor also refused to comply. An arrêté of the Prefect, dated the 3d October, has suspended him from his office for this neglect of his duty.

BRITISH AMERICA.

BUFFALO, SEPT. 29.—The assizes for Upper Canada were held on the 7th inst., at Sandwick, before the Chief Justice, and were adjourned on the Monday following, without making any disposition whatever of the important controversies between Lord Selkirk and the British North-West Company. The expected trial of his Lordship and the principal actors in that quarrel, or rather civil war, some of whom had been charged with murder, had excited a lively interest, which called to the Court a very large assemblage. On Monday a bill of indictment against Lord Selkirk and others, for resistance to legal process at Fort William, was laid before the Grand Jury, but rejected. Another bill for a conspiracy to injure or destroy the trade of the North West Company was afterwards presented, on which they were occupied three days in hearing evidence. On this bill, the Grand Jury would not, or at least did not, come to any determination. The Judge waited two or three days (all the other business of the Court having been finished) after the testimony before the Grand Jury had closed, for them to come to a decision, and then, after consulting the Attorney-General, adjourned the Court. Both parties (for it appears to have become wholly a party question) are much dissatisfied with the result, and both complain of partiality and corruption. Lord Selkirk, we learn, accused the Attorney-General and the prosecutor and witnesses, in open Court, of corrupt and oppressive designs; to which the Attorney-General recriminated by charging the Grand Jury with partiality, and other misconduct. The controversy was so warm that the Court with difficulty preserved order by silencing them both. The friends of his Lordship are disposed to charge the Chief Justice with furthering the designs of the North West Company, and intimate that the Court was suddenly adjourned to prevent a formal rejection of the bill of indictment by the Grand Jury, and to preclude the opportunity of presenting bills against Mr. McGillivray and other servants of the Company. The other side, on the contrary, charge his Lordship with practising improperly with the Grand Jury during their sitting, and intimate that something little different from direct bribery was used to prevent a fair investigation of the charges.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 8

THERE is little news this week from the Continent. The RUSSIAN EMPEROR and the KING of PRUSSIA have arrived at Paris, and the former gone again almost as instantly. The KING of PRUSSIA, it is said, intended to go also, but has been delayed by sudden indisposition. We believe they joke at his MAJESTY in the circles, for his coquettish feelings towards the lively Frenchwomen. He is understood to admire them much; and on a former occasion divested himself so far of his old school formality, as to venture upon the Montagnes, as they are called,—which are enormous wooden hills,—a sort of precipitous roundabout,—down which the gallants come sweeping with a smiling and conscious bravery.—His MAJESTY need not be ashamed of his flame, if he has any. It is a much better thing than his breaking his promises about the Constitution, and plundering his neighbour the KING of SAXONY; and we do not hear that he is yet ashamed of these things. A little love, out of the pale of royalty, might do him good, and help him to discover that there are feeling; and enjoyments which kingship cannot help him to. But then Princes have a strange way of making love; and think it a part of their legitimate privileges to be as illegitimate as they please in this matter. We hope the lady would vindicate the natural dignity of the passion, and make him understand that even Queens are inferior things to women; and then he will find out perhaps, that even Kings in the abstract are but secondary things to men.

There has been a rapid decline in the French Funds, which, as usual, is attributed to very different causes,—some entirely mercantile, and others political. It seems obvious, that at a moment like the present, when the troops are going away, such fluctuations must take place. I will depend upon the greater or less influence of the BOURBONS upon their own Government, whether such things are pernicious or not. If they were suffered to reign as they wish to reign, they would sink more rapidly than the Funds.

A Supplement to Tuesday's Gazette was published in the course of Friday, containing despatches from the Governor in Council at Bombay, as likewise from a number of Officers intrusted with minor commands throughout India, who, according to these documents, have captured several of the Mahratta forts, and achieved a number of small successes. Under this description of service, however, can hardly be called the storming of the fortified city of Chanda, in the Nagpore territory, by Lieutenant-Colonel J. W. ADAMS; an exploit which that Officer represents to have exhibited, in the highest lustre, the spirit and energy of the British troops. We had on this occasion Captain CHARLESWORTH and three other officers wounded. We cannot find in the Supplement to the Gazette any allusion to the reported surrender of the Peishwa.

Private accounts from Paris assert, that of 25 of the ultra-Royalist party who have now gone out of the Chamber by rotation, not one has been re-elected; that of the whole 55 vacancies produced on this occasion, 40 have been filled up by the supporters of the Ministry; and that of course 15 only remain to strengthen the ranks of the opposition of the party called Liberals.

The Rhenish Mercury contains an extremely severe decree, issued by the King of Portugal against the Freemasons, dated from Santa-Cruz. It declares, that every Freemason who shall be arrested shall suffer death, and all his property be confiscated to the State. This law extends to foreigners within the dominions of Portugal, as well as to native subjects. Not a word is said of trial or conviction, or how the "offence" may be defined; but if arrested, the unfortunate individual must "suffer a cruel death!"

CEYLON.—Such is the known poverty of Ceylon, that not a free trader has visited it since the enlargement of the Indian trade. The only merchant who can afford to trade thither is Mr. HUSKISSON of the Treasury, agent for the island, who duly transmits investments of hams, cheeses, and groceries, which are retailed for the good of the nation under the auspices of the gallant Sir ROBERT BROWN-RIGG, K. C. B. Sir ROBERT, in the midst of such occupations, has found time to meditate the dethronement of a King; and the King of CANDY, happening to reign not in the western, but in the eastern hemisphere, has been dethroned without scruple; the geographical situation of his country, and his wanting the eloquence of the Courier and Quarterly Review in his support, appearing to all unprejudiced men to be the only difference between his case and that of many other legitimate sovereigns.—To what particular cause the present almost universal insurrection of the Candians is to be ascribed, it is not possible for us to say. There is nobody to tell the story of the poor Candians, and no one to contradict an arbitrary Governor, who holds the only Newspaper in the settlement under a rigorous censorship. The Candians, oppressed by an abominable Government, placed themselves under our protection; and having given us a fair trial, find their old tyranny more tolerable than ours.—The Scotsman.

Wednesday morning Sir CHARLES ABBOTT took the usual oaths before the LORD CHANCELLOR, preparatory to his taking his seat as Chief Justice in the room of Lord ELLENBOROUGH. The same ceremony took place on Thursday relative to Justice DALLAS, who succeeds Sir VICARY GIBBS as Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

BANK NOTES.—We hear nothing of the labours of the Commission appointed by Ministers to ascertain the best means of preventing forgery; but if they find as many difficulties in their way as the Bank Directors said they found (they were 15 years unsuccessfully engaged night and day), we must wait with becoming patience. In the mean while, however, much unofficial discussion is going on, and a pamphlet has just appeared, which, though under the following rather odd title, contains much interesting matter on this important subject:—"Considerations on the alarming Increase of Forgery on the Bank of England, and the Neglect of remedial Measures; with an Essay on the Remedy for the Detection of Forgeries, and an Account of the Measures adopted by the Bank of Ireland. Addressed to the Commissioners by C. W. WILLIAMS, Esq."

On Monday, in Dublin, Dennis Madden, an engraver and printer, was found guilty of forging Notes of the Irish Bank. The Jury, however, recommended him to mercy, conceiving, doubtless, that loss of life is by far too severe a punishment for the crime.—We notice the case chiefly to show the different course pursued by the Banks of England and Ireland. When Mr. OLDFHAM, an Agent of the Irish Bank, was asked what was the particular distinguishing marks by which a genuine Bank Note might be known? he stated, that the Bank had no wish to keep it a secret; it arose from the general execution of the engraving, but particularly from the uniformity of the scroll border, and the still more difficult task of engraving a treble scroll on a black ground, and also for the exact uniformity of the edge of the insertion of the sum in white letters on the black ground.

NEW CROWNS.—We are authorized to contradict the statement that has been made in several of the papers, that by order of Government the further issue of the new crown-pieces to the public has been restrained, on account of the introduction into the die of the name of the Italian artist who executed it. There is no intention to restrain the issue, nor to make the slightest alteration in the die; which has received the sanction of the PRINCE REGENT's order in Council to be used at the Mint for striking the crown-pieces. A coinage of half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences is now carrying on, together with the crowns, at the Mint; and the issues will be made to the Bank for the use of the public.—Daily paper.

It is reported that great alterations are about to take place in the operative departments of the Court of King's Bench. The Hon. Mr. LAW, son of Lord ELLENBOROUGH, is to be removed from his situation of Clerk at Nisi Prius, to make way for a son of the new Chief Justice; and the Secretary, whose situation has not hitherto been considered as contingent upon the person of the first Judge of the Court, is also to be displaced, to make way for a dependent of the new Chief Justice.—Times.

In the Court of King's Bench, on Friday, Mr. SCARLETT obtained leave to file a criminal information against Richard Stokes, a Magistrate in Yorkshire, on the ground that he had employed his authority in compounding a felony (as we understood) for his own profit.

Parliament is further prorogued from the 12th of November to the 29th of December, by an order in Council, dated October 31, and inserted in Tuesday's Gazette.

MARY ASHFORD.—On Monday next, the 9th instant, a stone will be placed in the church-yard of Sutton Coldfield, over the remains of the unfortunate MARY ASHFORD, by the Rev. LUKE BOOKER, D.D. The following is the Inscription:—

"As a Warning to Female Virtue, and a humble Monument to Female Chastity. This Stone marks the Grave of MARY ASHFORD, who, in the 20th year of her age, having incautiously repaired to a Scene of Amusement without proper protection, was brutally violated and murdered on the 27th May, 1817."

Those who have seen the NAPOLEON Medals, or have merely read Captain LASKEY's "Description of the Series of Medals struck at the National Medal Mint by order of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, commemorating the most remarkable Battles and Events during his Dynasty," must have been much diverted with the late Puff Circular of Mr. WELLESLEY POLE, on the issue of a solitary Crown Piece. Captain LASKEY gives an account of more than one hundred and forty medals, many of them exquisite works of Art. It is remarkable, and is perhaps the only instance on record, that one of these Imperial Medals commemorates the disastrous retreat of the French army from Moscow. Would any of the Holy Allies have ventured thus to transmit to posterity one of their numerous failures?—Captain LASKEY, in his notice of the Medal struck on the marriage of NAPOLEON with MARIA LOUISA, gives an anecdote similar to that mentioned in the last Edinburgh Review, that the union with the Austrian Princess was occasioned by a direct application from the Emperor of AUSTRIA, who was fearful that NAPOLEON would marry either a sister of ALEXANDER (who was quite willing to form such an alliance) or a Princess of SAXONY. Yet these are the persons who, in the intoxication of unlooked-for success, now suffer the man whom they so much feared, courted, and envied, to be harassed and insulted by such a being as Sir HUDSON LOWE!

Mr. HAZLITT has recommenced his critical labours at the Surrey Institution. He delivered on Tuesday his Introductory Lecture "on the Comic Writers, &c. of Great Britain." It was "on Wit and Humour;" and he handled his subject with equal solidity and sprightliness. It is known in the literary world, that attempts have recently been made, by certain anonymous slanderers, to depreciate the talents of this Gentleman. To those who may have been impressed by such attempts (if any such there be) we say, "Go and hear him."—As for the low revilers themselves, they had better stay away, for they would find in the satisfaction and approbation of Mr. HAZLITT's numerous auditors only so many additional reasons for the exercise of their depraved propensities.—"We have often observed (says a writer in the last Edinburgh Review) that there is no species of hatred greater than that which a man of mediocrity bears to a man of genius. His reach of thought, his successful combinations, and his sudden felicities, are never forgiven by those whom nature has fashioned in a less perfect mould. The eagle cannot soar, but the crows are chattering against him."

We understand that when Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY was on the road to town, he sat with his hands clenched so tightly and for such a long time together, that the wrist of one of them was swollen so as almost to fill the cuff of his coat.

LITERARY.—Among the forthcoming novelties of the press, there is one announced, which seems to have been long wanted,—a Literary Pocket-Book.—The object of this publication (says the notice) is to furnish a Pocket and Memorandum Book, for those who would have the commonest matters united with something intellectual and tasteful. The intellectual power of society indeed has so much increased of late years, and has become so prominent, as one of the ruling or controuling authorities, that it seems proper and necessary it should have a sort of Court Calendar of its own; and the Literary Pocket Book is an attempt to supply one.—It is to contain, it appears, among many other things, a diary, including the Birth-days and Birth-places of persons of original genius; a newly-written Calendar of Nature, pointing out the Beauties and Productions of the different Months; a List of Living Writers, Artists, and Musicians; of Institutions and Exhibitions connected with Literature and the Arts; of the Schools of Medicine and the Medical Lecturers; new Publications that have attracted notice, and select Passages or Anecdotes from eminent Authors, with original Pieces of Poetry, &c.

NORTH AMERICA.—Permit me to offer (says a Correspondent) to the consideration of your readers, the following prophetic observations of Dr. SMOLLET: it appears to me that they are already verified in part:—"The Continent of North America, if properly cultivated, will prove an inexhaustible fund of wealth and strength to Great Britain, and perhaps it may become the last asylum of British liberty. When the Nation is enslaved by domestic despotism or foreign dominion, when her substance is wasted, her spirit broke, and the laws and constitution of England are no more, then those Colonies, sent off by our fathers, may receive and entertain their sons as hopeless exiles and ruined refugees."—Smollet His.

"The punishment of death has been abolished in Pennsylvania, for all crimes except murder of the first degree." "Objections have been made to the system; its mildness has been represented as a temptation to crime; yet crimes have diminished since its adoption."—Hall's Travels.—Speaking of the laws of New York, Mr. HALL says, "The punishment of death is abolished in this State, in all cases, except for murder and arson; other crimes are punished by confinement and labour. To America belongs the glory of having first made the experiment of the least waste of life with which society can be preserved."

Mr. BUTT's action against Sir NATHANIEL CONANT, for false imprisonment, will, we are informed, be tried in the Court of Common Pleas, during the sittings in or after the present term.—Besides the action against Sir N. CONANT, Mr. BUTT has served notices of trial, for next term, upon Mr. NEWMAN, the keeper of Newgate, for detaining him 48 days illegally; and also upon Mr. JONES, the Marshal of the King's Bench, for nine days' illegal detention, and breaking open his doors to recover the fine of 1,000*l.*: he has also served notice of trial upon the Stock Exchange, for the money stopped upon the disgraceful hoax-day.

A Paris paper notices the arrival at Amiens of M. COMTE, who is honoured with the title of a Natural Philosopher. This man is a juggler, or professor of the magic art of legerdemain. He has been lately in London, where he is said to have amused the PRINCE REGENT exceedingly. "One of his magic tricks," says the Paris paper, "and which particularly interested his Royal Highness, was to cause the trinkets, &c. of Lord CASTLEREAGH and the Ambassadors to disappear, and to have them found in the pocket of the Prince."

The Reverend GILES POWELL, of Acrice, was lately convicted before WILLIAM DEEDS, Esq. in the penalty of 20*l.* for snaring a hare on a Sunday.—Country paper.

At the Quarter Sessions now holding at Exeter, for the county of Devon, a true bill of indictment has been found by the Grand Jury against Sir MASSEY LOPEZ, Mr. HUNT, his solicitor, and Mr. SYMONS, one of the electors of Grampound, for bribery, during the late election at that borough.

The account of a duel between Lord BELGRAVE and Sir J. GREY EGERTON, which we copied from a daily paper, has been officially contradicted.

The consumption of sheep and lambs in London, during the last twelve months, amounted in number to 1,620,700; horned cattle, slaughtered, 164,000.

Dr. BATEMAN, in his Account of the Contagious Fever of this Country, says, that apprehensions of danger, from passing through the streets of an infected district, or near hospitals, are altogether unfounded; that even in an apartment, contagion may be entirely prevented from spreading by perfect ventilation and cleanliness; which should therefore be exclusively relied upon; carefully avoiding the use of camphor, tobacco, vinegar, and all strong smelling substances, which have no influence in destroying contagion, and which lead to a dangerous supposition of security, by concealing the taint which ought to be removed by ventilation.

PARLIAMENTARY ANECDOTE.—DAVID HARTLEY, Member for Hull during the Coalition Administration, was remarkable for the length and dullness of his speeches. On one occasion, having reduced the House from 300 to about 80 sleepy hearers by one of his harangues, just at the time it was supposed he would conclude, he moved that the Riot Act should be read, in order to prove one of his previous assertions. BURKE, who had been bursting with impatience for full an hour and a half, and who was anxious to speak to the question, finding himself about to be so cruelly disappointed, rose up exclaiming, "The Riot Act, my dear friend! the Riot Act! to what purpose. Don't you see that the mob is already completely dispersed?"—Every person present was convulsed with laughter, except HARTLEY, who never changed countenance, and who still insisted that the Riot Act should be read by the Clerk.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

STATE OF THE QUEEN.

The QUEEN experienced another alarming attack on Thursday night.—The PRINCE REGENT was about to return to town soon after ten o'clock, but her MAJESTY grew so materially worse, that his Royal Highness lengthened his stay. Both the Physicians were in attendance, and also Mr. BRANDE. Her MAJESTY suffered dreadfully from the violence of her cough, and great apprehensions were entertained lest the agitation it occasioned should induce those alarming spasms to which her MAJESTY has, of late, been so subject. Her MAJESTY was also greatly distressed by painful tension on the side, a symptom that is invariably brought on by paroxysms of coughing, and is often so intense as to cause extreme difficulty of respiration. For an hour or two, she laboured under these symptoms, in great pain; but at length, by the free use of the warm bath for the extremities, and topical fomentations, the irritation subsided, and the Royal Sufferer, alarmingly exhausted, gradually sunk into that almost unconscious state, which has uniformly succeeded these attacks. During the paroxysm, a report was made to the PRINCE REGENT every half hour; and about midnight, his Royal Highness, after conferring with the Physicians, took leave of the Princesses, and set out on his return to Carlton House. Throughout the remainder of the night her MAJESTY had frequent but less violent attacks. During the day, hourly dispatches were sent to the PRINCE, by grooms of the Royal establishment, relieved occasionally by orderly men of the 19th Lancers.—Up to a late hour last night, her Majesty remained dreadfully exhausted, and in great pain.—The PRINCE REGENT did not visit her MAJESTY last night; but his Royal Highness sent an express to receive the last Report for the evening from the Physicians.—Herald—Saturday.

The following Bulletin was issued yesterday morning:—

"The QUEEN has had another very indifferent night, and her MAJESTY suffers this morning from the want of refreshing sleep."
—Kew Palace, Nov. 7.

Previous to her Royal Highness the Princess of WALES leaving England, she gave orders for all the domestics in her service at Kensington to be retained till notice to the contrary: last week advices were received for their dismissal; and on Friday, after the inspection of the Palace by his Royal Highness the PRINCE REGENT, they all received notice to quit, nine in number. Her Royal Highness, it is said, has given up her apartments in the Palace.—Evening paper.

It is said that the Duchess of KENT is pronounced to be in a favourable way to give her Royal Consort an heir.

The apartments in Kensington Palace, formerly inhabited by the Princess of WALES, are said to be fitting up for the reception of the Duchess of KENT, who returns to England previous to her expected accouchement.

REPRESENTATION OF WESTMINSTER.

It has been proposed by several respectable Electors of this City to convene a General Meeting, for the purpose of considering a fit person to succeed Sir Samuel Romilly, with which view they have transmitted the following Address to Sir Francis Burdett:—

"Westminster, Nov. 5, 1818.

"SIR,—A great public duty has again devolved upon the Electors of Westminster.

"The death of your lamented Colleague, which the national grief proclaimed to be a national calamity, is, in no point of view, more to be deplored, than as it will expose the Electors of Westminster to the menaces of power and the arts of corruption. The patrons and propagators of slavery will unite, and their first efforts will be directed to divide the friends of freedom. To provide against so insidious an endeavour, it seems that a simple remedy may at once be applied.

"We are agreed on our principles; it remains only to agree upon the person whom it may be expedient to choose as an honourable and efficient advocate of those principles. For this purpose, it has appeared to the undersigned indispensable to consult the opinions of a General Meeting of their Brother Electors, as early as may be consistent with their feelings of regret for the loss of their late illustrious Representative.

"With the same object, we beg leave respectfully to request that you, Sir, in your capacity of an Elector of Westminster, will attend, and take the Chair at the proposed Meeting of your Fellow-Citizens, who, by the experience of many years, are fully able to appreciate the firm impartiality with which you have presided over their most important deliberations. Difficult, indeed, will it be to select an individual qualified to become the coadjutor of Sir Francis Burdett, but the more arduous the task, the more need have we of your assistance, and the more earnestly do we hope that you will comply with a Requisition, which we know to accord with the wishes of a great majority of your Constituents and Fellow-Electors.

"We beg leave to subscribe ourselves, with the utmost respect, &c."

DREARY-LANE.

AFTER the performance of the Country Girl on Tuesday night, in which Mrs. MARDYN performed the character of Peggy in a pleasant but over-conscious manner, a new melodrama was brought out, called the Barmecide, or the Fatal Offspring. It is founded on the story of the marriage which the celebrated Haroun Al Raschid suffered between his sister and our old friend the generous Giagar, his vizier, upon the tyrannical condition that no more intercourse should take place between the two lovers than if they were none. There is nothing observable in the writing of this piece or the music; but the dresses and scenery are extremely rich, abundant, and handsome; and the story is managed in a very adroit and interesting manner, and with considerable stage effect.

The Vizier (Mr. H. KEMBLE) has just returned from a war which he has gained for his haughty friend and master, and with the assistance of a former servant (Mr. HARLEY) continues to have a short interview with his wife the Princess (Mrs. ORGER). He gives her a nose-gay, which, after the fashion of the East, informs her by the arrangement of the flowers, that a little son which he has secretly had by her is well. A second interview is also agreed on, in a pavilion where the boy is concealed, and the fond and anxious couple accordingly meet there, when on her singing and playing the guitar, which is their signal for opening a trap door, the little fellow is lifted out by his father, and clasped to his mother's heart. Meanwhile, however, an envious and mercenary old scoundrel (Mr. WILKINSON) gets a scent of this secret, and informing the enraged Caliph (Mr. H. JONVSTON), they visit the pavilion before the lovers arrive, observe the trap-door, then retire to lurk in the neighbourhood, and at last during the interview are heard approaching. The boy is hastily secreted in a cabinet, Giufar goes out to mingle in his disguise with the slaves, and the mother almost fainting sits down on a sofa pretending to read. We forget whether it is before or after this scene, that another very interesting one takes place with the servant (HARLEY), whom the Caliph aware of the signal orders to sing and play on his guitar, which after many vain excuses he does in a faltering manner, keeping the trap-door down in the mean time with his foot, though somebody is evidently pushing from below. In the scene with the mother, the little boy alarmed at the Caliph's threats springs forth from the cabinet, and so discovers the whole matter. The father, upon another threat, rushing involuntarily forward, is discovered by the cry of the child, but the Caliph pretending not to know him, orders him to kill the boy; and when the mother rushes forward upon a new danger threatened her husband, discovers him openly. The second act closes with an order from the Caliph to kill not only the Vizier himself, but the whole race of his family the Barmecides. In the third act, it is discovered that the people, passionately attached to the Vizier, refuse to perform the bloody work; and he is therefore consigned with his wife and son to the caiff before mentioned in order to be dispatched in secret. In seeking fit men for his purpose, this fellow gets among the wild Arabs, where the servant discovers him, and delivers him over to be a camel-driver; and a series of adventures taking place, which ultimately bring the Caliph to the neighbourhood, where he comes to see a son who has happened to fall in with his aunt and her child, the tyrant suddenly finds himself surrounded with enemies; some of his troops appear at his call, but not to his assistance; and the arrival of Giufar turns their hearts against his persecutor; and the Vizier, after making them all advance and stand ready to cut their Prince to pieces at the first word of command, has the happiness of reading him a generous and converting lesson, by ordering them to prostrate themselves at his feet. It is really a very interesting as well as splendid little piece, and will no doubt have a run.

But alas! what a pity that the historical fact does not accord with the termination here given. It may seem monstrous and almost impossible; but it is nevertheless very true, and for a tyrant very possible, that Haroun, though not incapable of good actions, was base and impotent enough to revenge the infringement of an order already sufficiently villainous, by having the unhappy Barmecide and his whole family slain. Such is the madness which unlimited self-will produces in those hateful persons called tyrants, who, after all, are among the wretchedest and most unhappy of their own victims.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 14.—SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY.

"A piercing wit quite void of ostentation; high-erected thoughts seated in a heart of courtesy; an eloquence as sweet in the uttering, as slow to come to the uttering."

Sir P. Sidney's Arcadia.

FROM week to week I have hitherto postponed all mention of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, from an unfeigned diffidence in my own power to do his talents justice: at length the time has arrived, when such a task is unhappily a tribute to the dead, not a criticism upon the living: if before I felt my own incompetence and shrunk from the undertaking, how doubly difficult must I feel it now, and how reluctant must I be to avail myself of this last opportunity of speaking of an individual, regarding whom every sentence I utter must be accompanied by the reflection, that his eloquence, his learning, and his zeal in the cause of humanity, are lost to the world for ever!

Yet even here we have our consolation; however deeply we may regret that his benevolent and beneficent existence is terminated, we can say, that had it been more protracted, he could probably have effected no more than he lived to accomplish. One great object of his political exertions was a wise and temperate reform; but he well knew that upon such a subject in the House of Commons he talked to those who would not hear or could not understand—who trembled at every little inroad of knowledge, and whose security and stability depended upon keeping in ignorance the great mass of the people. But Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY survived to see a free spirit of enquiry active among all classes, and by him that free spirit was at least animated and encouraged, if not raised and created: its progress may be slow, but it must be certain; and though this generation may not witness its final triumph, yet the purpose may be said to have been attained in the present age for the benefit of posterity. In the abolition of that horrid traffic, which made a profit, not merely of the lives, but of the groans and agonies of our fellow-creatures, he mainly assisted. His attempts to purge our penal code of some of its barbarous and useless absurdities will never be forgotten, and his ill success will serve to perpetuate the disgrace of those who resisted his efforts with a pertinacious and uninformed senselessness, almost equal to that with which some of the measures originated: ignorance and prejudice are antagonists that time alone can overcome.

With regard to personal aggrandisement, he had nothing left to wish: title and office would have diminished instead of adding to his reputation: to be CHANCELLOR would have been less than to be ROMILLY.

It is said by one of our eloquent early writers, in his sententious way, that "as a great body is not without a like shadow, so eminent virtue is not without eminent detraction—calumny should die with the carcase of her subject;"* but in reference to ROMILLY, she never lived: her putrid breath never stained his fame; and though he might be envied by a few low-minded wretches, they were too dastardly to avow themselves his enemies, and too mean to be numbered among his friends: he was revered at the Bar, admired in the Senate, and beloved by the People; he was of no party in heart, and only of a party in act, because he knew that single and unsupported endeavours could accomplish nothing: he never spoke without exciting dumb attention in his hearers, and enthusiastic admiration in his country: no man ever dared to doubt the purity of his motives, and he often compelled reluctant conviction by the force and soundness of his reasoning. "I have conversed with some men (observes JEREMY TAYLOR) who rejoiced in the death or calamity of others, and accounted it as a judgment upon them for being on the other side and against them in the contention;" but to no one, however heartless from party feelings, and however uncharitable from political animosities, can such a remark in the present instance be applied. It was delightful to see how all persons of all opinions, united in one feeling of admiration, and it is still delightful to observe how they all unite in one feeling of regret.

Although the common-places of condolence are in the mouths of every one, and although upon an occasion like this little can be said but common-places, yet in sitting down to form as nearly as I can a fair estimate of the merits and defects of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, uninfluenced by any thing but a recollection of what they were, I could not avoid a few words to lament that I must now say of them that they were.

He had been long at the head of the Chancery Bar; for though he was not the senior King's Counsel, Sir A. Piggot taking precedence, yet in point of talent and extent of business he was far above competition: he was facile princeps in that Court, and was concerned in almost every important question that came before it. The presiding Judge, remarkable for his timorous and mistaken diffidence, always listened to him with the utmost attention, and if he saw that Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, independent of his capacity as an Advocate, was of a different opinion to that which he had formed upon any question, he scarcely dared to decide against him, nor would he at last venture to do so, until the force of the argument had by time been worn away. Though in one point of view this might be of advantage to his clients, it was very detrimental to his own interests, for the eternal postponement of decisions prevented the rapid progress of business: on the other hand, Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY was harassed by Attornies and parties, who hour by hour besieged him to read their briefs, to answer their cases, or to bring forward matters, which if mentioned could not have been heard, and if heard would not have been determined. Notwithstanding, he was probably in the receipt of a larger income than was ever before acquired by any member of the profession; and it is known that at some periods of the year his table was so heaped with cases on which his opinion was desired, that he was obliged at last to close his doors, and to clear away the accumulated mass before he allowed any more to collect. The load of business he had to dismiss must on such occasions have been extremely oppressive; and it would not be surprising if the vast arrears that must have been occasioned by his close attendance on his wife, and the knowledge that if he recovered his strength he should have to wade through it with a mind worn down and distracted by an overbearing calamity, had partially contributed to the temporary derangement which had so fatal a consequence. Yet his industry, when in health and spirits, was astonishing: it appeared before the Coroner that he usually rose at six, and though by nature fitted for the delights and comforts of a domestic circle, and for the intercourse of social life, he saw but little of his family or his friends. But these privations, at first no doubt reluctantly endured, at length became habitual. There is sufficient evidence to shew that though he might originally embrace the profession of the law with some degree of love for the pursuit, yet of late years, had it been possible for him to have limited more the amount of his business, he would have relieved himself from a considerable part of the burden he was under the painful necessity of continuing to sustain. His perseverance was accompanied by a quickness of apprehension equalled by very few, because perhaps very few have an opportunity of bringing it to such a degree of perfection: his memory too was proportionably retentive, and it was really sometimes wonderful to see him open brief after brief, and, almost without references, or even marks to guide his eye and direct his attention, detail to the CHANCELLOR with the utmost precision the complicated facts they contained.—In another respect, also, it was extremely obvious; for where he was called upon to reply, whether in Court or in Parliament, he made few or no notes of the speeches of his antagonists. In one respect however this was attended with disadvantages, as I shall presently explain.

These are however to be considered not as peculiar gifts, but in some degree as acquirements which others might attain with the same means; but who by any practice, by any industry however laborious, shall attain that elegant, that refined, that persuasive, yet at times that nervous and forcible eloquence, in which he has never been exceeded, I doubt if ever equalled, by any Lawyer in any age?

I remarked in a previous paper, that in Chancery of all our Courts there is least room for a display of the powers of language: independent of impediments I then referred to, the Advocates there have generally too much to do to attempt any thing of the kind, and this was especially the case with Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY; yet in transacting the most ordinary business there was a peculiar grace about his manner—a gentlemanly ease, an unpresuming suavity, that won the hearts of all his hearers. There are some men who sit in that Court and enjoy a certain share of business, whose excellence is quite of a negative kind—who are content with never doing anything positively well, provided they never do any thing absolutely ill: to this class of course Sir S. ROMILLY did not belong, and on important occasions, when more exertion and study was required, there was nothing like effort in what fell from him: his most graceful sentences flowed from his lips without pomp or ostentation, as if the words he used, however apt and forcible, dropped naturally and inartificially into their places, without the application either of will or memory. How often have we been disgusted with speakers for their obtrusive attempts to employ round and sonorous phraseology; but with him it seemed as if the last thing he cared about was the precise mode in which he expressed his thoughts; so much so, that the chief fault of his addresses, both in and out of Parliament, was sometimes a want of force and selectness in the terms he employed: he carried his love of simplicity and his hatred of affectation to an injudicious extreme. For the same reason, he took very little pains about the frame and construction of his sentences: they were never formed upon any rule or system, but their force and beauty were derived, either from the inspiration of the subject, or from the natural grace that always accompanied their delivery. One faculty was possessed by Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY above all competition—that of never deviating from the point in question; and this is the more remarkable, because in the multifariousness of his avocations he must have been frequently called upon to speak on the spur of the moment, when comparatively unprepared: it never could be said of him, that he wasted time by unnecessary or frivolous remarks, or dwelt upon matters of little importance to the issue: he always kept the great question in view as a land-mark, and arrived at it by the nearest possible road.

But if he were admirable as a juridical, he was more so as a parliamentary orator, and in this respect, accomplished much more than any professed practical lawyer I ever heard or read of. A few weeks ago I took occasion to complain of the stile of speaking almost invariably adopted by Barristers who obtained seats in the House of Commons—a petty, baggling, quibbling, punctilious stile, if I may so say, which dwells only upon uninfluencing details, and oppositions of paltry discrepancies. Sir S. ROMILLY, on the contrary, always took up a subject upon the broadest grounds of public policy, and embraced the most extended views of its causes, consequences, and bearings: his mind could never descend to littlenesses, and in his practice at the Bar, he much oftener took his stand upon principles than upon precedents; or in referring to the latter, he seldom failed to shew how far they were established upon the former. But this general mode of discussing a question in Parliament was the effect of necessity, as well as of natural inclination: could he, who from six in the morning until the hour when he entered the House had been unceasingly employed in his professional occupations, have time to study the minutiae and inferior details of a subject—to pick out particular facts and coincidences? On this account, very few debates originated with him, excepting upon topics incidentally connected with his pursuits: on other occasions, he commonly spoke in reply, and not unfrequently at so late an hour of the night, that what he said found its way very imperfectly into the Newspapers. For this reason, I should fear that it will be difficult to form a tolerable collection of his speeches for separate publication.

He was by no means always equally forcible; and though extremely energetic when roused or warmed by his subject, there was at times in Parliament a feebleness of voice and language, partly to be accounted for by the easy conversational mode in which business is conducted in the Court where he practised: this gave him in some degree that carelessness of phraseology, and that irregularity in the construction of his sentences, I before noticed, aided by his obvious disgust at any thing approaching ostentatious pretence. I do not think that he was remarkable for a logical or lucid arrangement of his subject, nor for any artifice, common to practised speakers, of putting his strongest points in the fittest places. When answering an opponent, I have often felt that he adverted to the arguments in a manner too desultory—just as they presented themselves to his recollection: had he taken more notes, this defect perhaps might have been remedied; yet I admit that too many notes only serve to distract and confuse. His general deportment was mild and candid, and if he were not always so affable or communicative in private as many persons wished, it did not arise from any haughtiness of disposition, but from the anxiously burdened state of his mind: he who had not time for social or domestic intercourse, could feel but little inclination to waste it upon tedious talk and unmeaning compliments.

I have thus attempted to draw the character of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY as an Advocate and as a Senator, and my principal fear is, that in endeavouring to shun the ordinary cant, I have spoken of him less favourably in some points than I should have done had he yet been living.—The deference paid to his opinions by every member of the profession, speaks all that can be said in favour of his legal knowledge: the delight with which he was heard in the House of Commons, even when the Members were worn out by the fatigues of a long debate, is sufficient testimony of his powers as a parliamentary orator; and the ardent attachment of his family, his friends, and his domestics, shews that the brightness of his talents did not exceed the kindness and benignity of his nature:—

"His ruins, like the shored carcasses
Of scattered Temples, great and reverend lie,
And the religious honour them no less Than if they stood in all their gallevy."

David's Pilgrims, A. 5.

AMICUS CURIE.

[Mr. WETHERELL is postponed until next week.]

ON THE CORN BILL,—

THE REAL CAUSE OF THE PRESENT DEPRAVITY.

Sir,—I am happy in having been brought up an humble but sincere follower of the Nazarene: I love to consider Christ as my Redeemer, and would not give up my belief in him for the choicest gifts of fortune. When a child, I have had my feelings so affected by his sufferings, that I never can give up his dying for me upon the dreadful cross. To any one who would unkindly persuade me that this mysterious person was an impostor, my answer is—He led a perfect life, and laid his life down, to transmit to future ages the doctrines of which that life was the example.

But if ever the heaven-tempered spirit of Christ betrayed human impatience, it was in his indignation against those proud oppressors, those over-righteous, self-gratulating fools, the Scribes and Pharisees, who devoured widows' houses, and afterwards made long prayers and gave alms.

Those true prototypes of certain people of the present day were equally officious in expounding the law of God to the people; but those had not the power, which the rich hypocrites of our day have had, of starving the people by masses; that has been reserved for the gaunt and deadly Corn-Bill, the most mild sentence of which is perpetual hopeless dearth: under its famine-breathing influence, a fine harvest leaves the populace of England half starved upon potatoes—a bad one sends them by thousands to the grave. The great mass of ordinary manufacturers and labouring people of this once proud nation, who, in my remembrance, looked with scorn upon the French as slaves for eating black bread and wearing wooden shoes, are condemned by the prohibitory Corn-Bill to make their meals upon an half rotten watery root, scantily supplied to them too, instead of wholesome wheaten bread, which used to be the food of the commonest labourer.

To what purpose does a reading populace learn, that Ceres was the benefactress to the human race, that taught mankind the use of the "golden corn" when they are reduced to a savage state again, fain to exist upon a scanty supply of roots? Is this the boasted result of Magna Charta?

Even for that scanty supply of watery potatoes, men are obliged to leave their families dependent upon charity for rags to cover them, and their children barefooted without; for it is calculated that more money is taken out of the pockets of the people by the Corn-Bill than the amount of all the taxes which support the expences of Government and the interest of the national debt: for besides that the average price of bread throughout the year is 30 per cent. too high, being three times the per centage of the Income Tax, about which so much rout was made, the price of bread governs the value of money, and the price of every thing is raised accordingly.

Entirely through one vague phrase, "the necessity of a protecting price," which, if it has any meaning, means "the necessity of high rents," are the populace to be prohibited entirely the use of bread: the labourer is now no longer "crammed with distressful bread," as the simple poet of other times in pity sung; that is now protected from the touch of the vulgar. A dragon, not fabulous, guards the golden ear, the gaunt and deadly Corn-Bill.

The summer which followed the passing of this Corn-Bill, or this Rotten-Potatoe-Bill, or rather this Famine-Bill, was, as our summers not so unfrequently are, very ungenial: during the alarming rains that foreboded the bad harvest which followed, Government should have given the utmost facility to the introduction of corn from abroad: in former times, such was the practice with the Romans; the provident government would itself have purchased, in such a threat of famine, a store of corn abroad for the people, while ours not only did not do so, but kept us under the unholy ban of the Corn-Bill. How hard, that the articles of English industry and ingenuity could not be bartered with nations, in want of our manufactures, for their superfluity of corn, to keep people from starving: and when in consequence they died like rotten sheep (as must ever be the case henceforward after a bad harvest) of all the dire diseases which want brings on, some of which, as typhus fever, remain with us to this day, "turning their horrid arms against the torturers," the knaves of Landlords had the address to lay the whole charge of the calamity upon the harvest, when they knew it was aggravated from dearth to famine by their Bill, by the unusual exhaustion of the granaries, all going out and none coming in, through their unrelenting interdict; the true cause of the murderous havoc which followed. No heart is so steeled as that of the religious hypocrite, who deceives himself, and therefore no words can be too strong to warn these people, who mostly affect to believe in Christ, of the wickedness they have been guilty of. Would one have thought it possible that a Bill to ordain scarcity, for that was its very principle, to make dear by scarcity, could have been brought forth in a time of universal commercial embarrassment and consequent want of employ, and when our gallant sailors, the defenders of their corn fields, were already actually starving?

Our brave army, with wives and other camp followers, are about to return home; no kindly importation has been hinted at to provide for this numerous influx of people. In the Corn-Bill, like Shylack's bond, "there is no mercy written." Importation is not regulated by the necessity, but by the inveterate rule of price. "I stand for the obligation of my bond." The soldiers that are to be still kept on foot will deprive some poor creatures of bread, who will die disgraced: and as to the 30,000 men who will be disbanded, it is expected, I suppose, that they should be numbed to death upon the bridges, or lie down on brick kilns, in an orderly manner, and die.

Here let it be particularly cautioned, that the heavy load of the taxes be not identified with the scarcity of bread: the scarcity is the effect of the Corn-Bill's gaunt and deadly operation, alone and unassisted; for as it was acknowledged in Parliament (and the port accounts prove it beyond a possibility of dispute) that England does not grow corn enough for the subsistence of her inhabitants, owing to the preponderancy of manufactures perhaps, nor has she for these thirty years past even in the best of seasons, we are therefore, by this insurmountable prohibition, evidently put into the condition of a besieged town. There is never enough in the country. If all the taxes were taken off, no more people would get bread than do now, plainly because there would not be more bread for them to get: if it were sold cheaper in consequence, that would but strengthen the prohibitory power of the Act: the stock would be sooner exhausted and famine take place, but not importation. If the wages of labouring people and ordinary manufacturers were generally raised two or three shillings a week, which many of their masters, under the pressure of this calamitous Bill, could not continue to employ them at, the increase would do no more than raise the price of the substitute root. No; the legislating Landlords took due care to fix the standard high enough to maintain the monopoly, though the people must be starved by it, as the monopolists have not enough for the supply of the country, even with the assistance of the substitute root, which the rich will insult us by saying they themselves are very fond of—yes, with good roast beef.

As the Landlords' standard price is unattainable by any wages that can be afforded to labourers, so the length of time it must remain thereat is cruelly long, in the face perhaps of famine; six weeks is the apparent time, but there was foisted in the Bill six weeks more, making the real time three months for the uninterrupted march of famine: this was done by not allowing any account of averages to avail, but in the six weeks succeeding the 15th of February, the 15th of May, the 15th of August, and 15th of November; this and other insidious strokes of murderous polity in the Bill, seem work of supererogation, like two or three lashes more upon a man's back after he is dead.

Much stress has been laid upon the absolutely too high wages which some workmen can command, from the nature of their particular employment, or their superior adroitness above their fellows; but that is as irrelevant as disproportionate fortunes or estates: if it had any effect, it would be that of forwarding importation, but it is not general enough to have any general effect: every artifice is used to turn people's attention to the right and to the left; but the true point and bearing of the gaunt evil is this, that the Landlords, clothed with legislative authority, have doomed the mass of the populace, with their wives and children, to ever-during, intolerable dearth, with certainty once in seven years of deadly famine.

Hence, in reality, have they rendered the people of the lower classes reckless, desperate, and ferocious.

While they themselves are looking about with all the simplicity of innocence for the cause of the present depravity, prying into prisons and pot-houses for abstract crime, and revising and abusing the old Poor Laws for not filling Garagantua's mouth out of empty potatoe sacks, for pauperism as well as crime is already doubled by the Corn-Bill; and if the Bill can last two or three years longer, which, "if it be to be wished, God prohibit it," we shall have a like fearful increase of paupers and felons.

To remedy all this, we have, first, that delicious preparation, be it food or beverage, which, in the hour of insolvency, our people used to laugh at the French for lapping up so savourily, called soup maigre. Then next, Paernoster-row teems with religious trash, or tracts, as the earth just now with mushrooms; but the people have not yet got into good Master Lintot's way of eating suppositories for radishes. In this we perceive a strong smack of the old Pharisee. The distributing of Bibles just now seems as ill-timed; for, in the forcible words of Hooker, "destitution, until it is removed, suffereth not the mind of man to admit of any other care."

But after all, as a master stroke of policy, commend me to their taking up every interval of the Sabbath, ordained to be a day of rest even for our cattle, however little we regard them, in schooling the early care-worn, unkempt little wretches of children: Do they think knowledge and a full sense of their misery will make them happy under it? Is it not a mockery of God for them to be made to say, "Give us this day our daily bread?" When they can read the gospel for themselves, will they not read with emphasis the woe-denouncing judgments of Jesus Christ, hanging over the heads of the canting hypocrites who are starving them?

Thank God; we have a New Parliament:—"Shalt see thy other daughter will use thee kindly."—King Lear.

Let us haste to petition, and universally to petition and beseech them, for Christ's sake, to grant us bread again; that potatoes may only be an auxiliary and a prop in time of need, but not the only staff of life; and let not any question of politics be mixed with this great question of life and death.

Under the conviction of experience the Parliament may feel compunction, for to say nothing here of the number of lives that have been sacrificed to the Corn-Bill, they cannot pretend not to know that the labouring people and their families are making all their meals upon a scant store of potatoes now, and the prohibition on wheat will remain in full force to a certainty (whatever increase there may be of calamity) until six weeks after the 15th of this month, and then most probably until six weeks after the 15th of March, to the infinite dismay of every humane and impartial man; for the scarcity of potatoes now will only starve the poor; they cannot attain to the price of corn, or forward the importation one single day. Again, I must repeat, price is "the obligation of the bond." Let us however indulge the hope of a repeal, and finish with the contrast

Prosperity would reappear as if by magic: the churches, new and old, will be filled with happy human faces, praying to the Almighty to bless their new rulers: desperate blaspheming ferocity would lose the irritation which excites it: pauperism and crime, that are now making such gigantic strides, would shrink to their old dimensions: the manufactories would resound with the songs of cheerful industry: reciprocity of interest would open our export trade: every man in the kingdom would find himself instantly richer, except the bloated millers and home corn-holders—let them live upon their fat. No man more than the Farmer would partake of that general benefit, for his greatest evil is want of capital: the reduction of every article of expence for husbandry, housekeeping, and dress for his family, with the certain decrease of pauperism now so heavy upon some districts, would render the necessity for capital less by half: for want of it they now must sell in a glut, and afterwards when they go to buy, as Sir John says, "There is no purchase in money." As to the Landlords themselves, they would congratulate themselves upon having followed the dictates of mercy: for no reduction of rents tantamount to their reduced expenditure would be necessary. I am far from certain there would be a necessity for reducing them at all; for the great desideratum is some expedient for the Farmers loss of paper capital, which took place about the time of the peace, and obliged them to sacrifice their corn, being panic struck, at a price which drew on the deadly Corn-Bill; whereas what would be a remedy now, (and perhaps now it will not be so much wanted) would have been the proper remedy then; but in the precipitancy of the measure it was overlooked.—I am, Sir, your real well-wisher, LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

DELAYS OF CHANCERY.

On Thursday the LORD CHANCELLOR took occasion to remark, that the public, who complained so much of the delays in the judgments of that Court, would be surprised to learn that there were now not fewer than 260 judgments left uncalled for. This was entirely owing to the negligence of Solicitors. He thought it was proper to mention the circumstance now, as he observed so many Solicitors in Court.

His Lordship also took an opportunity to say, that he would act strictly upon the rule he had laid down before the long vacation, and put off no cause for any person whatever.

OLD BAILEY.

On Saturday week, Balthazar Adams was indicted for forging an acceptance to a bill of exchange for 200*l.* purporting to be the acceptance of Messrs. Snow and Co. bankers, with intent to defraud them, or Messrs. Hurd and Johnson, solicitors.

M. G. Johnson stated, that he was a solicitor in the Inner Temple. Mr. Hurd was his partner: he had never seen the prisoner but once before the 4th of September, upon which day he came to their chambers. He said he had asked Mr. Hurd to discount a bill of 200*l.* for him, but that he had not found it convenient to do so from his private purse, and had directed him to go to him (Mr. Johnson). Witness took the bill, and gave him a cheque for 197*l.* 10*s.* deducting a discount of 2*l.* 10*s.* Witness sent the bill to Messrs. Snow and Co. and it was then discovered that the acceptance of "accepted for self and Co. Robt. Snow," was a forgery.

Mr. ALLEY then called a witness, named Charles Cummings, but he did not appear; he was consequently ordered to be called upon his recognizance. He was called aloud three times, but did not appear; and Mr. Alley then stated that in the absence of this witness, he could not with safety proceed further in the trial.

Mr. Baron Garrow observed, that the Learned Counsel had stated, that in the absence of the necessary witness he could not satisfactorily proceed with the trial; and as he was satisfied of that fact, he did perfectly right in saving the valuable time of the Court; for, fortunately by the law of our land, a prisoner was always presumed innocent until he was found guilty by a Jury of his country. Under these circumstances there was nothing for the Jury to consider, they were therefore bound to acquit the prisoner.

The Jury instantly pronounced the prisoner Not Guilty, and Mr. Adams, who was extremely well dressed and powdered, bowed to the Court and withdrew.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Charles Charnon was indicted for assaulting Isabella Hatchfield, a girl about 16 years old, in June last, with intent to commit a rape. It appeared that the prosecutrix had been nursery-maid at the house of a publican, in Swallow-street, Piccadilly. In getting necessaries for the children, she had sometimes occasion to go into the tap-room. On some of these occasions she used to see the defendant, who was a farrier. Elizabeth Lowe, another servant, introduced her to the defendant, and he appeared very fond of her. She then received permission from her aunt to visit him; she accordingly called at his lodging in June last, but found he was out. A man of the name of Smith, however, said he would show her where the defendant was. They went to a public-house, where they found him. She sat there for a short time, but finding it got towards eight o'clock in the evening she refused to remain any longer. The defendant then prevailed upon her to take a walk with him in the Regent's-park. She assented, and after they had walked a little in the Park, and got to a private place, he suddenly seized her round the waist, dragged her over a fence, and then executed his brutal purpose. As soon as he let her go, she implored him to assist her towards one of the outlets: he refused, and poured upon her the grossest abuse, saying, that all his trouble was about the loss of his stick, which, it appeared, was lost in the struggle. The prosecutrix returned home to a friend, as well as she could, and disclosed her situation.—It was proved that she continued for some time in the greatest agony. Her acquaintances described her as a very modest and careful girl. Her injury was found to have required surgical assistance. An attempt was made, for the defendant, to contradict the statement of the girl's modesty, but it totally failed.—The Jury returned an instant verdict of—Guilty; and the Chairman, after animadverting in the most severe terms on the brutality of the prisoner, sentenced him to two years' imprisonment in Newgate.

W. Harvey was indicted for assaulting Ann Middleton, with a similar intent to the last prisoner. Another count charged him with a common assault. It appeared in evidence, that the prosecutrix, a girl of 15 years of age, had been put apprentice to the defendant from the parish of St. Pancras. She stated, that on the 13th of July the prisoner took several indecent liberties with her. It however appeared that he desisted, without resorting to force. The Jury therefore found him guilty of only the common assault; and he was sentenced to pay a fine of 10*l.*

James Wheeler pleaded guilty to the charge of having indecent prints in his possession for the purpose of sale. The Chairman, after reprobating so infamous a practice, sentenced him to six months' imprisonment in the House of Correction.

T. Cowdery, who had been unlawfully gathering walnuts in Lord Ranelagh's grounds at Putney, and even breaking the walnut-trees, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment in the House of Correction, for an assault upon his Lordship's butler. The prisoner was one of a gang of 15, who refused to leave the grounds when desired to do so. He offered to fight the butler, whom he beat most cruelly and severely injured; and when taken, called upon his fellows to release him.

Sir Joseph Banks was fined in the mitigated penalty of 10*l.* for his servant removing his own ashes from his house in Soho-square.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Sunday morning, about four o'clock, a fire broke out, at the Log of Mutton and Trimmings public-house, in Taylor's-buildings, King-land-road, kept by Mr. Fowkes, which by 6 o'clock completely consumed the same, together with all the household furniture, an extensive stock, &c. Mrs. Fowkes being much afraid of fire, was always in the habit of examining her house every night to see all the lights out; and at two o'clock, when Mr. and Mrs. Fowkes retired to rest, every thing (to all appearance) was safe, and how it originated they are utterly at a loss to surmise.

Monday morning, about three o'clock, a dreadful fire broke out in the house of Mr. Bonnor, salesman, in Ratcliffe-highway, which in a very short time was totally consumed, together with the adjoining premises of Mr. Pickett, a large tea-dealer; the next house, occupied by Dr. Horsfold, is much damaged. By the timely arrival of the engines and a plentiful supply of water, the fire was got under by seven o'clock. A woman dropped a child from a window on the second floor; the infant was happily caught by the patrol and saved. The mother then leaped out of the window, and had her thigh broken and was otherwise severely hurt; she was wrapped in blankets, and conveyed on a shutter to the London Hospital in a very dangerous state. Mr. Bonnor, and his son, a fine boy, about 4 years old, perished in the flames. Mr. Bonnor was club-footed, which, it is supposed, was the cause of his not escaping.

On Thursday morning, between three and four o'clock a fire was discovered in a small earthenware shop at the Halfway-houses, which was attended with most calamitous consequences: the burning to death of a girl of 16 and a boy of 14 years of age; the scorching of a woman so severely that her life is despaired of; and the breaking of an arm of a young man, with the total destruction of the house and every article therein: the persons escaped from it with barely any covering. The origin of it cannot even be surmised by either of the survivors. The woman (Mrs. London) escaped with her infant and sister out of the back door; but the latter could not resist attempting to save the lives of the children who were up stairs. She went part of the way up, when the heat obliged her to return: and it is apprehended her life will pay the forfeit of her humane attempt. During this interval, the eldest daughter of Mrs. London had succeeded in throwing two of the children out of the garret-window into the arms of persons below; and she was urged to leap out herself; but she said, "No, I will go back for my brother." The flames had now actually reached the very garment she had on, and overcome by her feelings she threw herself upon the bed, which was soon engulfed in flames, and her dead half-consumed body was seen shortly afterwards to fall with the bed and the wreck of the upper part of the house to the ground! Her remains were soon after taken from the ruins, and those of the boy, whom she had attempted to save, were found in the cellar, about two hours after the fire was got under; it would appear that he had not awoken, and was suffocated in his bed. The occupier of the house (London), and his wife, by the most persevering industry obtained a scanty living; but every individual article they possessed became a prey to the flames, and for every article of clothing and morsel of bread they now obtain for themselves and for surviving children, they are indebted to the kindness of their neighbours. It is a case which claims the compassionate benevolence of these towns.—Mottley's Hampshire Telegraph

On Tuesday morning, Mr. Elliott, a wine-merchant, residing in Paternoster-row, put a period to his existence by cutting his throat with a razor. It appears the unfortunate gentleman was sitting at breakfast reading the newspaper, and suddenly started up and committed the fatal act. This person took an active part in the late Westminster Election.—The Coroner's Inquest sat on the body on Wednesday night, and brought in a verdict of Insanity.

On Wednesday an Inquest was held in Little Russell-street, on the body of Mr. Charles M. Carly, formerly an officer in the service of the Emperor of Austria, who fell down in the Pit of Drury-lane Theatre, on Monday night, and expired, just at the moment Mr. Kean was representing the dying scene in Richard the Third.—James Davis, constable, said, "I was on duty at Drury-lane Theatre on Monday night, and, as the curtain fell at the conclusion of the tragedy, was informed that a gentleman had fallen down in the Pit, and appeared to be dying. I went and assisted in carrying him into the passage of the Pit, and a female, who appeared to feel interested for the deceased, and who, I thought, belonged to him, ran for some water. The surgeons arrived shortly after, and tried further means, but to no effect."—Major Albert D'Alton, residing in Conduit-street, stated, "The deceased is distantly related to me; he had been lately at Paris, and was on his way to his family at Dublin. Deceased was a gentleman of a highly respectable family, and formerly was an officer in the Austrian service."—Verdict—Died by the visitation of God.

The same evening another Inquest was held in Dean-street, on the body of John Willatts.—Wm. Nicholls, Gerard-street, umbrella-maker, stated, that the deceased was between 50 and 60 years of age, and was in the habit of coming to my house the last 14 years; he held a situation in the Barrack Department, and retired on half-pay. Monday last, about 12 o'clock, he came to my house, and sat in the front parlour. In about 20 minutes after he came, I heard a noise as if he was rapping with his stick. I sent up the servant-maid, who soon returned, and I went to him, and found him lying on the floor. I sent for Mr. Dickson, a surgeon, who came directly. The deceased only uttered a few words, "Oh dear! Oh dear! what is the matter?" He was dead before the surgeon arrived.—The surgeon, who was called in, said that he died in a fit of apoplexy.—The Jury returned their verdict—Died in a fit of Apoplexy.

On Monday morning, Losch, for the murder of his wife, underwent the sentence of the law.

A man, named Wolfe, has been committed to Durham goal by the Magistrates of Sunderland, on suspicion of being concerned in murdering the servant-maid, and setting fire to the house of Miss Smith (now Lady Peel) at Herrington, some years ago.

On Friday week, as the Portsmouth mail-coach was on its way to London, it stopped as usual at Redbourne, when, in consequence of the coachman alighting from his box and incautiously leaving the horses without some person at their head, they ran furiously away. The horses, with the coach ran down a steep precipice, the coach was overturned, and the horses fell and rolled over, when fortunately the persons who were in pursuit came up and secured them, and so prevented further mischief. One of the gentlemen inside is since dead of the injuries he received. The other two gentlemen also received considerable injury.

HYDROPHOBIA.—Alisma Plantago infestual.—We last week announced the death of Matthew Laycock, a common carrier of Bradley, near Skipton, of the above calamitous malady. He was bitten by a dog of his own; about two months previous to his dissolution. He went to the sea, as directed by those whom he consulted, and took the usual medicines administered on such occasions: after which, he rested in perfect security, apprehending no future danger. On Monday the fifth instant, he was at Bury, following his occupation of carrier; and having got exceedingly wet by driving in the rain, he complained of very unpleasant sensations, and symptoms of the above complaint manifested themselves.—Having been conveyed to his residence at Bradley, every possible attention was paid him by Mr. Abbotson, surgeon, Skipton; and among other medicines the pulverized Alisma Plantago was repeatedly given him in bread and butter, to the amount of five drams at a dose; but all to no purpose. On the ninth he died, leaving a widow and three small children to deplore his melancholy and premature death.—Leeds Mercury, Oct. 31.

About the year 1773 he was introduced to his Majesty's notice, and was appointed Sub-governor to Prince William and Prince Edward, the former of whom he accompanied to Hanover. Upon the formation of the Duke of York's establishment, his Royal Highness appointed him his Secretary. The King conferred upon him the rank of General in the Hanoverian service, with other instances of royal favour.

On hearing of the death of Mr. Bartley, a master tailor in Exeter street, who fell down and suddenly expired in the street, an undertaker in the neighbourhood went to the shop where the body was conveyed, and found that Mr. B. was a relation of his. On going home he mentioned the circumstance abruptly to his wife, who, in consequence of the sudden shock, was seized with hysterics, and expired on Wednesday morning.

ENGLAND, HOW REPRESENTED AT CONGRESS.

WALLER was once asked by JAMES the Second, how he liked a portrait of the Princess of ORANGE. The poet said, it resembled the greatest woman in the world, Queen ELIZABETH. "I wonder you should think her the greatest," said the King;—"I must confess she had a wise council." "And, Sir," replied WALLER, "did you ever know a fool chuse a wise one?"

Kings had the choice of their council in those days; and very completely did they prove the truth of the poet's question. At present, a British Sovereign cannot so well be judged of according to his Ministers, though it may be safely asserted, that a very wise one would not be remarkable for having foolish servants. But during the reign of the Boroughmonger Oligarchy, it is the system that settles these matters; and though it implies no great sense in the Prince that suffers its existence, as well as a great diminution of liberty among the people, and the character of the Ministry is more or less fitted to what is thought of their ostensible master, yet the Oligarchy, upon the whole, is their real master and nominator, especially during the lamented disease of the King;—and by their ministerial figures in the glass, ye shall know them.

The character of the Oligarchy is made up of four things,—obstinacy, dullness, avarice, and frivolity. Mr. PITT left them the former, which they persevered in out of impotence, as he did out of something better; and BONAPARTE's rashness luckily prevented it from being their ruin, as it has been their leaders. Their dullness is their own innate prerogative, and has its representative in all their Ministers but Mr. CANNING; and Mr. CANNING, be it observed, has taken pains to shew that he has nothing in common with his political brethren but their love of place. The avarice, without meaning to apply the word personally to him, has its Minister in Mr. VANSITTART, who by hook or by crook keeps off the evil day of payment, and enables them with his taxes on the lower orders to roll in luxury. Finally, the frivolity, still dull however and ministerial, has its representative in my Lord CASTLEREAGH; who without talent and without letters, without originality or greatness of any sort, has also become the representative at Congress of a nation renowned for its genius.

Setting aside every species of political feeling, we declare most sincerely, that we have often had a sudden sense of shame come over us, at the thought of Lord CASTLEREAGH's representing the English nation in the presence of such men as HUMBOLDT and GENTZ. We say nothing of the Duke of WELLINGTON, because he does not pretend to act in that capacity, and because nobody expects it from a mere soldier and man of gallantry, however able he may be in his art. But intelligent Ministers of other countries, who meet our own at Aix-la-Chapelle, must expect him to be able to take part in a literary or philosophical conversation, and inform them respecting the great geniuses of his nation; and in all matters of this kind, Lord CASTLEREAGH is no more a representative of England, than a coat and waistcoat represent SHAKESPEARE and BACON.

Imagine this strange successor of the SYDNEYS and TEMPLES, betrayed by some unavoidable chance into a literary conversation. Imagine the usual courtly topics all exhausted, the bows and agrémens of no use, the very snuff-box no longer available. "Apropos," says some lively Frenchman or critical German, what do your Lordship's countrymen think just now of HOBBS?

"Of—HOBBS?" answers his Lordship, almost doubtful whether the speaker means hopes or hobbs:—"HOBBS—HOBBS."

Yes, my Lord; of HOBBS, you know;—the pronunciation of your noble language puzzles us a little:—HOBBS the philosopher.

Oh—HOBBS the philosopher! Oh yes,—I understand—ah—yes—HOBBS the philosopher—undoubtedly—HOBBS.—HOBBS! why his opinions are obsolete—quite out of date.

What! His political ones! They might have been a little useful.

Oh, dear me, no;—not his political ones,—at least nothing in them that is good,—nothing that is good.

Oh.—Is your Lordship an admirer of HOBBS?

Why—really—it's difficult to say. I admire in him what is good—what is consolatory to the human mind, and productive of real advantage to the species; but—you know, M. LE BARON, that all writers have their merits and demerits.

Undoubtedly,—but setting aside his politics, does your Lordship admire his philosophy?

Yes;—he was the precursor and perhaps teacher of LOCKE, you know, at least.

Oh, I admire his philosophy;—oh yes;—at least parts of it;—parts of it;—it is very great—superb—BUNKE admired him—but I believe the Council is waiting for us.

Here they are interrupted by another German. "I beg your Lordship's pardon, but bearing you mention the name of HOBBS—pray can you tell me whether any thing new has been done of late in consequence of my Lord BACON's recommendations?—a friend of mine is writing a history of modern intellectual improvement.

BACON—let me see—let me see—there are the Sunday schools.

Ah, ah—very good, very good; your Lordship is very witty. You mean to say that nothing new has been done—very good, very good.—But, Lord BACON is doubtless as much revered as ever.

Oh, doubtless—the Chancellor was a great man—very great man—there has been a beautiful edition of his Essays lately. You know what POPE says of him—let me see—what is it that he says of him—“the greatest something;” but it is very good. MR. BURKE was a great admirer of him.

Here an unlucky Duke comes in.—But POPE:—Your Lordship spoke of POPE:—Oh, he was a charming poet—wonderful—that grace—that amenity—if I were not afraid your Lordship would think me heretical, I should say that I preferred him to MILTON.

Why there, with great submission, I must differ with Monsieur LE DUC. MILTON is our greatest poet;—besides, he is an epic poet:—but POPE is doubtless charming. If you can excuse a sentence which may look a little artificial and antipathetical, I should say, for my part, that MILTON was the greatest, but POPE the most charming of poets. One does not admire POPE so much, but one always reads him; whereas one admires MILTON a great deal, but never reads him.—But I beg pardon,—the Council is waiting.

1st Minister. (going after him) What was that his Lordship said about antipathetical?

2d Min. Oh—a slip of the tongue for antithetical.

3d Min. But apropos—how can one admire a poet without ever having read him?

4th.—Oh—voices—you see it very possible. His Lordship is a great admirer of twenty authors, poetical and philosophical, but it is not necessary he should have read one of them. Nothing is difficult to so surprising an English statesman.

2d. Ah;—there it is.

3d. These English are a strange people—we see how matters go—and yet they still beat all the world.

1st. Shall I guess the secret for you? It is because they had great princes and ministers formerly. An influence has been left, which it takes, we see, a great deal of neutralization to do away. They live upon the credit of their intellect, as they do upon that of their money.

EMIGRATION.

FEARON'S “Sketches of America.”—The author of this work was, as the title-page informs us, deputed by thirty-nine English families “to ascertain whether any and what part of the United States would be suitable for their residence;” and he has communicated the results of his observations in eight reports, which compose this volume. As we have given an account of the opinions of Mr. Birkbeck respecting America, our readers will perhaps also wish to know those of this writer, who has taken a more extended view of the country, and differs with that gentleman in many particulars. Mr. Fearon had indeed better opportunities of judging of the general character of the people, having travelled over a larger portion of the country, and remained some time in the principal places for the express purpose of obtaining information; while Mr. Birkbeck passed quickly through the old States, and as he had resolved to become a proprietor of land, paid more attention to those points connected with his object. However these gentlemen may differ with each other, we do not suspect either of them to be guilty of any intentional misrepresentation. They viewed America with different feelings. Mr. Birkbeck left England from political and other causes, which did not exist in the United States; delighted with the great and acknowledged advantages of the country, and being besides an ardent and persevering man, he has perhaps spoken lightly of those disagreeables of which others may think more. Mr. Fearon is also a lover of liberty, and very much admires the American Constitution; but he had formed too great expectations of the people: it is therefore not surprising if his book shows some signs of the disappointment he felt on finding what was really the case.

Mr. Fearon spent nine months in America, during which time he visited the principal cities, New York, Philadelphia, and Boston; then proceeded to Pittsburg, through the states of Ohio and Kentucky, to Shawnee Town in the Illinois Territory, thence to Natchez, down the Mississippi to New Orleans, and returned to New York by way of Washington and Baltimore. The character of the people appeared to him to vary very little throughout the Union. He considers them generally unsocial, narrow-minded, boasting, cold and blunt in their manners, bigoted and interested. Their unsocial disposition he thinks is owing to the complete independence on each other, felt even by the lowest class; a servant or a journeyman feels no obligation to his master for employing him, nor a tradesman to his customer for buying at his shop; a subsistence can always be obtained with moderate industry, and thus one of the social ties—the necessity of mutual assistance—does not exist. This spirit of independence is often carried to a pernicious extreme, and destroys a proper social subordination. Yet the free manner of the Americans, when it does not become absolute impudence, is not unpleasant to a lover of liberty, as it continually reminds him that they are in the possession of that inestimable blessing. Their vanity is more disgusting to a stranger, and especially to an Englishman, as the principal topics of conversation in all societies are their naval successes in the late war, though, according to the statements of Mr. James, their superiority of force in the contests between the frigates in the action on Lake Erie leaves them little room for boasting of their victories. The Americans have many advantages of which they might reasonably be proud, but with these they are not satisfied; they fancy that they excel in all things, that they are, in short, “the most enlightened nation in the world.” Among the lower orders, it is a prevailing notion that they speak the language better than Englishmen; and Mr. Fearon was complimented by a black barber in New York on his talking English almost as well as they did. Mr. F. supposes this national defect to be caused by “their being so far removed from the seat of the arts and sciences, that their acquirements are not tried by the only effectual standard,—comparison.” Emigration must have also contributed to produce this effect: the preference given to America by so many hundreds, on account of the absence of those evils which drove them from Europe, might be easily imagined by their vanity to arise from an admiration of every thing American; and many of the emigrants have doubtless administered to this weakness by abusing their own countries, either because irritated by persecution, or from the hope of ingratiating themselves with their auditors. At any rate, it is very clear it cannot proceed from their own literary excellence: they have no authors of high reputation even with themselves; they are content to reprint English works; and although there is the greatest liberty of the press, their newspapers are in general very badly edited, and made up of advertisements, commercial news, and extracts from the English journals.

A dislike of foreigners is, according to Mr. Fearon, another feature of the American character, and this is one of the points on which he differs with Mr. Birkbeck, who uses the following words in his “Notes on a Journey to Illinois:”—“Here, whatever their original, whether English, Scotch, Irish, German, French, all are Americans; and of all the unfavourable imputations on the American character, jealousy of strangers is surely the most absurd and groundless. The Americans are sufficiently alive to their own interest, but they wish well to strangers, and are not always satisfied with wishing, if they can promote their interest by active services." As Mr. Fearon had more opportunities of forming a correct judgment, and also supports his statements by several anecdotes, we cannot help thinking he is right. He ascribes Mr. Birkbeck's error to his living in an infant colony, where national antipathies are prevented from shewing themselves by the dependence of every one on his neighbour, and to his being a man of property, which insured him a liberal reception during his journey. For his own part, he is confident, "that any Englishman, who had candidly surveyed the country as a whole, and observed the feelings of its inhabitants, particularly in the old settled parts, and where the population is dense, would declare that national antipathies exist here to an extent exceeding any thing which he had ever seen or could have conceived when in England:—

"I have already stated many facts which will tend to support this assertion. Let me now observe, that the State of Pennsylvania presents a further illustration of this subject. Between the Americans of Irish and of German extraction, there exists the most deadly animosity, "even unto the third and fourth generation." In the mind of a German American, the term "Irishman" is one of the most foul reproaches with which his range of ideas supplies him. Throughout America (the parts at least which are populated), Irishmen are despised, and Englishmen are viewed with cool malignant jealousy and hatred."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, NOV. 8.—The fine weather has been very favourable to the labours of MM. Biot, Arago, Mudge, &c. in the measurement of the earth. Their operations are terminated, and the English Colonel has already quitted Dunkirk. The two Members of our Academy will not delay returning to Paris, if they be not already arrived.

Colonel Falces, a Spanish exile, who resided in the Lower Pyrenees, committed suicide in the end of last month, at Etcharry. For some time past he had given himself up to a gloomy melancholy, but on the morning of the day on which he killed himself he manifested a very uncommon degree of hilarity.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUGES, NOV. 4.—Our journal contains the following article:—Nothing is spoken of here besides a circumstance which is a scandalous offence against morals and religion. M. C., formerly a monk in the abbey of St. Andries, who since the dissolution of the monasteries has performed no ecclesiastical functions, died last Saturday, Oct. 30, of a lingering disorder. Though the clergy were constantly with him, and he required the consolations of religion, it seems they were refused him, as well as Christian burial. Yesterday evening, late, his body was conveyed away without any ceremony or attendance, and buried in unconsecrated ground. And wherefore?—because it is universally said he possessed national property, and would not give it up before his death. If such disgraceful proceedings are suffered to go unpunished, the fanatics, who consider the Inquisition as a holy institution, and call for its introduction, may see their wish fulfilled, and may return to the ages of ignorance.

PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by the universal concurrence of the inhabitants and slave proprietors on the island, it was resolved, at a meeting held this day, that from and after the 25th day of December next (being the anniversary of the birth of our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ), all children born of slaves shall be free, subject to such conditions and regulations as shall hereafter be promulgated, in respect to their care, and to the services that may be required of them, in the families by which they may be maintained, until they arrive at a fit age to be able to support themselves. This is to give notice, that the above is to be considered a law of the island; and that from and after the 25th of December next, being the anniversary of the birth of our blessed Lord and Saviour, all children born of slaves on the island are consequently to be held free, subject only to such conditions and regulations as above.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 15.

A GREAT ferment was excited at the beginning of the week by the arrival of dispatches from St. Helena, and the air of profound secrecy under which they were forwarded to town. The first impression was that BONAPARTE was dead,—the next, that he had escaped,—the next, that a grand conspiracy had been discovered, and he was to be kept in double confinement. The following accounts at once shew the nature of the ferment, and offer a pleasant specimen of the decline and fall of one of these mighty pieces of bustle:—

“Portsmouth, Seven o’Clock, Saturday Evening.”

“The Musquito, Captain BRINE, arrived this day from St. Helena. The Captain is gone off for London in a chaise and four, and the strictest orders are left that no communication whatever is to be had with the ship for twenty-four hours from the time of his departure, which will expire about three o’clock to-morrow. I apprehend that BONAPARTE is dead, that his remains are brought to England in the Musquito, or perhaps he has made his escape.”

“HAMPSHIRE TELEGRAPH.”

“Portsmouth, Saturday, Nov. 7.”

“This afternoon, about half-past two o’clock, His Majesty’s sloop of war Musquito, Capt. GEO. BRINE, arrived from St. Helena, in 39 days (having sailed on the 20th September), with dispatches of very great importance. Captain BRINE was landed with them, by the Caston-house boat, and at half-past three, he set off in a post-chaise and four for the Admiralty. All communication with the Musquito being interdicted for 24 hours, we are unable to state what is the nature of the dispatches, though we have no doubt it is of the highest importance. Various rumours have been circulated since the arrival of the Musquito; but knowing, as we do, that the contents of the dispatches are not known by any individual here, it would be trifling with our readers to repeat these mere speculative opinions. Had it been possible to have ascertained the intelligence brought, they might be assured we should have had the satisfaction of communicating it to them. The latest intelligence received from St. Helena, previous to this arrival, was of the 18th September. By a letter from St. Helena, of that date, the naval force there consisted as follows:—Conqueror, 74, Admiral PLAMPIN, Captain STANFELL; Redpole, Favourite, Musquito, and Rattle. The latter is never to be seen, and the respectability of some of his attendants is much on the decline, BERTRAND particularly. A house is begun for the ci-devant Emperor close to Longwood, and the anxiety of the Governor to have it completed induces him to ride daily to the spot; and in less than a year I think he will have no cause to complain of his dwelling.”

“SECOND EDITION OF THE PORTSMOUTH PAPER.”

“RECEIVED IN TOWN THIS MORNING.”

“Arrival of the Musquito sloop of war from St. Helena.”

“Sunday Afternoon, Half-past Three o’Clock.”

“Communication has just been allowed with the above vessel. BONAPARTE was well, and in safe custody. It is understood that the dispatches Captain BRINE took with him yesterday relate to a plot which was near upon being carried into effect, and which had for its object the liberation of BONAPARTE. Some persons residing in England are the principals.”

“In London,” says the Courier, “and at the various public offices, there was more bustle than we have witnessed since the termination of the war.” And then comes the following demi-official information, containing “all the intelligence which has been yet suffered to transpire;” yes,—and which we may therefore pretty safely conclude is all that is to transpire, and the utmost, (vagueness and all) that can be made of it into the bargain:—“Little,” says he, “has transpired of the contents of the dispatches from St. Helena. But we understand the outline to be—That a correspondence had been interrupted by Sir HENSON LOWE at St. Helena, which proved the existence of a communication between that island and certain persons resident at Rome, Paris, and Munich—That this communication had for its object the liberation of BONAPARTE from St. Helena.”

Lastly comes the Chronicle, and gives another story of the affair, which, coupled with the previous report about the conspiracy’s being English, with some letters lately published between Count BERTRAND and Sir HENSON LOWE, and with the vague account and shirking repetitions of the Courier, presents us, we dare say, with the real immediate state of the matter:—

“According to our information,” says the Chronicle, “the fact simply is,—that a box of Newspapers and French books, sent by an individual to a Gentleman in St. Helena (no doubt with a view of being presented to the French party at Longwood), was, with a great air of importance, delivered to the Governor by the Captain of the vessel to whom they were entrusted; and unless it can be proved that the dreadful prisoner was to be liberated by pamphlets and journals, no other means of escape have been detected. Some time ago M. BERTRAND wrote to a Lady in Flanders, a relation of Madame BERTRAND, praying her to send out a few recent publications to divert their melancholy. This Lady, we understand, applied to our Ministers for leave to send them out, when she was informed that they would themselves send out an assortment. This, however, was not done, and an individual thought proper to apply to the Captain of a vessel destined for St. Helena, to take out a few books and newspapers, addressed to a friend in the island, with a note, desiring him to send them to the desolate party at Longwood. This is the mighty conspiracy, unless indeed that the Gentleman, in his note, made use of some very free expressions on the conduct of the Governor of St. Helena, such as are common in the mouth of every Englishman of feeling, when the treatment of the prisoner becomes the topic of conversation. The Gentleman to whom the letter was addressed, and who was totally ignorant of its contents, had been examined by the Public Officers of the Island. He was in no ways concerned in the matter, the letter having been addressed to him by a stranger; but it is probable that he will be sent off the Island, to give an air of importance to the pretended discovery."

This account being denied, as in duty bound, by the Courier, and the Chronicle being asked with an air of wonder how he could get his information, the latter replies,—In the same way that other people get theirs;—and then publishes the still more particular statement following:—

"From a private individual then, to whom this mighty affair has been communicated by a friend of the persons examined at St. Helena, we collect the following particulars: and we believe that the whole host of Ministerial Journals cannot invalidate the statement:—

"Captain BRIST, of the Lusitania store-ship, sailed from England towards the end of June last, for St. Helena, and took for persons on the Island a box of books and some letters. He gave a verbal and written declaration, that they should be delivered safely to the persons to whom they were addressed; and wrote from Deal, previously to his sailing, offering to take whatever else might be committed to his charge. The following extract of the letter, before alluded to, will shew the result:—"A box of books and some letters have been taken possession of by the Government here, in consequence of information from the Master of the vessel who brought them, who, wishing to get her employed in bringing supplies from the Cape, thought, no doubt, that this would be a most effectual way of making friends. He consequently waited upon Sir THOMAS READ, and stated, that in consequence of the mystery and importance attached to the charge of the said box and letters, he thought it better to deliver them direct to the Governor."

Now we have only to add, that as to the alleged conspiracy among certain persons resident at St. Helena, Rome, Paris, and Munich, every body can well imagine, and must indeed have always supposed, in the nature of things, that BONAPARTE's friends and relations would try to get him out of his prison; nor will it be thought an astonishing thing, if they supposed also that the prisoner would aid and abet in contemplating his own deliverance. The Courier talks of a miraculous sort of ship, which is always hovering about St. Helena, but can never be come up with by any of the cruisers. We can imagine such a thing, and the country in which it was built:—but what then? Does any body affect to suppose that Sir HUNSON LOWE has nothing to do but visit his prisoners with petty annoyances, instead of keeping a look out in larger matters? It is doubtless very possible that something of a conspiracy more obvious than usual may have been detected;—it is also very possible that a parade may have been made on the subject, and old matters brought forward to serve a new purpose. The conduct of Sir HUNSON LOWE, or Sir HUNSON, or Sir LOW, as the French sometimes call him (any of the names will do) has become so notorious of late, and excited so much disgust throughout Europe, that, as the Chronicle very justly observes, the present bustle may have been got up on purpose "to give a turn to the popular feeling" and make the rigorous treatment to which Sir LOWE has subjected his prisoner appear the warrantable result of circumstances. If the fact is otherwise, let the Ministers and their scribes prove it.

The Congress is expected to break up on the 24th or 25th instant. The old grudge against the French conquerors is not yet paid off, it seems; for an application made by Marshal OUDINOT, Count LOBAY, and by the family of BERTHIER, Prince of Neuchâtel, for the restitution of some German estates given them by NAPOLEON, was rejected without even the show of an examination. Such an application, indeed, appears at first sight to be very strange, especially as the estates are said to be in the hands of their "rightful owners;" but three things are to be observed on a question of this nature;—first, that it would hardly have been made, had it been one of mere gratuitousness and impudence; second, that till the downfall of an "illegitimate" Monarch, restitutions to old rightful owners were by no means so much in fashion, (and by the bye perhaps they will become an awkward precedent some day or other); and the third, that it remains to be proved whether the present owners of the estates alluded to are really the rightful ones; for it happens rather too legitimately, that certain "rightful owners" are at this minute vainly memorializing Congress, and endeavouring to get their former possessions out of some very Anti-Gallican hands indeed, the Hanoverian, we believe, included. It is said that the payment of the French contributions is to be delayed a year. A Committee, it appears, is to sit at Frankfort under the Presidency of Baron HUMMOLDT, in order to discuss the question between Baden and Bavaria, and perhaps other minor matters relative to Germany. A pun of the Duke de RICHELIEU's on that subject is at present in great request among the legitimate. He said that "this BADRIVAGE and BAVARDAGE (pompous babbling) would not light up a war in Europe." It would be hard now-a-days to criticise the wit and metaphors of a State Minister. The pun is very well; and we ought to be grateful.

Halifax papers have been received to the 25th ult.—They contain extracts from the American papers to the 18th Oct. The new Navigation Act of the United States took effect on the 1st, and on the 2d a British vessel, the Pitt, from Jamaica, was seized in the Delaware, for a breach of this law, having come to an anchor from a port where the American flag was excluded.

Extract of a letter from Madrid, dated in October:—"I understand that the moment the King received the Memoir of Don Florez Estrada, he assembled a Council to deliberate on the contents of the impious production. The Council lasted from 6 in the afternoon of the 18th till 2 in the morning, and orders were sent off in every direction to prevent its entry and circulation in Spain. Fresh spies were also employed, and the secret reports of a Frenchman in London, who carries on a regular system of espionage, and makes returns, was resorted to. The Holy Inquisition has declared the author of the said Memoir to be a heretic, a schismatic, an enemy of the throne, the altar; and all the excommunications and anathemas, applicable in similar cases, have been denounced against him. Some copies have, however, been smuggled in. I have seen one, and they have made a powerful impression in a country where a political pamphlet is of all others the rarest curiosity. It has also been declared to be an heinous crime for any one to possess or read this same production, punishable by the severest penalties of the law, and all those possessing, or having read the pamphlet, are commanded to declare or denounce the fact."

Can any of our readers inform us positively of the reason alleged by Ministers for striking that apparently excellent person, Mr. O'MEARA out of the Navy List?

In consequence of a very severe attack of the gout, the Lord CHANCELLOR was not able to go to Westminster Hall yesterday morning.

It is a fact that Mr. O'MEARA has been removed from the list of Naval Surgeons, and the pretext alledged is, that some passages of a very serious nature were contained in his Memorial against Sir HUBSON LOWE.—We feel ourselves authorised to contradict the statement, that Mr. O'MEARA had asserted, that Sir H. LOWE had made a proposal to him to poison BONAPARTE.—No such accusation has been made; but Mr. O'MEARA stated, that suggestions against his conscience were made to him.—Chronicle.

The Isabella and the Alexander, discovery ships, are safely arrived in Brassa Sound, Lerwick, neither ship having lost a man, nor having a man in the sick list. Capt. Ross has completely succeeded in exploring every part of Baffin's Bay, and, with the exception of errors in the latitudes and longitudes, of verifying the statements of that old and able navigator whose name it bears, and of ascertaining that no passage exists between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through Davis's Straits and Baffin's Bay, the whole being found to be surrounded by high land, extending to the north as far as lat. 77. 55. and long. 76. W.: and in the 74th degree of latitude, stretching westward as far as 84. W. longitude. They traced the same the whole way down to the Cape Walsingham of Davis, which they ascertained to lie in lat. 66. and long. 60.: from hence they steered for Resolution Island, and then stood homeward. They have made many curious observations and discoveries, of which, perhaps, will not be considered the least interesting, that of a nation being found to inhabit the Arctic regions, between the latitudes of 76. and 78., who thought that the world to the South was all ice; that generation had succeeded generation of a people who had never tasted the fruits of the earth, had no idea of a Supreme Being, who never had any enemy, and whose Chiefs had hitherto supposed themselves monarchs of the universe. There now only remains to be discovered the termination, if it has one, of Middleton's Repulse Bay, and, a few degrees to the northward of it, to determine whether Greenland be an island or joins America; and this might with the greatest ease be done from the northernmost station of the Hudson's-bay Company in any one season.—Courier.

It has been erroneously stated, that the family of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY consisted of one son and five daughters. He has left one daughter and six sons; the eldest is a student at Trinity College, Cambridge. Lady ROMILLY's age was 44.—On the 11th instant the remains of Sir SAMUEL and his Lady were interred in the family vault, at Knill, near Presteigne. The mourners were, his Brother and Nephew, with his Brothers-in-Law—Mr. WHITTAKER and Mr. DAVIS. The bearers were, Lord LANS-
DOWN, Mr. BROUGHAM, Sir HARFORD JONES, Mr. FRANK-LAND LEWIS, Mr. RICHARD PRICE, Mr. WHISHAW, and Mr. ALLEN.

Yesterday morning as a boat was conveying a man from Billingsgate to Cotton's Wharf, with a basket of fish, it ran across a ship's hawser, which upset it, and the poor fish-man, named Gun, was drowned.

It appears by a return presented to the House of Commons (and which was ordered to be printed on the 5th of June last), that the number of criminal offenders committed for trial in England and Wales, during the last thirteen years, has increased in the last year to more than triple the number of the former year; that the number sentenced to death was in nearly the like proportion: but that the number of executions was not one-half in proportion to the number so sentenced. The numbers were as follow:—

In the years 1805 and 1817.
Committed for trial	4,605. 13,932
Sentenced to death	350. 1,302
Executed	68. 115

being 1 in 5, in 1805—and 1 in 11, in 1817.

SURREY INSTITUTION.—Mr. HAZLITT's second Lecture this season, last Tuesday, was on the Comic Characters of Shakspeare, Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher. It is extremely difficult for an Author, who has already written on the general merits of any particular author, as Mr. HAZLITT has done on those of SHAKSPEARE, to vary his former observations without contradicting the spirit of them; but every body must have admired the way in which he contrived it. The comic characters of BEN JONSON he seemed to consider chiefly in reference to their comparative merits with those of SHAKSPEARE. And this is not unnatural, when we see the absurd attempts still kept up to mingle the pretensions and merits of two men, who though both eminent and excellent, are no more to be looked upon as rivals, than number 10 is to be looked upon as the rival of number 10,000. Mr. HAZLITT noticed, in a strain of just contempt, the special nonsense of a living Editor (Mr. GIFFORD), who in his anxiety to claim a more courteous character for BEN JONSON than the honest old poet would have asked for himself, sets about shewing his taste for benevolence by venting his peevishness and petty egotism upon every writer on the subject whom he meets,—with "impatient beggings of the question, and pert ejaculations of surprise."—The assembly was very crowded.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

STATE OF THE QUEEN.

The following Bulletin was issued yesterday morning:—

"Kew Palace, Nov. 14.

"The QUEEN continues in much the same state. Her MAJESTY rested ill in the early part of the night; but has had some good sleep this morning."

Her MAJESTY has felt considerable temporary relief by a small rupture of the skin in both ankles, from which there has been since a considerable effusion of water. It was not occasioned by any puncture, but the effort of nature—and, as we have stated, it had the effect of affording temporary relief; but it too frequently happens that such cracks in the skin of a dropsical patient produce symptoms of more speedy termination than the disease itself. We fear that her Majesty's malady is come to that stage when the most loyal, as well as filial tenderness, may pray for relief from her suffering. Her Majesty received, the week before last, a large packet of dispatches from the Duchess of Homburg, and we understand that but a few days ago she gave orders to her silversmith to manufacture a sumptuous set of plate for a dejeuner, together with several articles of silk, as presents for her favourite Daughter.—*M. DRURY-LANE.

CIREER's comedy of Love makes a Man was performed here with spirit and success on Friday evening. We never saw PENLEY to such advantage before in one of his foppish parts, which are apt to be too vague and general. His blank snuff-taking sang-froid when he was disarmed and thrown on the ground by his brother, and the scene where he plants himself in the way of the proud Spaniard, and picks a quarrel with him, were both in a real style of humour, in which every detail had its relish. Mr. PENLEY would much assist the effect of his acting, if he could alter a certain excessive Bond-street mode of utterance, in which his voice becomes too broad and open, and his words melt away in indistinctness. What does he do with such a modern coat and hat, when all the other male characters are dressed in the old southern costume? There were coxcombs in the world, before the invention of cocked hats. We are delighted to see MUNDEN again in his old men. His part in this play is not worth much; but he always raises what he has to do into such a rich crust of drollery and apprehensiveness, that every syllable tells. Mrs. MARDYN, in the character of the violent lady who falls in love with Carlos, made a very hands me and fierce sort of man-trap; and Mrs. WEST was equally striking, or rather impressive, in the pleasanter part of the hero's beloved mistress. We wish we could say any thing for the hero himself, Mr. H. KEMBLE, especially as he has the air of being an intelligent and unassuming man; but he looked more at home among the scene with his books, than any other.

Love Makes a Man is taken from FLETCHER's Comedy of the Elder Brother, the story of which is that of a young man passionately fond of books, who when about to give up all his possessions to a younger brother going to be married, is suddenly roused to a sense of their value and that of his species by the beauty of the betrothed lady, who strikes him with a mutual passion, and ultimately marries him. Upon this story, which CIBBER perhaps thought too learned, or romantic, or spun out, for the stage, he has grafted, (we suppose by way of contrast) the mere animal passion of another female,—for we can call it by no other name; and in attempting to divest the hero of his bookish pedantry, has turned him into a commonplace declaimer and moral pedant, who sees no other way of avoiding a lady's advances than by retrograde virgin grimaces, and expostulations with her on her wicked intentions. In other words, he has neutralized one of the best characters in the poet's works; and supplied the place of what is lost by imitating one of its worst general features. But still the piece is left entertaining.

MR. HAZLITT AND THE TIMES' CORRESPONDENT.

A Writer in the Times of Thursday, in a letter to the Editor, says,—

"I am in the habit of attending the lectures at the Surrey Institution, and on Tuesday last was present at one delivered by Mr. Hazlitt, on the comic genius of Shakspeare, Ben Johnson, &c.; in the course of which he made (as he not unfrequently does) an unfortunate and irrelevant political allusion; which was instantly followed by rounds of applause from some, and hissing from other parts of the audience; by which hubbub the course of the lecture was suspended for some minutes.—Now, whatever a lecturer's private political notions may be, he is wrong in venting them before a mixed auditory, assembled for amusement and instruction in science and literature: it certainly is inconsistent with the impartiality to be expected from a lecture on criticism. But more blameable are the hearers, who, instead of marking their sense of the impropriety of such extraneous remarks, by treating them with silence and neglect, burst into a more violent expression of approbation or dislike, than any observation connected with the subject on which they are assembled could produce. I am myself very little moved by party differences, and looked on this scene with calm composure, and was not a little shocked at seeing so well dressed and (to my own knowledge) generally respectable an audience emulating the uproar of a one-shilling gallery—behaviour totally at variance with the dignity and decorum due to the place and occasion, and highly offensive to every one who professes to be, with the writer, a friend to order."

The truth is, that the only passage in the Lecture of a political cast, and which excited "a hubbub," was one in which Mr. Hazlitt, in treating of Ben Jonson's dramatic writings, glanced at a querulous edition of his works by Mr. Gifford, "recommended by an apostrophe to Dr. Ireland's posthumous fame, and a dedication to Mr. Canning's public principles." Now, if the very mention of Mr. Canning's public principles is a piece of severe irony, which his friends cannot brook, this is not Mr. Hazlitt's fault. If an allusion to this Gentleman's public principles is an irrelevant mixing up of party politics with general literature, the impropriety is Mr. Gifford's, who in his Dedication of that work expressly sanctions and makes himself responsible for Mr. Canning's "public principles." Mr. Hazlitt did not go out of his way to attack Mr. Gifford; he merely stood (we think unnecessarily) on the defensive. The Correspondent of the Times can never have heard of the Quarterly Review, and its impartiality, which parallels even that of the Times. The Editor of that Review has published more than one article in it, for the avowed purpose of crushing Mr. Hazlitt as a writer, on the score of his political sentiments, by false facts and false representations, and concludes one of these tirades in particular with a declaration, that "he should not have undertaken it but to shew how small a portion of talent and attainment is necessary to carry on the trade of sedition!"—that is, to write the Characters of Shakspeare's Plays. After this, it must seem a little hard to preclude Mr. Hazlitt, on the ground of liberality and candour, from even a passing allusion to those connections and "public principles" of Mr. Gifford's, which constantly influence his critical opinions, and alone give authority to them.

WESTMINSTER REPRESENTATION.

LETTER FROM SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

Kirby-park, Nov. 9, 1818.

GENTLEMEN,—On my arrival here, I found a numerous signed requisition from the City of Westminster, requesting that I would take the chair at a meeting intended to be held for the purpose of considering what, under the distressing circumstances in which a recent misfortune has placed us, is most advisable to be done.

I lose no time in expressing my readiness to accede to the requisition, and in assuring the Electors of Westminster, that I consider it a pleasure, as well as a duty, to obey their call whenever they judge me capable of rendering them any service.

With respect to the cause, the sad cause, which has created the necessity of a fresh struggle for the independence of Westminster, it would not be proper for me to say more at present, than that I share, with every honest heart, in the common grief: an event so unlooked for and overwhelming brings home at once to our bosoms the poignant anguish of private affliction and deep sense of public calamity.—I remain, Gentlemen, your most obedient and very humble servant,

(Signed)

FRANCIS BURDETT.

We learn, that a Meeting is to be held at the Crown and Anchor on Tuesday morning, at which Sir F. BURDETT will preside, "to consider of a fit and proper person to be put in nomination to represent this City in Parliament."

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 15.—MR. WETHERELL.

None other council good him seemeth
But such as himself deemeth;
For in such wise as he compasseth,
His wit alone all other passeth, ***
And weeneth of him selven so,
That such as he is there be no mo.

Gower's Conf. Am. L. 1.

IN the course of my remarks upon those who practise at the English Bar, I have necessarily interwoven some few strictures upon what may be considered abuses or defects in the proceedings of our Courts of Justice: there is one however very obvious to all who have closely attended, but with which the public in general are little acquainted, and to which I have not yet adverted—I mean the vast expence of Government Prosecutions: no reference is here intended to ex-officio informations for State libels, nor to indictments for great crimes, but to proceedings in the King's Bench against insignificant offenders—such as those who commit assaults upon or obstruct revenue officers, or those who against the statute are discovered to have naval stores in their possession: the former are very numerous, and the latter by no means unfrequent. Some have argued that these petty delinquents ought to be tried and punished at the Sessions—that the same rule that applies to a case of private outrage (in which the Court often observes, that justice would have been satisfied without the needless and heavy expence of removal by Certiorari), ought to be extended to prosecutions of this kind. I do not enter into this question, which may admit of difference of opinion on the ground that at the Sessions petty Juries will not convict upon such charges; but what I complain of is, that when they are brought forward in the Court of King's Bench an immense expence is incurred, which is wholly needless, and might therefore be avoided. Whether more witnesses are summoned and paid for than are necessary, or whether in the working of the indictment (if I may borrow a phrase from bankruptcy) more money is expended by the Solicitors for the Excise, Customs, or the Admiralty, I do not know and I do not inquire: I protest here only against the employment, with very heavy fees, of a whole row of King's Counsel, when less than the talents and experience enjoyed by any one of them would be quite sufficient to ensure a conviction; especially when we recollect that such matters are always tried by a Special Jury, never much disposed to favour a poor smuggler, who defends the property he has actually paid for, or the wretched chandler, in whose cellar has been found a rope's-end with the white twine in the centre, or a copper bolt marked with the broad arrow. Every Barrister, of only a few years' standing, must have observed many instances of this kind. A remarkable proof of the correctness of what I state occurred only one or two sittings ago, when an unhappy Jew-broker, I think he was, residing somewhere in Wapping, was indicted for having in his possession some pieces of metal, without the needful document to prove their purchase at the King's sale: he made no defence, I believe employed no Advocate, and the fact was proved against him by one or at most two credible witnesses, yet not less than five Counsel were retained by the Crown against him, four of them with silk-gowns, and of course receiving nearly double fees. I need not enumerate their names, more particularly as they themselves (as if they felt some sense of the impropriety of receiving so much money for doing absolutely nothing; not even for reading their briefs), seemed anxious to keep in the back ground and not to appear to have any thing to do with the proceeding. As I said before, without entering into any examination of the extraordinary proceedings, (which I really am not competent to do) if they are conducted upon the same system, and by the same scale, the charge upon the public is enormous, and beyond what it ought to bear. I may here notice what I consider another abuse, though perhaps of less magnitude: if my information be correct, and I have no reason to doubt it, the Attorney and Solicitor-General each receives a large fee upon every prosecution brought to trial in the Exchequer, even though they have had nothing to do with it in its progress, and leave the whole management entirely to Mr. DALRYMPLE or Mr. CLARKE. The motive for this unwarrantable expenditure of public money is the same in both cases—to keep up the influence of the Crown and its Ministers—to lead King's Counsel always to be expecting something, and to induce them to avoid all opportunities of giving umbrage to those in power.

I have had the less reluctance in making these remarks in a free spirit, because on this occasion they cannot be supposed to have an invidious or personal application: the individual whose capacity and qualifications are before us in the present article, confines his practice almost solely to Cases of Equity, and can therefore have no concern or connection with trials such as those to which I have alluded.

The name of Mr. WETHERELL was pretty generally known even before he obtained a silk-gown, for his practice was considerable not only in the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer, but before Committees of both Houses of Parliament: his advancement in his profession, and his obtaining a seat in the House of Commons, contributed still further to bring him into public notice, and his volunteered defence of Watson and others, when tried for high treason, drew all eyes upon him: some wondering how it happened that he of all men at the Bar should step forward on such an occasion, and others doubting how he would fulfil the task he had thus unexpectedly undertaken. Into his private motives I shall not enter; whether they originated in political pique at not being made Solicitor-General in preference to Sir R. GIFFORD, or in a love of notoriety and popularity, I shall not investigate: I have only to do here with the proportion of talent, knowledge, and zeal, he displayed upon that occasion, and with his general abilities and merits as an Advocate.

Whether he did or did not feel rancorously against Ministers, certain it is, that he acted strenuously for those who were accused by them: he exerted himself to the utmost, and what is much more important (for more than half the world measure the means by the end) his exertions were successful—he obtained a verdict of acquittal, and he made a speech of more than eight hours duration. Even the last circumstance, with a great number of people, would have obtained him the title of an orator, and I must remark, that during the greater part of the time, to such persons he seemed to address himself. Not a few of those who did not hear him, (and how few could, on account of the smallness of the Court) will think this observation severe—perhaps unjust: they read his speech in the newspapers, and from that source they judged of its merits; they thought it, no doubt, as good as the case admitted—in some parts acute, in others learned, and as a whole forcible if not convincing. They are not aware of the infinite repetitions with which it abounded, of the tedious length to which some of the weakest points were spun out, and of the flimsy vapidness of most of those portions where Mr. WETHERELL attempted to be eloquent and to rouse the feelings of the Jury. The beginning of his harangue consisted chiefly of stale quotations from trite books, and mistaken positions of law, with all the pretence of learning; and the end, of pompous declamation,—at least as pompous as the speaker's paterity, or more properly, little variety of words and phraseology, could make it:—

All in fustian suit
Is cloth'd a huge nothing—all for the repute
Of profound knowledge.

J. Marston's Sc. of Villany, L. 3.

I think I might securely appeal to every judicious and impartial auditor, whether the speech did not deserve this character: I say impartial auditor, because I believe that among a few of the seniors of the King's Bench Bar, a little envy prevailed, and prevented them from forming quite a fair estimate.* Mr. WETHERELL had travelled out of his Court, and he certainly shewed that he was not very familiar with the subject of which he was treating; he wanted much of the skill and readiness which a Nisi Prius Advocate ought to possess. Had he not received most able assistance from Mr. Sergeant Copley, upon

* It is obvious that a speech of eight hours could not be given in a newspaper, and the consequence was, that Mr. WETHERELL's address to the Jury underwent a great deal of wholesome pruning: all the sappy exuberant branches were lopped off, and the dead wood cut out; so that with a small addition of force and vigour in the vapid parts, and many omissions of re-statements, it made a much more respectable figure in print than in Court. But in these observations let not the difficulty and novelty of the undertaking be forgotten.

technical matters and points of evidence, he would probably have appeared to the nation at large much more incompetent than he was actually considered. His other co-adjutors (if indeed the term can be properly applied to them) Messrs. E. LAWES, HOLT, RIGBY, and STARRIE, did little else but take most laborious notes from the beginning to the end of the trial, and for this duty I do not deny that they were all exceedingly competent. But dismissing Mr. WETHERELL's address from discussion, which it is not improbable many readers have long ago dismissed from their memories, it may be fit that I should say a word or two respecting the celebrated cross-examination of the infamous Castles: here it was thought, by all but those who were most competent to judge, that the Advocate acquitted himself with the greatest ability; it went out to the world, that by dint of worming insinuation and dexterous artifice, the Counsel had extracted from the witness facts most damning to his character and credibility. I do not pretend to say that some ingenuity was not displayed now and then in the mode in which a question was worded; not to put the truth point blank, and thus to tempt a point blank denial, but to offer it in such a moderated form, as led the person in the box to suppose that no great injury could arise from admitting the fact to that extent: in this respect some skill was shewn, but Mr. WETHERELL did not succeed in a single point upon which he had not already obtained the full particulars from his brief. He rather failed in proving all he expected, than prevailed in establishing more than he was instructed: that only is a cross-examination meriting the highest praise due to such an effort, where the Advocate from some glimmering hint, perhaps let fall by the witness himself, proceeds step by step to the developement of a whole system of falsehood and iniquity.

It remains for me to speak of Mr. WETHERELL as a Counsel in Courts of Equity, which, as I have said, is the sphere to which he confines his practice: I do not think that before the trial of Watson and others he had quitted it for many years. Here he indulges his passion for talking quite as freely as upon the occasion above referred to; I mean, of course, taking into consideration the comparative importance of the cases: he always seems to me to say about twice as much, or to speak more precisely, to utter nearly twice as many words, as are necessary upon any question. He runs on with vast volubility from fact to fact, and from point to point, and with so little arrangement, that his repetitions are innumerable and wearisome: while he is adverting to one topic, another strikes him, and he instantly flies off at a tangent to it; and when he has concluded that subject, he often finds that he is obliged to return by the very same ground that he has just before galloped over. This makes his speaking often tedious; but I admit that he has acuteness: the defect I have noticed arises out of it; he seizes a point with rapidity and enforces it, when he feels it strongly, with corresponding clearness, barring a want of compression and succinctness, which of course must detract from the force of his reasoning. It seems as if he wished to advert to all parts of a subject at once, from a feeling that each fact has some bearing upon another, which it is fit at the instant to explain and illustrate: he wanders from one end of his brief to another without rule, order, or measure, but he never himself appears confused or confounded, although he may succeed in confusing and confounding his hearers, who are not able to follow him with equal velocity, as they are not like him intimately acquainted with the particulars in his instructions. In this respect there can scarcely be a stronger contrast than, between Sir ROBERT GIFFORD and the subject of the present article; the one is brevity, point, and proportion—the other dilation, looseness, and irregularity; the one keeps a distinct line between facts and arguments—the other jumbles both in one mass without reference to time or place: in short, the one has a clear logical head, while the other is almost destitute of the reasoning faculty, considered as a system and a science. It has been said, that the difference between logic and wit is this, that the first makes and the last confounds distinctions: if confounding distinctions would prove Mr. WETHERELL to be a wit, he undoubtedly may lay claim to that character.

He is indisputably an able lawyer as far as knowledge is concerned, but the deficiency of which I have spoken must of course have its influence here: he may be a great reader of decided cases, and may have a memory like a commonplace-book of marginal notes, but without the power to make and perceive nice distinctions between one and another, they cannot be of the same utility: yet it is but fair to allow, that I know men who differ from me in this respect, or at least hold, that Mr. WETHERELL possesses a considerable portion of subtlety. I think however that they make some confusion between two things quite distinct, subtlety and ingenuity; it is very easy for a man to be extremely ingenious without any pretension to subtlety or refinement. The knowledge possessed by Mr. WETHERELL is also generally very applicable: he can always lay his hands upon the tools with which he intends to work, and this is a qualification seldom attained without great practice; it often happens, as in instances I could point out in this Court if necessary, that no labour, however unremitting, will communicate it to some men of considerable learning but of dull comprehension. Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciet alter, are the words of the proverb, and Mr. WETHERELL takes good care that his candle shall not be hidden under a bushel: he is certainly fond of display, and avails himself of every opportunity of making his attainments upon many subjects independent of the law, pass for quite as much or more than they are worth. It is obvious that he has a very good opinion of himself, and is anxious that others should participate in it.

He came into Parliament for some Borough at the time when the Vice-Chancellor's Bill was under discussion: he made three or four long speeches upon that question, and affords one more instance of the total unfitness of most Lawyers for the situation he occupied.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S SUCCESSOR.

"When once they have departed from the great constitutional line, by which all their proceedings should be directed, who will answer for their future moderation?"—Jurist's Letter to the King.

MR. EXAMINER.—The die is cast, and Mr. Justice Abbott is the successor to Lord Ellenborough. The one, with all his hauteur and coarseness, was profoundly learned, possessed dignity, and commanded respect: and we shall soon be enabled to determine how far that is the case with the other. My fears, however, outrun my hopes.—Juries will not be much inclined to pay deference to the opinion of a Judge, who, it may be fairly presumed, has obtained his seat by a submissive and tame compliance with the dicta of his patrons; but one advantage will result from this selection, viz. that the Bar will be under less controul, and consequently more independent. The boasted purity of the Judges may now, at least, be questioned. Servility will in future carry with it a passport to the post of honour, and the obsequious advocate of the privileged orders may flatter himself with the prospect of obtaining the highest legal distinction.

The Judges are very properly appointed for life, and therefore ought to be above the controul of political influence: On their acceptance of office, every temptation should be withheld from them, that might lead them to indulge the hope of being invested with a higher station, or a more dignified appointment.—Such is the spirit of our Constitution. But if a deviation from this salutary principle must be introduced, let it be done in the least exceptionable manner, and let the next in succession fill the vacant seat; particularly, as in the present instance, when it would have been assigned to Mr. Justice Bayley, who is greatly Mr. Justice Abbott's superior in learning, dignity, temper, and good feeling. However well qualified for it, I would not have removed even Mr. Justice Bayley, while such a man might have been appointed to the Chief Justiceship as Mr. Sergeant Lens, who is generally esteemed the brightest ornament of the English Bar*. He would command the respect of the Court beyond all other men; and independent of his legal knowledge, which is inferior to that of none on the Bench, he would be found to unite in his person that essential attribute of a Judge, the "suaviter in modo," with the "fortiter in re."

Chief Justice Glanvil, in the reign of our 2d Henry, observed, there was such a thing as "high treason against the kingdom as well as against the King." Here it appears to me we have the fact exemplified. I would not believe, until doubt was forced to yield to certainty, that our present Ministry would have given their sanction to so extraordinary a deviation from established usage; and I could almost forgive them any thing, rather than their polluting the fountain of Justice, which, with the view of the subject that I have taken, appears to me to be beyond dispute. We have no remedy, however, for what is past. Let us look with proper vigilance to the future; and it is to be hoped, that some spirited Member of the House of Commons will mark the proceeding with that merited indignation, as to preclude the possibility of its being quoted hereafter as a precedent, and prevent the recurrence of a similar outrage on the next vacancy that may happen. The Judges are the property of the public: and as Horne Tooke has remarked, "they are paid by us for their attendance, and we pay them well." In the same speech (on the proceedings in an action between Mr. Fox and himself, relative to the taxed costs of a petition presented by the latter to the House of Commons) which is full of admirable matter, and which shows the extraordinary talent, commanding eloquence, great self-possession, and fearless spirit of the man, he afterwards adds, "Character and reputation were of more consequence to the Judges formerly, than they are to the Judges now. They are now completely and for ever independent of the People, and

* Had it not been for the late melancholy event, I should here have said, with the exception of that great and good man, Sir Samuel Romilly. To speak of his talents as a lawyer would be useless, as they have been universally acknowledged by the profession to be super-eminent. To descant on his merits as a politician, would be only to echo the sentiments of the wise and enlightened of all parties.—To describe his qualifications as a legislator and philosopher, would be merely to point to all his strenuous exertions for the amelioration of his species, by preventing rather than punishing crimes, and by reforming the criminal code;—and to portray his virtues as a man, would be to direct our thoughts to the contemplation of his unspotted life, and of that acute sensibility which accelerated his fatal, final hour. Whether we regard him therefore as a lawyer, a politician, a philosopher, or a man, perhaps,

"Take him for all in all,

We shall not look upon his like again."

Dear departed shade! A stranger may without flattery pay this faint tribute of respect to thy memory. May thy correct example induce others to emulate thy virtues; and despising the vain and flimsy distinctions which too often attract the eye of the superficial observer, let them remember that virtue alone can lead the way to real honour.

"Only the actions of the just

have every thing to hope, for themselves and families, from the Crown."

Mr. Justice Dallas has succeeded Sir Vicary Gibbs in the Chief Justiceship of the Court of Common Pleas. To this appointment there would be no objection but on the principle previously alluded to. Mr. Justice Dallas is humane, dignified, and eloquent, and will, I have no doubt, do honour to that seat which he has been selected to occupy.

FINE ARTS.

MR. DEVIS'S APOTHEOSIS OF THE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE.

This picture is in the possession, and was completed under the inspection, of Prince Leopold. It portrays an acknowledged strong likeness of the Princess, united with a look of langour interesting and extreme, such as the moment of time described required, that which immediately following her expiration, just when the "Youthful sufferer was at peace in death."

This langour, the cause in fact of her decease, pervades the figure, and is blended with a most graceful disposition of the limbs. Supported in the arms of Resignation, who is painted also with great grace, her eyes, in which resignation is exalted into a look that displays her as

"Divinely darting upward every wish,"

are turned to "the blaze of Immortality pointed out to her by that consoling virtue." The composure and confidence of the most religious mind could scarcely conceive a more suitable representation. It is that of a being in the consecrated hour of change from a chequered to a happy state, suddenly and delightfully conscious of the blissful variation of existence,—a being, to use words we have elsewhere employed, where Innocence and pious Hope have tranquillized the features and composed the limbs to a graceful and sacred serenity of attitude; where the world is forgotten; where the rapt thought has already penetrated the expanse of Creation into the beatific regions, and is about to hold audience with the Deity. Though the Painter has given the fullness of form that belonged to his original, he has most skilfully managed to give it also a light and aerial appearance. This beauty arises from the floating grace of the figure and dress, and the light texture of the latter. They seem to belong to a different order of things, and to move in a new and more refined atmosphere. The breath of Heaven seems to blow upon them, and the groups of little Angels that are hailing their new associate, and assisting to escort her to Paradise. These are strewing flowers, the emblems of the virtues, &c. and "holding various significant symbols: The Serpent of Immortality, the Phalaena Butterfly, the Elysian Daffodil, the Forget-me-not, the never fading Amaranth, and the pale Lily." Below appears Claremont by moonlight, as descriptive of the time and place of the catastrophe. The elegant pathos of the whole is finished by the Princess, who wears a Constellated Crown, pressing her infant to her bosom. The classical mind acknowledges the correctness and beauty of the entire composition, and the heart, the very best decider on such a subject, seconds that decision by the experience of a soft and melancholy enchantment.

INTRODUCTION OF THE ELGIN MARBLES INTO RUSSIA, &c.

The most undeniable testimony that a man of genius can receive is the testimony of eminent foreigners. Friends, whatever truth they may speak, are always accused of being partial; and enemies, of being prejudiced. But when approbation comes from those who are uninfluenced by connection, interest, or affection, it sanctions previous predictions, that sneerers have always attributed to regard rather than to conviction; and gives to those who have adhered to a man, when his merits were acknowledged and his genius denied, the conscious consolation of having been right.

One of the proudest days of Mr. HAYDON's life was the day on which the freedom of his native town was voted to him, in consequence of the Judgment of Solomon, then exhibited there—of that town, which he had left but a few years before an obscure and unknown boy. The next was the visit of CANOVA, who seemed as if he only came to sanction all that he had predicted about the Elgin Marbles for eight years preceding; and the last, the present of Casts from the President of the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg, the capital of a great empire. This present of Casts, which has now arrived, was the first promised mark of respect from his Excellency; and on receiving intelligence of which, Mr. HAYDON immediately shipped the President, in return for the intended present, some of the finest casts from the Elgin Marbles, and some from the negro Wilson, in order to illustrate the principles on which the Elgin Marbles were executed. They arrived at St. Petersburg before the others had left it, and the beauty of the Theseus and the Ilyssus exceeded instead of disappointed the expectations of the Russian Artists. Mr. OLENIN expressed his sensations with the most unbounded enthusiasm, in a letter to a friend in London, written in Russ., of which we are permitted to give an extract:—"Your letter," says he, "brought me the most agreeable news, that the Imperial Academy of Arts will soon be in possession of those inimitable Elgin Marbles. What a treasure for Artists! I have already had the happiness of being convinced of their perfection by Mr. HAYDON's favour, and without any merit of mine, he has had the goodness to make me a most delightful present," &c. &c. "I beg you very earnestly to tell Mr. HAYDON, if it can be expressed in English, that * may God Almighty himself be pleased to console him, as much as Mr. HAYDON has consoled me. Tell him at the same time, that if he knows how to be in raptures with their excellence, we also in our cold climate possess hearts sufficiently ardent to feel all that can elevate the mind and the soul. For this reason the Professors of the Imperial Academy frequently crowd to pay their adoration to the precious remains of the ancients sent us by Mr. HAYDON! This adoration is in a measure extorted from one, in a manner, by the superiority of these productions, in comparison with all those we have hitherto admired," &c. &c.

In a subsequent letter to Mr. HAYDON, which accompanied the Casts sent to him, he says, "I hope you will ornament your painting-room, as I have ornamented the Imperial Academy, with your delightful and generous present of Casts from the Elgin Marbles, which were in your possession, together with some Casts from nature, from, I understand, the famous Negro, which I have placed close to those of the Elgin Marbles, that the young students of the Academy may convince themselves there is nothing beautiful but what is in nature, and that our poor imagination only plays the child, when it invents without reference to it; for all our inventions will be below that nature, which is the great object of our life, first to choose well and then to imitate faithfully," &c. &c.

M. OLENIN seems to be a man of a true feeling for his art, and does not mind doing honour to another Artist, if he can by that honour advance or improve the taste of his countrymen. His placing the Casts from nature by the side of those from the Elgin Marbles, is one of the most admirable plans that could be adopted, and will do the utmost to purify Russian taste.

* A Russian proverb.

But it is time to speak of the Casts that have been sent from St. Petersburg to England. They consist of a Silenus and a Venus, from the Palace de la Tauride, and a grand bust of Achilles, from the great Palace of the Hermitage, belonging to the Emperor, and moulded by his leave, under M. OLENIN's inspection, entirely for this purpose. The head and body of the Silenus are among the most exquisite specimens of Greek workmanship: he leans on a pedestal, covered by a lion's skin, holding in his right hand a cup of wine; his legs crossed, and his whole action and expression denoting a voluptuous hilarity. He is not intoxicated so far as to lose his reason, but arrived at that interesting moment, when a man feels unspeakably benevolent to the rest of his fellow-creatures. His mouth is open, his nostrils expanded, one brow higher than the other, as is always the case when command of his features is lost. His eyes are half under his lids; his bald head is crowned with a vine. Though it is all in white plaster, one cannot help imagining his cheeks to be rosy, and that in a rich voice of wine and good humour he is chanting an ode to the satyrs of the woods. He looks so full of wine and good living, that if you pricked him in any part of the body, wine would spout out instead of blood.

The other statue, a Venus, is very interesting. The trunk is excessively beautiful: it is a singular repetition of the Venus de Medicis, without those marks of maternity which are so visible in her form. It is evidently Venus when young. The feet and head are not equal to the rest of the body.

The bust of Achilles is exceedingly handsome, in a grand and severe style, but the Silenus is certainly beyond all praise. These Casts, the moment they were landed at the custom-house, were passed free of all duty, by an order from the Lords of the Treasury. Just before they left Petersburg, the first shipment of the great body of plaisters, cast by Mr. WESTMACOTT (the commission having been put into his hands by Mr. HAYDON, on the part of the Imperial Academy), arrived without any accident whatever.

We congratulate Mr. HAYDON most sincerely on this high mark of foreign respect. In short, since the exhibition of his Judgment of Solomon, continued testimonies to his talents have been paid him from all quarters. The success of that picture was indeed a triumph, whatever may happen to him hereafter. It cannot be denied, that in the early part of his life, an attempt was made to put him down; he appealed by his works to public opinion, and he triumphed! May success attend his future labours.

LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Wednesday, Nov. 11.

THE MARQUIS OF BLANDFORD (SON) v. HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH (HIS FATHER.)

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said he was instructed to move the Court to grant an injunction for restraining his Grace the Duke of Marlborough from proceeding to cut down the growing timber in Blenheim Park, or in any manner removing the ornamental and other timber in that district. The question was one of particular importance, as it involved the rights of a tenant in tail; and, under the present circumstances, he had no doubt the Court would grant the injunction. The property in question was, by two Acts of Parliament in the 3d and 4th of Queen Anne, given to the then Duke of Marlborough, in consideration of the very great services which that illustrious warrior had rendered to the country. By the 5th of Queen Anne, the property in question was more secured to the Duke for the benefit of himself and successors, and it was rendered incapable of being ever disposed of or put away. The Court would see this by the section of the Act which he was now going to read.

The LORD CHANCELLOR conceived that it would be better to defer reading any thing till the whole was fully argued on both sides. The question involved in this case was one of considerable importance, in every point of view; particularly as it would lead to a full discussion on the difference between a tenant entail and a tenant for life. He remembered Lord Shrewsbury's case, which had a striking analogy to the present one, and he thought it his duty now to grant the injunction on these terms, that the party who obtained it would give immediate notice to the other side, that it had been granted, in order that they might come forward and have the case fully argued without delay. He wished it to be perfectly understood, that this injunction was issued generally, and included all the timber, both ornamental and growing, but he gave it without prejudice to any future application.

Injunction granted.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Tuesday, Nov. 10.

LEWIS v. THE EDITOR OF THE OBSERVER.

Mr. MARRYAT moved for a rule to show cause why judgment should not be entered up in this case, non obstante veredicto, a verdict having been found for the defendant on some of the counts of the declaration. The action was brought by the plaintiff, an attorney, against the defendant, for an alleged malicious statement of what passed in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, commencing with the words, "Shameful Conduct of an Attorney." The Court granted a rule to show cause.

THE KING AGAINST BOWDITCH AND OTHERS.

The defendants in this cause were tried at the last Dorchester assizes, for a conspiracy to abduct Miss Maria Glenn, a young lady, 16 years old, from the care of her mother, and a Mr. Tuckett, who had married her aunt.

The defendants, by Mr. SCARLETT, their Counsel, now moved for a new trial. The whole number of the defendants were obliged to appear personally in Court for this purpose, as is always the case in moving for a new trial on indictments for a conspiracy. They were, James and William Bowditch, Messrs. Paul and Snell, Mrs. Bowditch, mother of James and William, Susan and Jane, her daughters; Mrs. Paul, Mrs. Snell, and Mrs. Mulrairie. James Bowditch, the young man to whom Miss Glenn was to have been married, appeared about the age of 22, rather slender, of the middle height, and of a countenance not unpleasing. He was dressed in a black coat, yellow kersey-waistcoat, with metal buttons, a red under waistcoat, and a spotted neckcloth, smart leather breeches, and jockey boots. In other words, his appearance (which we describe minutely, as perhaps of some consequence in a case of this sort) was that of the class called gentlemen farmers.

Chief Justice ABBOTT ordered a seat to be found for the ladies, in respect to their sex.

Mr. SCARLETT then proceeded to state the facts that came out upon the trial, and the evidence of Miss Glenn and Mr. Tuckett; for, which, see the trial as reported in this paper at the time. The grounds on which he moved for a new trial were, first, that the verdict was against evidence; secondly, that he had affidavits to contradict the evidence, the greater part of which was a surprise on the defendants. The Learned Counsel commented upon the manner in which Miss Glenn gave her evidence; on her composure, clearness, precision, and apparent modesty; all of which had had a very remarkable effect upon the Court. The main pillar of the prosecution was the evidence of this young lady; and one part of the defence set up was, that she had represented herself to be of age, had every appearance of being so, and that the defendants fully believed her statement. In answer to her testimony, they produced three letters (one of which was admitted to be in her hand-writing), and seventeen witnesses; if the verdict given was right, not only was this one of the foulest conspiracies ever brought before the public, but seventeen witnesses must all of them have been guilty of perjury. Fifty persons had now come forward to swear to facts, the existence of which contradicted Miss Glenn's statement in the most material points: the remainder of the defence went to show, that the elopement was assented to by the young lady, and the match proposed one of her own seeking. Miss Glenn had denied the existence of any familiarities between her and James Bowditch. A witness who was called to state that he had seen them together upon a footing of intimacy, having proved the fact, was called on to say whether Miss Glenn, then in the witnesses' box, was the person he saw with James Bowditch. He replied, no. This came like a burst on all present, and had such an effect on the Learned Judge, as indeed it well might, that he summed up strongly against the defendants. It was late, however, in the evening when this witness was called, the Court was almost dark, and the witness was evidently in a state of intoxication. There were now three witnesses who had made affidavits of having seen Miss Glenn with J. Bowditch on the occasion in question. The defendants then proceeded to show that Miss Glenn was on such terms of intimacy with the family as to have attended a christening, and stood godmother to one of Mrs. Mulrairie's children. The clerk who was called to prove her attendance at the christening, on looking Miss Glenn in the face, said, he thought she was not the person. This second denial seemed almost conclusive to all present. But he had fourteen witnesses who had made affidavits of facts, the existence of which was utterly incompatible with Miss Glenn's not having been present at the christening; and the clergyman who attended had prepared instructions for an affidavit, but had died before it was sworn. The Learned Counsel then read the letter which was admitted to be in Miss Glenn's hand-writing. It was a letter to a friend, in which, among other things, she stated she was much altered, and appeared much older than she was; inasmuch that her aunt herself had said, if she did not know her to be sixteen, she could not believe her niece to be less than twenty. Of the other two letters, though she had denied them both at the trial, one was addressed to James Bowditch; and Mr. Oxenham, the attorney, swore, that when she had called at his office with Mr. Tuckett, she had admitted the whole of this, except the direction, to be her own hand-writing; and it was remarkable that she herself stated at the trial, that the letter which she had been forced to write at Mr. Oxenham's, in the presence of Mrs. Bowditch and Mrs. Mulrairie, contained instructions to James Bowditch how he was to proceed. This letter then stated, that she was of age the August preceding, and directed James Bowditch to buy a license forthwith. The letter was dated the 14th of September, and the interview at Oxenham's took place on the 20th. If this letter was Miss Glenn's hand-writing, it showed that she was as much implicated in this alleged conspiracy as any of the defendants; and that James Bowditch had every reason to believe her 21 years old. The Learned Counsel then read the third letter which Miss Glenn had denied when at Mr. Oxenham's, with her uncle, as well as at the trial. This letter expressed a strong wish to see Mr. Bowditch; and he put it to the Court whether all the three were not in the same hand-writing? (The letters were here handed up for the inspection of the Judges). These letters had never been submitted to the inspection of the Jury. There were three principal points on which he had supplementary evidence. Out of the 50 new witnesses he was ready to produce, by far the greater part of the facts deposed to by them were such as the defendants could not have been prepared to produce on the former trial. As to the letters, he had the affidavit of Mr. Kingslade, an attorney at Taunton.

Chief Justice ABBOTT.—How could the defendants have been taken by surprise by Miss Glenn's denial of the letters, when she had denied one of them before Mr. Oxenham, their own attorney? Read your affidavit; though it is not clear that it can be admitted, unless you show that the parties were taken by surprise.

Mr. SCARLETT said, he was aware of the difficulty, but Miss Glenn had distinctly admitted one of the letters at Mr. Oxenham's, and this had put the defendants off their guard.

Chief Justice ABBOTT.—Was she examined as to what passed at Oxenham's?

Mr. SCARLETT.—She was; and denied her admission there. The ordinary way of proving hand-writing was by calling persons who had seen the party write, and were acquainted with the hand; but when the hand-writing is unexpectedly denied, there are cases to show that supplementary evidence may be resorted to. Witnesses were called who were acquainted with Miss Glenn's hand-writing; and Mr. Kingslade states in his affidavit, that Mr. Tuckett's solicitor had said, that in case Miss Glenn denied the hand-writing, Mr. Tuckett would examine competent persons, and if their opinion was against the lady, he would drop the prosecution. Could the defendant after this have supposed that the letter would have been denied, unless the lady was the basest of womankind?

Chief Justice ABBOTT.—You express yourself somewhat too strongly, Mr. Scarlett.

Mr. SCARLETT.—Perhaps I might, my Lord: but it was necessary for me to express myself strongly, in order to pave the way to affidavits of the most competent persons in the Post-office, Bank, and other public offices, who all state that the hand-writing of the letters is not a feigned hand, and that they have no doubt of their being the same hand. I am aware that such evidence could not have been given at the trial.

Chief Justice ABBOTT.—Then how can we receive it here?

Mr. SCARLETT.—My Lord, the Court often receives evidence that could not be admitted before a Jury. As, for instance, affidavits made by the defendant himself.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY.—That is to remove some wrong impression that the Court might otherwise form.

Mr. SCARLETT then contended, that when the rule of evidence, rejecting the opinions of competent persons concerning hand-writing, was laid down, it was thought that all men were equally competent to form a judgment on the subject: but now, since the establishment of public offices, which did not then exist, it is known that persons concerned in those offices are more skilled in judging of hand-writing than others; he hoped, however, that part of their affidavits might be received which stated that the hands were not counterfeit.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY.—Was Kingslade called?

Mr. SCARLETT.—No.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY.—You did not expect his presence would be necessary?

Mr. SCARLETT then stated, that Oxenham swore, that before the occasion mentioned at the trial, he had never set eyes on Miss Glenn. She swore that she had met him in the street; and there are affidavits to show that he never quitted his office till the night of the day on the morning of which she swore she met him. There was a good deal of theatrical effect in the description she gave of Oxenham's person, his having a sweaty face, &c.; and this was not without its effect on the Court and Jury. Here there was one material contradiction of the Lady's evidence. He should now mention another: she was present at the christening of Mrs. Mulrine's child, but all the others who were present were among the defendants except the parson and clerk. She denied having been there. Could the defendants have anticipated this? There were now 14 witnesses who swore to facts which could not have existed unless she had been present. If these were all perjured, the conspiracy was broad indeed. They swore that she desired to be godmother, and went into particulars of her dress; when she first went to Mrs. Bowditch's she wore a very plain dress; but she went to the christening in Mrs. Bowditch's gown, and with a spencer and parasol of Miss Susan Bowditch's. In this dress she met an acquaintance of her's, named Goldsworthy, and afterwards stated that she was so well dressed he did not know her. He had also the evidence of a music-master, who attended at Mrs. Bowditch's on the evening of the christening. He stated, that she played on the harp, and he accompanied her on the piano; that she said she had been present at the christening that morning; that it was usual to kiss the godmother on such occasions, and proposed that he should kiss her; that James Bowditch looking displeased at this, she said it was only nonsense, and went immediately to stand by him. It was true the clerk, who was present at the christening, was called, and said he could not swear she was there. But the clergyman, who unfortunately was now dead, had prepared instructions for an affidavit, which instructions could be produced, and his hand-writing proved. The learned Counsel, however, expressed his fears that these instructions could not, consistently with the rules of evidence, be introduced into the affidavit.

The COURT.—You may make affidavit of the clergyman's death.

Mr. SCARLETT.—It could be proved that this clergyman, Mr. Clapp, was too ill to attend at the trial. He should now proceed to that part of the case which respected Miss Glenn's familiarity with J. Bowditch, and he should divide this into two parts—the familiarities that took place while Miss Glenn resided with Mrs. Bowditch, and those that occurred during the elopement. He should show the familiarities that took place at the farm by 20 witnesses. If they were not all perjured, she must be so; but their evidence proved the defendant's case completely. She appeared publicly, walked out repeatedly, with James Bowditch, boasted of her intimacy with him, said that in her country young women were married very early, and was surprised that was not the case here. She wished if all things to be a farmer's wife, and longed to make the butter and attend to the poultry: as she had no certain expectations, she said that a farmer would by no means be a bad match for her. He (Mr. Scarlett) was sorry for the young lady, but justice must be done, and the origin of all the business had proceeded from her. He should now speak of the familiarities that took place during the elopement; he had 38 witnesses to speak of these: that she had several times left her uncle's house by assignment; that she had been seen often walking in the town with James Bowditch, and frequently at the house of William Bowditch. These were strong facts; but he had to explain the evidence of Sarah Northam, who said that on one occasion she saw Miss Glenn walking with James Bowditch, and on looking at her in Court stated that the lady there was not the same person: now he had to produce three persons who were present on the occasion in question, who swore that the person with James Bowditch was Miss Glenn, and that Sarah Northam had said so herself to them. This was the case of the defendants. It was of infinite importance to public justice, that a numerous and respectable family should be cleared of the stigma that unjustly rested on them. If the affidavits on which he rested were all false, he must have brought with him a volume of perjury, such as never before disgraced a Court. He had also an objection in point of law. The indictment was preferred in Dorsetshire; but the conspiracy, if any, took place in Somersetshire; all that occurred in Dorsetshire was the reception given the parties by Mr. Paul; and there should be, at least, some evidence to show that he knew of a criminal design. If a young lady, who had every appearance of being of full age, chose to elope, it was very hard that a friend who received the parties, knowing nothing of the circumstances, should also be implicated. An affidavit of William Bowditch stated, that he and all his family believed from Miss Glenn's repeated assertions, that she was 21 years old; and that when they arrived at Mr. Paul's, and she denied her being of age, he advised his brother to give the thing up, and prevented the marriage.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY.—She stated at the trial, that an elderly gentleman at Mr. Paul's had asked her age, and upon its being stated, said the marriage would not do.

Mr. SCARLETT said, he had several witnesses to contradict her statement of what passed at Mr. Paul's. At the late trial Mr. Templar had stated, that she ate her dinner as usual, and exhibited no signs of distress; and two more witnesses now stated, that she was sitting on James Bowditch's knee, playing at dominoes, with her arm round his neck. He trusted that the Court would grant a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted in this matter, and insisted that, in point of law, the venue of the indictment ought to have been in Somersetshire.

Chief Justice ABBOTT.—The Court don't think you likely to succeed as to the last part of your rule respecting the venue. But as this is a case of great importance, and it is impossible for the Court to proceed with too much caution in the administration of justice, they think it proper that the business should be sifted to the bottom, and grant a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be had in this case.

In order that both parties might be prepared, the argument was postponed till some day next term.

One of the female defendants wept during the whole time she was in Court; as did James Bowditch, when Mr. Scarlett read that part of the evidence at the trial which mentioned Miss Glenn's apparent regard for him.

OLD BAILEY.

On Tuesday morning, the whole of the trials having been gone through, sentence of death was passed upon the following 25 prisoners, four of whom have been convicted for uttering forged Bank-notes:—William Digby alias Cripps, John Evans, Gilbert Warren (forgery), William Holt, Patrick Leeson, Thomas Herbert, John Burgess, Ralph Hodgson, George Beck, John Press, James Holt, Barnard James, John Franks, Ann Bates, Peter Wilson, William Keefe, Edward Evans, William Abkens, William Parsons, John Leonard (forgery), Susannah Leonard (forgery), Susannah Farnillo (forgery), Stephen Morris, James Dennis, and Mary Hall.—A Jury of Matrons was sworn in to ascertain whether Mary Hall, upon whom sentence of death had been passed, was or was not with child. The Jury retired, and on their return, reported that she was with child. The judgment upon Mary Hall was thereupon respited.—Sentence of transportation for life was passed upon the following prisoners:—Marsh Brown, Henry Hawkins, William Clarke, Hugh Corrie, John Carter, John Ray, James Edwards, Thomas Little, William Bingley, John Baker, George Brooks, Edward Farren, and Mary Brown.—The following were sentenced to 14 years' transportation:—Joseph Davis, John Lamb, William Brown, Thomas Curry, John Lecore, and Catherine Bryan.—John Daley, tried for the murder of Learwood, the tailor, in the Fleet, and convicted of manslaughter, was sentenced to one year's imprisonment in Newgate.—More than 76 prisoners were sentenced to seven years' transportation. Several other prisoners were sentenced to lighter punishments. The Sessions then adjourned until the 2d of December next.

EXTRAORDINARY CASE OF CHILD-STEALING.

A very singular and afflicting event has occurred in the family of Mr. Horsley, a merchant, residing in Canonbury-lane, Islington, of which the following are the principal facts:—The nursery-servant, Eliz. Holbrook, a girl under 17, about two o'clock on Sunday afternoon, took two of Mr. Horsley's children out for an airing in a four-wheeled hand chaise: one of them, a boy, three years and a half old—the other, a girl, only one and a half. Not returning at the proper time, some anxiety was excited in the minds of Mr. and Mrs. Horsley, that increased to a height, which those who are parents can alone imagine, as the evening approached without bringing any tidings of their offspring. Messengers were of course dispatched in every direction, hand-bills were issued, and rewards offered; and the neighbours and friends of the unhappy parents were active in the extreme on this touching occasion. At length, about six o'clock, the little girl was found;—but found alone,—sitting in the hand chaise, under the wall of the Asylum, in the Lambeth-road, from which she had been taken into the Hercules Arms public-house, and kindly protected by the landlady.

The inquiries for the other child and the absent servant were of course still continued with unabated earnestness. Applications were made at the Police-Offices, and officers were dispatched, &c. Information at last reached Bow-street that the nursery-maid was in custody. She had gone, it seems, on Sunday evening, to the Saracen's Head inn, Snow-hill, and claimed an outside place to Birmingham. No place had been taken for her; but she was told that one was taken by a Mr. Atkins, who had not arrived. She said that her name was Atkins; and as he did not appear, and the coach was ready to start, she mounted the outside, and was carried to Birmingham. On her arrival at the inn there, it was soon observed that she knew nobody; and being interrogated, she avowed that she came thither to be married, and that her intended was to follow for that purpose. Tuesday evening having arrived, and no lover appearing, she admitted that she had been deceived, and consented to return to town. Some money was collected for her, and she was put under the care of the Guard of the Coach. On their journey back, he learnt from her that she was the nursery-girl that had absconded with Mr. Horsley's children: he accordingly delivered her into the hands of the Parish-Officers of Islington, and she was on Wednesday and Friday examined at the Office in Bow-street.

The account she gave of herself was as follows:—About two months since, while out with the children, she formed an intimate acquaintanceship with a young man, who said his name was George Faulkner, whom she considered, from his dress, &c. a gentleman. He told her that his friends resided at Birmingham, and after repeated meetings, he prevailed on her to promise she would meet him last Sunday in Smithfield to go off to Birmingham, whither he would follow her by the next coach. He enjoined her strictly to secrecy, and made her engage to bring the children with her, particularly the boy, of whom she had frequently spoken as a fine child, who was to have a great fortune. She complied; after reaching Smithfield, and waiting there for an hour and a half, Mr. Faulkner appeared. He gave her a 2*l*. note, and showed her the inn the coach went from. He then took possession of the chaise and the two children, promising to take them safely home to their parents, to whom he would explain every thing concerning the intended marriage, &c.—She then gave the same details of her journey as related by the Guard, and though closely questioned, persisted in averring that she knew nothing more than she had related. She seemed utterly devoid of feeling, and spoke quite unconcernedly of the painful incidents, in which she had taken so indiscreet if not criminal a part, though her father was present, and appeared much affected at her conduct. As her Master declined to make a direct charge against her, she was entrusted to her father's care instead of being sent to prison.—This was all of moment that came out of her examination on Wednesday, but on Friday some light was apparently thrown upon this wicked business.—The girl had stated, that in one interview with Mr. Faulkner, he had left her for a few minutes to procure an umbrella, which she believed he had obtained from a house in Severn's-row, Islington. Mr. BIRNIE, upon this, directed her to be taken to the place, where, after going into various houses, one was entered, in which she recognized the very umbrella that Mr. Faulkner had procured on the day alluded to. It was a remarkable one, being French and of red silk. This naturally led to further inquiries. The umbrella, it was ascertained, belonged to a female lodger named Rennett, who was taken to Bow-street and ex-mined. She said, that her husband, Charles Rennett, went frequently to France (it is imagined for smuggling purposes;) that they lived very uncomfortably together, but that they parted friends on Sunday last, before two o'clock, when he took with him two portmanteaus and some money, saying he was going to France, and should be absent two months. Mrs. Rennett denied all knowledge of any plot to carry off the child.

Mr. Horsley was now sent for to the Office. On his arrival, he appeared shocked that his wife's relation (cousin, it is said) should be at all implicated in such a foul transaction. He observed, however, that he believed her husband capable of any act of the kind, as he had frequently thrown out the most dreadful threats against him and his family, in consequence of a lawsuit respecting the heirship to an estate, which had been recently decided in favour of Mr. Horsley, or rather in that of the missing boy. Mr. Horsley mentioned one act of which Rennett was suspected, that of sending an anonymous letter to Mrs. Horsley, telling her that her husband had met with an accident, and was not expected to survive. On her reaching the supposed scene of distress in great anguish of mind, she found the story a false one; and as she was then pregnant, it was imagined the trick had been planned for the diabolical purpose of causing a miscarriage, lest the child should prove a boy.

In consequence of this information, and as Elizabeth Holbrook says the description given of Charles Rennett satisfies her that he is the person who deluded her under the name of Faulkner, warrants have been issued against him as the child-stealer, and officers have been dispatched to the ports, accompanied by Mr. Horsley and some of his friends, who can identify the parties. There is every reason, therefore, to believe that the offender will soon be brought to answer for his having thus barbarously invaded the domestic peace of a whole family. "He has no children," exclaimed Macduff in the agony of a bereaved father.

Precisely to this new light having been thrown on the affair, some rather curious information was given. A Mr. Carter, who is employed at Astley's Theatre, stated that he saw a man take the boy out of the chaise at the Asylum wall, and walk off with it. He thought it so singular a circumstance; that he followed the man into a gin-shop in the Borough, where he had a full view of him and the child, which answered, he said, the description given of it. On their leaving the liquor-shop, he lost sight of them when going towards London-bridge. A friend of Mr. Horsley, who had been kindly exerting himself to find the lost child, stated, that he had met with some sailors at Wapping, who told him, that on Sunday evening, they had seen a man with a child, at a public-house in a lane near Billingsgate, where passengers waited for the sailing of the Gravesend boats. This man, as well as the child, answered the description given by Mr. Carter, except as to his dress. The sailor added, that he went to sleep while waiting for the boat, keeping the child close to him, and that he went off to Gravesend at 10 at night.

Before Elizabeth Holbrook was taken to Bow-street, she was carried to the Hercules Arms public-house, to be confronted with persons assembled there. Among them was an elegantly-dressed female, who took great interest in the affair, and attempted to get Holbrook away from the officer. The girl herself declared she knew nothing of this "mysterious" Lady, who, however, followed the whole party to the Bow-street Office, at the back of which she stood during the first examination, but without attempting to interfere,—actuated, perhaps, merely by curiosity.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Wednesday week, an Inquisition was taken, at Broxbourne, on the body of John Cooper, who was found murdered on the preceding evening, at Spittlebrook-hill. Cooper had been in the habit of bringing packages of fruit to London in a chaise-cart, and returning the same evening, generally, with a considerable sum of money. On Tuesday se'nnight, about nine o'clock, upon his return from one of these journeys, he called at the White Horse public-house, at Wormley. Several labouring men were there, but it was not observed that they took any particular notice of Cooper. He continued in the house only a few minutes, and then resumed his journey towards home. The bloody deed was perpetrated within a few minutes after his departure from the White Horse. About half past nine o'clock he was discovered lying dead in the middle of the road, at Spittlebrook-hill, near Broxbourne, within the distance of a mile from the White Horse. He was conveyed to the Bull-inn at Broxbourne, and a surgeon was immediately sent for, who discovered that a dreadful wound had been inflicted on the forehead; the skull was fractured, and the instrument which had been used for the purpose (apparently a hammer) had penetrated the brain. His pockets were completely rifled; nothing but a few papers were found upon his person. The horse and cart were discovered at the distance of about 100 yards from the body; the front of the cart was sprinkled with blood. The Jury returned a verdict of—Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown.

On Tuesday last an Inquisition was taken at Leeds, on view of the body of Ann White, a young woman about 19 years of age, who it appeared hanged herself the preceding evening, in a large yew tree, in Leeds church-yard. The deceased was in the service of Mr. Harrison of that place, and had conducted herself with uniform propriety until the morning of that day, when it appeared that some suspicions had entered her mind as to the fidelity of a young man who had paid his addresses to her, and which it was evident occasioned some disorder in her intellects. In the folds of the cord with which she had suspended herself, was found a note directed to her lover, gently chiding the waywardness of his attachment.—Verdict—Insanity.—Maidstone Gazette.

On Tuesday an Inquest was held, in Great Windmill-street, on the body of Sarah Pearce, aged 23.—Mr. J. Pearce, of Great Windmill-street, stated, that the deceased was his daughter, and lodged at a friend's house opposite his own; she was addressed by a young man, a harness-maker, who lodged in witness's house. Last Sunday three weeks he told her that he was going to St. Ann's church to publish the banns for their marriage; she sent a female friend to the church to ascertain the fact, and the following Sunday she went herself, but found that her name was not called: she returned home quite melancholy, and was observed to be in a state of dejection from that day till the hour of her untimely death. On Sunday last the deceased was with witness and her mother all the day: about the afternoon the young man alluded to came home, bringing with him a young woman, whom he desired his landlady to tell the deceased was his intended wife, and as a further insult to the poor girl, he kept the female to tea. During the whole of this time the deceased was in a state bordering on frenzy; witness detained her at his house till near one o'clock in the morning, trying to soothe her, but to no effect; next morning Mrs. Jones, with whom the deceased lodged, came to witness and said she feared something had happened, as she could not make her hear when she called her. Witness, full of terror, ran over; the door was locked; he forced it open, and instantly ran to the bed; no one was there, nor had it the appearance of having been slept in. Thinking that she had wandered out he was about to retrace his steps, but as he turned round was horror-struck to see her hanging by a silk handkerchief from a rail against the cupboard. He uttered a piercing cry, and snatching up a knife that lay on the table he cut the body down, and then ran into the street, not knowing what he did.—Mr. Dixon, surgeon, stated, that about ten o'clock on Monday morning he was called to see the deceased. There was a deep mark round the neck, the tongue protruded and was much swollen. The body was quite cold, and she had been dead some hours. She had all the appearance of a person strangled.—Mr. Jones, with whom the deceased lodged, deposed, that she worked at shoe-binding, and that on Monday morning some work was sent to her from Mr. Puzey's, in Piccadilly; witness went to call her, but received no answer.—(This witness here confirmed the evidence of Mr. Pearce.)—She was a modest, prudent, good natured girl, and much respected, but lately her conduct had been that of a lunatic.—The Coroner briefly summed up the evidence, and the Jury returned the following verdict:—The deceased hanged herself in a fit of insanity, produced, in the opinion of this Jury, by the culpable, and, they add, criminal conduct of John Mill (the young man before mentioned).

Another Inquisition was taken on Tuesday, at the Mitre Tavern, near Islington Church, upon the body of Mr. Henry Gottchall, aged 23 years, a gentleman belonging to a mercantile-house in the city.—Elias Redfern, in the employ of Mr. Hiron, stable-keeper, Islington, stated, that on Sunday afternoon the deceased came to his employer's stables and asked witness to get his horse ready, as he wished to take a ride for the benefit of his health. The deceased said, "I will take a ride round the ring two or three times in the riding school before I set off." The deceased led his horse by the bridle into the riding school, and witness went into the stable to attend to some business. In about five minutes after witness went into the ring, and saw the deceased lying on the ground on his face; witness thought the horse had thrown him, and immediately went to him to render him assistance, but to his great surprise he found him apparently lifeless; he called for assistance, and the body was removed. The deceased sighed twice after witness saw him. Mr. Hold, surgeon, came in less than five minutes and bled the deceased; one drop of blood followed the lancet. Witness was of opinion that the deceased had not mounted his horse, as the stirrups were not soiled, nor were there any foot-marks of the horse in the ride, and that the deceased fell down on his face the moment he entered the ride. There were no marks of violence on the deceased's body; the horse stood over the deceased, whose hat lay about ten yards from him.—John Smith, coachman, who happened to be in the stables when the melancholy event happened, corroborated the above evidence.—Mr. Hold, surgeon, stated that the deceased died of an apoplectic fit, and in his opinion, it might have been produced by the exertion of attempting to mount his horse; the deceased was quite dead when he saw him.—Verdict—Died in a fit by the visitation of God.

On Thursday an Inquest was held, at Ratcliff-highway, on the body of Mrs. Ann Turner, aged 30, whose body was found in the Thames on Saturday week.—Margaret Dyne, Shadwell, said, that she had been acquainted with the deceased for a number of years; she was a woman of most excellent character. The last time witness saw her alive was on Thursday, when witness perceived a great alteration in her manner. The deceased said her head and mind were so distressed, that she did not know what to do; and that the thoughts of her aged mother and children drove her to madness. Her husband was abroad. The deceased had four children, with a feeble mother, to support. The whole of them were nearly in a state of starvation; they were without victuals for days together, until witness could afford to give them a meal. Witness was of opinion that the deceased destroyed herself, being at the time in a state of madness, brought on by distress. Verdict—That the deceased drowned herself, not being in a state of sound mind.

An Inquest sat on Friday on the body of Mrs. Richardson, landlady of the Three Compasses, in Wild-street, who died in consequence of taking a dose of acid of sugar instead of salts. The fatal mistake originated as follows:—A fellow named Shillito, who had formerly been shopman to a chemist, had given a large quantity of stuff, which he called Epsom salts, in consideration of a debt, to one Hargate, formerly a grocer. Sixteen parcels of this pretended physic had been sold as salts by Hargate, about a month ago, to Mrs. Richardson, who on Wednesday, for the first time, took a dose, and died shortly afterwards in the greatest agony, in spite of the most powerful antidotes. The Jury brought in a verdict to the effect here mentioned, and severely reprimanded Hargate for his culpable negligence.

Monday evening, as Mr. Lindsay, builder, of Islington, was on his way home along the New-road, Mary-le-bone, three men came up to him, one of whom attempted to trip up his heels, but failed, and then made a blow at him, which he stopped, and knocked the fellow down; the other two then attacked him, when a gentleman's carriage coming up, they ran across the Regent's Park. When Mr. Lindsay got home he missed his watch, which he had no doubt they had taken.

Sunday evening, about seven o'clock, whilst the family were out, some villains entered the premises of Mr. Steers, ironmonger, in Chiswell-street, by means of false keys. They proceeded to the counting-house, and broke open the desk, in which the key of the iron chest was deposited; they plundered the latter of Bank of England notes, gold and silver, to a great amount. They then went up stairs, and stripped the side-board of a quantity of plate and other property. The thieves regaled themselves afterwards with a part of a bottle of rum, which had been left on the side-board. They were observed to enter the house by a neighbour opposite, but he considered they were some of Mr. Steers's family, and took no further notice.

Another calamitous fire happened on Tuesday night, about eight o'clock, at the house of Mr. George, Ratcliff-highway, butcher, directly opposite that of the late Mr. Bonnor's, who perished in the late conflagration. Tuesday night Mrs. George prepared the children to put them to bed, three of whom she generally let sleep on the second floor, and the youngest, an infant boy, slept in her own chamber: at about seven o'clock Mrs. George put the whole of them to bed, after which she went down stairs, and had sat in the parlour upwards of an hour, when an assistant boy came to her, and said, "Mistress, I smell something like fire." She answered, "It could not be there," and told him that it must proceed from the ruins of the house of Mr. Bonnor. The place, however, began to fill with smoke, and smelt very strong, which induced Mrs. George to proceed up stairs: on her arrival at the top of the stairs, the flames came out of the door of the first floor in a most furious manner; her screams brought assistance; some of the persons who came, on hearing that children were asleep up stairs, proceeded thither, but after getting them out of bed, their passage was stopped by the flames issuing up the stairs, when, to save their lives, they were obliged to let the children and themselves out of the back window. The poor child on the first floor perished in the flames. A family in one of the back apartments narrowly escaped. Several engines arrived in about a quarter of an hour after the fire commenced, and the flames were soon subdued, but not before the whole of the inside was burnt to the ground. The fire commenced, it is supposed, in consequence of the curtains of the bedstead catching fire in the first floor apartment, unperceived by Mrs. George, when she put the unfortunate child to bed. When the fire was put out, the body of the child was found.

The messenger of an apothecary in Kentish-town, who was employed to carry medicines about, had, on the 5th of November, purchased a quantity of squibs, two dozen of which he had put into his breeches-pocket. As he went along, he let one of them off, but unfortunately some of the sparks thereof coming in contact with the touch paper of those in his breeches-pocket, almost instantaneously set them in a blaze. The boy was terrified, did not put his hand into his pocket for fear of burning it; in vain did he call to the by-standers, for they were equally terrified with himself. Shortly, a tremendous explosion was heard, and the spectators were shocked by the horrible sight of his bowels gushing from his abdomen. The shrieks of the boy roused the beholders at length to a sense of charity, and he was shortly after carried to St. Thomas's Hospital, where he now lingers with very slender hopes of his recovery.

On Tuesday week, as Mr. Congreve, brother to Sir Wm. Congreve, and Col. Hammer, were out shooting in the neighbourhood of Beech-hill, near Reading, in crossing a field the gun of the former accidentally went off, and the charge unfortunately lodged in the elbow of Colonel Hammer. At first no serious danger was apprehended. A mortification followed, however, and we are concerned to state that Colonel Hammer breathed his last on Friday se'nnight.

Tuesday evening, soon after dusk, as Mr. Smirk, of the Hampstead Road, was passing through Russell-square, he was surrounded by five or six ruffians, whom he took for labourers returning from work, who robbed him of 79*l.* in notes, and his watch. He made resistance, but was knocked down by a blow which rendered him senseless.

Wednesday night, some villains broke into the Sluice House public-house, near Hornsey-wood, by forcing open the cellar-flap, passing through the cellar into the upper apartments, they entered the bar, from whence they carried off about 20*l.* worth of spirituous liquors, nothing else of value being left in the bar. From the state of the place next morning it appeared that the thieves remained a considerable time in the house, regaling themselves by eating, drinking and smoking.

Wednesday night, or early on Thursday morning, the house of Mr. Richard Sharp, Birdcage-walk, Bethnal-green, was broken into and plundered of considerable property, amongst which was a tea caddy containing Bank of England notes. An officer, who inspected the premises, found an entrance was effected by taking a pannel out near the back door, which enabled the thieves to put back the bolt of the door, the only fastening to it.

Wednesday night a gentleman, of Addington-place, Camberwell, was attacked by a party of eight men on Newington-causeway, about seven o'clock, and robbed of a gold watch, value 30 guineas.—Mr. Augustus Prier, of Wandsworth, was robbed of his watch and seals on the same evening, near the Britannia, on the Wandsworth-road.

On Thursday se'nnight, a shocking murder was committed on Newmarket Heath, on the body of a poor higgler. He was stopped by some villains, who, after dragging him out of his cart, robbed him of all the money he had, and barbarously murdered him, by blowing his brains out with a pistol. The body, discovered lying on the road, and the blood and brains strewed all round, presented a most horrid spectacle. The villains afterwards effected their escape undiscovered.

On Thursday evening a man who had been observed lurking about Newington for several hours, got over the fence of a garden belonging to Mr. Webb, Prospect-row, where various articles of linen were hanging out to dry. Catherine, the daughter of Mr. Webb, about 19 years of age, perceiving him in the act of taking the property from the lines, went into the garden; the thief, upon her approach, attempted to escape over the wall, but was foiled in the endeavour, by the courage of Miss Webb, who seized him by the collar, and held him fast until her father arrived to her assistance. The name of the robber is

Wm. Sherwood. Upon being taken before a Magistrate, he was committed for trial.

A fellow named John Haldstock has been committed to hard labour as a disorderly character. He last week decoyed a child named Connolly from its home, and then left it on board a smack, without saying a word to the Captain. The child however was returned to its agitated parents after a short absence. What the ruffian's object was, does not appear, though it is said he has been before endeavouring to decoy children from their homes. He had no visible means of getting his bread.

Extract of a letter from Leith, dated Nov. 10.—“A melancholy accident occurred here yesterday morning. One of the Kirkcaldy pinnaces sailed from this port about 11 o'clock, and when half way between Leith and its place of destination, the boat shipped a heavy sea and immediately went down. Every person on board was drowned; but the exact number has not yet been ascertained. Eight hats have been picked up, belonging to the unfortunate sufferers. There were one or two, if not more, women on board. A dog, belonging to the boat, swam on shore.”

On the 2d instant, at Hatfield, in Yorkshire, Sir Hector Maclean, Baronet, of Marvare, North Britain.

On Wednesday, at a very advanced age, at Southwood-house, near Ramsgate, Charlotte, Dowager Countess of Dunmore. Her Ladyship was a daughter of the Earl of Galloway, and was married to the Earl of Dunmore, by whom she had five sons and four daughters, including George, the present Earl of Dunmore; Augusta, now Lady Augusta d'Ameland, married at Rome, April 4, 1793, to his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, and secondly, Dec. 5, 1793, at St. George's Hanover-square, London, which marriage was declared void by the Prerogative Court, in 1794; and Virginia, born in Virginia, of which her father was then Governor.

J. H. Burrows, Esq. one of the Magistrates of Marlborough-street Police-Office. He attended the office on Friday week, apparently as well as usual: having occasion to go into the City, he was there attacked with a giddiness in the head; he was taken home in a chair, and expired within twenty-four hours. He had been subject to rheumatic affection; this, added to an attack of an apoplectic nature, has hastened his dissolution.

DEATH AND CHARACTER OF THE QUEEN.

As we are in general more elaborate than most papers in our notices of deceased persons that have been before the public, it will be expected perhaps that we should make our first article out of the present subject. We do so.

Our brother journalists have relieved us from the necessity of entering into any historical details of her MAJESTY's life. All that can be collected on the subject from the daily papers will be found in our subsequent columns. To the writer of the Times in particular we are indebted for what is called "breaking the ice" respecting her MAJESTY's character and reputation with the public;—an example the more refreshing, inasmuch as the ministerial and opposition papers seem resolved to say as little as possible about the matter. The Courier, which does not think itself bound to be courtly except to its masters the Ministers, and its masters' masters the Boroughmongers, contents itself with a paragraph or so of vague panegyric. The Chronicle says nothing. As for ourselves, the subject is a personage whom we seldom thought of:—we do not conceive that all the influence of Royalty is likely to give it any undue gilding with the public;—and — — we shall hasten to say all that seems necessary.

We may as well begin with quoting the whole passage in the Courier. It is a sort of epitome of the cant common on these occasions, being studiously general instead of particular, common-place to the last degree in its sententiousness, extravagant as if in despair of being true, exceedingly "brief and tedious,"—in short, very insufficient and very sufficing.

"It has been our melancholy task this day," says our Official Mourner, "to collect and arrange every particular, within our reach, which might tend to illustrate the eminently virtuous character of our departed QUEEN. It is by posterity alone that the conduct of Princes can be impartially estimated. They who are but coldly praised while living, become objects of unmingled affection and applause after death. The meed of justice is too often tardily bestowed. It is a proud consolation, however, to the British nation to reflect, that only one opinion exists throughout all ranks of society, as to the unblemished and irreproachable character of a Queen, whose virtues on the throne have contributed, in a high degree, to improve the moral character of the people.—In all those points that constitute female excellence, she was pre-eminently distinguished, and when this sentence is pronounced, what higher eulogy can be bestowed? That her late MAJESTY partook of the common infirmities of human nature, it would be foolish adulation to deny; but her portion of them was never such as marked her out, even in her elevated station, with all eyes drawn upon her, for the censure of the most severe moralist. This tribute to her memory is but an act of common justice; and, with pleasure we add, it is a tribute which we pay in common with all our contemporaries."

Now all this etiquette sort of eulogy, when translated into the language of truth and common sense, really means nothing more than that her MAJESTY was what is called decorous. "Eminently virtuous" means that she was not notoriously vicious;—"unblemished and irreproachable" mean that she was chaste; "all those points that constitute female excellence"—(what talking, to be sure!) amount to about the same thing;—and the praise, that she was not liable to "the censure of the most severe moralist," is only another variation of it. This is the usual way of comprising all the compliments that are thought payable to the sex, regal or otherwise; and a worse mode of paying them, or a more confined notion of what is praise-worthy, could not be invented.

That the late QUEEN had the virtues of appearance in some respects, and may have had virtues in reality, we do not deny. But we must plainly say, that when we come to be told of her obvious, great, and undeniable virtues, we must be then allowed the privilege of differing in opinion, or at least of enquiring what sort of virtues they were. If we are told to act upon our usual professions of charity, and give her MAJESTY credit for what we did not know, on account of what we did, we must as plainly say, that we knew little or nothing; and that we want some popular kind of reputation for virtue, such as a queen might easily obtain, to form a ground upon which to attribute the rest. When we saw the Princess CHARLOTTE give way as she did to her feelings of sympathy for her Mother, we augured favourably of her nature in other things. When we remembered that SHERIDAN had sympathised to the last with his old friendships, though a friend at the last forsook him, we attributed his errors to circumstances rather than to vice. When we found that Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY killed himself out of an impatient sympathy with his old habits and affections, we said, here is a man who fell a victim to the diseased excess of a good thing and not of a bad one. All these persons, though in different ways, and in different degrees of disinterestedness, evidently lived for others as well as themselves; and therefore, in spite of the violations of decorum in one, and of custom in another, we attributed, and were bound to attribute to them, an additional and gratuitous measure of virtue. But we know of nothing ever done or exhibited by the QUEEN, which might not have been done by a merely prudent person, whether virtuous or not. She was chaste; but so are many vicious as well as virtuous persons. She was decorous; but so may the greatest hypocrite be. She was prudent, but so may be the greatest miser and the most cunning intriguer upon earth. We do not say that her MAJESTY was vicious or hypocritical, nor would we undervalue prudence, except when old Philpot in the Citizen talks of it; but we say, that what merely proves the absence of certain vices, does not prove the possession of any virtue.

On the other hand, though the non-exhibition of any thing which the world agrees to call vice is of so little avail in proving actual virtue, the non-exhibition of certain virtues, in so eminent and maternal a station, goes a good way to prove, that they, at least, hardly existed. It was a pretty general opinion, for instance, that the late QUEEN wanted charity, in more senses than one; and notwithstanding the Courier's attempt to confine virtue to the most ordinary and conventional notions of it, we hold this to be a little "blemish" and "reproach" in a person's reputation. Her MAJESTY was understood to be rich;—indeed she must have been so, from the property that belonged to her, and that came into her management, by law;—the calls, which it has been alleged might have been made upon her, there is no reason to suppose ever were, at least to any purpose; for we know where, and how often, they were made in other quarters; and in short, whether she was marvellously rich, or more marvellously poor, a generous woman in her condition of life would always have had it in her power to make the whole nation ring with her noble qualities.

In the great Christian virtue then of charity, or generosity in money-matters (and her MAJESTY piqued herself upon her Christianity), appearances and popular opinion are certainly against her. In the other equally indispensable Christian charity, of benignity of sentiment, and mutual forgiveness of error, the case, we are afraid, is the same. It appears from the auto-biography of a late Prelate, that even a Bishop could not differ in opinion with her MAJESTY, but she would contrive to show him a sour face. But a remarkable and well-known instance occurred but a short time since, even to the avowed surprise of Members of the Senate; and it was in resolute existence to her last moment. We allude to her MAJESTY's obstinate refusal to admit the Duchess of CUMBERLAND to Court, on the ground, says a Daily Paper, of "a taint" in her reputation. This taint (for the apparent virtues of her ROYAL HIGHNESS in other matters will warrant us in dispensing with the trouble of mystery on a subject mysterious to no one) was alleged to be a former reputation for want of chastity. We say former; for her ROYAL HIGHNESS's manner of life in England precluded all notion of any such thing here. But, "Go, and sin no more," was not the doctrine, it seems, to be practised in this instance; though a belief in its propriety was indispensable. It was, "Go at all events, and come not near me." If her MAJESTY, in spite of all her Christianity, would have said this to the woman taken in adultery, what, in CHRIST's name, would she have said to a woman like MARY MAGDALEN, who is understood to have sinned more than once or twice; and yet CHRIST, we see, preferred her, after all, to the over-careful MARTHA. He also rebuked his Apostles, who misunderstood him*, when, with a sweet appreciation of sentiment, she lavished the rich ointment on his feet. The reason was, that he knew very well that the ordinary conventional virtues of society might even be superseded by greater ones; but that none of them could produce disinterestedness and happiness when the greater ones were all absent. But to resume. As chastity is at best a virtue as little questioned or understood, as it is rigorously and partially exacted, so the less of it may either be the consequence of some of the coarsest or some of the finest feelings of human nature. It may either be mere impudence and defiance,—or it may be the result of the most conscious virtue and trusting simplicity; and we know not which is the greater fool,—the seducer, for his wickedness in violating such confidence, or not repairing it,—or the callous bigot, for his stupidity in thinking it an unpardonable sin. We know not what was the natural moral character of the PRINCESS in question. Her alleged faults, if they existed, may have been the result of neither vice nor confidence, but of the manners of the court in which she lived; and what particularly astonished people was, that at the very time when the QUEEN set her face in this manner against her daughter-in-law, she had herself taken a sudden vagary for being gay and festive in her old age, at a new court not very famous for its scruples, and at a time when her Husband was prevented in the most unhappy manner from expressing his known dislike of such habits.* Other ladies who had admission were at least tainted in their reputation, if unjustly; if the seduced might not be there, nobody, we are sure, will deny the absence of seducers.

* We suspect that this was the case many a time; and that it would be a new and useful thing to keep an eye to the fact, throughout their biographies of that Divine Person. If nobody takes this hint, and does it before us, we hope, before we die, to write a treatise on this principle, which may help to rescue the exquisite philosophical beauty of his doctrines from the inconsistent dogmas and threats with which they are mingled, and those pernicious sine-qua-nons of faith, which have turned them into dispute, selfishness, and bloodshed.

And this brings us to speak of a passage in her MAJESTY's life, which does not appear to us to have abounded even in decorum, nor even when decorum would have looked most like a virtue. The above is one instance; and another is her having had supper parties in Windsor Castle, while her Husband was in his present unhappy condition there. We should have been the more loth to call this to mind, had not the Courier the other day, in one of his strange forgetful fits, thought proper to tax the public at large with inattention to the KING's situation!—the public! who wait in silent delicacy and sympathy to hear news of their old SOVEREIGN; and who wonder (as we told the ministerialists some time ago) at not hearing of him more frequently, or rather particularly!

We noticed the suppers we allude to at the time; and we are not at all sure that our notice may not have been useful; for to come to another point in her MAJESTY's reputation, it may afford no uncurious specimen of her alleged attention to every thing that passed in the political world, to mention, that she was a subscriber for many years, perhaps all her life, to the Examiner; and was in the habit of having two numbers of it. The pretence of some of her eulogists, that she did not interfere in politics and intrigue, is refuted not only by all probability, but by what politicians themselves have shewn. Her attachment, after the fashion of the old German school, to divinity, and the love of power which manifested itself in her love of riches, led her, it is understood, to cherish a particular influence with respect to all graver matters and personages,—in the nomination of zealous Bishops, and decorous Ministers of State.—Her MAJESTY is said to have written out, with her own hand, a manuscript Life of JAMES the Second, sufficiently Tory; and furthermore, to have translated from the German the sermons of ZOLLIKOFFER,—a name provocative of a rhyme.

* We should not wonder if these sudden trespasses upon her usual manner of life, at so advanced an age, were the original cause of her death.

Her ministerialist eulogist, who is too modest to be long, is of opinion that “posterity alone can estimate the conduct of princes,” and that “they who are but coldly praised while living, become objects of unmingled affection and applause after death.” The observations, no doubt, are extremely original, and perfectly inapplicable:—“exceeding good sense”—less. Princes must at least have done something in their own times in order to be noticed or applauded by posterity. The late QUEEN did nothing; and if posterity is not informed on the subject, especially by something else than the Gazette, we venture to assert, that their mis-information, if they thought about the matter at all, would be as great as their total indifference is certain. We lay the passage out of it before our readers as something which will really astonish them. It would make a most illustrative figure in Mr. BENTHAM's late famous work on the insincerity that is taught the nation by its creeds and systems.

“Whitehall, Nov. 17, 1818.”

“This day, at one o'clock, the Queen departed this life, to the inexpressible grief of ALL the Royal Family, after a tedious illness, which her Majesty bore with the most pious fortitude and resignation.—The many great and exemplary virtues which so eminently distinguished her Majesty throughout her long life, were the object of universal esteem and ADORATION amongst ALL classes of his Majesty's subjects, and render the death of this illustrious and most excellent Princess AN UNSPEAKABLE LOSS to the WHOLE Nation.”

We recover our breath merely to add, by way of summary, that the late QUEEN was not at all popular; nor does she appear to have been a favourite with the family, if we may judge from the singular and apparently studious absence of the greater part of her children and connexions. She seems to have been a negative character, with little sympathy of any sort, but with a good deal of royal wilfulness, and an abundance of that sort of prudence, which has a steady half-shut eye to its own personal comfort both in this world and the next.—Her MAJESTY was of a small stature, and is said to have had a pleasing figure when young. Her face, it is agreed, was never handsome. We think there was a remarkable likeness in it to the prints of Joanna Southcott.

(From the Times of Wednesday.)

It is at length our duty to announce this melancholy, though not unlooked-for, termination of a course of human suffering uncommonly protracted and severe. That her Majesty should not have sunk before, under the complicated maladies which assailed her at so advanced an age, is, we are taught to believe, more surprising to her medical attendants, than that she has ultimately yielded to their violence. The Queen was born on the 19th of May, 1744; having from nature a sound and vigorous frame. Until within these two years, her Majesty enjoyed an almost uninterrupted state of health; and as is sometimes the case with those whose habits are regular, and whose various bodily powers are thence exposed to a pretty equal pressure, the first very serious attack of disease was that which indicated a general breaking-up of her constitution. The water which accumulated in her limbs and on her chest was an unequivocal symptom of the deadly stage which her Majesty's sufferings had arrived at. This source of distress and immediate alarm was, however, acted upon, from time to time, both by medicines and surgical operations; which were productive of partial, though gradually diminishing, relief, until “the potent poison quite o'ergrew” the antidotes applied to it by professional science. Each interval of repose became shorter than the preceding one—each succeeding paroxysm more acute—each struggle more nearly mortal. The Queen expired at Kew, about one o'clock on Tuesday, Nov. 17, 1818, in the 75th year of her age.

That her Majesty was provided with the best medical assistance which England, the centre of human art and knowledge, could afford, must be a solid satisfaction to those who were personally attached to her, and to all her sympathizing subjects. It was an advantage, at the same time, which, with few exceptions, people of high rank never fail to possess. But there are other and sweeter alleviations of human agony, which nature calls for, and life not unfrequently furnishes—blessings “—— which should accompany old age,

“As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends;”

which, nevertheless, afflicted greatness cannot always “look to have.” Foremost on this list of anodynes must ever be esteemed the kind and watchful attention of our children; of those upon whose hearts, if we have faithfully discharged our parental duties, we cannot fail to have established the strongest claims to grateful and pious tenderness. How far the late Queen of England acquitted herself of the sacred obligations of a mother towards her offspring, from their infancy upwards through the several stages of youth and of maturity, of health and of disease, we, in common with the public, are perhaps not quite accurately informed. Were it safe to found a judgment on the recent dispersion of the Princes of the Blood Royal, and of some of the Princesses, we might, however reluctantly, conclude, that her Majesty had not altogether succeeded in attaching to her the hearts of her children. The Duke of Cumberland is out of the question. The inflexible, though well-meant, determination of the Queen to stigmatize her niece, by shutting the doors of the Royal Palace against her, may excite strong feelings of estrangement or resentment on the part of the Duchess and of her husband; but that the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, and Cambridge, at the same time should have quitted, as if by signal, their parent's death-bed, is a circumstance which, in lower life, would have at least astonished the community. The departure of the Princess Elizabeth, the Queen's favourite daughter, who married and took leave of her in the midst of that illness which it was pronounced would shortly bring her to the grave, may perhaps have been owing to the express injunction of her Majesty. The Duke of Gloucester stands in a more remote degree of relationship; Prince Leopold more distant still; but they all quitted the scene of suffering at a period when its fatal termination could not be doubted; and, as these have departed, it is no less apparent also, to common observers, that the Queen of Wurtemberg might have approached the bed of a dying mother, from whom, by the usual lot of Princes, she has been so long separated; or that her Royal Parent has not accepted from her the performance of that painful duty. But the leading Members of the Royal Family who remained in England were unwearied in their attendance at the Palace, and set, in that instance, no unworthy example to the people over whom Providence has placed them.

We turn from the event of the Queen's last illness to a few observations connected with her life and character.

In absolute Governments, the history of a nation may be found in the biography of its Kings. It is, on the other hand, one among the choicest blessings attendant on the possession of law and liberty, that the character of a Sovereign has little influence upon the state, except in so far as his personal vice or virtue may affect the public morals. A weak Prince, in an absolute monarchy, is frequently governed by his wife or concubine. An ambitious or a profligate woman, therefore, under such a system, may rule and ruin 20 millions of men. But it is another blessing for a free people, that the Sovereign cannot delegate to a wife or minion the powers of royalty granted to him by the Constitution. Court intrigue, under a limited monarchy, can rarely effect any political object, and never for any long duration. The responsibility of Ministers may be an airy shadow in matters of light importance; but in questions of superior magnitude, or which deeply move the national feeling, it is a sword suspended by a thread. The power of the press, and of public opinion, which that press wields at all times with a giant's arm, impose an awful controul on the petty enterprises of the Bed-chamber.

Intrigue, therefore, the vulgar instrument of female ambition, has accomplished in England, at least comparatively with its exploits in other kingdoms, almost nothing, since the accession of the House of Brunswick. Of the three Queens-Consort who have lived since that accession—the first was in perpetual exile—the second was nominal Regent of the Kingdom during the absence of George the Second in Germany; but acting under the responsibility of a Council, she was fettered and eclipsed by the genius of the constitution. The late Queen of England was not gifted with any splendid or commanding endowments. Her history, during the former part of the reign of George the Third, is altogether domestic and unvaried; and to the historian therefore more than usually uninviting. Decorum and correctness have been the leading characteristics of the Court of his present Majesty, and the duties demanded by such a Court have been performed by the Queen with as much success as the nature of the thing would admit.

We are told by the public and private records of the times, that a suitable marriage for his Majesty was an urgent (as it was a natural) object of state policy, immediately on his coming to the Crown; but his known and ardent attachment to Lady Sarah Lennox, sister of the Duke of Richmond, with some manoeuvres of Mr. Fox, afterwards Lord Holland, set on foot to foment that youthful passion, hastened the designs of the Princess Dowager of Wales and of the Earl of Bute to bring about the Royal marriage. The Princess is said to have had in view a niece of her own, at least some Princess of the Saxe-Gotha family; but as the House of Saxe-Gotha was supposed to be afflicted with a constitutional disease, that wish was overruled by the Cabinet. Lord Bute then sent a confidential dependent, a Scotch officer, reported to be Colonel Græme, (who was afterwards appointed to be Master of St. Catherine's, near the Tower, an excellent place, in the peculiar gift of her Majesty,) to visit the inferior German Courts, and to select from amongst them a future Queen for England. The instructions were said to be, that she should be perfect in her form, of a pure blood, and healthy constitution, possessed of elegant accomplishments, particularly music, to which the King was very much attached, and of a mild and obliging disposition.

Colonel Græme found the reigning Princess of Strelitz taking the waters of Pyrmont, and accompanied by her two daughters, with little or no appearance of parade; and where, from the freedom of communication usual at those places, and the ready means of observation, &c. it was no difficult matter to become fully acquainted with their characters and daily habits. Their Serene Highnesses frequented the rooms, the walks, and partook of the amusements, without any distinction that should prevent Col. Græme from being an unsuspected attendant on their parties. Here, it seems, he fixed on the younger Princess, as best according with his matrimonial instructions. In short, after all due communications, inquiries, &c. the Princess Charlotte of Strelitz was chosen to be the consort of George III. Earl Harcourt, with the Duchesses of Ancaster and Hamilton, the two finest women of the British Court, were sent to conduct her thither; and Lord Anson was appointed to command the fleet of convoy on this important occasion. The circumstances of the voyage, which was very stormy, the Queen's journey and arrival in London, her marriage the same evening, the successive courts, ceremonials, coronation, &c. will be found in Dodsley's Annual Register for the year 1761. We shall remark it, however, en passant, as a whimsical circumstance, that Lady Sarah Lennox was among her Majesty's bride's-maids.

Her Majesty's figure was very pleasing, but her countenance, though not without attraction when she smiled, could not boast any claim to beauty. It was, however, a well-known fact, that the King declared himself satisfied with his connubial fortune. She entered at once upon the Royal offices of the drawing-room, with a most becoming grace and easy dignity. It was a singular occurrence, that the first play she saw was the Rehearsal, in which Mr. Garrick, in his inimitable representation of the character of Bayes, kept the King, the courtiers, and the audience in a continual roar; but which, from the construction of the piece, it was not possible to explain to her Majesty.

She was popular when Lord Bute's administration had rendered the King very much the reverse. She gave beautiful children to the country. She interested the people of England as a fruitful mother; and was considered with general regard as a domestic woman; so much so, that Colonel Barre, then a violent opposition speaker, delivered a very splendid eulogium on her "mild, tender, and unassuming virtues."

At length, however, the payment of her brother's debts, to the amount of about 30,000*l.*, began to create a suspicion, that the Queen had influence, and would occasionally employ it; nay, it was conceived that the Earl of Suffolk was appointed to the office of Secretary of State, on his engaging to manage the embarrassed affairs of his Serene Highness the Prince of Strelitz. It was believed that her German women, Madame Shullenberg, &c. were allowed to traffic in petty places. A notion also very generally prevailed, that her Majesty was fond of diamonds, and that she received with willingness those Oriental presents. She was, however, attentive to the payment of her own tradesmen, who were, for many years, regularly settled with, when the King's civil list was disgracefully in arrears. When the King held his brothers, and afterwards the princes, his children, at a distance, from their having incurred his Royal displeasure, the Queen's conduct was always considered to be as amiable and conciliatory as circumstances would permit; but that much of the praise which was long bestowed upon her Majesty, as a model of the parental and domestic character, really belonged to her illustrious consort, who impressed in some degree upon all his immediate household the image of his own steady and exemplary virtues, it would argue great ignorance or injustice to deny. We have heard, that during several years of his life, the King himself anxiously watched and superintended the progress, both physical and mental, of his children; and that the daily discipline of the nursery itself did not escape his paternal solicitudes. That her Majesty's voluntary tastes were not exactly those which had been inferred from the habits of her matrimonial life, may be conjectured from the revolution which they seemed to undergo soon after the period when her Royal husband ceased to exercise the supreme authority in this realm. At that period, a transition was observed from "grave to gay." The sober dignity, the chastened grandeur, the national character of the English Court, seemed to vanish with its afflicted Sovereign. A new species of grandeur now succeeded, in which there was more of the exterior of royalty, and less of its becoming spirit. A long series of what were meant to be festivities—crowded balls and elaborate suppers—glittering pomp—gaudy and gorgeous, yet fluttering, decoration—reckless, capricious, and never-ending profusion—all the apparatus of common-place magnificence, were introduced with the Regency, and countenanced, or apparently not discountenanced, by the Queen.

How far her Majesty's treatment of the unfortunate, and now we fear not too highly respected, Princess of Wales, can be justified, it is not for us to determine; although the world are familiar enough with the sentiments of her lamented Grand-daughter on that painful subject, and with the compassionate attentions of the King himself. About the period of the meditated Regency in 1789, the Queen was accused of having changed in a great degree the whole complexion and purpose of her life, and of having become an active and zealous mover of the springs of party. But it must be remembered, that her Majesty was then taught to believe the support of the Minister necessary to her own defence, and even to that of the interests and independence of her afflicted husband. Strong reports prevailed that she never afterwards retired wholly into the shade of domestic life; but exercised, both over his Majesty and the Regent, an influence, more or less effectual, in the choice, the continuance, and dismissal of their responsible advisers. These are mere reports. The first rule of philosophizing ought to be, not to seek a second cause, when that which you have already arrived at is sufficient to account for any given phenomenon. We are not so far disposed to wonder at that distribution of place and power which has been for some years witnessed in the British empire, as, in our perplexity, to ascribe it to the sinister and irregular interposition of the Queen's patronage. We are of no party, and are, perhaps, the more capable of forming a tolerably true judgment of those who fight under its banners. The want of a united, effective, and popular opposition in Parliament, is a more natural reason than that which we have alluded to, why any set of Ministers should grow old in office, and why any mob should grow daring and obstinate in crime. But should Queen Charlotte be really thought, during her life-time, to have produced a sensible operation on the state of parties, some further change in their strength or position will now be requisite to prove that such surmises were just.

The following details are from the usual source, the Court Circular:—

It is asserted, that the first alarming change in the state of the Queen was on Monday afternoon, and was of such a nature as to induce Sir Henry Hallford to write to the Prince Regent to hasten his departure from London; and the Regent immediately sent for the Duke of York to accompany him to Kew palace.

Their Royal Highnesses remained at Kew till near 1 o'clock, when her Majesty, having recovered from her serious attack in the afternoon, and there being no immediate appearance of danger, they left their afflicted parent for the night. The Queen passed a disturbed night; but only similar to what she had frequently done for some time past; and the physicians had sent off an account to the Regent a little before eight o'clock to that effect. In two hours afterwards a serious change for the worse took place, and Sir Henry Hallford sent off an express, which arrived soon after eleven o'clock at Carlton-house, and the statement was so alarming, that the Prince sent instantly for the Duke of York to accompany him to Kew. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at Kew palace before half-past twelve, and repaired to the chamber of their expiring parent, who, we are happy to say, was perfectly sensible of their presence. The scene was truly distressing, and the Prince Regent had the trying task of supporting his mother in her last breathings—a fit though melancholy close of his incessant attendance day and night, and of his anxious contrivance of every expedient that could administer relief and comfort to his parent, in her long and afflicting illness of six months. His Royal Highness was assisted by the Duke of York and their Royal Sisters. The expiring scene—the heart-rending feelings of the Regent, and all present, it will be equally impossible and unbecoming to attempt to describe. The brothers and sisters were supported with much difficulty to a private room, where the Regent continued several hours, and then left for town.

The first communication which arrived in town of the melancholy tidings, was about half-past two at Carlton-house, by communication sealed with black, to Viscount Sidmouth, as Secretary of State for the Home Department; together with a letter to Sir Henry Torrens, from the Duke of York, to postpone his Royal Highness's levee. The intelligence was soon circulated, and inquiries were made very numerous at Carlton-house; and at three o'clock the following notification was issued:—

“Carlton-house, Nov. 17.

“Her Majesty expired at one o'clock this day, without a pain.”

Shortly after, the following letter was placarded at the Mansion-house:—

“Whitehall, Nov. 17.

“MY LORD,—It is my painful duty to inform you of the death of her Majesty the Queen. This melancholy event took place at Kew-palace, at one o'clock this day.—I have the honour to be your Lordship's most obedient,

“To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.

“SIDMOUTH.”

In the evening, and before the post hour, a special Gazette, with a black border, supplementary to the regular one, was published, for the express and sole purpose of announcing her Majesty's decease, in the following words:—

“Whitehall, Nov. 17.

“This day, at one o'clock, the Queen departed this life, to the inexpressible grief of the Royal Family, after a tedious illness, which her Majesty bore with the most pious fortitude and resignation. The many great and exemplary virtues which so eminently distinguished her Majesty throughout her long life, were the object of universal esteem and admiration amongst all classes of his Majesty's subjects, and render the death of this illustrious and most excellent Princess an unspeakable loss to the whole nation.”

Heralds' College, Nov. 19.

THE DEPUTY EARL MARSHAL'S ORDER FOR A GENERAL MOURNING FOR HER LATE MAJESTY QUEEN CHARLOTTE.

In pursuance of the commands of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, these are to give public notice, that upon the present melancholy occasion of the death of her late Majesty, of blessed memory, all persons do put themselves into deep mourning.

HENRY HOWARD MOLYNEUX-HOWARD,
Deputy Earl Marshal.

Letters were sent off by the Government bags, for as it was post-night there was no necessity for sending messengers to all the different branches of the Royal Family now abroad.—Mr. Vicke, the King's Messenger, was the only one who was sent abroad with the melancholy tidings, and he is ordered to Aix-la-Chapelle.

We are informed on very good authority, that soon after the death of the Princess Charlotte, the Queen made a codicil to her will, for the express purpose of ordering that she should not be embalmed.

(From the Courier.)

The Archbishop of Canterbury was sent for, by the same messenger who carried the despatch to the Prince Regent, respecting the approaching dissolution of the Queen; but he was not at home. After some time his Grace was met with at a meeting, held on the business of the new churches. The Archbishop went with all speed to Kew; but his Grace did not arrive at Kew till after the decease of her Majesty. The account, therefore, published of the Archbishop having administered the Sacrament to the Queen, in her expiring moments, must be incorrect.

It has been maintained in a variety of quarters that her Majesty has left no Will. We, however, have every reason to believe that there is one existing, which has been drawn up at different periods since the 2d of May, and on different pieces of paper, by an Officer belonging to her Majesty's establishment. About a fortnight previous to the Royal demise, her Majesty, for the first time, was apprized of her danger, by a communication made by order of the Regent, and in as delicate a way as possible, such as is commonly resorted to on such occasions, namely—“That if her Majesty had any affairs to settle, it would be advisable to do so, whilst she had health and spirits to bear the fatigue.” The Queen was considerably shocked at the intimation, as she had entertained an idea of recovering through the skilful aid of her medical attendants.

One of the most esteemed and conspicuous traits of the late Queen's character, was the strictness with which she consulted the moral decency of her Court. Her fine reply to Lady——, when soliciting her Majesty for permission to present Lady——, and when refused, saying, she did not know what to tell her disappointed friend, will long be remembered and repeated:—“Tell her,” said the Queen, “You did not dare to ask me.”

One of the first acts of her Majesty's benevolence was the forming an establishment for the daughters of decayed Gentlemen, or orphans. A house and grounds were purchased in Bedfordshire, and a Lady, of high attainments, placed therein, at a salary of 500*l.* to instruct the pupils in embroidery, &c. They were taken in at 15 years of age. The produce of their labour was converted into ornaments for window-curtains, chairs, sofas, and bed-furniture, for Windsor Castle, and the Palace in St. James's Park.

Her Majesty has made a will. It appears that she was not possessed of 5,000*l.* of money at her demise, and that she possessed no funds. She has bequeathed her diamonds to be divided equally among the Princesses, her daughters, with some distinctions; and is said to have given a handsome bequest to Lady Harcourt, who has been always admitted to the honour of her intimate confidence; and smaller legacies to others, who have been longest in her Majesty's service. All the under servants will have pensions from the public, according to their ranks, which will amount to a considerable sum.—Morning Chronicle.

BONAPARTE.

The Hampshire Telegraph publishes the following extract of a letter from St. Helena:—

“St. Helena, Sept. 28, 1818.

“The Musquito sloop of war sails to-morrow for England: she is charged with despatches from Sir Hudson Lowe, relating, it is understood, to an intercepted correspondence, which has discovered the existence of a plot, the object of which was the liberation of Bonaparte from this island. I forbear to mention the names, currently circulated here, of those who are said to be implicated in this transaction; a banker's house in London, however, and two individuals in England, with others on the Continent, it is rumoured, are concerned. Detection of the plot was produced by the circumstance, it is said, of many letters, addressed to a person (the name of which no individual is to be found here), lying uncalled for at the post-office. Bonaparte is in very good health; he still, however, abstains from exercise, confining himself wholly within doors. The reason assigned at Longwood for the departure hence of General Gourgaud, is a quarrel between him and General Montholon. Gourgaud had been challenged by the latter, but Bonaparte forbidding them to fight, Gourgaud quitted. It is confidently said, Bonaparte has recently obtained the sum of 15,000*l.* in dollars; through what means this weighty bulk could have been carried clandestinely to Longwood, is still a matter of surprise. The discovery of the plot has also brought to light where the whole of Bonaparte's treasure is deposited. Bertrand some time since asserted, he could at any time command a million sterling. Of the three Commissions, one only remains on the island; those of Russia and Austria are gone to Rio to take up their abode some time. Bonaparte will not admit either one of them to his presence; the Austrian Commissioner, Baron de Sturmer, who returned some weeks since to his Court, did not, during the long period he remained on the island, once see Bonaparte.

"This island is not healthy for a continued residence; it is for many hours, every day, covered with vapours and dense fogs, and it does not yield a sixth part of sufficient vegetable substances for the use of the troops and seamen." The inhabitants are wholly excluded from all means of livelihood; no ships are allowed to remain here longer than is absolutely necessary; all supplies come from the Cape; but they are very scanty, and what fresh meat is afforded from this channel is wholly engrossed by the troops; the ships never get a meal of it; and during the last five months they have had only one third bread, no cocoa, and no peas; the deficiency is wholly made up of rice. Dysentery, consequently, prevails much; and all the vessels have lost many men; the Musquito has lost about twenty-three in three months, and the Conqueror has scarcely seamen enough on board to work the ship. But, notwithstanding this weak state, the squadron had furnished 300 men to assist in building a new house for Bonaparte, of the most capacious dimensions. The seamen, after the day's work is over, are marched to another part of the island, to be encamped for the night. Every ship furnishes guard-boats, which row round the island, and, as they approach the various points, are always challenged by the sentinels. A short time since, one of the sloops of war, in working to windward of the island, discovered two men in a cave on the shore; she accordingly sent a boat, and brought off two Yamstock (native) negroes, who had been fishing; and who, it appeared, used to get to the beach from the top of the Cliff by a secret but dangerous path. A new battery was consequently immediately erected, and it was by this unknown outlet, it is said, that the Great Man was to be carried off. We are constantly amused with stories of schooners hovering off the island; the cruisers certainly sometimes see such, but never board them. A transport from the Cape lately passed one close, lying to, to windward, about 80 miles from the island, which took no notice of her; she might, however, have been slaving, or looking out for Spanish or Portuguese Indians: she was a large long schooner of 18 guns, and apparently full of men. The troops here are more healthy than the seamen are; many casualties, however, occur among the former—several sentinels have been lost by falling over the cliffs.

* The Courier, in copying this article, has carefully omitted the whole of this passage. Was it because the other day it insisted upon the great salubrity of the climate?

FRANCE.

PARIS, Nov. 17.—This day being the anniversary of his Majesty's birth, there will be a grand dinner at Court. The King was born at Versailles on the 17th of November, 1755; his Majesty will therefore, this day, have attained his 63d year.

The cause of the Sieur Lhuillier, Editor-printer of a periodical work, entitled L'Homme Gris, was called on yesterday, in the Court Royal of Paris. Lhuillier had been condemned to a year's imprisonment, a fine of 5,000 francs, and to find security in 3,000 francs, that he would submit to five years to the surveillance of the high police, to an interdiction of civil rights for five years, &c. The decree now given by default confirms the original sentence.

In the latter part of September, a violent shock of an earthquake was felt about a league and a half west of Lisbon. Fortunately no accident occurred, but the consternation was general among the inhabitants, whose imaginations are still alive to the former catastrophe.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 23.

THE Congress is still sitting, both great and small; but they have not publicly done any thing except the determination to call their troops out of France, which are still marching off accordingly. The Sovereigns make excursions to the capitals of neighbouring countries, and then return. The Duke d'ANGOULEME has been among them, probably to see what he can do, cunning rogue, for his friends the Ultras, who if they had their way would ruin themselves and the BOURBONS together.

The Congress, it is even said, is to last longer than was expected. They find business increase upon their hands, and wish to put an end to it. They must put an end first to the royal passions that create it. As long as the Princes act unjustly, how can the people be satisfied? Yet it seems imagined, that while they retain possession of lands and properties to which they have no right, such as Lombardy, Genoa, part of Saxony and Poland, &c., they are to be venerated as umpires between lesser disputants! Will nothing teach them but more adversity? If not, it is pretty certain, in the present state and disposition of the world, they will have it.

We omitted to notice, a week or two back, the additional acts of popularity, which we anticipated from the French Court, now that the foreign troops are going away. Notwithstanding these, however, it plainly appears that an air of fierce irritability has manifested itself among the lower orders, who sing Anti-Bourbon songs, and put on tri-coloured cockades, and cockades made of pieces of bacon,—a coarse allusion, we suppose, to the gastric faculties of Louis the 18th.

That the Sovereigns, notwithstanding all their present power, are apt to be angry and uneasy, and that they do not know what to do with their enemies when they contrive to nail them, is very apparent from the various prisons which are well known to be filled in Prussia, Spain, and France, and of course in other places. MASSENBACH, whom the King of Prussia violated a neutral territory in order to seize, has never, as we foretold, been brought to trial. General CANUEL's conspiracy has come to so little, as we foretold also, that he was even introduced to the King the other day. ARGUELLES and hundreds of other patriots who helped to restore that loathsome person FERDINAND, and vainly thought to make a decent King of him, are still languishing in his execrable dungeons, and for ought we know to the contrary are subjected to the tortures of the re-established inquisition. Signor FLOREZ ESTRADA, of whose noble appeal to the most ignoble of mankind our readers saw a specimen the other day, has been denounced with ridiculous fury as an excommunicated person, that is to say, all Catholics are forbidden to aid and assist him in any way even to keep life and soul together, and he is devoted to the devil in all his limbs as well as soul, with an enumeration equally horrible and absurd.* Signor FLOREZ must laugh one moment; but he must feel bitterly the next for his poor country. But Spaniards of his description must at least be safe in England, as long as one single particle of truth or shame survives in the persons who affected to make common cause with them against BONAPARTE. Frenchmen are not in such habitual creditability with their English neighbours; and advantage seems to be taken of this circumstance to wreck the allied passions on their never forgiven heads. At least, such must be the feeling with intelligent observers, as long as outrage so gross as the one committed on General GORGAUD remains unexplained. The General was with BONAPARTE in St. Helena. It was he, we believe, who wrote a letter which transpired lately to the Empress MARIA LOUISA, urging her, not very discreetly perhaps, to do all she could in favour of her captive husband; as if she had not done so already, provided she loved him, or would do it for such a letter if she did not. This, however, looks more like a good-hearted enthusiastic man, than an underhand plotter. But to conclude the list of the General's awkward interferences, he was guilty, the other day, of a military publication, which undertook to settle the merits of the battle of Waterloo, and in which he thinks that the victory was not attributable to the causes usually assigned. It is the opinion of many persons that this alone constitutes the offence of General GORGAUD; and their opinion will be greatly strengthened by one of those unwitting passages, in which the Courier lets the Castlereagh out of the bag. "The arrest," says he, "furnishes, of course, an opportunity not to be missed, of inveighing against the 'inhuman law,' under whose authority he has been removed. It may seem very odd; but this case is precisely one of those, which, in our opinion, justifies the wisdom of Ministers in having applied to Parliament for that law. We are glad that a power exists, by which a turbulent alien, who comes into this country, only to abuse us, and contravene our policy, can be sent out of it with the least possible delay or trouble."

* See for an official specimen of excommunication the novel of Tristram Shandy. Uncle Toby, on hearing it, exclaims with an apparent profaneness beyond all common-place piety, that he would not have the Devil himself subjected to such shocking punishment.

Some arrests have taken place in the Netherlands, which coupled perhaps with the late real or affected importance of the dispatches from St. Helena; raised the singular report of a plot to waylay the Russian Emperor and force him to sign an order for NAPOLEON's release. This is very idle. But reports of all sorts will still be in agitation, because it is very likely that plots are so.

We shall take due notice next week of the Proceedings in Westminster.

Preparations are making for the Funeral of her MAJESTY, but it is said that no time is yet fixed for the interment.

THE PRINCE REGENT has been in a low nervous state ever since the death of the QUEEN.—Courier.

It is said that the death of the QUEEN will bring home several of the male branches of the Royal Family.—Sun.

The King's jewels are missing from Windsor Castle.

MR. HORSLEY's child has not yet been recovered, though it is ascertained that he has been carried to France.

We have authority to contradict a paragraph which appeared in the Morning Chronicle of Saturday, annexed to a long article on the late lamented Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, and which announced the appearance of a lady of the name of POTTERS at Drury-lane Theatre, under the immediate patronage of the Hon. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD.—That gentleman, we are authorised to say, has in no one instance, for a period exceeding two years, interfered, directly or indirectly, in the conduct of that establishment, and is utterly ignorant of the lady announced, or of any other performer being about to appear on the London stage.

On Friday night, Mr. CARROLL's Lottery-Office in Cornhill, was totally destroyed by fire, and some of the neighbouring houses were much damaged.

SURREY INSTITUTION.—The lectures here are suspended for a while on account of the QUEEN's death. Mr. HAZLITT's, last Tuesday, was on BUTLER, and the Dramatists of CHARLES the Second's time. He gave an excellent account of the fatal way in which the extremely local and temporary nature of the subject has neutralized even the superabundant salt of BUTLER's wit and fancy. The lecture upon the whole appeared to us a great deal too short: but perhaps amends will be made us in the next, which is to be upon Comedy in all its fine-gentlemen glory,—CONGREVE, WYCHERLEY, &c.

FRIGHTFUL BARBARITY.—On Friday, an inquisition was held on the body of Martha Puarello, aged four years, the daughter of an interpreter, living in Castle-street, Leicester-square.—It appeared in evidence, that the child had been put out to nurse to her Aunt, the wife of a tailor named Hill, in Hemming's-row. The father, on hearing some reports of ill-treatment, took away the child, whose back and thighs then exhibited bruises. She was so terrified at the very name of her aunt, that she was afraid to tell how barbarously she had been used.—The Surgeon said, she died of a low typhus fever, but inflammation preceded the fever, which might have been produced by bad treatment.—The wife of Mr. Blunt, 12, Hemming's-row, said, that Mrs. Hill lodged in her house. When the deceased child first came to her aunt, she was in perfect health, was playful and rosy-cheeked. Mr. and Mrs. Hill had a cutaneous disease; the child took it, and with taking sulphur and other drugs, she became much reduced. On the 3d November witness saw Mrs. Hill throw a pan of cold water over the child, while quite naked, which almost threw her into convulsions. Witness interfered, and was sharply told to mind her own business. Mrs. Hill then threw another pan of cold water over the poor little creature, observing, "there, I've done it in spite of you, and will do it as often as I please." On a preceding day, witness dashed a dripping flannel over the child when it had only its shift on, then drove her up stairs, and beat her violently. The child was much relaxed; and Mrs. Hill said she punished her for having dirtied herself.—The witness mentioned other instances of ill-treatment, which were corroborated by Ann Coles, the last witness's servant, who added, that Mrs. Hill one day put the child into a dark cellar for an hour, telling her, at the same time, that it was full of rats! This was merely for crying at being put into cold water. A lodger gave testimony to the same effect, adding, that when the child was put into the dark cellar, it frightened her nearly into fits. Another lodger said, that the child was frequently kept without food from dinner-time till morning, and very often beaten for a quarter of an hour. The grandfather of the deceased said, that a Surgeon had given it as his opinion, that the child's death was caused by acts of cruelty. The verdict was Manslaughter,—and Mrs. Hill was committed to Tothill-fields Prison.

On Saturday morning, the Baron Gourgaud was served with an order to quit this kingdom, under the provisions of the Alien Act, and was removed from his house by virtue of a warrant from the Secretary of State, with a view to the execution of that order. His behaviour was most violent, and the officers, in the discharge of their duty in removing him, were severely bruised in the scuffle which arose from his resistance.—A belief, however, is attempted to be created, that the officers, in the execution of their duty, made use of wanton cruelty. This, we are desired to state, is without the slightest foundation. The only persons that suffered were the officers. Upon being informed of the object of the officers' coming, that they were to remove him under the Alien Act, there was a plan to rob him and the window, and, alleging that attempts were making to rob and murder him. He wished to excite a mob to rescue him. Upon taking his papers, he tried to seize a pair of loaded pistols and a short dagger. He was first conveyed to the house of Mr. CAPPER, where he remained some time, in order, if he chose, to send for his clothes from the lodgings he had occupied. But this he declined. He was then put into a postchaise, and sent off to Harwich. On his arrival at Romford, being market-day, and the inn-yard full, the horses were changed in the open street, where there were many persons assembled. He then called out—"Thieves! murder! I am General GOURGAUD; they are going to rob and murder me." A few miles further on, he wished to be taken before a Magistrate. On his arrival at Harwich he was put on board the packet, which is said to have sailed last night for Cuxhaven.—Courier—Monday.

The Chronicle gave a very different account of the above arrest, by which it appeared that the General was wantonly and personally ill-treated—grossly used.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

THIS Theatre, fitted up with new and tasteful decorations, opened on Monday with a burletta founded upon a pleasant extravagance recorded of WILMOT the "mad Lord" of Rochester. The house, in its renovated condition, is just what play-houses should be, and once were, from its size admirably adapted for seeing and hearing, and only perhaps rather too well lit up. Light is a good thing, but to preserve the eyes is still better. ELLISTON and Mrs. EDWIN personated a reigning wit and beauty of the Court of CHARLES the Second to the life. But the charm of the evening to us, we confess, was the acting of Mrs. T. GOULD (late Miss BURRELL) in the burlesque Don Giovanni which followed. This admirable piece of foolery takes up our hero just where the legitimate drama leaves him, on the "burning marl." We are presented with a fair map of Tartarus, the triple-headed cur, the Furies, the Tormentors, and the Don, prostrate, thunder-smitten. But there is an elasticity in the original make of this strange man, as RICHARDSON would have called him. He is not one of those who change with the change of climate. He brings with him to his new habitation ardours as glowing and constant as any which he finds there. No sooner is he recovered from his first surprise, than he falls to his old trade, is caught "ogling Proserpine," and coquets with two she devils at once, till he makes the house too hot to hold him; and Pluto (in whom a wise jealousy seems to produce the effects of kindness) turns him neck and heels out of his dominions,—much to the satisfaction of Giovanni, who stealing a boat from Charon, and a pair of light heels from Mercury, or (as he familiarly terms him) Murky, sets off with flying colours, conveying to the world above the souls of three damsels, just eloped from Styx, to comfort his tender and new-born spiritualities on the journey. Arrived upon earth (with a new body, we are to suppose, but his old habits) he lights a-propos upon a tavern in London, at the door of which, three merry weavers, widowers, are troubling a catch in triumph over their deceased spouses—

*They lie in yonder church-yard
At rest—and so are we.*

Their departed partners prove to be the identical lady ghosts who have accompanied the Don in his flight, whom he now delivers up in perfect health and good plight, not a jot the worse for their journey, to the infinite surprise, and consternation ill-dissembled, of their ill-fated twice-yoked mates. The gallantries of the Don in his second state of probation, his meeting with Leporello, with Donna Anna, and a countless host of injured virgins besides, doing penance in the humble occupation of apple-women, fish-wives, and sausage-fryers, in the purlieus of Billingsgate and Covent-garden, down to the period of his complete reformation, and being made an honest man of, by marrying into a sober English citizen's family, although infinitely pleasant in the exhibition, would be somewhat tedious in the recital: but something must be said of his representative.

We have seen Mrs. JORDAN in male characters, and more ladies besides than we would wish to recollect—but never any that so completely answered the purpose for which they were so transmuted, as the Lady who enacts the mock Giovanni. This part, as it is played at the Great House in the Haymarket (Shade of MOZART, and ye living admirers of AMBROGETTI, pardon the barbarity) had always something repulsive and distasteful to us.—We cannot sympathize with Leporello's brutal display of the list, and were shocked (no strait-laced moralists either) with the applauses, with the endurance we ought rather to say, which fashion and beauty bestowed upon that disgusting insult to feminine unhappiness. The Leporello of the Olympic Theatre is not of the most refined order, but we can bear with an English blackguard better than with the hard Italian. But Giovanni—free, fine, frank-spirited, single-hearted creature, turning all the mischief into fun as harmless as toys, or children's make-believe, what praise can we repay to you, adequate to the pleasure which you have given us? We had better be silent, for you have no name, and our mention will but be thought fantastical. You have taken out the sting from the evil thing, by what magic we know not, for there are actresses of greater mark and attribute than you. With you and your Giovanni our spirits will hold communion, whenever sorrow or suffering shall be our lot. We have seen you triumph over the infernal powers; and pain, and Erebus, and the powers of darkness, are henceforth “shapes of a dream.” †

THE CORN BILL.—CLEANING MADE ROBBERY.

That the measure of misery is not sufficiently heaped, and that the present dearth after a fine harvest is below the average intended, is plain; for bread, which the mis-called and misbegotten Corn Bill has proved to be the standard for the price of other provisions also, and in fact of every thing else, has not reached the importation price yet.

Man is a gregarious animal; the very minds of men follow their leaders. Ages as well as Countries have their character: one age shall be celebrated for high romantic bravery, and in another we see the same people mean-spirited and cowardly: after this it is not surprising if the milder virtues sink under the circumstances of the times: Charity in this time there remains scarcely more than the * name of: we see wretchedness, till we think it one of the regular orders of polished society: strange mistake; it is lamentable dilapidation; ruins; the Tuscan Order of a fine temple of antiquity, buried under an heap of miserable rubbish; and to carry the metaphor further, the whole beautiful fabric of the Virtues, without charity for the basis, is a mere castle in the air. Worse than typhus fever, the Famine-Bill has spread over the land one general epidemic moral influenza, the cruel symptoms of which are a morbid deadness of sensation and coldness at the core of the heart.

* Charity must not be confounded with mere almsgiving: a man that conspired with others to keep up rents to the old factitious paper height, when many millions of such stuff disappeared like the assignats of France, and money was finding its level, mutton then being but 6d. a pound in Leadenhall, (which might be rather too low), and which man now gives away, say 50l. a year in charity, is still extorting from distress five or ten times that amount probably. Fine abatement—excellent idea of charity!

It is an hard time: since my last I have read two trials for Gleaning! and both the Judges, without ceremony, condemned it as trespass and robbery. Feeling nothing, they uttered not a word in favour of humanity—not a word on the antiquity of the custom—nor had they a moment's hesitation at taking away from the poor a privilege of three thousand years standing! (Blackstone says, that the tenure of the Landlords is but by privilege.)

However, allow me, Mr. Editor, to send a sigh after the nicest word in the language, which must now grow obsolete; the very language of our books is unsuitable to the harshness of the time. The word Glean has ever been a favourite word with poets and authors; it presented instantly to one's mind summer and sunshine and charity, love, virtue, and happiness, the brightest flower in civilized society; it pictured man satisfied with having secured himself from want, looking on pleased that his less fortunate fellow-creatures, who, like the fowls of the air, gather not into barns, should have a taste of the bounty of Heaven at this holiday time of the year; but the reality is gone.

The prettiest story we have extant of the early people of the earth arose out of the more ancient privilege of Gleaning. I can scarcely remember now without tears Boaz and Ruth, the filial piety of the lovely girl, and all the pastoral innocence and beautiful simplicity of this interesting tale. The charm is gone. Ruth, Lavinia, and Rosina, were robbers.

LORD CHURCHILL v. THE TIMES JOURNAL.

Mr. GURNEY rose to answer a rule that had been granted, calling on the proprietors of the Times to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against them for a libel on Lord Charles Spencer Churchill, published in the Times. The rule had been granted on the ground that the account was a libellous account, and particularly that it was a misstatement of the evidence given before the Coroner.—Some time in May last Lord Spencer Churchill was driving a gig in the King's-road: by this gig, another, in which were a Mr. Tooke, Miss Shewin, and another lady, was overturned; and Miss Shewin in consequence came by her death. The publication complained of was not the first account of the transaction, but one that was written in answer, and was sent by Mr. Tooke, to show that he had not been guilty of the negligence which in some quarter had been imputed to him. He had employed a friend to draw up this account for him, and sent it to the Editor, requesting its insertion, and this letter or account was the libel complained of. He (Mr. Gurney) was surprised that a Nobleman such as Lord Spencer Churchill should have been guilty of the indiscretion he had fallen into on the day of the accident; but he was still more surprised that he should add to that the indiscretion of the present application; for he undertook to show that the conduct of the Editor of the Times, in investigating this business, was marked with the utmost care, and the most laudable anxiety to tell the truth, and nothing but the truth. The application had been made on the affidavits of Lord Charles Spencer Churchill himself, of his groom, of a Mr. Jones, a Mr. Harris, and other persons. No two of these affidavits agreed. That of Lord Charles Spencer Churchill varied materially from that given by his groom: and as to the affidavit of Mr. Jones, it was in direct contradiction to the evidence given by him on oath before the Coroner. It was stated too, that none of the witnesses in their examination before the Coroner had thrown any blame on Lord Charles Spencer Churchill: whereas they had all blamed him, without exception; not for a malicious intention, for that was never alleged at any time; but for impetuosity, impatience, a most culpable disregard of the safety and lives of other people; and a degree of haste which was even beyond the common portion of youth. Mr. Tooke was going quietly, at the rate of about six miles an hour, on a road not 22 feet wide. Lord Charles Spencer Churchill, who was coming up behind, had said that he called out, but was not heard, because the party in the gig were talking and laughing; but he admitted that Mr. Tooke pulled his horse inwards, and then alleged that his Lordship's wheel did not touch that of Mr. Tooke's. The groom stated that Mr. Tooke pulled in to give way, and then directed his horse back again—an allegation which was contradicted by nine witnesses; and by their testimony it appeared that Lord C. S. Churchill was driving at a furious rate, or at all events, at an improper rate. Besides his chaise coming up, made three parallel chaises in the road, only 22 feet wide; a fact which evinced a degree of impatience and impetuosity, which none could be guilty of who had the least regard for others, or the smallest spark of humanity. Jones, in his deposition before the Coroner, had stated, that the Gentleman attempting to pass was in the wrong.—Mary Smith, another witness, deposed, that the gentleman was driving so fast, she had said to a companion at the time, “an accident must happen.” It had been represented to his learned friend on the other side, he had been instructed to state, (and that was the ground on which the rule was granted,) that there had been no impropriety in the conduct of Lord Charles Spencer Churchill, when, in truth, all the deponents had blamed him. The Learned Counsel read Mr. Tooke's deposition before the Coroner, which stated that if Lord Charles Spencer Churchill had waited only one quarter of a minute all would have been safe. After the accident, Lord Charles Spencer Churchill never took the trouble to call and make any inquiry, but only sent his servant to the surgeon's.—The affidavit of Mr. Bradshaw stated, that if Lord C. S. Churchill had stopped half a minute, he would have had sufficient room to have passed; and that the accident was occasioned solely by his Lordship's impetuosity. Lord Charles Spencer Churchill was behind; he saw another gentleman driving before him, and on the right side of the road: he had nothing to do but to wait a single moment, and all would have been safe: instead of this, he hurries on, strikes the wheel of the other gig, and pushes it to the post. This was deposed to by all the three witnesses, who gave their evidence before the coroner: how the prosecutor could induce one of them entirely to alter his statement, he could not tell; but an application for a criminal information came out with a very bad grace from one who, in order to furnish a ground for it, was obliged to begin with causing a witness to state that he had been guilty of perjury! Under these circumstances, the learned Counsel submitted, that no ground whatever had been shown for granting a criminal information; that the statement originally given of the transaction had been amply confirmed by the prosecutor's own account of it, and by all the evidence it appeared that the accident was entirely caused by the culpable haste of Lord Churchill.

Mr. SCARLETT observed, that his learned friend had said nothing of a second publication.

Mr. GURNEY replied, he did not suppose that Mr. Scarlett would have alluded to that publication; but as he had, he should make some observations on it. It appeared that Lord Churchill had answered the first publication, and that Mr. Tooke had replied in the manner which was now complained of as a libel; and he should not have expected that his Lordship would have alluded to this second publication, after he had seen the affidavit on the other side, (an affidavit which stated that his Lordship had never once called to inquire for the victim of his wanton impetuosity.)—he should not have expected this, because his Lordship might have been led to express some concern, even for the fate of a stranger under such circumstances as those of the accident alluded to. However, the letter complained of as this second publication, did not state on its own authority that Lord Charles Spencer Churchill had expressed so little concern as to have gone to Almack's the same night, but only repeated a statement that had been made to that effect in the Morning Herald; and then said, that if his Lordship, as represented in the Herald, had gone to Almack's, his conduct was very unfeeling. Now, if this statement of the Herald was untrue, his Lordship might easily have answered it.

Mr. SCARLETT rose on behalf of the prosecution. He said it was an undisputed fact, that after the accident happened Lord Charles Spencer Churchill got out of the gig and rendered all the assistance possible: he sent to the surgeon to inquire for the lady, gave his address, and expressed his wish to be examined on the Coroner's Inquest. He stayed at home all the night in great anxiety, especially when he heard that the young lady was dead: and it was only because he was told that his presence would not be required by the Coroner, that he forbore to go. Then came the statement in the newspapers, that the death of this unfortunate lady was occasioned by the most wanton carelessness; afterwards, a passage in the Observer begging the public to suspend its judgment; and then the statement complained of, which contained a gross misrepresentation of what had passed before the Coroner: for Mr. Jones, in his affidavit, swore that he did not impute blame to Lord Charles Spencer Churchill before the Coroner. Neither did Miss Smith—

The COURT.—Yes; she says that he was driving as fast as he could; and that she observed to a lady, that an accident would happen.

Mr. SCARLETT said, he would ask, whether, if after the verdict of the Coroner's Inquest, Lord Charles Spencer Churchill could be liable to punishment for manslaughter? Certainly not. If then the Editor of the Times had published the depositions alone, he would have done wrong, because they were an ex-parte statement; but he regrets first that he has them not, and then publishes the statement of a partisan. The defence put in an affidavit did not contain the evidence of persons on oath, but merely what was said in conversation by some persons in attendance, who were not examined. After that came the letter about Almack's—

Chief-Justice ABBOTT.—There you see the reference to the author of the statement, the Morning Herald.

Mr. SCARLETT contended, that a libel was often contained, not in the statement of a fact, but in the pointing of it, as the Times had done with respect to the statement of Lord Charles Spencer Churchill's being at Almack's. He might never have seen the statement in the Herald, though the Editor of the Times had sufficient leisure to have inquired into the truth of it; but the libel had joined two facts together to give a point to both, and imply that Lord C. S. Churchill was a young man so devoid of all humanity as to neglect every feeling that such an occasion must call forth. He (Mr. Scarlett) trusted, at least, that a young man who had felt severely, and had vindicated himself from all imputation of want of feeling, should be allowed this mode of clearing his character.

Chief-Justice ABBOTT.—The Court, in discharging the rule applied for, pronounce no opinion on what has been spoken of, as to the merits of Lord C. S. Churchill's case, or as to his conduct. It appears, however, that on the evening of the accident and the following day, he conducted himself with feeling and propriety. But the Court cannot allow this opportunity to pass, without an observation, that the driver of a carriage behind another is to relax, and give time to his precursor, and not to pursue and attempt to pass with heedless velocity. It appears from the affidavits on both sides, that ex-parte statements were sent into public by both parties; and the Court cannot help lamenting that such statements are but too frequent in the public prints. The Court, therefore, discharges the rule, without pronouncing any opinion upon the merits of the prosecutor's case; but from what has been said on both sides, no ground has been shown for enabling him to proceed by way of criminal information. If Lord Charles Spencer Churchill has been aggrieved, he may find redress in another mode of proceeding; but though the Court discharges the rule, it does not see any thing in the situation of the defendant to entitle him to his costs. The rule must therefore be discharged, but without costs.

[Lord C. S. CHURCHILL has, on the same ground, three other actions pending for damages (damages!) against the Morning Chronicle Observer, and Examiner.—His Lordship's Attorney is Mr. MANNING, of John-street, Adelphi;—Mr. PLATT, of Brunswick-square, is the Solicitor of the Times.]

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, DUBLIN.

Wednesday, Nov. 12.

HARRIET CAILA, WIDOW, v. RICHARD M'NAMARA, ESQ.

Mr. DOGHERTY moved to show cause why the defendant, who had been arrested at the suit of the plaintiff, under a writ for 5,000*l.* should not be held to special bail. The plaintiff's affidavit stated, that she lived at 32, Upper George-street, Bryanston-square, in the parish of Marylebone, county of Middlesex; that in the year 1815, the defendant entered into an agreement under his hand, to marry deponent, and never live or cohabit with any other woman, or on breach of such promise, to pay to deponent the sum of 5,000*l.*; that defendant had since married another woman, and consequently could not now fulfil his agreement with deponent, and was therefore indebted to her in the said sum of 5,000*l.*

Mr. O'CONNELL contended, that as this affidavit did not aver any mutuality of promise or other consideration, it was no more than a promise, and not an agreement; for a mere promise on one side, without any consideration on the other, is but a nudum pactum, and no agreement, and therefore insufficient grounds for the party to be held to bail; and further, Mr. O'Connell observed, that the plaintiff in her affidavit only stated, that the defendant agreed to marry her at a future time, but does not mention the precise period. "Now," said Mr. O'Connell, "this same Harriet Caila had been married herself, and is now a widow, and at liberty to marry Mr. M'Namara; how, therefore, can she say but that at some future period he may become a widower, and be at liberty to marry her? and if there was no time specified at which this 5,000*l.* was to fall due, how could they say it was due now?"

It was urged by Mr. DOGHERTY, in reply, that with respect to want of consideration, the Courts generally inferred a mutuality of promise in cases of promise of marriage; that where there was no time specifically mentioned for the fulfilment of an agreement, a reasonable time was usually presumed; and as the execution of his promise, by the defendant, could not now be expected within such reasonable time, he being married to another woman, he (Mr. Dogherty) hoped the Court would allow his motion.

On Mr. O'CONNELL's complaining of the hardship of keeping Mr. M'Namara in prison,

"Indeed," said Lord NORBURY, "the unfortunate gentleman seems to be suffering under a* double captivity—he is a captive in the chains of wedlock, and a captive within the bars of the Sheriff's prison."

The Court intimated a wish, that as the defendant was a gentleman of fortune, his own recognizance might be received; but if not, the case being one of great moment, and requiring much consideration, they would hear further argument upon it.

* Perhaps it may be necessary to inform our readers, that Lord Norbury is reckoned a wit in Ireland.

WESTMINSTER REPRESENTATION.

An extremely crowded meeting was held on Tuesday at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, for the purpose of considering who is a fit person to be put in nomination to supply the vacancy which has occurred in the representation of Westminster.—At about one Sir F. Burdett entered the tavern. Mr. Hobhouse and Mr. Bruce accompanied him, who were all received with acclamations. Mr. Hunt had taken his place at the table a short time previously, amidst partial and ambiguous indications of the sentiments which prevailed respecting him.

Sir F. BURDETT having taken the Chair, observed that the public advertisement which had brought them together clearly explained that it was in consequence of the recent loss which they had sustained, and the necessity of supplying it. The occasion was undoubtedly most important, at the same time that the circumstances which led to it were awful and distressing. Before, however, he proceeded to commence the business of the day, he thought it right to disclose the contents of a letter which he had received from a gentleman who had considerable claims to their favour; and who would probably have been, in the event of his coming personally forward, the object of their choice. The gentleman to whom he alluded was Mr. D. Kinnaird, who had withdrawn himself entirely from their consideration as a candidate, by a statement which he was requested to communicate to them; and in which Mr. Kinnaird regretted that engagements, which he felt to be binding on him, would prevent his attendance at this meeting, and deprive him of the opportunity of paying his tribute of respect to the memory of their late representative, and of mixing his own with the general grief. The letter went on to say, that as his name might probably be mentioned, it was his earnest wish to have it made known as early as possible, that his duties towards the citizens of Westminster must be limited, as heretofore, to the character of an elector. As, therefore, (resumed Sir F. Burdett,) this gentleman had placed himself out of the question, it was incumbent on them to consider what other person it might be most advisable for them to nominate, in order to fill up the vacancy left by the death of their late lamented representative. It would be improper for him, in the situation which he now held, to offer any opinions of his own, with regard to the personal qualifications of individuals. It was his duty to attend to all that might be offered, and to collect impartially the sense of the room upon every proposition that should be submitted. It was not to be concealed that they were in a state of some danger; and of danger arising from a circumstance somewhat singular. The first difficulty which they had to surmount was not a want, but a variety of choice. Five or six names had already been mentioned to him, each of which he had reason to believe belonged to a man of independent and unexceptionable character. All appeared to him equally eligible; all had frequently been before the public eye, and were, he had not the shadow of a doubt, animated with the same spirit, prepared to answer the wishes of their constituents by faithfully discharging their own duty. They must be cautious, therefore, lest the embarrassment of their wealth itself should turn out to be the source of their weakness. (Loud applause.) It might be proper to remind them, that they incurred the risk, amidst all this variety, of disunion amongst themselves; and that the probable consequence of this disunion would be, that some Government tool would be forced upon them, to the lasting disgrace of Westminster, and to the damping of that spirit, and retarding that progress of reform, for which they had so long, and he hoped not ineffectually, contended. (Renewed applause.) With regard to their late representative, he found it impossible to pass over this opportunity of testifying at once his grief and his respect. To them, the electors of Westminster, as well as to the country at large, the loss which they had sustained was the more unfortunate, inasmuch as it was the loss of a man possessing the highest abilities and the purest character, at the moment which was best calculated to afford scope for the free play of his talents and integrity. He had been placed by their suffrages in a situation which would have enabled him to follow up his own enlightened schemes for the public good, without yielding to the authority of inferior minds, or finding his great exertions checked by the influence of party. Of this able and deeply lamented coadjutor he had been deprived, under circumstances, and at a time, when, although for his own honour and credit with posterity, and with reference to that measure of good which he had previously rendered to his country and to mankind, he had lived long enough, yet, nevertheless, at a time when, although his own glory was sufficiently established, he had it in his power to be of more service to the public than perhaps any other man. (Applause.) He had died full of honours for himself, leaving his countrymen filled with admiration and regret, and a name behind him which never could be mentioned without a sigh. (Applause.) In disburdening themselves, however, of their sense of this calamity, so far as to undertake the discharge of the duty which had devolved on them, it should still induce them to regard, with a more scrutinizing eye, the claims of every one who might be proposed to fill up so great a chasm. Above all things, he was desirous of impressing on their minds what he had touched upon at the outset of his address—that the difficulty consisted not in the paucity of those who were perfectly qualified to represent them, and might probably be submitted to their choice; but in selecting one from many, all of whom were possessed of claims equally satisfactory and indisputable. In the conduct of this selection it was that, unless they should act with unanimity, and rally around one individual, they would incur the hazard, if not the certainty, of a defeat by the influence of Government. (Applause.) Such was his respect for the several individuals whose names had been transmitted to him, that he could sincerely declare his opinion to be, that if those names were put in a balloting box, the first that might be drawn would be a very proper person to serve as their representative. But as some choice must be exercised, their first care should be to preserve unity amongst themselves. When one name was adopted, he hoped they would all steadily adhere to it, and that the friends of liberty would not again suffer themselves to be divided. (Applause.) Their grand and paramount interest on this occasion was to exhibit to the world a spirit of unanimity, both with a view to the preservation of their own character, and in order to prevent that dreadful evil to which disunion would necessarily lead—the debasement of their city, and the triumph of a venal and corrupt administration. (Loud applause.) Appealing, therefore, now to their indulgence, for having so long trespassed on their attention, he moved that they should proceed to the order of the day.

Mr. BRUCE observed, his object in now rising was to state, that he knew no man more capable of supplying the loss, and of maintaining with energy the same principles, than the gentleman whom he was about to nominate. He was known to them all by his active and unwearied exertions during the last election, in support of their Hon. Chairman, by the talents and promptitude displayed on more than one occasion, and by an eloquence which promised to render him one of the brightest ornaments of the Senate. After the first resolution therefore, which he held in his hand, and which expressed in general terms the purpose for which they were then assembled, it was his intention to submit a second, proposing John Hobhouse, Esq. as a fit and proper person to represent the city of Westminster in Parliament. (Applause.) Nothing but a sense of public duty, and he was not ashamed to state, in conjunction with that of private friendship, could have induced him to put that gentleman in nomination. But it did appear to him, that qualified as he was by literary talents, by general knowledge, and by zeal for their cause, they could not, on their part, perform a greater service to that cause than by giving him their unanimous support.

Mr. THELWALL begged it to be known that he was not actuated by any feeling of hostility to Sir Francis Burdett. When, after a long absence, an old acquaintance appears once more among his former friends, he may be excused for adverting to the circumstances which have kept him so long out of view. Twenty-one years had now elapsed since he withdrew from public notice, after having fought his way through bands of ruffians who wished to murder him. He then made a resolution not to interfere with political opinions in public, unless he should find himself independent from his professional exertions, or some public emergency should require that life itself was not too dear to be laid down in the public service. The first of these contingencies had been prevented, he believed, by the political feelings which he was known to cherish in private; and as to the second part of the dilemma, he believed that there was at present an emergency which affected every individual in the nation: If we look abroad, what do we see but an illegitimate bond of legitimacy, which links allied Sovereigns against the freedom of their people? But while we look abroad, let us not forget to look at home. What do we see but an attempt to establish military power? I believe I must not call it military despotism; that perhaps would be treason, and I do not wish to commit that crime again. (A laugh.) The situation of the country at this moment is of extreme importance. It is a reason why a man who has been silent for 21 years should open his mouth. (Signs of impatience, and cries of "Question.") If he deviated from the question, the Chair would call him to order. It was necessary to attend to the state of parties, particularly in Westminster. They could not have forgotten the proceedings at the late election. The division of the friends of liberty on that occasion had distressed him more than the loss of his own liberty had done. (Cries of "Question.") These divisions had threatened even the return of their old and faithful representative, the honourable Chairman, and the only independent member in the House. They obtained, indeed, a great victory ultimately, by returning him; but the effort was too late, because it did not put him in his proper place, at the head of the poll. (Applause.) Let them now take care, that the organized and drilled band of corruption did not rout the light infantry of reform, while divided and scattered. It appeared to him that the most certain mode of securing success would be, unanimity in favour of a person who would pledge himself to vote against the Minister. His own principle was, that if we cannot have a quatern, we should take a twopenny loaf rather than starve. Nothing is politically desirable but what is morally possible. Therefore let us take what we can get. We are the rallying point of reform, to which all the reformers through the kingdom look for an example. Who can co-operate with us? All who hate military power; even the Whigs themselves who are true to their principles. If we find a man who will act up to his principles, whatever degree of reform he pledges himself for, let us support him. But if we have divisions, the Minister will triumph; and, oh! what a triumph will that be! The biscuit-baker of the Minister will reproach us for returning a tool of Government. (Applause.) He would conclude with one word of advice. If there is a man who will attach himself to a leader of whom he knows nothing, but from whom he expects to receive his hire, let him excite divisions. If there is a man who has the love of his country in his heart, and who is anxious for reform, let him endeavour to preserve unanimity.

Mr. HOBHOUSE now rose and spoke to this effect:—

GENTLEMEN,—This morning I received a request from a respectable body of the electors of Westminster to attend the present meeting: had I not been so invited, I should not have presumed to be here, for I am not an elector. Such a request, and the resolutions you have just heard, I can attribute only to those exertions, humble indeed, but zealous, which I was permitted to add to those noble efforts that secured your triumph in the late contest for the independence of this great city. The last occasion of our meeting was on the eve of a victory; we are now as it were following a funeral. It was then much less embarrassing for me to address you: what I then had to say was on your behalf; I am now to speak on a subject on which of all others I am the least qualified or inclined to enlarge—on myself.—Electors of Westminster, you have heard me nominated to succeed the great man whom you have just lost; what may be the issue of that nomination I will not presume to foretell. The cause is your own; you are the best judges, and are most interested, as to the choice of the person who is to be the advocate of that cause. A friendly voice from amongst you has asked, who is he? I must answer this question negatively. I am not arrayed in the attractions which belong to many of the candidates for popular confidence; I am allied to no great family either by blood or connexion; I am the child of no party; I am the champion of no individual interests. On the other hand, I may add, that I am not known to you by any real disqualification. If I have lived hitherto in private life, I have been at least saved from the commission of any of those delinquencies, of which, unfortunately for England, consists the notoriety of the greater part of our public men. Allow me, if you will, to be young and inexperienced; it is surely better that I should be your pupil, than (as would perhaps be the case with a veteran politician,) you should be my dupe.—I stand here before you, Electors, with nothing to recommend me but my principles. What those principles are, I must presume to be known to the electors who proposed to nominate me, and indeed to all those with whom I had the honour to co-operate during the late election. To recapitulate all the articles of my political creed is more than you would desire or I should think requisite for the present occasion. There is one point, however, on which I conceive it to be my duty to be explicit, as I would not desire that my silence should obtain me a single vote, of which an honest declaration might deprive me. Gentlemen, I am (since your notice allows me to give myself a name), I am a Reformer; and when I use that word, I will not mince the matter: I will profess myself to allude to that Reform, which may at once strike at the root of the evil that threatens the dissolution of all our liberties.—I trust, Gentlemen, that in declaring myself a candidate, I do not infringe upon those principles of election purity which have secured the freedom and the triumph of Westminster. When the Honourable Chairman was proposed by the electors, and carried by them, in 1807, without any personal interference of his own, he had already been distinguished for a long course of political virtue, which rendered all previous interference between him and his constituents altogether unnecessary; but the case is far different with me. I have not the inordinate vanity to believe that my name circulated in a hand-bill, or chalked upon a wall, will at once give a key to my character, and bespeak the cause which I aspire to defend. It is my intention, therefore, to appear upon the hustings, that the electors may there question me as to the conduct which it is my intention to pursue, should I be placed, by their suffrages, in Parliament; that they may there say to me,—"Mr. Hobhouse, what do you propose to do for us, should we return you? what are your opinions on this or that, of the great political questions which so nearly concern all the electors and all the people of England?" To these and to any definite questions, I shall think myself bound to give a sincere answer; for it appears to my judgment, that the clamour raised against what is called demanding a pledge, has no foundation either in theory or in practice. Surely every elector has a right to demand the opinions of any candidate to whom he proposes to give his vote; and from the statement of an opinion to the delivery of a promise to act upon that opinion, the distance is too small to be observed, except by the eye of casuistry, and the difference is too trifling to be acted upon except by a dishonest man. As for the practice, it is resorted to even by the very persons from whom the accusation proceeds; and if every borough patron thinks himself entitled to prescribe the conduct, and come to the thorough knowledge of the nominee, who is to represent his influence? Shall not the freemen of Westminster dare to demand what services they are to expect from him who is to represent their rights? Gentlemen, you must do me the justice to believe, that I am not ignorant of the duties, of the difficulties, of the high office which it has been proposed to entrust to my hands: you must believe that I know how arduous it will be to fill a place before occupied by illustrious men; you must believe that I feel what is required from one who presumes to be the coadjutor of such a man as your present representative—of him who has attained the confidence and good will of his fellow-countrymen, to an extent to which I verily believe, and speak it from my heart and my conviction, no other individual has ever had the happiness to arrive:—of him who has shewn us that public virtue is not a mere dream, nor the patriot one of those imaginary beings whose existence must be confined to the fancied republics of the wise and good. But his example will rather aid than discourage me; and by having before me the living lesson, I may the more easily be instructed: by being what he is, I may know what I ought to be. I am fully aware that amongst the motives that induce me to present myself to your notice, is to be ranked the wish to acquire the good will and even the applause of my fellow-citizens. I own it, gentlemen—nor does such a desire appear to me an infirmity to be ridiculed and derided by the world, any more than it is to be concealed by myself. Since I could form a rational hope—since my mind first began to expand itself to the limits, whatever they may be, which it is allowed to reach, my principal object, at least as far as this existence is concerned, has been to merit and to obtain the approbation of my countrymen. I speak, however, of that fame which alone an honest man would covet—which none but honest men can confer: I speak not of that short-lived noisy repute, which begins where a truly valuable name should end, but of that reputation which an Englishman more than any man in the world knows how to prize—of that reputation which originates and spreads from the social circle, and like the genuine philanthropy defined by the poet, although it may, in the end, diffuse itself over the world, begins, in the first instance, at home. If there be any circumstance which diminishes the difficulty of the proposed enterprise, it may perhaps be found in the nature of the opposition which the Court has prepared against the assertion of your rights. You see, by an advertisement in the papers of this morning, that Sir Murray Maxwell is again chosen to be the instrument of the ministerial endeavours to convert this great portion of the metropolis,—this your city of Westminster,—into a cinque port—to reduce you to the degraded condition of an Admiralty Borough. I find Sir Murray Maxwell openly confessing that his purse and his person are in no condition to admit of his own interference on this second trial. I would not be supposed to make a mockery of the sickness of any man, least of all of that gallant Captain: but as he has been honest enough to tell us by an implication not to be mistaken, that his pocket received some rude shocks in the encounter with the freemen of Westminster, I shall as candidly own, that although I shall rejoice to hear of his bodily health, it would afford me equal dissatisfaction to be told of his pecuniary convalescence. It is not uncharitable to say, that I hope his purse will never recover from a disease incurred by an imprudence, to say the least of it, which that gentleman himself appears now to deplore. We should, however, thank him for his confession, as it plainly avows what were the means resorted to by this candidate to persuade the electors of the propriety of returning him to Parliament. Without the slightest personal disrespect for that gentleman, I must say that it appears to me altogether unaccountable that a gallant sea officer (for they are all gallant), one of those to whom we look for the best security of our liberties, should allow himself to be made the tool of the vilest and most contemptible administration that ever engaged in the unhallowed project of subverting the institutions, breaking down the spirit, and finally changing the character of our free and glorious islanders; and of assimilating them in manners, as well as in laws, to the barrack-bowed nations of the continent. His conduct does indeed appear to me to be quite incongruous with his character; he seems to forget that the hustings is not his quarter-deck; that he cannot introduce the discipline of a man of war amongst the freemen of Westminster; and that he wears his uniform at Covent-garden with about as much propriety as one of you, Gentlemen, might venture to make a Crown and Anchor oration from the poop of the Captain's own frigate. We have heard much and have profited much by the bravery of British seamen, but I do think, Gentlemen, that Sir M. Maxwell is the boldest of the bold, when he again exposes himself to the indignation of all the friends of liberty in Westminster, and indeed in all England, and modestly requests you to surrender for his use, benefit, and promotion, a trust which has been for many years reposed in hands that have employed it solely for the protection of your rights and interests. I trust that his reappearance will not be saluted by any thing harder than words, and that he will not be spoken to with sticks and stones:—he must however be told the truth, since he exposes himself to hear it; and I must be permitted to say, that although as a gentleman and an officer he should be received with every deference, he is, as a candidate for Westminster, entitled to no respect, and, as far as language can correct his intrusion, should be treated with none. He knows as well as you do, that he is set up in opposition to the feelings of a very great majority of the Electors. He knows as well as you do, the disgraceful means used to fill his numbers at the late poll. My situation amongst you at the late Election brought me acquainted with those scandalous transactions, and he shall be told of them at the re-election. But I forget, it seems, that the Captain himself will not come. I suppose, then, that he will at least send his First Lieutenant to the hustings. Should you see any such person among you, you will, doubtless, show every attention to the cloth, but will regard the wearer with just such sentiments as the nature, and motive, and end of his enterprise may seem to deserve.—Nothing, certainly, can be more striking than the contrast of the different grounds on which I am brought before you, and of those on which Sir M. Maxwell appeared at first, and again presumes to stand. He is sent by an odious and contemptible Government, to act for that Government, and against you. His opponent will be called for by you, to act for you, and against those wicked powerful men, who in fact are the only friends of Revolution to be found in this country. By them has private confidence been shaken; by their spies and informers have all the bonds of social life been loosened or destroyed; the suspicions, the fears, the hatreds, which they spread into every circle, and amongst all classes, have filled these unfortunate kingdoms with discontent, confusion, and dismay.—Yes, Gentlemen, it is now, if at any time, indispensably necessary that you should do your utmost to counteract the encroachments of despotism, and infuse a new spirit into that once healthy constitution which vicious practices have reduced to the last stages of decay. The first and best expedient is to choose a man who shall fairly represent your opinions and speak your wishes. To give effect to your first selection, you should be sure that it is founded upon that union which you have heard recommended from the Chair. If in my person you should suppose that the best chance of resisting the efforts of power shall be found, I shall contribute every exertion to justify your choice: if now, or at any time previous to the contest, I shall ascertain that the struggle should be confided to other hands, I shall withdraw, in obedience to the only voice that, as a public man, I will ever obey,—that of the people.—Should I be elected, I shall be the work of your hands alone; to you alone shall all my gratitude be due; for you alone will every effort be employed. To you I shall look for support, for advice, for admonition, and for orders; for certainly, Gentlemen, if a Representative is not to represent his Constituents; if he is not to be the organ of their injunctions,—his name is misapplied, his office has been hitherto misunderstood. In your hands I leave the question, and retire from a discussion during which I could not well be present without embarrassing you and distressing myself.—(During this speech, the Electors repeatedly evinced their approbation by loud applause, and at the conclusion, the room resounded with continued peals.)

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT now put the first resolution, which expressed that the man of their choice should support the claims to short Parliaments, and a full, free, and equal representation. It was carried unanimously.

Mr. JENKINS proposed W. Cobbett, Esq. as a fit person to represent them in Parliament. (Great confusion.)

Mr. HUNT presented himself, and infinitely increased the confusion.

The CHAIRMAN observed, that they would save time, as well as conduct the business of the day to a beneficial issue, by listening with fairness to every Gentleman who addressed them; there would otherwise be neither usefulness nor respectability in their public meetings.

Mr. HUNT was still received with every ungrateful noise. He hoped it would never go forth that such an assembly had refused to hear an Englishman. He thought they ought to have known his character too well (Much laughter and cries of "Yes.") to suppose that he could be put down in ten minutes. It had been justly said, that their weakness was in division. He agreed in that opinion, and his object was to prevent division. His friends had intended to propose him, but his answer was "No; if no other man comes forward to resist Sir Murray Maxwell, I am at your service; but if any other person on whom all agree shall come forward, in God's name let me not interfere." He should speak of Mr. Hobhouse with freedom, with liberty; but he trusted with moderation. Was he any relation of Sir Benjamin Hobhouse? (His son.) Was he the son of that Sir Benjamin Hobhouse who, at a public dinner in that room, had kissed the hand of Lord Holland from veneration to Whig principles, and soon afterwards joined the present wicked administration? Was he the son of that Sir Benjamin Hobhouse who had been forso many years Chairman of Mr. Pitt's committees? Was he the son of that Sir Benjamin Hobhouse, who had been a traitor to the cause of liberty, and gone over to the banners of slavery? Was he the son of that Sir Benjamin Hobhouse, who had 1,500l. or 2,000l. a year as Commissioner of the Nabob of Arcot's debts? He wished to ask likewise, what Mr. Hobhouse had been doing for the last ten years, and in what respect he had been of service to the people of Westminster? He was not desirous of visiting the sins of the father on his children, although this was one of the principles of the religion which he professed; but he thought it impossible that Mr. Hobhouse should unite their votes, or satisfy their expectations. A gentleman had proposed Mr. Cobbett, now an alien from his native land through the oppressive measures of the Government; and a man of greater abilities or political honesty they could not elect.—(Hisses and groanings.) Mr. Cobbett was, if they should think proper to support him, willing to undertake the task of representing their rights and interests in Parliament; and for the purpose of bringing that question to issue, he would second the nomination. (Loud disapprobation.) He would take this opportunity also of referring to a letter, read by Mr. Cleary on the hustings at the last election, and which purported to be a letter from Mr. Cobbett, in 1808, in which, speaking of him (Mr. Hunt), he was described as a sad fellow, who rode about the country with another man's wife, having deserted his own.

The noise and interruption were at this moment so excessive as effectually to stop the progress of the speaker's explanation.

Sir F. BURDETT entreated a patient hearing. He implored them to pay an impartial attention to what fell from every gentleman. It would give him infinite pain to find himself compelled to leave the chair, from his inability to maintain the order and decorum of their proceedings. (Applause.)

Mr. HUNT then resumed. It was not surprising, if, after the villainous attacks which he had borne, he was now desirous of vindicating himself from the foulest calumny of them all. Mr. Cobbett had declared publicly, through the medium of a Liverpool newspaper, that he had never written the letter in question, and that it was an entire forgery.

Mr. CLEARY stated that he had the letter in his possession, and would produce it before them in half an hour; and he immediately left the room for that purpose.

Mr. WISHART, after some observations on the virtues and public spirit evinced on so many critical occasions by the House of Bedford, proposed as a candidate for their suffrages the second son of the present Duke, Lord John Russell. The electors of Westminster could not forget the interest taken in the maintenance of their rights by the late Francis Duke of Bedford, his personal exertions, or his willing attendance at their meetings both there and in Palace-yard. The present Duke of Bedford had always supported the same principles, had always lent his aid to the election of their favourite representative, and had, by his contribution to Mr. Hone, and his uniform hostility to a bad Government, been recently deprived of the honour of the Lord-Lieutenancy of his native county. With respect to Lord John himself, it was well known that he had made a speech in Parliament on the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, equally creditable to his head and his heart. It was proper for him, however, to state, that if their choice should appear to incline in preference to any other individual, Lord John was determined not to impede or interfere with the exercise of it. (Applause.)

Mr. THELWALL took this opportunity of saying, that the political opinions of Mr. Hobhouse's ancestors could be no wise prejudicial to him (Mr. Hobhouse,) since it was well known that he had been proscribed by his family on account of his independent sentiments. (Great applause.)

Mr. STURCH put a question of order.

Sir F. BURDETT explained. The first question was that alluded to by Mr. Sturch, namely, whether Mr. Hobhouse was a fit person to be returned; the second was the amendment proposing Mr. Cobbett; and the third was another amendment, proposing Lord John Russell. He thought it the fairest way to allow every person to propose any candidate he thought proper, and then to put the question seriatim.

Mr. STURCH acquiesced, although he was not aware till now that Mr. Wishart's motion was an amendment. He must take up their time for a moment, while he stated that he had had no concern in calling this meeting. He was desirous that this should be known, because, during the last few days, he had received a great number of letters, advising him how to act on this occasion. He had been stopped by people in the street, who wished to know from him who was to be elected. It would appear from this, that some thought him a more important man than he really was. (Question.) He wished those who called for the question would ask themselves whether, if they brought forward Mr. Hobhouse, they would fulfil the wishes of the electors of Westminster, and of the nation at large? He maintained that they would not. (Disapprobation.) He did not mean any thing against the talents or principles of Mr. Hobhouse, because he was ignorant of both. Till Mr. Kinnaird came forward, Mr. Hobhouse was unknown. He exerted himself also for Sir Francis Burdett; but he opposed Sir Samuel Romilly. He would not go the length of Mr. Hunt, in saying that the sins of the father should be visited on the son; but he must say that he had seen Mr. Hobhouse's father standing on a table and making such a speech as Mr. Hunt had ascribed to him. He would maintain that the feeling of his being an untried man, would operate on the electors out of doors; and that, if Government brought forward any Tory, whether Sir Murray Maxwell or any other person, and Mr. Hobhouse were the only candidate opposed to him, Government would triumph. He should conclude with one word of advice. He was aware that delays were dangerous; but precipitation was still more dangerous. He therefore recommended that they should not come to any decision at present, but allow the electors at least a fortnight longer to look out for a proper person.

Mr. PITT hoped that the electors of Westminster would act as a body, and not be led away by any set of men. He was as much against division as any one could be; and therefore he proposed, if they wished to keep out the Court candidate, that every elector, as he quitted the room, should put down his name, in order to form a broad and expanded committee for the purpose of preventing division. Because Mr. Hobhouse comes here and makes a great display of talent, we are not to decide that he is the only proper person. He did not scruple to say, that the getting up of Mr. Hobhouse was a rank job.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT wished to know if any other person was desirous to address the meeting. (Loud and repeated calls for Mr. Wooler.)—Sir Francis said, he was desired by Mr. Wooler to state that he was not an elector, and that he had nothing to say on the question.

Mr. GALE JONES presented himself on the table, but was hooted off without a hearing.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT again addressed the meeting. His friend Mr. Sturch had advised them to pause, and not to come to any decision at present. Had he known, before he left the country, that he should travel to London for the purpose of deciding that nothing should be done, he should certainly have thought that he was going on what was commonly called "a fool's errand." What reason had they to delay? The object they had to consider was not merely the election of a Candidate for Westminster; no; the object was the support of those principles for which he and they, for a period of 25 years, had been contending. Mr. Sturch had been seconded in his advice of delay by Mr. Pitt, who had recommended the appointment of a committee on an extended principle. This plan, which is said to have the support of union for its object, is the very plan which the enemies of union would adopt. (Applause.) One principle which had been adverted to in the discussions of this day, reminded him of the fable, in which a hungry wolf, wishing to devour a lamb, and having no pretext for quarrelling with the innocent creature itself, very conveniently remembered that the parent of the lamb had once offended him. (Loud applause.) He could conceive no greater pledge for political integrity, than that a man of Mr. Hobhouse's warm heart—(chair, chair, from Mr. Hunt.) He was bound to state such remarks as a sense of duty dictated. With regard to Mr. Hobhouse, he repeated, that no greater pledge of principle could be given, than that a man of tender feelings and warm heart should renounce the connection and brave the displeasures of his family. To start obstacles, and to do nothing to obviate them, was not to do service to the cause. His youth, which had been objected to, would improve. There was no risk of disappointment in that. But there was no risk of his disappointing them as to the principles he had avowed there that day, and on a former occasion. It had been asked what he had been doing for the last ten years. He was, as every young man ought to be, laudably employed in improving his own mind. From that pursuit he had been called to offer himself for a situation which he could not have expected, for it was only by a most unfortunate calamity that it was put within his reach. In cultivating his mind he had not cultivated a sterile soil. It had produced fruits to be judged of by Europe. He was not therefore unknown; and if he were, in these days of tergiversation, treachery, and intrigue, it was no small praise not to be known for combinations against the people. (Applause.) A gentleman had remarked, that we had no other motive for returning him but the eloquent speech he made. That was not a bad motive. The man who was to be their voice in another place should be qualified to speak eloquently. Let none assert that there were no proofs of his talents. Both his pen and his tongue had proved his talents, and he would dare always to maintain the principles which he had avowed. The pretensions of Mr. Hobhouse were not small; on pretensions alone he was equal to any that could be named. He knew but one individual superior in pretensions to Mr. Hobhouse, and that was Major Cartwright. It was not an invidious comparison that influenced him, but he felt for various reasons that it was impossible to carry Major Cartwright. (Great applause.) His admiration for him, for his excellent character, and for his unswerving exertions for the liberty of England and of Europe, was strong and unalterable. There was also Mr. Fawkes, of Yorkshire; and there was Sir Charles Wolesey, a Baronet, whom he rejoiced to see advocating the people's part, for there were not many of them (of the baronetage) who took this turn. Of Lord John Russell they knew not so much as of Mr. Hobhouse; but that Englishman's heart must be cold when the name of Russell, Sydney, and of Hampden ceased to operate as a charm. (Applause.) It had been asked if any had heard Lord John Russell's speech on the suspension. He had heard it, and paid to it at the time his tribute of applause and thanks. He had only one observation to make respecting Lord John Russell—he was already in the House of Commons. (Applause.) However highly he estimated the character of Frances Duke of Bedford, and however willingly he paid homage to the present Duke, he thought it better to send another to the House to fight by the side of Lord John Russell. (Applause.) The committee had been accused of dictating. What was every body's business was nobody's. The committee had no power or reward, they had nothing but the labouring oar. They could do nothing without their approbation; and but for them there would have been no meeting to-day. They suffered in their purses as well as in their persons. This he knew; for he saw their accounts. Who then were the usurping junta? What power had they got? They had been blamed at last election for doing nothing. Those charges were ludicrous and absurd. They were to pause in coming to a decision, because he supposed they were so few!

although the largest room in the kingdom was crammed even in the passages. In God's name, let them be decisive. He should say little of Mr. Cobbett, because as he had written against him he might be supposed to have angry feelings respecting him. He had none. He had always read his writings with much gratification, and he regretted much that the country was deprived of his talents in support of public principles by, he would say, the oppression and infamy of the Government, which forced him into another country. (Great applause.) Mr. Hobhouse would willingly have surrendered his ambition to Mr. Kinnaird, if he had stood forward, and would have been most active to promote his success. Mr. Hobhouse was now proposed for their choice. If he forsook the principles he professed, shame attached to him; but they had acted consistently in supporting a man who avowed the principles which they all adopted, and which they were anxious to render every where triumphant. They were old enough to judge for themselves; and he hoped they would not separate till they adopted decisive measures. (Applause.)

[Mr. Cobbett's letter, which Mr. Hunt had stated to be a forgery, was now produced.—Sir F. BURDETT said, he believed it to be Mr. Cobbett's hand-writing.—Mr. HUNT pronounced it a forgery.—Sir F. BURDETT said, that Mr. Cleary, whose eye had been deceived by it, as his would have been, and Mr. Hunt had nothing further to do with the question, which rested entirely between Mr. Cobbett and Mr. Wright, formerly the printer of his Register.]

Mr. Cobbett being put as the amendment of the nomination, about six hands were seen in different parts of the room. Mr. Hobhouse had a large if not universal show of hands. Lord John Russell had very few.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT said, that every one would be satisfied with the impartiality of his conduct, although his private feelings were particularly engaged. As to Lord John Russell, he was satisfied that many of his friends had declined to show their hands for him, knowing that he would not come forward to divide them. That was the reason that so few hands had been shown for him. Unless he was blind, he felt no hesitation in saying that Mr. Hobhouse was chosen by an immense majority.

Mr. HUNT.—I declare that Mr. Hobhouse had an immense majority. If he could finally gain his election he had not the least objection, and he should not stand in his way. He requested his friends, if there were any, to do every thing in their power to support Mr. Hobhouse.

The 3d resolution respecting the appointment of a committee was then put, and carried unanimously, and thanks were voted to the Chairman.

Sir F. BURDETT said he had the honour of returning his best thanks, and of expressing his gratification that he had been able to conduct the meeting in a manner, he trusted, satisfactory to all parties. (Great applause.)

The Meeting, which was excessively crowded during the whole time, broke up a quarter before five.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

A report having been circulated on Thursday, that Mr. Horsley's child had been discovered, and that the robber was in custody, a crowd was attracted in Bow-street: it turned out, however, to be another stolen child, who had been recovered; a woman named Mary Anne Gregory having been brought to the office, charged with stealing Mr. Hedgway's child, only 19 months old, from Kent-street, in the Borough.—William Nisbet, street-keeper, stated, that on Thursday afternoon, observing a crowd of people assembled near St. Clement's Church, and going among them, he found that the prisoner had been stopped in consequence of her answering the description given of her having stolen a child. She confessed to him that she had dropped the child in Chancery-lane, and on searching her he found a bead which she confessed to belong to a necklace which was on the child. He soon after learnt that the child had been found.—Mrs. Plush, the wife of Mr. Plush, a plumber, in Chancery-lane, stated, that on Thursday afternoon, several persons were collected about her house in consequence of a child having been left in her passage, the door being open. The child was nearly dead with cold. She wrapped it in a blanket and laid it before the fire, and in a short time it began to recover. Shortly after a woman entered her house, claiming the child, and the infant, on hearing her voice, raised himself, and knew his mother, who had been distracted since Tuesday at the loss of him. The mother stated that she keeps a lodging-house in Kent-street, in the Borough. On Tuesday she sent her son out with the child, and the prisoner met him, and obtained the child by a false representation. She, her husband, and a friend, had been in pursuit of the child nearly ever since. The child had been robbed of its shirt, boots, petticoat, feather, and necklace, only the frock remaining; and the feet, ankles, and legs, were a most shocking spectacle from scars and blisters: it was supposed they had been occasioned by excessive cold.—The prisoner was committed for further examination.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MOST REMARKABLE SUICIDES.—It has fallen to our lot to record one of the most lamentable and most singular instances of self-destruction we ever heard of. The names of the unhappy men are John and Lancelot Younghusband. They were most respectable farmers at Heckley Grange, near Alnwick. The eldest was verging on 70 years of age, and the youngest not less than 60. They were always together; never known to be at variance: their feelings and actions the same. On the morning of Tuesday, between nine and ten o'clock, while one of them was giving instructions to a boy plunging, the other brother approached, and asked, "Are you ready?" Being answered in the affirmative, they left the field together. At dinner they were missing, but this created little alarm. Evening arrived, and they did not appear. This naturally excited fearful apprehensions, and a servant was sent, when the dreadful discovery was made that they were no longer in existence. They were lying distant from each other only a few yards, each having his throat cut, and a razor near his body. A watch was also found beside one of them, from which it may be inferred that they had resolved to die at the same moment. There was not the least appearance of scuffle, nor any room for suspicion that they had been murdered by others. A Jury was summoned, and continued to hold inquest, adjournments intervening, till Thursday, when a verdict of felo de se was returned. The farming stock and utensils were then valued, and the bodies were buried at midnight on Saturday, on cross-roads near the church. Unseasonable as the hour was, the interment was numerously attended. All seem to allow the justice of the verdict, though all seem to lament it. The friends of the deceased attempted to prove insanity, but failed entirely: their greatest efforts being unable even to establish previous melancholy. The act appears to have been some time premeditated. A hair-dresser who was called before the Jury, identified the razors found near the bodies as having been brought to him to sharpen on the Saturday before. This melancholy event, for which no satisfactory cause has been assigned, will long remain in the recollection of all who have heard of it, and never be forgotten by the inhabitants of Alnwick.—Tyne Mercury.

On Monday week, an inquisition was taken at Framlingham, Suffolk, on view of the body of Mary, the wife of John Smith, who was unfortunately killed on Sunday morning; her husband had on the Saturday endeavoured to discharge his gun, but as it would not go off, he set it down in his room loaded, and went from home early on the following morning; about seven o'clock, his wife being busy making the fire, and her little favourite boy, a child about ten years old, playing in the room, he took up a gun, (which was a long one, and he could scarcely hold it out) when it went off, and the contents were lodged in his mother's head, which caused her instant death. Verdict—Accidental death.

An inquest was held on Thursday on the body of Mr. Wm. Gale, of New-court, Shoreditch, who hanged himself in a state of mental derangement. It came out in evidence, that if timely medical assistance had been afforded, he might have been recovered.—The Coroner, therefore, and the Jury expressed their utmost abhorrence of the inhumanity of those medical practitioners who had been applied to and refused to attend. (Their names are said to be, Eaton and Blaythwaite.)

The Cornwall Gazette says—"A few days since, the younger son of Mr. T. Binney, of St. Eval, about 17 years old, on occasion of some dispute with his brother, stabbed him with a knife in the side. The young man, aged about 21, lingered till the following Saturday, when he expired. The Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of Manslaughter."

THE LONDON MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Nov. 23, 1818.

Notwithstanding the ports are continued open for the importation of Wheat from all countries, and the supply large this morning from Essex, Kent, and Suffolk, yet the major part of what appeared from these counties was taken off at the prices of this day week, and fine Foreign fully maintains last week's prices. The arrivals of Barley, both English and Foreign, being very considerable, the sale of that article was heavy, at the reduction of 1s. from the prices obtained on Friday; but fine samples found buyers on the same terms as on Monday.—Oats are 1s. dearer, but not brisk sale at the advance.—In Pease and Beans there is no alteration.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 555.

A FEW MORE WORDS ON THE LATE QUEEN.

WE say a few more words on this subject, for reasons which they will easily explain. We would willingly have said nothing at all as far as the individual is concerned; but we could not well avoid it; and the foolish mortification of the ministerialists, who neither know how to muster up eulogies on the occasion, nor to put up with contradictions which they provoke, endeavours to keep the subject before the public eye. They do not care for it, in point of fact, a jot more than most people. It is indeed a sad jest in them to pretend a veneration for the dead mother of a family, who have been described by them as a set of "great babies fit only to fill up ball-rooms." But though they will insult power themselves when it ventures to differ with a greater power,—with the usurping dictatorship of Boroughmongers,—yet when the people venture to have an opinion now and then not perfectly worshipful to any body who is or has been in possession of authority, then the idea of power must be vindicated and made sacred at any rate. The Morning Post may help to spoil Princes with the most gross adulation, and if you expose it's absurdity, you shall be put in prison. The Courier, on the other hand, if Princes happen to disagree for an instant with Ministers, may call them "great babies fit only to fill up ball-rooms; and whether you expose it or not, the Courier shall be safe; nay, you yourself, for noticing such little irritable vagaries on the part of the sharers of power, or their servants, shall be followed perhaps with all the petty barkings and howling pain of the literary turnspits about St. James's;—Heaven save their convulsive little throats!

We should not allude to matters of this collateral nature, but that others will have them alluded to. When we are compelled to speak of any public persons, we would willingly speak of them as we do of others, and judge them according to the impression they have made upon the public and ourselves;—but no;—in comes an indifferent-faced courtier, with a black border to his newspaper coat, making the most miserable attempts to look wretched, and insists that we shall all mourn, admire, and eulogize, whether we can or not. The people in short must take every thing for granted with respect to Princes and Queens, though the Boroughmongers do not; and this will no longer do. It is too late in the day. The gratuitous merits of royalty have vanished with it's old costume and with general political ignorance. Princes and Queens must excite admiration and love as other people excite it,—by admirable and loveable qualities. People in general are still quite ready enough to give them credit for such qualities, if they have the least encouragement; but they must have something to go upon; they must have some few rays of warmth striking upon them, before they take the hidden lustre for granted. Above all, when a Prince or a Queen has reigned upwards of 50 years, they must have something like a general impression of real and not negative qualities,—something, in all that period, to have excited yearnings of gratitude and affection,—before they can praise her memory and lament her loss. A Queen who in the course of a long reign has made no such impression on the people, has almost as little right to their remembrances as a mother who has left no tender impression on her family. Yet what magnificent stories have the ministerial papers scraped together in order to supply the loss! About three or four at most; all of them unauthenticated; some of them of an equivocal sort, which were generous or not, according as we know the details; and one of them, which is mightily trumpeted, redounding to her absolute dishonour. All that we have found in the course of the week are published in our present number; the other we repeat from our last. "One of the most esteemed and conspicuous traits of the late Queen's character," says the half-witted writer, "was the strictness with which she consulted the moral decency of the Court." (As if there were no moral decency but negative ones! and as if none of the morally indecent,—seducers and misers, &c. were admitted there!—But to continue.) "Her fine reply to Lady —, when soliciting her Majesty for permission to present Lady —, and when refused, saying, she did not know what to tell her disappointed friend, will long be remembered and respected;—" Tell her," said the QUEEN, "you did not dare to ask me."—Now we do not maintain, for our parts, that the QUEEN actually uttered this vain and vicious nonsense; but her would-be eulogizers say she did, and repeat it triumphantly; and we can only tell them, that if this is "moral decency," then moral decency comprises arrogance and lying. "Tell her," said the QUEEN, "you did not dare to ask me;"—that is to say,—"Tell yourself that you ought not to have dared to ask me what you dare to ask of God; and tell her—a downright filshood."

We can admire Queens well enough, as well as other women, when we find them admirable and possessing the best virtues of their sex. We can admire the talents of ELIZABETH, the conscious virtue of CATHARINE of Arragon, the genius and want of bigotry of MARGARET of Valois, the lovely and patient wisdom of Lady JANE GREY, the devoted tenderness of CALPURNIA, ARTEMISIA, and others, and the homely but not less heroic womanhood of her Majesty's predecessor Queen CAROLINE, who used to strengthen her weak and painful legs with dangerous applications, in order that she might never fail to accompany her husband in his walks. But—

We are fairly sick of this subject, and must have done with it.—We shall only take this opportunity of adding, that the QUEEN, who was bred up at one of those petty German Courts that have become proverbial for pride and narrowness, had most probably a very bad education, as hollow, as low, and as dry as a chalk-pit. This is the best thing that can be said for her want of better reputation;—and we say it accordingly.

CASE OF DON DIEGO CORREA.

To his Majesty the King of Spain.

SIR,—General Smith, the Ex-Governor of this place, delivered me, in May 1814, to your Majesty's Consul, supposing me to have entered fraudulently.

The late Captain-General of Cadiz, Don Juan Maria Villavicencio, and the disloyal Ex-Minister of your Majesty, Don Pedro Macanaz, sentenced me to ten years' imprisonment in Ceuta, from the sinister interpretation given to my considerate and respectful letter addressed to your Majesty on the 10th of the same month, without attending to my defence.

The charges adduced are unjust and criminal; my honour has been insulted, my health debilitated, my interests destroyed, and my sons, both officers of merit, and my wife, sacrificed with impunity. I have been treated with the most dreadful rigour, loaded with chains and fetters, and doomed to perish in disgraceful confinement.

The first is entirely refuted, by the original passport with which I departed from Cadiz and entered this place: it was taken at the moment of my apprehension, and is found in the illegal process, of which I have an authenticated copy, and to which I refer.

Thus circumstanced, I made a representation to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of England, and through his mediation was reclaimed and restored, without the slightest obstacle or responsibility, to this place.

In order to refute the second charge, his proofs and attestations, worthy of royal consideration, your Majesty (if you deem it convenient) will please to order an entire copy to be given me of the paper in question, together with the documents and royal dispatches justificatory of my patriotic conduct, which were inserted in the process.

I am profoundly convinced, Sir, that your Majesty will not deny me a favour consistent with equity and justice; on the contrary, your Majesty will be pleased to concede to me your royal determination for the guidance of the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty near your Majesty, by which I may return to the Spanish territory, and to my native country, which I abandoned with the loyal view of saving your Majesty from captivity, and of serving the country in its most imminent danger. The proofs, Sir, of these eternal truths are indelible. They are twenty-one wounds received on the field of honour and immortality, by three innocent victims, whose generous blood and particular services appeal to the Divine Omnipotence for just vengeance, like that of virtuous Abel.

Heaven preserve the royal person of your Majesty many years, &c.

DIEGO CORREA.

Gibraltar, June 6, 1816.To the Minister Plenipotentiary.

SIR,—I entreat your Excellency to give such direction as may seem meet to your superior pleasure, to the annexed reverential exposition, which I prefer to the royal consideration of his Catholic Majesty Ferdinand VII., conformably to your Excellency's respectable answer of the 27th ult., and the reasons which occasion it.

Persuaded of the noble and equitable character of your Excellency, I implored the compassion which humanity and justice dictate; to the religious generosity of the virtuous gentleman, Aaron Cardoso, I owe my actual existence in Gibraltar.

As the four American individuals were relieved by the Governor of this place, as he has informed me, they immediately arrived at this destination in consideration of their indigent state. I had just grounds for expecting to find myself in the same predicament.

All my afflictions will disappear at the happy moment when I shall have the honour to render my services and gratitude to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of England, and inform him of my case and circumstances with the dignity and candour which my patriotic services and cruel destination require.

Gibraltar, June 6, 1816.

DIEGO CORREA.

To Don Diego Correa, &c.Madrid, June 13, 1816.

SIR,—I have just received your letter of the 6th instant, and I have the honour to return to you the memorial enclosed in it, addressed to his Catholic Majesty.

I consider myself fortunate in having had some influence in restoring to you your liberty; but I must decline mediating any further in your favour with the Spanish Government.

God preserve you many years.—Your obedient servant,

CHARLES R. VAUGHAN.

To Don Diego Correa.Gibraltar, Aug. 29, 1816.

SIR,—I beg to inform you, that I have received a communication from Earl Bathurst, his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, authorizing the discharge of such debts as may have been contracted by you here, provided they are to a moderate amount, and likewise for the payment of the expenses of your passage to England; but his Lordship desires that it may be distinctly understood, that on your arrival in England you will not receive any further support or assistance whatever from his Majesty's Government. I therefore conclude, that you will immediately avail yourself of the means now afforded you, and I am ready to comply with his Lordship's directions to that effect, provided your stay in this garrison is not unnecessarily protracted.—I am, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GEO. DON, Governor.

To his Excellency General Geo. Don, Governor of Gibraltar, &c.Gibraltar, Aug. 30, 1816.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR,—After two years of reiterated wrongs and insupportable sufferings, immersed in dungeons and loaded with fetters and chains, I had the happiness of being restored to this place, through the magnanimous generosity of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of England. At the moment of my arrival, I implored the noble patronage of your Excellency during my indigent condition. Your Excellency could not assign me a slight pecuniary relief for my subsistence, in consequence of having no orders from the British Government.

In circumstances so peremptory and pressing, I wrote without delay to my native country (the Canaries) directing property to the value of 5000 dollars to be sacrificed for 3000. With these funds, your Excellency, I expected to undertake my voyage to England, with the intention of paying the homage of my gratitude to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent. Meantime, the above-mentioned portion of what I possess was only adequate to reimburse various sums to those who, through disinterested humanity, relieved my urgent and obvious necessities (whose acts are easy to be proved); it is not possible for me to realize it.

These, General, are the sole and important reasons which induce me to remain in this place, and neither the conduct observed, nor the delicacy of my principles, can occasion me to quit it, unless your Excellency so determine; the slightest intimation on your part shall be to me an inviolable precept.

So far I am enabled to state to your Excellency, in reply to the honourable letter which your Excellency deigned to address me yesterday; and meantime I pray Heaven to extend the life of your Excellency many happy years.

DIEGO CORREA.

DECLARATION.

Gibraltar, Nov. 3, 1816.

I the undersigned do declare, that on the 15th May, 1814, I was, in company with the Town-Major of this garrison (Major Frazer) being then his Clerk, at the arrest of Don Antonio Poigblanc and Don Diego Correa, in the house of Nicolas Gadusa, Ship Tavern, and that he was taken from the said tavern, per force of arms, to the main-guard of this place, where he underwent an investigation by the Civil Secretary (Stedman) interpreted by Mr. Martin, his clerk, who took down his depositions; and I further declare, that if my affidavit was required, I would swear that the above gentlemen entered this garrison under the names that they were arrested, and not under fictitious names as asserted, and that they consented to their imprisonment without the slightest resentment, except that Correa remonstrated in his own language, saying, "That he was under the protection of the British flag, and ought not to be molested by any information from Spain."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Nov. 20.—The Government has a project for ameliorating the establishments now existing at Cayenne, for the purpose of cultivating, on a large scale, the vegetable productions of the Indies. Plants are to be naturalized in Guyana, to be afterwards transported to Europe. French Guyana will thus become a sort of entrepot for all that relates to natural history.

A subscription has been opened in Paris, for the erection of a monument at Cambray to the memory of the immortal author of Telemachus.

Under the article "London" will be found extracts from the English journals, relative to the despatches brought to England by the sloop Musquito, which arrived in 39 days from St. Helena. The contradictory reports, to which the arrival of this vessel gave rise, appeared to us so vague and uncertain, that we deferred, till now, placing them under the eyes of our readers. In fact, the Courier speaks of a project for escaping, which the Morning Chronicle and other opposition journals deny. In the midst of these contradictions, it appears certain that the whole rests upon a correspondence with St. Helena, intercepted by Sir Hudson Lowe, Governor of that island. As nothing has transpired respecting the despatches from Sir Hudson Lowe, we are ignorant of the nature of this correspondence, or what individuals may be implicated in it. If it had for its object an attempt to escape, that project has been defeated by the seizure of the correspondence itself. In fact, it appears from private letters brought by the Musquito, that there had not been the slightest commencement towards executing such a plan, nor even the slightest attempt, as they were ignorant at St. Helena even of the correspondence being intercepted. These letters speak of no new measure being adopted for the safe custody of the prisoner, and they all say that things remain just as they were at Longwood. Hence, Bonaparte is still a prisoner at St. Helena, and will continue so.—Monitor.

Nov. 21.—Of all the young men who have as yet been brought before the Correctional Police, for having, during the several ballots for recruits at the Hotel de Ville, exhibited seditious colours, only one who carried an actual tri-coloured cockade has been condemned. Two others, whose case was not so serious, were set at liberty this morning. They had ornamented their hats with three coloured ribands, but had not formed cockades.

COURT OF CASSATION.

Nov. 20.—Can a citizen be compelled to hang out tapestry on the front of his house, while the external ceremonies of the Catholic worship are performing?—Such was the question brought before the Court, by an appeal from the Sieur Roman, a Protestant, against a judgment of the Correctional Tribunal of Police of Gap, which condemned him to a fine of six francs for not having obeyed an edict of the Mayor of Lourmarin, ordering the inhabitants to cover the fronts of their houses, in those streets through which the Holy Sacrament might pass, during the procession of the Fete Dieu.—Mr. Odilon Barrot observed that the constituent assembly, and, after it, all other constituted authorities, had proclaimed the principle of religious freedom; and had completely separated questions of religion from those connected with civil and political rights. The charter had confirmed these principles by proclaiming anew, that every citizen is free with regard to his worship; and that all religions are equally protected.—We therefore still live under the influence of the principle rendered sacred by the Constituent Assembly; a principle which places a man's religion out of the jurisdiction of the law. When the law is neutral, the civil authority must necessarily be the same, and cannot interfere with different religions, except to give them equal protection. It cannot, therefore, associate itself with the ceremonies of any one particular worship; and still less can it compel a citizen to participate in ceremonies against his will, and in disregard of the scruples of his conscience. The Advocate-General, M. Grand Duplessis, on the part of the Crown, coincided in the arguments which had been adduced by the complainant's counsel, for the repeal of the judgment of the Tribunal of Gap.—The Court, after a long deliberation, pronounced a judgment said to be most "strongly worded," by which it annulled the judgment complained of, and decided that the Municipal authorities have no right to make a rule for constraining citizens to cover the fronts of their houses on occasions of religious ceremonies.—M. Maron, and other members of the Reformed Church of Paris, were among the auditory present at the hearing of this important cause, thus so equitably and satisfactorily decided.

NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 21.—It is with great astonishment that we read in the Journal de Frankfort, of the 17th of this month, the following article, dated Brussels the 12th: "A plot has just been discovered, the object of which was nothing less than to seize the Emperor Alexander on his journey hither, and to force him, under pain of death, to declare the Duke of Reichstadt (young Napoleon) Emperor of France, and her Majesty the Duchess of Parma, Regent. The conspirators had got proclamations printed, on which they depended to excite an insurrection. Several of them have been arrested, and they are almost all Frenchmen. This plot is supposed to have extensive ramifications."

STATE PAPERS.

COPY OF THE NOTE ADDRESSED TO THE DUKE OF RICHELIEU BY THE PLENIPOTENTIARIES OF THE COURTS OF AUSTRIA, GREAT BRITAIN, PRUSSIA, AND RUSSIA, ON THE 4TH OF NOV., 1818.

"The undersigned Ministers of the Cabinets of Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, have received orders from their august masters to address to his Excellency the Duke of Richelieu the following communication:—

"Called upon, by article 5 of the treaty of the 20th of November, 1815, to examine, in concert with his Majesty the King of France, whether the military occupation of a part of the French territory, stipulated by the said treaty, might cease at the end of the third year, or ought to be prolonged to the end of the fifth, their Majesties the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of all the Russias, have repaired to Aix-la-Chapelle, and have charged their Ministers to assemble there, in conference with the Plenipotentiaries of their Majesties the King of France and the King of Great Britain, in order to proceed to the examination of this important question.

"In this examination the attention of the Ministers and Plenipotentiaries had for its particular object the internal situation of France; and had to be also directed to the execution of the engagements contracted by the French Government, with the co-subscribing Powers to the treaty of the 20th of November, 1815.

"The internal state of France having long been the subject of serious deliberations in the cabinets, and the Plenipotentiaries assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle having mutually communicated the opinions which they had formed in that respect, the august Sovereigns, after having weighed these opinions in their wisdom, have recognised with satisfaction, that the order of things happily established in France, by the restoration of the legitimate and constitutional monarchy, and the success which has hitherto crowned the paternal care of his Most Christian Majesty, fully justify the hope of a progressive consolidation of that order of things, so essential to the repose and prosperity of France, and so intimately connected with the great interests of Europe.

"With regard to the execution of the engagements, the communications which, since the opening of the conferences, the Plenipotentiary of his Most Christian Majesty has addressed to the Ministers of the other Powers have left no doubt on this question, as they prove that the French Government has fulfilled, with the most scrupulous and honourable punctuality, all the clauses of the treaties and conventions of the 20th of November; and propose, with respect to those clauses the fulfilment of which was reserved for more remote periods, arrangements which are satisfactory to all the contracting parties.

"Such being the results of the examination of these grave questions, their Imperial and Royal Majesties congratulated themselves at having only to listen to those sentiments and those personal wishes which induced them to put an end to a measure, which disastrous circumstances, and the necessity of providing for their own security, and that of Europe, could alone have dictated.

"From that moment the august Sovereigns resolved to cause the military occupation of the French territory to be discontinued; and the convention of the 9th of October sanctioned this resolution. They regard this solemn act as the compleatment of the general peace.

"Considering now, as the first of their duties, to preserve to their people the benefits which that peace assures to them, and to maintain in all their integrity the transactions which have established and consolidated it, their Imperial and Royal Majesties flatter themselves that his most Christian Majesty, animated by the same sentiments, will receive with the interest which he attaches to every thing tender to the welfare of mankind and to the glory and prosperity of his country, the proposition which their Imperial and Royal Majesties address to him, to unite henceforth his councils and his efforts to those which they will not cease to devote to so salutary a work.

"The undersigned, charged to request the Duke of Richelieu to convey the wish of their august Sovereigns to the knowledge of the King his master, at the same time invite his Excellency to take part in their present and future deliberations, consecrated to the maintenance of the peace, the treaties on which it is founded, the rights and mutual relations established or confirmed by these treaties, and recognized by all the European Powers.

"In transmitting to the Duke of Richelieu this solemn proof of the confidence which their august Sovereigns have placed in the wisdom of the King of France, and in the fidelity of the French nation, the undersigned are ordered to add the expression of the unalterable attachment which their Imperial and Royal Majesties profess towards the person of his Most Christian Majesty and his family, and of the sincere interest which they never cease to take in the tranquillity and happiness of his kingdom.

"They have the honour, at the same time, to offer to the Duke of Richelieu the assurance of their very particular consideration.

COPY OF THE NOTE OF M. THE DUKE OF RICHELIEU, IN ANSWER TO THAT OF THE PLENIPOTENTIARIES OF THE COURTS OF AUSTRIA, OF GREAT BRITAIN, OF PRUSSIA, AND OF RUSSIA.

"The undersigned, Minister and Secretary of State to his Most Christian Majesty, has received the communication which their Excellencies the Ministers of the Cabinets of Austria, of Great Britain, of Prussia, and of Russia, did him the honour of addressing to him on the 4th of this month, by order of their august Sovereigns. He hastened to make it known to the King his master. His Majesty has received with real satisfaction this new proof of the confidence and friendship of the Sovereigns who have taken part in the deliberations at Aix-la-Chapelle. The justice which they render to his constant cares for the happiness of France, and above all to the loyalty of his people, has deeply touched his heart. Looking back to the past, and observing that at no other period no other nation has been able to fulfil with a more scrupulous fidelity engagements such as France had contracted, the King has felt, that it was indebted for this new kind of glory to the influence of the institutions which governs it; and he sees with joy, that the consolidation of these institutions is considered by his august Allies to be no less advantageous to the repose of Europe, than essential to the prosperity of France. Considering that the first of his duties is to endeavour to perpetuate and augment, by all the means in his power, the benefits which the complete re-establishment of general peace promises to all nations; persuaded that the intimate union of governments is the surest pledge of its duration; and that France, which could not remain a stranger to a system, the whole force of which must spring from a perfect unanimity of principle and action, will join the association with her characteristic frankness; and that her concurrence must add strength to the well-founded hope of the happy results which such an alliance must produce for the benefit of mankind, his Most Christian Majesty most readily assents to the proposal made to him of uniting his councils and his efforts with those of their Majesties the Emperor of Austria, the King of Great Britain, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of all the Russias, for the purpose of accomplishing the salutary work which they have in view. He has, therefore, authorized the undersigned to take part in all the deliberations of their Ministers and Plenipotentiaries, for the object of consolidating the peace, of securing the maintenance of the treaties on which it rests, and of guaranteeing the mutual rights and relations established by these same treaties, and recognized by all the states of Europe.

"The undersigned, while he begs their Excellencies to have the goodness to transmit to their august Sovereigns the expression of the intentions and sentiments of the King his master, has the honour of offering them the assurance of his highest consideration.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Nov. 12, 1818.

"RICHELIEU."

PROTOCOL SIGNED AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, ON THE 15TH NOV. 1818, BY THE PLENIPOTENTIARIES OF THE COURTS OF AUSTRIA, FRANCE, GREAT BRITAIN, PRUSSIA, AND RUSSIA.

"The Ministers of Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, as a consequence of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention signed on the 9th of October, relative to the evacuation of the French territory by the foreign troops, and after having addressed to each other the notes, of which copies are subjoined, have assembled in conference, to take into consideration the relations which ought to be established, in the existing state of things, between France and the co-subscribing Powers of the treaty of peace of the 20th of November, 1815—relations which, by securing to France the place that belongs to her in the system of Europe, will bind her more closely to the pacific and benevolent views in which all the Sovereigns participate, and will thus consolidate the general tranquillity.

"After having maturely investigated the conservative principles of the great interests which constitute the order of things established, under the auspices of Divine Providence, in Europe, by the treaty of Paris of the 30th of May, 1814, the reces of Vienna, and the treaty of Peace of the year 1815, the Courts subscribing the present act, do, in consequence, unanimously acknowledge and declare—

"1. That they are firmly resolved never to depart, neither in their mutual relations, nor in those which connect them with other states, from the principles of intimate union which has hitherto decided over all their common relations and interests—a union rendered more strong and indissoluble by the bonds of Christian fraternity which the Sovereigns have formed among themselves.

"2. That this union, which is the more real and durable, inasmuch as it depends on no separate interest or temporary combination, can only have for its object the maintenance of general peace, founded on a religious respect for the engagements contained in the treaties, and for the whole of the rights resulting therefrom.

"3. That France, associated with other Powers by the restoration of the legitimate Monarchical and Constitutional Power, engages henceforth to concur in the maintenance and consolidation of a system which has given peace to Europe, and assured its duration.

"4. That if, for the better attaining the above declared object, the Powers which have concurred in the present act should judge it necessary to establish particular meetings, either of the Sovereigns themselves, or of their respective Ministers and Plenipotentiaries, to treat in common of their proper interests, in so far as they have reference to the object of their present deliberations, the time and place of these meetings shall, on each occasion, be previously fixed, by means of diplomatic communications; and that in the case of these meetings having for their object affairs specially connected with the interests of the other States of Europe, they shall only take place in consequence of a formal invitation on the part of such of those States as the said affairs may concern, and under the express reservation of their right of direct participation therein, either directly or by their Plenipotentiaries.

"That the resolutions contained in the present act shall be made known to all the Courts of Europe, by the subjoined declaration, which shall be considered as sanctioned by the Protocol, and forming part thereof.

"Done in quintuple, and reciprocally exchanged in the original, by the subscribing Cabinets.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Nov. 15, 1818.

(Signed) "METTERNICH, RICHELIEU, CASTLEREAGH,
WELLINGTON, HARDENBERG, BERNSTORFF, NESSELRODE, CAPO D'ISTRIA."

DECLARATION.

"Now that the pacification of Europe is accomplished, by the resolution of withdrawing the foreign troops from the French territory; and now that there is an end of those measures of precaution which deplorable events had rendered necessary, the Ministers and Plenipotentiaries of their Majesties the Emperor of Austria, the King of France, the King of Great Britain, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of all the Russias, have received orders from their Sovereigns, to make known to all the Courts of Europe the results of their meeting at Aix-la-Chapelle, and with that view to publish the following declaration:—

"The convention of the 9th of October, which definitively regulated the execution of the engagements agreed to in the treaty of peace of November 20, 1815, is considered by the Sovereigns who concurred therein as the accomplishment of the work of peace, and as the completion of the political system destined to ensure its solidity.

* The names of the Powers are put alphabetically.

"The intimate union established among the Monarchs, who are joint parties to this system, by their own principles, no less than by the interests of their people, offers to Europe the most sacred pledge of its future tranquillity.

"The object of this union is as simple as it is great and salutary. It does not tend to any new political combination—to any change in the relations sanctioned by existing treaties. Calm and consistent in its proceedings, it has no other object than the maintenance of peace, and the security of those transactions on which the peace was founded and consolidated.

"The Sovereigns, in forming this august union, have regarded as its fundamental basis their invariable resolution never to depart, either among themselves or in their relations with other States, from the strictest observation of the principles of the right of nations; principles which, in their application to a state of permanent peace, can alone effectually guarantee the independence of each government and the stability of the general association.

"Faithful to these principles, the Sovereigns will maintain them equally in those meetings at which they may be personally present, or in those which shall take place among their Ministers; whether it shall be their object to discuss in common their own interests, or whether they take cognizance of questions in which other governments shall formally claim their interference. The same spirit which will direct their councils and reign in their diplomatic communications, shall preside also at these meetings; and the repose of the world shall be constantly their motive and their end.

"It is with such sentiments that the Sovereigns have consummated the work to which they were called. They will not cease to labour for its confirmation and perfection. They solemnly acknowledge, that their duties towards God and the people whom they govern, make it peremptory on them to give to the world, as far as in their power, an example of justice, of concord, of moderation; happy in the power of consecrating, from henceforth, all their efforts to the protection of the acts of peace, to the increase of the internal prosperity of their States, and to the awakening of those sentiments of religion and morality, whose empire has been but too much enfeebled by the misfortune of the times.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 22.

THE Congress is now said to have terminated its business. The King of PRUSSIA quitted Aix-la-Chapelle yesterday week, having issued a bulletin of his own declaring himself indisposed. This perhaps was to anticipate the public curiosity respecting his going away just as the Emperor of RUSSIA was about to return,—which has an odd appearance certainly. ALEXANDER was to arrive the next evening, and finally set off the day following through Cologne. The Emperor of AUSTRIA had departed some days before.

When the business of Congress however is said to be terminated, it most probably means that such business only as the Sovereigns think of any great importance is terminated,—that is to say, the evacuation of France, and the ratification of their Holy Brotherhood. The feebler potentates are to scramble on, we suppose, for what they can get, like the upper servants after a feast.

In the mean time they have published the long expected Documents which were to tell us such grand and consolatory things; and the Ministerial papers find them infinitely grand and consolatory accordingly, reeling with an intoxication of delight between their inability to speak contemptuously enough of popular dreams of perfectibility, and their inconsistent candour to hold up these sovereign documents as tending to produce "all and more than the most benevolent imagination can picture to itself of social felicity!"—But we shall enter at large into this subject in our next week's first article. A good deal is certainly to be found out in these documents by implication; but on the face of them, and we suspect according to their intention, they really say nothing more than what we have just mentioned, viz. that France is evacuated, and that the Sovereigns are resolved to be a Holy Brotherhood,—fast Anti-Jacobin Jacobin friends for life,—“true, till death (or the drum-major) us do part.” The day before these documents arrive, it is related in the same Newspapers which doat upon their Millenium tendencies, that the Empress-Dowager of Russia, in her visit to the Dutch Royal Family at Brussels, made the Prince's infant son put on a Russian uniform which she had sent him, and present arms. Thus is ambition sown into the first dawn of the mind; and then the odium of the bloody harvest is palmed upon every body but the “legitimate.”

A new candidate has started for Westminster, who seems to have the way a good deal cleared before him. It is Mr. HOBHOUSE, well known to the public for his friendship with Lord BYRON, his travels in Albania, and his Letters from France during the close of NAPOLEON's Reign. Mr. BROUGHAM, to whom many eyes were turned as the probable successor of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, has declined occupying the seat of his late excellent friend. He probably feels also that he has a more useful and exemplary task to perform in ridding his native county of the despotism of the LOWRIERS,—an object only inferior to his noble efforts in the cause of intellectual charity. Major CARTWRIGHT, with a modesty proportioned to his inflexible spirit in every other mode of pursuing Reform, has also declined hazarding the division of his political brethren. Sir MURRAY MAXWELL has consented to be put up again, if his nominators choose, but not in person; and as it seems pretty evident that the gallant Captain prefers fighting with England's enemies than its friends, and the ministerialists and courtiers had a stout lesson given to them in his former failure, they will probably not take up the cause with such ardour as before. Mr. Bristol HUNT puts up Mr. CONNERT, but evidently for no purpose than to make something like a distant hint of a sensation; and we think it injudicious in Mr. CONNERT to suffer this kind of trifling, which by making him appear weak in his own person can only serve to hurt the effect of his powerful writings. Mr. KINNAIRD avowedly makes way for his friend the new candidate; he also furnishes 100*l.* towards defraying the expenses of his election; and Sir F. BURDETT, adopting the same, contributes the large sum of 1000*l.* We cannot well conceive a more favourable stage left for Mr. HOBHOUSE to combat Ministerial influence upon; nor do any of the objections apply to him which have been made against the several reforming Candidates hitherto, and divided the efforts of the common cause. It was objected to Major CARTWRIGHT, that he was too old and infirm to make any exertion in Parliament; Mr. HOBHOUSE is young and strong, as well as ardent. Mr. Bristol HUNT was said to be a mere Mobbite;—Mr. HOB-

HOUSE is a man of family, though he even differs with it on politics. Mr. KINNAIRD, it was urged, was not publicly known;—Mr. HOBHOUSE is very well known. Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, with all his good qualities and efforts, was a professed Whig; and this is a season, when Westminster should exhibit all her special reputation for independence;—Mr. HOBHOUSE is a decided Reformer. Add to this, that he has never yet been in Parliament; and that he has long been honoured with the rage and revilement of the scribes in the pay of authority; and youth, strength, ardour, family, reputation, and a love of Reform which the Courtiers represent as amounting to the revolutionary, seem to comprise all the parliamentary qualities which are demanded by all the Reformers, Sir FRANCIS BURDETT and Mr. CONNERT included.

A Supplement to the Gazette of last Tuesday was published yesterday morning, containing dispatches from Bombay. The greater part of them has already appeared. The dispatches from the Governor in Council at Bombay, dated June 22d, and 15th July, further announce, the unconditional surrender of the fort and district of Vezeadroog to the British Government, which completes the conquest of the southern Concan; and that by letters received from Seroor, it appears that the garrison of Malligaum had surrendered to Lieut.-Col. M'DOWALL.

A courier is arrived here (at Aix-la-Chapelle) from Prince METTERNICH, who states that a tumult had broken out at Brussels on the arrival of that Minister at the capital of the ci-devant Austrian Netherlands. The report is, that the people surrounded the hotel of the Minister, using seditious cries, and calling for the restoration of the Austrian sway. If this report has any foundation, it would appear that Brussels is now in a state of considerable agitation, probably created by those restless and turbulent refugees to whom it offered an asylum.—Times—Private Correspondent.

During the stay of General GOURGAUD at the Three Cups, at Harwich, he was strictly guarded, but he conducted himself in a very orderly manner. He sent for the Mayor of the town, to question him as to the legality of his being carried away in so forcible a manner. He is thirty-four years of age, thin made, about five feet seven inches in stature, and possessed of a most penetrating and intelligent eye. When taken, he had a brace of pistols in his room, loaded to the razzles, and a dagger, which he usually wore round his neck, the edges of which were like a razor, and were brought to an exceeding fine point. He accompanied BONAPARTE, with whom he was a great favourite, as his Aid-de-Camp, in every engagement within the last fifteen years, having entered the army at the age of eighteen. When the General landed at Cuxhaven he was immediately set at liberty.—Courier.

Lord MULGRAVE, it is said, retires from the Master-Generalship of the Ordnance. The uncertain state of his Lordship's health is assigned as the cause. We are not without hopes, that the salary of this office may, at least in time of peace, be saved to the public, by the amalgamation of the duties with those of some other bureau.—Times.

The packet of London newspapers addressed to the Glasgow Coffee-room was on Monday charged 10*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* of postage, as a shipping list (which does not bear the Government stamp, which entitles a newspaper to franking,) was contained in it. That the subscribers might not be disappointed, the demand was paid. This morning, however, the charge was repeated, when payment was refused. In the mean time private individuals have, as far as possible, furnished the coffee-room with London papers. The charge was made in London.—Glasgow Chronicle.

The following statement is taken from the Genoa Gazette.—"On the 10th September, Mr. JONES, the American Consul General at Tripoli, went out to hunt with his Secretary, the Danish Consul, and a Janissary. Being separated from his companions, he was attacked by three Moors of the Admiral MOURAT-RAIS, who struck him several times with the but-ends of their muskets, knocked him down, and would have murdered him, had it not been for the return of his companions. The Consul was conveyed, covered with blood, to the Palace of the Pacha, who promised every reparation that should be required, and then convoked all the Consuls at his country-house, to consult with them. In the mean time MOURAT-RAIS, who is an English Renegado, and the private enemy of Mr. JONES, took refuge at the house of the British Consul, who granted him an asylum, and refused to deliver him up to the Pacha. By the advice of the other Consuls, MOURAT-RAIS was exiled, one of the Moors was sentenced to death, and of the two others, one had his hands cut off, and the other received a hundred blows by bastinado. Mr. JONES transmitted information of the circumstances to the American Consul at Tunis, who immediately sent off the American squadron then in that port. The appearance of the squadron before Tripoli excited much surprise, but as the American flag was still hoisted on the house of the American Consul, a parley was entered into, and after several communications, the American Admiral sent off a messenger to the United States with a report of what had happened."

There has been an elopement from Paris of an English young lady. A few days ago a Captain GORDON ran away with Miss BLANEY, daughter of Lady BLANEY. They went off for Normandy, and they say that the ceremony was performed by an English clergyman at Caen. This might satisfy the conscience of the lady, but by the law of England is no marriage, which can be only legally performed in the hotel of the British Ambassador.—Morning Chronicle.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, as the Ministerial papers inform us, is very ill indeed. We have long wished him better.

PORTSMOUTH BANK.—It was stated on Friday at Guildhall, that the Notes of this firm in circulation were believed to be under 90,000l.; but that in consequence of the Crown Process against the PERSONS of the Partners in this House, they could not attend at Guildhall to give those explanations to the creditors which they were so anxious to make.

A Correspondent informs us—"Mr. BRAHAM, in consequence of the most brilliant prospects and tempting offers made to him will, in the course of next spring, visit Petersburg, Vienna, and Paris, after which he will proceed to Italy, when he will make the tour of the principal theatres. Mr. B's. last engagement in Italy was at Venice, in the year 1800. Mr. B. has just refused an offer of a very liberal engagement at Drury-lane Theatre, which is much to be regretted, as he might have been of infinite service to that concern."

The following instance of barbarity, perpetrated by some robbers in this county, a few days back, will be read with horror:—A poor labouring man, driving a cart, was met near Waltham Cross by three men, who demanded his money; he presented all he had, which amounted to 2s. 3d. The villains being disappointed at the trifling value of their booty, beat the unfortunate labourer most unmercifully, and after knocking him down, carried him by his shoulders and heels, placed him under the wheel of the cart, and drove the horses on. He was found a considerable time afterwards, lying in the road, lacerated and bruised in a shocking manner, and was conveyed to the nearest workhouse, where he lies without hopes of recovery.—Essex Paper.

CASE OF DISTRESS.—A man of education and respectability is compelled by most unfortunate circumstances to solicit most respectfully, though with painful reluctance, the assistance of the affluent and humane. For a long period he has experienced great privations, in consequence of severe disappointments, that have almost broken his heart; and the only chance which has offered itself of enabling him to support himself and family is now in danger of being lost for ever; his afflicted wife, unable to leave her bed, which she has kept for months; his little earnings taken away by domestic illness, and what he had reserved for other purposes exhausted, leaving him in utter inability to retain his residence, and preserve himself and family, from inevitable destitution and all its lamentable consequences. Some speedy assistance, at this period, would be most gratefully received and acknowledged. Reference for his respectability, education, and misfortunes, at Mr. McDOWAL's, printer, Pemberton-row, Gough-square, Fleet-street, London, where donations will be received, and his name and residence stated.

MR. ALDERMAN GOODBEHERE.—The remains of this late worthy Alderman were on Friday interred in the family vault at Lambeth church. The body was conveyed, about one o'clock, from his late residence, China-terrace, in a hearse and four, followed by four mourning coaches, in one of which were Mr. Alderman WOOD and Mr. Alderman WATMAN. It was intended to have been very private, his most intimate friends only being invited; but his numerous acquaintance wishing to pay every respect to his memory, the funeral was followed by a vast string of carriages.

FRENCH ARDOUR.—The worthy Founder of the National Benevolent Society for the relief of aged females of the middle class, has published a very useful little work under the title of "How to enjoy Paris." Mr. HERVE, however, has omitted to point out to his readers the mode which he himself appears principally to have relied upon for ensuring pleasant feelings at Paris—and that is, to take abroad with you a taste for simple pleasures and a kind heart.—Speaking of the gardens of the Tuileries, our author says—"In these gardens also, in the deep gloom of the remote parts, I have observed (more frequently than in England) the overcharged heart pour forth its distress into the bosom of a condoling friend; the studious sage, tired of the world's insignificance, fly for repose with his chosen book; and here, like me, the admiring stranger inclining his mind to sympathise with all. The French excite a powerful interest in the heart of a spectator from the ardour of their pursuits. The vivacity in the crowded promenade, each narrator seeming to engage the powers of wit and the charms of sensibility to secure attention, has no sooner communicated a joyful animation to an observer, than two persons in a distant walk, by their violent emotion and gestures, evidently denote poignant suffering, and attract his eye; whilst the hurried step and despairing countenance of a figure that has crossed the path to avoid the crowd and struck into an unfrequented bower, spread an alarm for his fate; it is instantly recollected that suicides frequently occur among the Parisians."

THE STOLEN CHILD.—We understand that information has been received from Mr. HORSLEY, who is near Antwerp, and within a few miles of his child and Rennell.

Our readers are desired to discredit the statement in our last, of a methodist preacher being stopt near Spalding by four highwaymen, whom he defeated. The account we published accorded with the story circulated by the divine himself, but we have since discovered it to be false. The truth is this:—a fellow of Spalding had been preaching at Weston Hills, and was returning home "drunk as David's sow," when he reeled against some post upon the road, which he magnified into men on reaching home, and heroically boasted of exploits he had never performed.—Stamford News.

PUBLIC MOURNING.—What does the Deputy Earl-Marshal mean by issuing his "order" for a general mourning? "Mark you his absolute shall." Are the Court so fond of the mere shadow of power, or would it be maintained that this custom had existed so long as to make it part of that heterogeneous mass called Common Law? It may be said that this is a trifle; but it is one of those appearances of authority to which an encroaching government accustoms the minds of the people, in order that the exercise of it may be assumed with less difficulty. It is besides an attempt to prevent the expression of public feeling, and ought therefore to be resisted. These "orders" come forth on all occasions; we are to mourn for all the Royal deceased, popular and unpopular; whether it is for a beloved and lamented Princess, or a Queen whose character commands neither love nor respect. We have no objection that the real sorrow of the nation should be evinced by "outward and visible signs," but it would be useful if a marked distinction were made between different persons. To those who argue that rank should be revered on its own account, it may be answered that what is indiscriminately applied to all can not be considered as a mark of respect to any individual. Even if this distinction were made, it is such as should not be used in a free country.

NEW JUDGES.—WILLIAM DRAPER BEST, Esq. is appointed one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench; and RICHARD RICHARDSON, Esq. one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Sergeant COPLEY is expected to be the new Chief-Justice of Chester, vice Mr. Sergeant BEST.

The action brought by Mr. HALL against Lord RANELAGH, for assault and false imprisonment, we understand will be the first brought on for trial to-morrow morning at the Sessions House in Clerkenwell.

MOST EXTRAORDINARY SUICIDES.—The very singular end of the two Brothers, named YOUNGHUSBAND, was noticed in our last. JOHN, the eldest, a bachelor, was 70 years old; LAMONT was 65; he has left a widow and a daughter. The Newcastle paper says, "they were men of most sober habits, and remarkable for their constant attendance at Church"—"This is fortunate, or they would have been denounced by the Pharisees as freethinkers, deists, and atheists."—"They were buried, (adds the account) on the 15th, in a footpath leading from Baillifgate to Walkergate, Alnwick—and within the churchyard. This not being considered sufficient compliance with the terms of the statute, an order was given by the Magistrates"—(the names of these worthies are not given)—"that the sentence of the law should be carried strictly into execution." That is, that their remains should be buried in a cross road, and stakes driven through them!—"The bodies (concludes the account) were accordingly taken up on Monday, and buried again, amidst a great concourse of people, in a highway called Hindling-lane, not far from the spot where they committed the fatal act." And all this is done "in the most enlightened country in the world."—But this is not the worst. It is not enough that the relatives and wife and daughter of the deceased should be annoyed and afflicted with these disgusting acts—it is not enough that they should have lost the society and protection of their dearest associates. No; the law will not suffer their misfortunes to end here; for as the sentence of "Felo de se" has been pronounced, the whole property of the deceased is to be confiscated to the Crown;—so that wife and child, and dependants, however numerous and destitute, in addition to their other bitter sufferings, are to be abandoned to all the miseries of poverty!—Well may the excellent BENTHAM have exclaimed, "Thus, in pouring forth Law, does the Government, as it is written, rain down snares."—How long will Humanity and Justice call in vain for the cessation of these fearful and revolting absurdities?

NEW STREET AFFAIRS.—A pamphlet has been published on the New-Street Concerns, which contains much curious information, official and non-official, respecting this costly business. It appears from this "Exposition" that the favoured builder, Mr. NASH, had given an estimate of the expense of the New-Street which was not half the amount of that named by Messrs. LEVERTON and CHAWNER. As the New-Street Commissioners, like all other virtuous public officers, were most economically inclined, Mr. NASH's cheap plan was adopted. But, somehow or other, it seems that, after all, the expenditure under Mr. N. will be considerably above even that named by Messrs. L. and C. What a mistake for the ablest of Commissioners! We should like to hear their defence; Mr. NASH's, it appears from the Writer of the Exposition, resembles that of "the Doctors of Babylon, who, when ZADIG's eye got well, wrote books to prove that it ought to have fallen out, because they had so prognosticated at first."

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT has contributed a thousand pounds to assist in defraying the expenses of the ensuing struggle in Westminster, as the following Letter will show:—

"Kirby-Park, Nov. 26. 1818.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg leave to transmit a draft for 1000*l.* for the expenses of Mr. HOBBHOUSE's Election, and to state to the Committee my readiness to attend them, in any way they may think useful, for securing the independence of Westminster. I remain, dear Sir, yours, very sincerely,

FRANCIS BURDETT."

"Mr. S. Brooks, Chairman of the Westminster Election."

It is understood that nearly two thousand pounds have already been subscribed. The Whigs, it is said, do not mean to put up any Candidate.

We are told that at a late meeting of the friends of Sir M. MAXWELL, it was proposed, that each person should subscribe 100*gs.* towards his election expenses. This proposition, it is added, was scarcely made, when the room was nearly abandoned.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

THE LATE QUEEN.

"They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low; they are taken out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn."—Job.

THE QUEEN enjoyed an income of 50,000*l.* a-year, for more than 50 years, and her habits approached the parsimonious. She would accept presents, it is said, from any body, though she very seldom made any. She is reported to have left 3000*l.* only—which people can scarcely believe. Had she not monies in various continental banks—and may not the dispersion of her children abroad have reference to this fact? Some people suppose, that to have left a royal will, exhibiting an enormous accumulation of money during a period of unexampled national distress, would have been a rather unseemly thing, and so the matter has been otherwise ordered.

The funeral of her MAJESTY is to be as private as possible, consistent with the exalted rank of the illustrious Personage; but as the QUEEN of England cannot be buried privately, under any circumstances, so much of the solemn pomp only will be dispensed with as has been practised on former occasions. The remains of her late MAJESTY will lie in state in Kew-palace; but owing to the small and contracted state of the building, there cannot possibly be an admission of the public at large; but admissions will be by tickets. The large dining-room or hall, as it was called by the KING, and the small sitting-room adjoining it, have been deemed the best calculated for the purpose. The part of the dining-room or hall deemed best calculated for the remains lying in state, was a recess, in which was an organ, a great favourite of the King's, but which has, for this occasion, been taken to pieces with all its complicated mechanism, and which was also removed to the new building. When we say the organ was a favourite of the King's, we wish to avoid being misunderstood that he played on it, as he neither played on that instrument, pianoforte, or harpsichord, although so many ridiculous stories have been published about his performances on these instruments.—Court Circular.

The hearse will be drawn by eight of her late MAJESTY's black horses, and driven by her state coachman. This being the funeral of a Queen, no mourning-coaches are to follow, nor any but Royal carriages, including the King's, the late Queen's, and the PRINCE REGENT's, drawn by black horses; none of the Royal Family will attend till the procession arrives at Frogmore. The QUEEN's carriages are to be filled by Mrs. BECKENBOROUGH and other attendants of the late QUEEN. Numerous detachments from the Life Guards, the Royal Horse Guards, with their bands, are to form part of the procession. It is expected that a party of the Lancers will lead the procession, which will proceed at a very slow walking pace, till they arrive at Frogmore, whence the roads and streets leading to St. George's Chapel will be lined with the Foot-guards, under arms, every sixth man holding a lighted flambeau. The procession will be formed at Frogmore, as it is to enter St. George's Chapel, with the exception of those who will join it at Windsor-castle. The PRINCE REGENT will enter as chief-mourner, upon which occasion his Royal Highness is to have four Marquisses to hold up his train. The hearse is to be guarded by the King's body guard, forty of the Yeomen of the guard, who are to appear in mourning, of black cloth, made exactly the same as their scarlet uniform, with the same embroidered arms and ornaments. They are to carry their arms in a reversed position. The QUEEN's crown is to be carried on a cushion covered with black. Her late MAJESTY's pall is to be held by six Dukes. The PRINCE REGENT is to sit at the head of the coffin, the Chamberlain at the feet. The Marquisses to hold up the REGENT's train, and the Royal attendants, will stand during the last awful ceremony.—Court Circular.

The Royal carriages which are to go in the procession from Kew, are commanded to be there at a quarter before nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, to prevent any confusion arising. The procession is to halt for about an hour at Longford, and the time of arrival at St. George's Chapel is not to exceed a quarter past eight o'clock. Preparations are making for the hanging of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, with black, previous to the day of the funeral, to which melancholy ceremony a great number of the nobility are invited.—Court Circular.

When the late failure of the bank at Windsor happened, the largest portion of the lower order of inhabitants were thrown into great distress by having one or more of their 14. notes in their possession, with which the sustenance of their families for the ensuing week was to be provided. Her MAJESTY no sooner heard of this calamitous circumstance, than she ordered her Deputy Treasurer to provide 400*l.* in small Bank of England notes, and immediately to exchange all the Windsor notes for them. The Princesses personally assisted therein with inexpressible delight.—Courier.

On an application to her late MAJESTY for a subscription to the funds of the Female Penitentiary, she was pleased to observe, that she very much approved of the design, and wished it all possible success,—adding, she had no doubt her good subjects would support it. Not a sixpence, however, was obtained.—We have this anecdote from good authority.—The Princess of WALES afterwards became Patroness of the Institution.

General TAYLOR, who was of the dinner party at Cambridge-house, Kew, on Wednesday, met with a very serious accident in returning to the palace. The General, after having dined at the table of the Princesses, always returns to the palace through the Botanic-gardens, to the door of which, at the extremity of the Birdcage-walk, he has a key. On Wednesday night, immediately after the departure of the PRINCE REGENT, he left Cambridge-house unattended, and, in passing along one of the avenues, owing to the darkness, fell over some gardening implements, and fractured the small bone of the right fore arm, and also received a considerable injury in the knee. Mr. JULIUS, of Richmond, was immediately sent for, and the fracture, after some time, was reduced. The General was able to walk out yesterday morning and pay his respects to the Princesses; but the accident is considerably unfortunate at the present moment, as in his capacity of Private Secretary to the King and her late MAJESTY, a considerable portion of responsibility in the approaching solemnities devolves upon him. Ever since the death of her MAJESTY, the General, and two of his Secretaries, have been almost constantly employed in writing.—Courier—Thursday.

It is denied that her Royal Highness the Duchess of YORK is to hold the Courts in future. The PRINCE REGENT will soon remove to Buckingham-house, where he will remain, until some meditated improvements in his present residence shall be accomplished. When Carlton-house is again fitted for his reception, Buckingham-house will be very probably given to the Duke and Duchess of YORK, as a residence becoming the new rank to which they have arrived.—Morning paper.

THE KING'S JEWELS.—One of the partners of the house of MESSRS. RUNDALL, BRIDGE, and RUNDALL, of Ludgate-hill, with whom the late QUEEN's diamonds were deposited, had an audience of the PRINCE REGENT, at Carlton-house, on Saturday. It appears that the King's George, diamond hilted sword, loop, &c., which were supposed to have been safely deposited in a cabinet belonging to her MAJESTY at Windsor-castle, have not yet been found, and it is supposed this audience had reference to the subject.—Morning paper.

GENUINE COURT PLASTER.—Among the numerous sermons preached in the Metropolis on the occasion of the death of her MAJESTY, that of a worthy Clergyman at the West-end of the town, who is supposed to have an eye to the Mitre, was the most remarkable for its Courtly adulation. After dwelling with much eloquence on the distinguished piety and the numerous virtues which adorned the character of our late excellent QUEEN, the Preacher concluded by congratulating the nation, in the midst of its affliction, that the same zeal for the good of the Church, the same perseverance in the practice of every moral and domestic virtue, happily existed in the illustrious Person exercising the Government of this highly favoured land, and reigned in the hearts of his Ministers!—Morning Chronicle.

CITY.

On Thursday the Lord Mayor held his first Court of Common Council.

THE DEATH OF HER MAJESTY.

MR. DAVIES moved an Address of condolence to the Prince Regent upon her Majesty's death. The tender solicitude with which she had watched over the illness of his Majesty, and the scrupulous example she exhibited to her children in the course of her life, were parts of a character which for purity and duty was the admiration of all descriptions of persons. The dignity too with which she had filled her high station was no less remarkable, her Court being a place from which ALL were excluded whose conduct was deserving of reproach.

MR. JACKS agreed in all that had been said, but was particularly struck with that point which described her Majesty as an example to the nation. The Queen was, he said, an example not only to the British nation, but to all the nations on the Continent. The reign of George the Second, which had been advancing in morals with respect to the Court, bore no comparison to the purity of the highest ranks of this day! Her example was to be considered as the cause.

Nobody else said one word, and the motion was carried unanimously.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 16.—MR. SERGEANT BOSANQUET AND MR. RICHARDSON.

*Je refuse d'un cœur la vaste complaisance
Qui ne fait de mérite aucune différence.*

Molière Misanthr. A. 1.

IN consequence of the resignation of the Chief Justices of the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, it is the general understanding at the Bar, that it is the intention of Ministers to make one or both of the gentlemen, whose names stand at the head of the present article, Puisne Judges: as this distinction is likely to be soon conferred, I have taken an earlier opportunity of noticing them than I should otherwise have done, in order that a fair opinion may be formed of their qualifications for the office before their elevation to it. To criticise them when upon the Bench, to say no more of it, would be out of my province.

I cannot perhaps chuse a better time than the present for alluding to what has been considered by some (whether justly or not is another question) rather a new mode of keeping up the influence of the Crown and its advisers, as much as possible, in all departments of the profession of the Law. Until very lately it was the general notion, that after a man had attained a certain standing at the Bar, he had a sort of right to be made a Sergeant, if he thought fit to put in his claim, either from motives of precedence in his pursuit, or of station in his intercourse with the world. A Counsel who had been a certain number of years on the hinder rows of the Court of King's Bench, when an advantageous opportunity presented itself by the death of a leader on the circuit, might wish to obtain a rank which would give him a chance of succeeding to the vacancy; or having long acted as junior, and fancying that he was qualified in other respects, he might be ambitious of a coif, to be able to display his qualifications as a senior: under such circumstances, upon application, formerly it was understood that the grant was made as a matter of course. Within a very recent period however it is stated that the practice has been changed; that at present the individual or individuals in whom is vested the power of conferring, may and do exercise a discretion on the subject nearly in the same way as in the case of an application for a silk-gown. If so, I do not say that it is, but that it may be, converted into an engine for extending ministerial influence; and a young man who is called to the Bar may have another motive, in addition to all those at present powerfully operating, for speaking respectfully of persons in high office, and of doing his utmost to conciliate their favour. If this be the purpose, it is not easy to see where the system will end: it may proceed still lower, even to induce the Benchers of the different Inns of Court not to recommend to the Society any individual who wishes to be called, but who in any way has rendered himself obnoxious to the higher powers. It would be difficult, however, I apprehend, to bring this about, for many of the persons who are the seniors in these Societies, and in whom at present rests acquiescence or refusal, are men who have either never engaged in the arduous occupations of the law, or who, having gone through its labours, have arrived at the highest rank they will ever attain: both these classes are generally above or beyond the influence of ministerial instruction.

These remarks do not in any way touch Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET: I think he has been advanced to the dignity of the coif about five or six years; or supposing the strictness to which I referred had been exercised even at that time, which was not the case, it would not probably have been extended to him: his connection with some of the wealthiest and most powerful families in the city, independent of his own inoffensive political tenets, would have been certain to have succeeded in removing all sorts of obstacles that might oppose the promotion of many others. I believe that his principal object in being made a Sergeant was that he might hold the office of one of the leading Advocates of the Bank of England: at least, if I am not mistaken, he was appointed to the vacancy very soon after the acquisition of his new distinction. Whether the object were that he should not interfere with the business of his seniors, on the circuit, or that he might be upon the spot to give his advice to the establishment from which he received his nomination, it is certain that there was a distinct understanding that he should then give up his country practice: this sacrifice however was by no means very considerable, and he received on the other hand more than a full equivalent.

His abilities certainly come under the general denomination of respectable, and I apprehend that his attainments as a Lawyer are much of the same order: there is nothing very peculiar either about the one or the other, and probably he would not have obtained the situation he at present holds, (which has chiefly contributed to bring him before the public eye), without the assistance of that family alliance of which I before spoke. The Bank prosecutions have however so rapidly multiplied of late years, that his aid in public as leading Counsel for the prosecution has often been required; he has thus become better known to the world than he would have been had his office continued as much of a sinecure as that of Sir A. Piggor, who is also retained by the Bank of England, but is his senior. I do not think that trials of this kind could be much better conducted than at present by Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET; but they have now become almost matters of course, and he has so often gone over the same ground, that his exertions are nearly mechanical. On this account the newspapers have become tired of reporting speeches, to which it would be scarcely possible for the greatest ingenuity to give variety, and the public has almost ceased to take an interest in such proceedings, excepting so far as they are connected with the great question of crimes and punishments. For this reason, though the immense number of prosecutions he has advised, in his capacity of Counsel to the Bank, have been extremely profitable to him from the fees he has received in the progress of each, yet they have not brought him into public notice as much as half the quantity of business would have done, had it been of a different kind: yet to that, as I have said, he is principally indebted for such acquaintance as unprofessional persons have of him. His style of speaking has nothing at all remarkable about it, but that perspicuity which will, almost of course, be found in the addresses of a man of sense, and a staidness of delivery which sometimes renders even the narration of interesting facts rather too somniferous.

Notwithstanding he has no commanding talent, and although his knowledge of the law (upon which point I speak with more hesitation) may not be very extensive or deep-laid, I still think that he will make by no means a bad Judge: in this respect I am guided by experience, for he has more than once presided on the circuit, in the absence of one of the Judges, from illness or some other cause. On these occasions, he has always conducted himself to the unanimous satisfaction of the Bar, and though part of their approbation may have arisen from his gentlemanly and diffident deportment in a situation of embarrassment and novelty, yet it would be very unfair not to add, that his decisions at Nisi Prius, on points of law, if subsequently questioned, were generally sanctioned by the opinion of the Court. In fact a sound discretion usually regulates the conduct of Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET: he is besides cool and deliberate in his manner, and the equality of his temper does not seem easily disturbed. His appearance, if that may be taken into account, is also extremely judicial, and the perspicuity which marks his speeches at the Bar, is peculiarly important in the summing up from the Bench.

Regarding Mr. RICHARDSON (who I believe is still more likely to fill one of the vacancies) I have already inserted a few sentences in a previous article (No. 7, Examiner of September 6), and it would be difficult to say much more than a few sentences about him: I observed, that he was employed under the present Attorney and Solicitor-General to go through a great part of the labour of their offices, for a comparatively small part of the remuneration, and that he was therefore known in the profession by the Nick-name of the Devil; I added, that the individual who filled this subordinate office usually went through the drudgery under a sort of implied promise, that if he were zealous in the cause, and rendered himself useful to his employers, when he was no longer wanted, he should be converted into a Puisne Judge. This promise is now about to be fulfilled, and it cannot be denied, as far as his conduct has appeared before the public, that he has discharged his duty with great industry and devotedness. That he is a man of learning and experience is, I believe, equally incontrovertible; but this is nearly all—this is almost the utmost praise he can obtain, even from his warmest friends, unless indeed they add a certain portion of legal acuteness, independent of quickness, and not amounting to subtlety. He has not one spark of eloquence—indeed his voice and manner are both unfortunate—the one is asthmatic, and the other contrained; but if he had possessed physical powers for distinguishing himself as an orator, he never could have added to his reputation in this respect. He is a mere lawyer, though more deeply read than a good many of his rivals in this heavy and entangled walk of the profession. There are some men at the bar, who, if they have degenerated from unavoidable necessity,—the compulsion of circumstances,—into fags and drudges, came to the Bar with some expectation of gratifying laudable ambition by the display of popular talents; who have previously gained distinguished honours at the University, for the ardour and success with which they entered into the pursuit of elegant literature, and have been admired for the ready and persuasive eloquence they displayed at an earlier period of their lives: Such, for instance, I believe, is Mr. FREDERICK POLLOCK, who, if a favourable opportunity were afforded, would still in all probability shew that he possessed very different, not to say more admirable talents, than those for which credit is now given him, as a shrewd and industrious pleader; but such undoubtedly is not Mr. RICHARDSON, who, if it be fair to judge of his youth by his more advanced age, and by the opinion of those who have long known him, seems never to have had any desire to be more or better than he is; and he will most likely soon reach the topmost height to which his hopes and wishes have aspired.

Excepting as I have seen him in public, I know nothing of him: of his attainments out of his profession I am therefore not very competent to speak: he seems to be a very mild, gentlemanly, unassuming man, reluctant to give offence to any body, and especially to the Members of the Court. If, devoting himself entirely to the laborious part of the profession, it cannot be said of him that

Are dolphin-like; they shew his back above
The element he lives in;”

at least it cannot be complained, that, like Mr. RAINE, he displays only its inferior extremity in bad puns and coarse jokes.

AMICUS CURIAE.

Nov. 19.

[Mr. BROUGHAM next week.]

NOTE.—As my object is to make these articles the vehicles of fair but free opinion, and as what I said respecting Messrs. E. LAWES, HOLT, RIGBY, and STARKIE, last week, has been in some degree misunderstood, I subjoin the present note to explain, that in stating that on the trial of Watson they did nothing but take laborious notes, I did not intend to imply that they could or ought to have done more: in fact it was out of their power; the prisoners for whom they were Counsel were not tried, as the verdict in favour of Watson was followed by the acquittal of Thistlewood, Preston, and Hooper, by consent of the Crown. Mr. E. LAWES is a man of acuteness, though he may now and then be much too positive in insisting that he sees a point more clearly than other people.—Mr. HOLT is undoubtedly a shrewd man, and has given one proof of it by dedicating a book to Lord ELLENBOROUGH.—Mr. RIGBY also bears the reputation among his friends of possessing talents; and Mr. STARKIE, I have reason to think, is an industrious Advocate and a good Lawyer. What I meant to say, and what I still say, is, that I do not consider any of them equal to the great task they then undertook.

FINE ARTS.

SOUTHERN COAST OF ENGLAND.

WE greet the arrival of the 9th Part of A Picturesque Delineation of the Southern Coast of England with feelings analogous in some respects to those with which we welcome the arrival of an assured friend, whose substantial and undiminished merits bring us a renewal of undiminished satisfaction: for this last Part keeps up to the full the character of high-toned excellence the Publication has sustained through Eight Parts. The fervour of imagination, and the cherished demands of taste, experience no damp or disappointment at the hands of either the Painters or Engravers. The closeness of the Plates to the represented scenes, and in a style of engraving so entirely unaffected, convey in effect our vision and our minds, even while we are stationary and at home, along the noble coast of our Island. It conveys them on the long and whitening surges, or smoother surface of the deep, sometimes amidst the ports and towns where commerce reposes and unloads her stores; sometimes on the summits or in the chasms of lofty cliffs, or where horror rules among ruffian winds and waves, dashing the ship against rocks, or shivering it among insidious breakers; indulging, in fine, our curiosity, our taste, and our desire of information, by shewing us some of the best features of our coast.

The execution of these Plates is entirely different from nearly all of our other eminent Engravers. It is much like that of some of the best of the early Dutch Artists, being more in a Painter-like style, yet still more carefully and minutely finished than could be expected from any but an experienced and professed Engraver. It has but little of that regular arrangement of stroke or softness of grain and gradation, less in fact of that varied amenity of manner which distinguishes the present mode of Line Engraving, and which, though more polished and elaborated, is perhaps less natural, as the simplicity of the means, bordering almost upon an involved scratchiness of lines, produces more of the abundant touchiness which enriches the objects of earth and ocean.

Each Part has three quarto Plates and two Vignettes, engraved by W. B. and G. COOKE's nature-guided hands, from Drawings by the Poetical Painter*, J. M. W. TURNER, R.A., and by those justly admired Artists Messrs. OWEN, DEWINT, WESTALL, A.R.A., HAVELL, ARNOLD, A.R.A., EBRIDGE, ALEXANDER, and CLENNELL. The 9th Part has three Plates from Mr. TURNER's Drawings, and two Vignettes from Mr. DEWINT's—1. East and West Looe. These towns are seen between two lofty hills covered with gardens on the mouth of the river Looe, and over a bridge which connects the towns. Cliffs and the sea are beyond. The view raises a mixed feeling of the picturesque and the grand. The latter is increased by the agitated state of the water and clouds, which "display with the happiest effect a contrast with the tranquillity of the harbour." "The number of houses in these towns," says the descriptive Letter-press, "is 300, and that of the voters for Members of Parliament 100, who send four representatives, two for each place;" that is, as many as the city of London, and twice as many as the city of Westminster. O shame, shame!

2. Ifracomb. This is not a mere portrait of the place. The high-tutored genius of the Painter, so well seconded by the evidently just feelings and taste of the Engraver, has given to it so proper, so poetical and heart-stirring a character of a storm, as to render the Plate, as to intellectual interest and value, infinitely beyond the cost affixed to each part. Far among a range of cliffs and rocks is the town of Ifracomb, with its light-house, and snug, safe, ship-protecting cove. Against the nearest mass of rocky and perpendicular cliffs, a vessel, stripped and precipitated by the fury of the winds and waves, beating against the ground, and nearly overwhelmed with the sea, is giving herself up to destruction in a last convulsive thro. The short flag at the only remaining mast head, with an upward turn towards the summit of the cliffs, seems earnestly to sue for assistance if possible from the people collected on the cliff, as does a still more pathetic appeal of the sailors, made by their appearance on the little remaining rigging, that last touch in the pathos of a shipwreck but one, when another plunge of the vessel, separating its already disjointed beams, engulphs it for ever from the sight, except a few piteous fragments, or more saddened corpses, heaved up occasionally to the sight or thrown on the sands. The dark, driving clouds, where "Jove's lightnings, the precursors of the dreadful thunder claps," make an awful opening and illumination above, and glare along the cliffs to the distant Ifracomb—the sea, sweeping along in grand curves, and vexed into feathery-shaped foam that mix with and mantle the black ridges of water—the spray impetuously thrown in a white and misty mass high against the cliffs,—the abrupt and dreary cliffs,—in fine, the attributes of a coast storm and wreck are wrought by the united and rare art of the Painter and Engraver, with so intimate a feeling of the reality, that we not only admire its grandeur, but feel with Miranda in the Tempest, that

"It touches the very virtue of compassion in us."

It is unquestionably one of the choicest engraved representations of a sea storm.

3. Tintagel Castle, "now in ruins, standing partly on the main land, and partly on a bold, slaty promontory, almost separated from the shore by an immense chasm in the cliff." These two stupendous elevations, with the intervening chasms, the restless water dashing into sparkling spray, at the base of a craggy and terrific precipice, with the appropriate majesty of clouds and wildness of effect, from a degree of forceful rendering and scattering in the lights and shades, raise this view also from portraiture into the sublime, especially as the close, fine, unconstrained lines, adopted by its admirable Engraver, give all possible effect to the talents of the Painter, by their allowing of the introduction of those every where spread and numerous touches which the Engraving with more open and thicker lines cannot admit, but which are essential to the completest copy of nature.

4. The Logan Stone. "There are several of these Logan or Rocking Stones in Cornwall." The one here so neatly engraved by Mr. W. COOKE, from Mr. DEWINT's efficient Drawing, "is poised on a pile of rocks which project into the sea, and though an immense block of granite, supposed to weigh nearly 90 tons, it may, from the peculiarity of its position, be easily moved to and fro."

5. Coves Castle, Isle of Wight. "It consists principally of a small battery in the form of a crescent." With this, the small houses and a few trees behind it, and the reflection of the whole in the water, and enlivened in the lightest part by linen drying and groups of women, Mr. DEWINT has composed a pleasing Vignette, especially softened off as these central objects are by the surrounding tints of sky, water, and offscap. Mr. G. COOKE's true and touchy translation of this view crowns the rare treat this 9th and the preceding Parts have afforded the subscribers, and like all works of superior and now existing genius, excites increased desire to become acquainted with the future productions of their authors. The appetite for intellectual pleasures "grows by what it feeds upon."

SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

November 20, 1818.

MR. EXAMINER,—There are unfortunately people in the world, and all seemingly in one rank of life, who do not possess generosity or humanity enough even for their own interests,—or how could we expect to see the finest and first feelings of nature outraged by the enforced and unnecessary separation of the soldier from his wife and children on being sent abroad? When an army goes on a short and arduous service, it is a mercy to the tender sex to detain them at home from such dangers and necessities; but why should the soldier going to a peaceable colony,—to the Cape, for instance,—be dragged from his family? Why should he see the infant that he doats upon, and that he contrives to warm from his old great coat, and comfort with the sweetest piece of his ration, torn from his manly and independent protection to be committed to the tender mercies of a parish overseer? Where, after a long proposed service of seven years, is he to look for the abandoned child,—starved, in the grave, or stewing in a factory? or, forsaken by its natural guardian, in training for the gallows?—Have our brave men fought then so badly, and would a country liberal to the fortunate be so niggardly to its poor defenders, as to begrudge the extra expence of an additional transport, to carry with the soldier's treasures as dear to him as our lamented Princess and her babe were to his Royal Highness Prince Leopold? And can the arrangers of such matters be so stupid as to forget that it is a national purpose to colonize the Cape, and that they are perversely depriving it of the best species of colonization?—This in a hurry, but more very likely soon from

QUARANTE.

FANATICISM.

London, 2d November, 1818.

SIR,—I have read with pleasure the just and sensible remarks upon the civil and political consequences of Superstition, in your leading article of the 1st inst. to all which I subscribe, and think, with equal propriety, they might be extended to Fanaticism, which appears to me to be the legitimate offspring of the former; and, perhaps, to a certain degree, of its political and interested cunning.

If the principal doctrines of Christianity were universally understood, and permitted by the higher powers to be intrinsically practised;—if they were sent forth through the world in their original simplicity, unsophisticated, uninterpolated, and unperverted;—if they had to depend for success upon their own simple merits, as a system of moral rule and instruction;—if they were disengaged from creeds and dogmas offensive to reason, and framed by ignorant, or what is worse, designing and wicked men;—if the craft of Priests and Monks did not pervade and soil almost every page, and worldly interests usurp the place of Christian charity—then might Christianity take hold, alone, of the minds of men; then, indeed, its truths would be elicited, its practice evolved, nor would the thunders of the Vatican, the armies of despots, the dungeons of the Inquisition, the fires of Smithfield, or the hypocrisy of Priests, be necessary, as auxiliaries, for its propagation, or for enforcing on the mind a due conviction of its purity and truth.

Prior to its connexion with the state, and its amalgamation with politics, we find its professors peaceable, mild, and unobtrusive; but from the time of Constantine, who made it a legal religion, to the present hour, the cry of "Church and State" has originated more wars, caused the immolation of more human beings, and been the precursor of a greater sum of human misery, than perhaps any other system which was ever forced upon the world.

It was but too justly observed by a great author, speaking of the Seven Years War, that in all Asia, where Christianity was not known, during 140 years then past, only six wars had taken place; while in Christian Europe, during the same period, more than fifty wars had happened, by which more than twenty millions of human beings had perished by the sword.

The pulpit declares, "We know the tree by its fruit." Is this apothegm applicable to the above remark? If it is, what opinion can the unbiased mind have of that system, the avowed professors of which have brought such accumulated desolations upon the earth?—Creeds and dogmas have caused this; and creeds and dogmas are, and ever have been, the curse of mankind: they have deprived Christianity of its main attractions, and all its force upon the mind, by attempting to stick and fetter themselves upon it. These ill-agreed and anomalous absurdities, founded upon ignorance, nurtured upon superstition, and emanating from the Aristotelian doctrines of the schools, although they might have been, and were, palmed on men during the ages of darkness, cannot now, in this age of reason, bear the light of truth, or the test of the understanding. Will the blindest enthusiast venture fairly to assert, that the doctrines of Christianity are contrary, or at variance, or superior to reason?—If they are so, they cease to be a guide to it, and consequently cannot be received as a standard of moral action.—If he says, its dispensations are not to be tried into,—that its doctrines are of a nature purely spiritual,—are not to be subject to the test of mere human reasoning;—that its authorised professors only are competent to dilate upon it, and that the human mind must prostrate itself before the tenets promulgated by its priests:—may it not be answered, that if this be really the case, is it not a direct avowal, that it will not bear the test of truth (as it now stands); that our understandings were given us merely for mundane purposes, and that, as to future results, we must not, no, dare not, trouble ourselves, but simply place ourselves under the direction of these blind guides, whose profession alone, forsooth, has bestowed on them the strict monopoly of all reasoning, so far as it regards spiritual matters.

Fanaticism seems to me to differ from Superstition in this, that the former founds its pretensions upon possessing a superior and favoured insight into the true light of the Gospel;—the latter, upon the old maxim that "ignorance is the mother of devotion;"—they both in some degree savor of the times whence they received their birth, and are both, no doubt, erroneous: the first claims a light, to which he has no solid pretensions; the latter presume a darkness which has no extensive existence.

Since the Church has been a trade, and chimed in with the State, priests, by perverting its original doctrines, and distorting them to their own private advantage, have made it a convenient stepping-stone to wealth, title, and political importance.—their frauds and hypocrisies have enabled them, at suitable periods, and when it squared with their own interested purposes, to debase and degrade both prince and people.

Wiggling and insinuating themselves into worldly pre-eminence, they forgot their functions, and the original purposes of their order;—they became mere intriguing men of the world; their character for sanctity was lost, and with it the respect of the people;—their pious frauds, framed for the accomplishment of their mercenary purposes, were detected, and their secret arcana exposed;—calling on the people to worship God, they contented themselves with worshipping Mammon; by their intolerance and haughtiness they extorted money from the people; by their piousness and servility, they begged it from the Prince.

Fearful of trespassing too much on your columns, I must defer some further remarks to another opportunity.—
I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, Mines.

DR. HASLAM: THE GOVERNORS OF BETHLAM HOSPITAL.

Our readers may probably remember, that the medical officers of this Hospital, Dr. Monro and Mr. Haslam, were in 1816 displaced from their situations of Physician and Apothecary. The latter gentleman has just now (somewhat late, it must be confessed) published a very acute and caustic Letter to the Governors, in which he endeavours to show, that he was unworthily treated by his dismissal; and that the Governors acted in a manner equally inconsistent, partial, and unjust.—It was the case of an unfortunate maniac named Norris, who had been confined with iron machinery and heavy chains to one spot for nine years, like a ferocious beast in a den, which first drew the public attention to the management, or rather the mismanagement, of the Hospital, and finally ended in a change of the medical officers. That Norris was most barbarously used, there cannot, we imagine, be a shadow of doubt. Dr. Haslam himself calls his confinement a rigorous one, but urges in his own defence that the Sub-Committee preferred it to "the lenient, wholesome, and efficient restraint, which he had submitted to their notice." (That of allowing him two cells instead of one.) "This iron machinery (adds the Dr.) which they had approved and ordered, was so complicated, that it employed the smith, with filing, boring, screwing, hammering, clinching, and basilling, nearly two hours in adjusting; so that if a fire had occurred, he must have perished in the flames, and his bones would have been calcined at the stake which held him."—This, on Dr. Haslam's own showing, was the fearful condition in which an afflicted fellow creature was kept for nine dreadful years; and though we readily admit that the Sub-Committee were by far the heaviest offenders against humanity, in originally rejecting Dr. Haslam's "lenient, wholesome, and efficient restraint," yet, when we find year after year passing away, without one single remonstrance, or even hint at a reconsideration of the case of the wretched prisoner, on the part of the Doctor, we really cannot venture to affirm that he performed his duty, or he induced to think that his dismissal was wholly unmerited, however highly we may estimate his general conduct and capacity. But if Dr. Haslam has failed in his attempt to convince us that he was treated in this manner choly business, he has proved, beyond all doubt, that the acting Governors of that period were an imbecile, trimming, and we fear we must add, unfeeling set,—and that their Clerk, Mr. John Poynder, with his little, diplomatic, managing epistles, was not altogether void of fear that something ugly might happen to official interests, if such reforming people as Grey Bennet were to pay them a visit of inspection while they were absent, and consequently unable to explain every thing in the “regular and proper manner.”—The chief advantage arising from the exposure of abuses is the effect it has in preventing their recurrence. Vigilance has been excited, and for some years at least we shall not expect to hear of a female patient becoming pregnant by the keeper—of the difficulty of dismissing the vile culprit, because he had been the footman of a Governor—of the seduction by a lunatic of the daughters of the laundry-maid—or of the employing and pensioning drunken porters, clerks, and surgeons—and all this, too, under the direction of some of “the most respectable, loyal, moral, and religious men,” (as the Courier would say on reading the list of names) in the united kingdoms.—After sufficiently exposing the old management, Dr. Haslam proceeds to notice the new hospital in St. George’s Fields, “built (he says) in the eclipse,” without due attention to medical considerations, on a piece of ground “distinguished by its marshy situation and moist atmosphere,” which the Committee of City Lands has kindly disposed of to the Governors. These profound personages, without waiting for proper opinions on the subject, subsequently proceed to make the building habitable by warming it with steam—a plan which they were afterwards compelled to relinquish after wasting more than a thousand pounds from the funds of the Hospital.—Dr. Haslam concludes his Letter by asserting that he has published it for the sole purpose of vindicating his character, which, he says, “as it is neither to be created by authority nor transmitted by favour, it cannot be destroyed by privileged oppression or chartered injustice.”

CORN LAWS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

Sir,—In your last Monday’s Examiner I saw a letter, signed J. L., against the Corn Bill, which he appears to consider a very cruel measure: he would rather have had Corn imported till the price of the article had become so low as to have quite ruined those Farmers who had small capitals; and those who had larger capitals would not have worked for nothing, or for less than nothing—certain and great loss; and why should it be expected of them more than of those of other professions? consequently, when they had found the imported corn reduced the price of the article below what they could raise it for, they would have left their agricultural pursuits, and have engaged in some other business; and the year following the land thus forsaken could have produced no corn, and the country would in consequence have been dependant upon the foreign supply, which circumstance would have empowered our suppliers to starve us to their terms whenever they chose to withhold the supply, as our home resources would have been cut off by our lands being uncultivated, and thus having no corn of our own: why not rather recommend (as Mr. J. L. says there is not bread enough in the country), the cultivation of all the waste lands which are in different parts of the country, and make that bear corn which now yields little or nothing? Much better have more corn grown to increase the quantity, than to have none grown to effect that purpose!—a fact this which will not admit of contradiction, as Mr. Examiner, I trust, will allow with his usual candour.—I am, Sir, with great respect, your humble servant and

LAW.

COURT OF KING’S BENCH.

Tuesday, Nov. 24.

LEWIS v. HAMMOND.

This case was argued last Friday, and the question was, whether certain Dissenters were exempt, under a local turnpike act, from paying toll, on going to religious worship. The Court now gave judgment, and said, “That by the body of the act the toll was imposed generally; the party, therefore, who declined to pay, must bring himself within the exception; but the Court was of opinion, that the party did not, in the present instance, fall within the exception of the act. The exception named ‘persons going to their parochial church, or other proper place of religious worship.’ Now this exception did not extend generally to all; but it was obvious, that a dissenter residing in one of the parishes near the turnpike, and going to a place of worship in another, was not going to his proper parochial place of religious worship; he, therefore, was not entitled to the exemption mentioned in the act. The case would be the same with a member of the Church of England: if he chose to leave his own parish church and go to another, he could not be exempt. This led the Court to think that the expression, ‘other places of religious worship’ fell under the same construction as the word church, and must be taken to mean parochial places. Persons, therefore, in a different parish were not within the exemption; and this construction was warranted by convenience. The gate-keeper might soon know the parochial place of worship of those who resided in his neighbourhood; and passed through his gate every Sunday; but he could not so easily discover the place of worship of those who lived at a distance.”

Thursday, Nov. 26.

ASSAULT.

Belinda Taaffe, Thomas Boulbee, Joseph Parish, and George Carroll, were called on for judgment, having pleaded guilty, by their Counsel’s advice, to an indictment for an assault on Lady Colebrooke and her grand-daughters in August last.—Mr. Gurney said, he forbore to pray judgment against Belinda Taaffe; and as Carroll did not appear, and his conduct was less blameable than that of the other, he should say nothing as to him.

After affidavits had been put in and Counsel had been heard, Mr. Justice BAYLEY passed sentence, observing, that the prisoners’ offence was one of an aggravated nature, and such as, fortunately for the police of the country, rarely occurred—a systematic plan to way-lay a carriage, in which there was one female 80 years old, and three others under 20; and this was said to be done in aid of Belinda Taaffe, mother of two of the young ladies, in order that she might have an opportunity of seeing them. The defendant Parish was not any servant of Mrs. Taaffe’s nor any connexion of hers; and the only account given of him was, that he was a prize-fighter, and had pistols in his pocket, though it was said they were not loaded. Boulbee’s account was, that he was most reluctantly prevailed on by Mrs. Taaffe, to assist her in an attempt to see her children, and protect her from the outrage of Lady Colebrooke’s footman. Did he make any inquiry before he engaged in such an undertaking? However, he was overcome by Mrs. Taaffe’s importunity; and he then met her by appointment on Hampstead-heath—not to go to Lady Colebrooke’s house; and he saw (what would have opened the eyes of any reflecting person) two men with Mrs. Taaffe, one of them having pistols in his pocket, though not loaded. Instead of remonstrating, he placed himself on a hackney-coach. Lady Colebrooke’s carriage came in view, when the carriage on which Boulbee was seated so conducted itself as completely to obstruct the way. If he had only wished that Mrs. Taaffe should speak with her daughters, that might have been done without violence. But what was the case? The doors were opened, and an endeavour made to force the young women out. A waterman, a prize-fighter, and two other men attacking one woman of eighty, and three under twenty. Mr. Boulbee stated, that seeing the young women not so willing to join their mother as he had been led to expect, he desired his companions to cease: by which he had admitted, that down to that time they had acted with outrage. Did he then quit the carriage and leave Lady Colebrooke to return unmolested? No! he and Mrs. Taaffe proceeded in the carriage to London, insisting on Mrs. Taaffe’s right to have the children. Mr. Boulbee took credit that he had prevented the crowd from increasing the annoyance to Lady Colebrooke. But in what situation must he have placed that lady when, from the impetuosity of a violent woman, he had drawn upon her the indignation of a crowd? He had stated the circumstances in the most favourable manner, and according to Mr. Boulbee's affidavit. The affidavits on the other side gave a much worse view of the case. He had lent himself most unjustifiably and imprudently to a woman who was not a cool judge of what she was about to do; he had lent himself to an outrage, such as fortunately was not frequent. The Court would not do its duty, if it did not protect others from a similar danger; and however hard the punishment might appear, it was most requisite that before a man acted on such occasions he should think. The Court therefore sentenced Boulbee to four calendar months' imprisonment in the custody of the Marshal of the Marshalsea, to find security for good behaviour, to pay a fine of 100*l.*, and be further imprisoned till it was paid.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Friday, Mr. Starkie gave charge of a woman, whom he found in the streets, beating an infant in her arms unmercifully; and declaring her intention of murdering it. On being interrogated by the Lord Mayor, she answered that she was a married woman, living in Bridgewater-gardens, Borough; that her husband was a prisoner in Whitecross-street Prison; that she had no means of gaining a subsistence; that she had summoned the constables of her own parish, in order to obtain relief, but had obtained none; that she was so faint from want of sustenance, that she knew not what she was doing; and that if she had beaten her child, she was unconscious of having acted so cruelly. Mr. Starkie here observed that he believed the case which she had made out to be a complete imposition. He had frequently seen her kicking up disturbances, &c.—The Lord Mayor asked the officers whether they had ever found the prisoner begging in the streets?—they replied that they had not. He then observed, that from the ragged state of both parent and child, he was inclined to consider the present case not as a case of fraud, but as a case of real distress. Distress might have affected the poor creature's intellects, and he would therefore alleviate that distress as much as possible by taking care that she was properly assisted. Let some of the officers (added he) carry this woman to Guildhall, and see that a proper summons be granted to compel the attendance of the Overseers of the parish to which this unfortunate being belongs.

UNION-HALL.

Ann Sarah Webb, a young woman of extremely respectable appearance, on Monday preferred the following charge against Wm. Beale alias Briant, a man between 30 and 40 years of age, and of genteel address. About three weeks ago the prisoner commenced an acquaintance with the complainant, by accosting her during an evening's walk at Walworth, near the Elephant and Castle: a few days subsequent to the first meeting, she again saw him at Kennington; he then made a declaration of attachment to her person, professed to entertain intentions of the most honourable nature towards her, expressed a wish for an immediate introduction to her family, and represented himself as the nephew of Mr. Beale, of Kennington, and entitled, upon the death of that gentleman, to the sum of 8,000*l.* He also stated that he then acted as clerk to Mr. Beale, and resided at his country-house at Clapham. The complainant felt highly gratified with the attentions of a person of so much apparent respectability, introduced him to her father and mother, at their residence, Golding's-place, Vauxhall, by whom he was received and considered as a man of honour, and the future husband of their daughter; his addresses were sanctioned and encouraged, his frequent visits received with pleasure, and an unrestrained intercourse allowed with the object of his choice. On Saturday evening he prevailed upon her to accompany him in a walk towards Kennington; he there took a coach, and ordered the driver to proceed to the Elephant and Castle at Newington. He had not been seated in the coach more than a few minutes, before he treated her in a most indecent manner, and forcibly attempted to violate her person. She screamed as loud as she was able, when he threatened to murder her if she did not discontinue her vociferations, and struck her several severe blows on the head, and endeavoured, by placing his hand upon her mouth, to prevent her spreading an alarm. The coachman heard her screams, stopped the coach and opened the door, when she immediately jumped out, and, without her bonnet, which had been knocked off in the struggle, ran, in a state of distraction, to the house of her parents, about a mile from the spot where the transaction happened. She fell upon the floor breathless and exhausted, and for a considerable time remained insensible. Upon her recovery she acquainted her father with the particulars of the circumstances, and he adopted measures which led to the prisoner's being taken into custody. Mr. Webb stated to the Magistrate, Sir John Pindorne, that since the confinement of the prisoner, he had been induced to make inquiry respecting his family and connexions, and he had discovered that his daughter had been deceived by a series of infamous misrepresentations. The prisoner's real name was Briant; he was a married man, and resided at Wilson's-buildings, Kennington; his circumstances were indigent, although his appearance was genteel; and his statement, as to the expectancy of 8,000*l.* upon the death of Mr. Beale, was as destitute of truth as the other parts of his tale, which had been framed to effect the ruin of his daughter.—The prisoner denied at first that any assault had taken place in the coach, but afterwards admitted that something unpleasant had happened, and imputed it to intoxication. The measures which the Magistrate passed upon his conduct, he appeared to regard with great indifference; and proposed to Mrs. Webb, the mother of the complainant, to compromise the affair for a sum of money. Mrs. Webb rejected the offer with scorn, observing, that the wealth of the world could not wipe away the disgrace of her child, nor restore the happiness of the family which had been destroyed by his infamous machinations. He was committed for want of bail.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCE.—An Inquisition was taken on Friday, at Christchurch Workhouse, upon the skeleton of an infant, when the following particulars transpired:—About a fortnight ago, the cook of Mr. Muggeridge, of Bennet-street, Blackfriars, died; her name was Ann Pace, her age about 50. Mrs. Muggeridge expecting that her relations would claim the property of which she died possessed, determined upon taking an inventory of the articles; and, accompanied by two female servants, went into the room where the deceased had slept. Upon opening a trunk, she was struck with horror at the sight of the skull of an infant; and being excessively terrified, she abandoned the idea of further search, and communicated the circumstance to Dr. Paysley, who re-opened the trunk, and found it to contain the whole of a human skeleton, the head severed from the body. A consultation was held between Mr. Muggeridge and the Parish Officers, and it was determined to bring the affair under the notice of the Coroner. It was stated, that during the time of her service in Mr. Muggeridge's family, the deceased servant had never shewn any symptoms of pregnancy. Her character was irreproachable. She had always shewn an extraordinary anxiety for the safety of the trunk in which the skeleton was found. The cause was not suspected; it was conjectured that it contained her best clothes. Dr. Paysley stated, that when he discovered the skeleton, it was so flatly squeezed, that he with difficulty separated the breast from the back; the separation of the head was caused by decay. He considered that it must have been in the trunk during a period of 15 or 20 years. The principal bones being entire, no circumstance existed to guide his judgment in forming an idea respecting the cause of the infant's death. The Jury consulted for a considerable time, and returned a verdict of—"Found dead, and very much decayed, in a box belonging to Ann Pace."

An inquisition was taken on Tuesday in St. Swithin's-lane, Lombard-street, on the body of Nedrick Sparks, the son of Mr. S. of George-street, Mansion-house, who was killed by the falling of the front wall of the house of Mr. Smith, in Lombard-street, which was injured by the fire on Friday last night.—Another Inquest was taken before the same Coroner upon the body of William Anderson, for many years foreman of the Phoenix Insurance Office, and remarkable for his promptness and decision, as well as activity, in cases of fire, who was killed by the same accident.—Verdict in both cases, Accidental Death.

An Inquisition was taken on Wednesday, at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, on the body of Mrs. Maria Pazz, a foreign lady, whose death was caused by the falling of the front wall of Mr. Smith's house, in Lombard-street, injured by the recent fire. The deceased was walking on the foot-path opposite Mr. S.'s house, when the wall fell upon her head, deprived her of sight, disfigured her face most horribly, and fractured several parts of her body: she died on Tuesday morning.—The verdict was the same as in the other melancholy cases.

Thursday night, Mr. J. Stone, a professional gentleman, passing through Park-lane, was followed by three fellows, who, on his passing Grosvenor-street, knocked him down, and robbed him of a gold watch. Mr. Stone instantly called "Murder!" but the fellows escaped into Hyde Park.

EXECUTION OF JOHN MURRAY.—This most unfortunate convict, after undergoing all the awful and appalling preparations for an ignominious death, on Saturday last, was no sooner launched, as it was charitably presumed, into eternity, and the curtain drawn over his mortal existence, when, horrible to relate, the rope snapped at about half a yard from the knot under his ear, and he fell from an elevation of about ten or eleven feet on his side against the stone steps of the gaol beneath. An indescribable horror pervaded the surrounding crowd: but what must have been the situation of the wretched sufferer! He lay apparently insensible for a minute or so, when being raised by some of the people belonging to the Sheriff, he was conducted to the execution-room, where, by his earnest desire, the Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick again attended, and administered to him that heavenly consolation which alone could mitigate his sufferings. In about half an hour from the time of his fall, he was again brought out, supported by the executioners, all covered with blood from the wounds he had received, and again suspended from the fatal drop. He died without a struggle.—Dublin paper, Nov. 23.

Monday night a person named T. Turner, residing at a coffee-shop in Wells-street, Cavendish-square, made a dreadful attempt on his own life. He went up to the second floor, and there with some sharp instrument cut his throat; he then opened the window, and having dragged his body through with difficulty, he gave a spring and fell. He was taken to the Middlesex Hospital. Mr. Turner expired on Thursday. He had been very unwell for some time, and for several days prior to his commission of the horrid act, he was evidently deranged in his mind. The razor with which the unfortunate man cut his throat could no where be found, and a deep cut which was on the side of the deceased was supposed to be inflicted by his falling on some iron railing when he threw himself from the window. Such, however, were mistaken conclusions, for since his death the medical gentlemen at the hospital, on opening the body of the deceased, found the razor with which he cut his throat in his inside, lying very near his heart. It appears, that after he cut his throat, he cut a deep wound in his side, and having opened the razor, he thrust it into the aperture, which closed up, and when he was taken to the hospital his wound was sewed up by the surgeon, not supposing that any thing was in the inside.

Monday, Charles Cuthbert, Esq. late Consul-General at Gibraltar, accompanied by his son, called on Mr. Curtis, Aurist, of Soho-square, to consult him about his hearing. While waiting to see him, he amused himself with a book; in the act of reading it, he was seized with an apoplectic fit, and expired almost instantly, even before Mr. C. could get out of an adjoining room to him. A Coroner's Inquest sat on the body and returned a verdict—Died by the Visitation of God.

At a late hour on Wednesday night, or early on Thursday morning, the dwelling-house of Mr. Peter Guillemard, silk-manufacturer, 36, Steward-street, Spital-fields, was broke open, and robbed of 20 lots of silk, weighing about 140 pounds.

Bank notes to the amount of 105*l.* and various articles of plate and wearing apparel, were stole from the house of Mr. Marsh, in Union-street, Borough-road, on Monday last. The robbers obtained an entrance by means of picklock keys.

Wednesday night some thieves broke into the house of Mr. Magnus, at Brompton, by means of a crow-bar, and stole 15*l.* in money, a quantity of plate, jewellery, &c.

On Tuesday night, about seven o'clock, two ruffians, with their faces disguised, knocked at the door of Mercer's school, College-hill, Upper Thames-street. Mr. Hill, the master, opened the door; one of the men delivered him a note, and on Mr. Hill going in to read it they instantly rushed in, presenting pistols, and demanding 30*l.* immediately; the noise and confusion brought Mrs. Hill to the spot, who, perceiving the fellows, raised an alarm; the scholars also came forward and joined in calling for help, when the rascals, perceiving their danger, snapped their pistols, and made a hasty retreat, without further mischief.

A most melancholy accident occurred on Tuesday se'nnight, in the vicinity of Winchester. Two lads, sons of Mr. Mould, cabinet-maker, had gone out with a gun, for the purpose of shooting small birds; and while the elder was nicking the flint, the piece went off, and lodged its contents in the side of his brother, who was immediately conveyed to the County Hospital, where he lingered till Thursday afternoon, when death put an end to his misery.

Mr. George Clarke, of Haywood, put an end to his existence, in a fit of desperation, on Wednesday week. Pecuniary embarrassments led to the commission of the rash and fatal deed; he was in the custody of a Sheriff's Officer, and taking an opportunity to go up stairs, he placed a horse pistol in his mouth, with which he blew his head nearly off, and expired instantly. Evidence of temporary insanity was advanced before the Coroner's Jury, and a verdict of Lunacy was returned.—Stafford Paper.

The house of Sir John Knight, at Camberwell, was broke open on Monday night, and plundered of various articles of plate and linen. An attempt was made on the house of Mr. Wybrow, Camberwell, on the same night.—A young woman, named Williams, was met in Peckham-lane, on Sunday night, by two men, who robbed her of all her money and a bundle of clothes.

On Thursday a young man, named Joseph Nicholson, servant to an Officer in the Guards, cut his throat with a razor. He had returned home to his wife a little intoxicated, and began to quarrel with some impropriety. She repelled the charge, and told him that he never was out of temper unless he had been drinking, and that it was a shocking thing he did not avoid it. He replied—"It is shocking, is it? You shall see something more shocking very soon;" and ran up stairs into a chamber. In a few minutes after, his wife heard a great noise; she went up stairs, and saw the deceased covered with blood, with his head nearly severed, and the instrument lying by his side. He has several children. He was carried in a hopeless state to St. George's Hospital.

Thursday morning, between four and five o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in Gloucester-court, between Gray's-inn-lane and Brook-street, Holborn. It commenced in the premises of Mr. Jarvis, a leather-dresser, and no small degree of alarm was excited from the number of old houses contiguous. In a short time engines surrounded the scene of conflagration, and, after about half an hour's playing, they prevented the flames extending further than the premises of Mr. Jarvis, nearly the whole of which, however, were consumed.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 556.

ALLIANCE CONCLUDED AT CONGRESS.

EXTRACT FROM THE STATE PAPERS IN OUR LAST.

"The object of this union is as simple as it is great and salutary. It does not tend to any new political combination—to any change in the relations sanctioned by existing treaties. Calm and consistent in its proceedings, IT HAS NO OTHER OBJECT THAN THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE, and the security of those transactions on which the peace was founded and consolidated.

"The Sovereigns, in forming this august union, have regarded as its fundamental basis their invariable resolution never to depart, either among themselves or in their relations with other States, from the strictest observation of the principles of the right of nations; principles which, in their application to a state of PERMANENT PEACE, can alone effectually guarantee the independence of each government and the stability of the general association.

"Faithful to these principles, the Sovereigns will maintain them equally in those meetings at which they may be personally present, or in those which shall take place among their Ministers; whether it shall be their object to discuss in common their own interests, or whether they take cognizance of questions in which other governments shall formally claim their interference. The same spirit which will direct their councils, and reign in their diplomatic communications, shall preside also at these meetings; and THE REPOSE OF THE WORLD SHALL BE CONSTANTLY THEIR MOTIVE AND THEIR END.

"It is with such sentiments that the Sovereigns have consummated the work to which they were called. They will not cease to labour for its confirmation and perfection. They solemnly acknowledge, that their duties towards God and the people whom they govern, make it peremptory on them to give to the world, as far as in their power, an example of justice, of concord, of moderation; happy in the power of consecrating, from henceforth, all their efforts to the protection of the arts of PEACE, to the increase of the internal prosperity of their States, and to the awakening of those sentiments of religion and morality, whose empire has been but too much enfeebled by the misfortune of the times.

"Aix-la-Chapelle, Nov. 15, 1813.

(Signed) "METTERNICH, RICHELIEU, CASTLEREAGH,
WELLINGTON, HARDENBERG, BERNSTORFF,
NESSLERODE, CAPO D'ISTRIA."

Of the above summary the following extract from a previous passage in these documents may be reckoned the crown:—

"They (the Allied Sovereigns) are firmly resolved never to depart, neither in their mutual relations, nor in those which connect them with other States, from the principles of intimate union which has hitherto decided over all their common relations and interests—a union rendered more strong and indissoluble by the bonds of Christian fraternity which the Sovereigns have formed among themselves."

Now let us see, firstly, how far these Allied Personages are in earnest or otherwise; and secondly, how far the nature of the age and its acquirements will have a compulsory influence on their proceedings, whether they are in earnest or not.

It is observable, in the first place, that every thing is dated as it were from the commencement of the peace, and no allusion whatsoever made to the popular promises which enabled them to obtain it. When BONAPARTE was first to be opposed, great and universal promises of new constitutions, guaranteed liberties, and improvements of all sorts, were made to the people of Europe. He was opposed successfully; and the promises were forgotten directly. So directly were they forgotten, and so flagrantly violated, as in the never-forgotten and existing instances of Lombardy, Genoa, Saxony, Poland, Finland, and Norway, that all the truly sincere and unaffected lovers of freedom, who had regarded the Allied Sovereigns as at least teachable men not destitute of gratitude, felt their old doubts of them re-established; and when BONAPARTE came back, in that romantic manner, from Elba, the Sovereigns would have found it impossible to revive the late zeal in their behalf. They did not attempt it. The popular feeling had enabled their armies to be victorious; and the military feeling, confirmed by that circumstance, and by old jealousies against the French, was substituted for it. Yet even this was evidently alarmed by the re-appearance of NAPOLEON, and by his making use, whether sincere or not, of those hopes of freedom which even the Allies just then had not the face to appeal to. If the world was to be deceived again, it was only for a man of genius to deceive them. They thought that such a man alone could find out perhaps the real glory of confessing his errors and falling in with the spirit of the age. But be this as it may, the BOURBONS, who pretended they would sit in their palaces and wait for the invader like old Roman senators, made haste to get away; NAPOLEON collected a great enthusiastic army, and the fortunes of the world were again contested by main force at Waterloo. Main force, in the persons of the British soldiery, who still retained the good effects of the free spirits of their ancestors, still kept them in the hand of the Allies. BONAPARTE, not for his legitimate sins against liberty, but for his illegitimate sins against the inferior talents of his enemies, was sent to have the iron thrust into his soul at St. Helena; and now, not only were the old promises never heard of, but instead of compacts with the people, Holy Alliances were made between the Sovereigns in order to secure every species of sovereign dictation, and to quash every popular pretence.

This is still the spirit of the Alliance before us. How far the Sovereigns secretly feel it their interest to respect certain symptoms in the present state of society, we shall consider in our next number. But the obvious meaning of this new Alliance is, that they, and they alone, will, as far as lies in their power, keep peace by main force, in order to consolidate their sovereign power of dictation. The world must get on, if they cannot help it; and if they cannot, they will endeavour to flatter themselves that they would not; but every thing shall, if possible, be determined by their sovereign will, and with an eye to the eternal despotism of the few over the many.

Thus, to recapitulate,—the Allies, in the first instance, were frightened out of their wits, and made promises.

Upon obtaining their first victory, they were still frightened, but at their own success; and in the instinctive spirit of royalty, with a nice exchange, began to substitute a convenient gratitude to heaven for an inconvenient one towards earth.

In the instance of the second struggle with BONAPARTE, they had not the face to recur to promises, but relied upon their lately victorious armies, and their new devout self-respect; and luckily for them they succeeded.

Upon obtaining this second victory, they forgot every thing but their newly consolidated power, and a certain frightened, half-worldly, half-mystical notion of their being favourites with heaven,—a notion exceedingly apt to dispense with proper behaviour to earth; and they accordingly kept their old promises religiously—broken. They made a Holy Alliance for the better preservation of their favourites—their plunder, and the quieting of objections.

Lastly, their power, they think, is now consolidated, and will remain so, if they can continue at peace; and accordingly, under cover of christian charity, their whole object is to keep the world quiet for the sake of themselves.

Observe the whole tenour of Congress and its documents. The only thing done is the evacuation of France; the only thing said, We will do every thing to keep matters as they are. Not a word do we hear of the old promises; not a word of the Constitutions to be given to Germany; not a word of the Prussian Constitution; not a word of the Lombards, who innocently requested permission of the Austrian Emperor to be free; not a word of that part of Saxony, forcibly seized by the former whiner the King of PRUSSIA; not a word of the retention of Poland by ALEXANDER; not a word of the transfers of Finland and Norway; not a word of the bestowal of indignant Genoa upon the wretched King of SARDINIA; not a word of the more wretched FERDINAND and his imprisoned, exiled, and destroyed preservers; not a word of the great interests contending for in America; not a word more of the Algerine pirates, or of the abolition of the Slave Trade. Yes, of some of these things we do hear, in a very summary manner,—of the retention of Poland for instance, Lombardy, and Norway. All these retentions are to be “consolidated.” The Courier expands his eyes in delight upon the simplicity and candour of the manifestoes. And simple and candid they are with a vengeance. They seem to say, “We are powerful enough now to dispense with deceiving you:—we mean to do nothing that we said, but only to keep all we have got.” This is the amount, or it means nothing, of the first paragraph above transcribed:—

“The object of this union is as simple as it is great and salutary. It does not tend to any new political combination,—to any change in the relations sanctioned by existing treaties. Calm and consistent in its proceedings, it has no other object than the maintenance of peace, and the security of these transactions on which the peace was founded and consolidated;”—that is to say, Legitimacy and the Uti Possidemus.

The rest of the extract which we have made, and which, as we have already observed, is a summary of the whole proceedings, is but an involuntary and vague addition made to this candid statement in order to soften its effect. Thus in the paragraph that follows, mention is made of the “right of nations;” but what mockery is this, when we repeat the list of nations, whom the Holy Allies have transferred to each other against their will! The real meaning of their use of this phrase is, not that they respect the right of nations, but that they respect their own alleged rights, as the future masters of the nations which they have governed or usurped. The right of Poland, for instance, is hereafter to be respected as a nation forming a part of the Russian Empire. Its own voluntary right, unequivocally expressed whenever it could obtain a voice, is no longer any thing to the purpose. It is the same with Lombardy and part of Saxony. The former has rights, not as an independent nation, which it has long wished to be, but as a compulsory part of the Austrian Empire. The latter has rights, not such as it ought and wishes to have distinct from those of the hated government of Prussia, but as identified with that government. In other words, the prisoner has a right to be under his jailer;—the kidnapped have a right to be considered as the inviolable property of their kidnappers. What a mockery then, and yet what an unconscious truth are these Holy Usurpers uttering, when they say that the principle of the right of nations can alone render a peace permanent.

“Faithful to these principles, the Sovereigns will maintain them, whether it shall be their object to discuss in common their own interests, or whether they take cognizance of questions in which other governments shall formally claim their interference.” Yes, other governments; that is to say, any other nations whom they have not yet deprived of governments, and whose governments are of the same unpopular nature as their own. But not a word is said, in the spirit of the old forgotten promises, about assisting the people. Governments are every thing now, as they were before; and it is to depend on the chances of individual character in the governors, whether the governed are to be at all considered or not. This paragraph ends also with the same exquisite candour and simplicity respecting the object of the alliance:—“The repose of the world shall be constantly their motive and their end.” Yes, no doubt; because the Sovereigns are tired of fighting with any body, and afraid of fighting with the people.

“It is with such sentiments,” continues the next paragraph, “that the Sovereigns have consummated the work to which they were called. They will not cease to labour for its confirmation and perfection.” Oh—to be sure; nobody doubts them, for it is their personal interest to be quiet; they would have to keep their promises if they were disturbed again. But by whom were they called? Not by the people certainly, still less by the people of Lombardy, Poland, or Saxony, or Norway. Their calling was of the true methodistical kind, worldly and other worldly,—three-quarters selfish and one quarter superstitious. These words in Italics might serve as a motto for any treatise on the subject.

And now comes a piece of morality and religion to embroider the hem of this precious cloak,—a regular phylactery, after the old Jewish fashion. The Holy Allies “solemnly acknowledge, that their duties towards God and the people” (this is the first time the word people has been uttered, and very refreshing it is; but the people that do what? the people that give them their authority? Oh no; this would not be true; and the Holy Allies scorn to utter a falsehood;—it is the people “whom they govern.” Very well;—to return to them—) they “solemnly acknowledge, that their duties towards God and the people whom they govern, make it peremptory on them to give to the world, as far as in their power, an example of justice, of concord, of moderation; happy in the power of consecrating, from henceforth, all their efforts to the protection of the arts of peace, to the increase of the internal prosperity of their States, and to the awakening of those sentiments of religion and morality, whose empire has been but too much enfeebled by the bad example of its ancient professors—we beg pardon—by the “misfortune of the times.”

Here we see that our old legitimate friend if is not the only virtue extant; there is much integrity also in those three very gentlemanly monosyllables, as far as. The Holy Allies solemnly assure us, that they will set examples of justice, concord, and moderation, as far as lies in their power; but, what is very odd, they will not undertake to do it, where the thing is impossible! But where and when is it impossible to set examples of justice, concord, and moderation? There lies the question. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum, used to be the ancient motto—Let justice be done, though the heavens come together;—but now it is only Fiat justitia, stet Gothus—Let justice be done as far as the Goth or Gothamite finds it convenient. The Reader sees at a glance all the use that can be made of this phrase, as far as. It prepares the Reader for every injustice, discord, and excess that may ensue; and in fact neutralizes the whole promise,—which the Allies feel it as well to do at once. We thank them for this at any rate.

Lastly, as to “the awakening of those sentiments of religion and morality which have been but too much enfeebled by the misfortune of the times:” what, in the first place, do the Allies mean by religion? Does the Protestant PRINCE REGENT of England mean the Papal religion, which his family was brought in and has hitherto done it's best to put down? or does the Catholic Emperor of AUSTRIA mean the Protestantism of his friend the REGENT? or the Greek-church Emperor of RUSSIA mean both? Yes, it may be answered,—both and all; for religion does not exclude liberality. Oh, does it not? Well, this is the first time we have seen the saying reduced to practice, though what the English Poet-Laureat still means by warning us against the Romish Babylon, and the Greek-church Emperor by marrying nobody into his family who will not become Greek-church, become inexplicable. But granting that religion is to become liberal, in the teeth of the illiberal conduct of it's liberalizers, we beg leave to observe, that irreligion did not begin with “the misfortunes of the times.” The sentiments of religion, if they mean any thing good, were habitually violated long before, in the infamous debaucheries of Louis the 15th, in the more solemn and compounding ones of Louis the 14th, in the atrocities of CATHERINE DE' MEDICIS and her St. Bartholomew massacre,—in the barrack and beastly tyranny of the Prussian kings (though FREDERICK the Great must be left out as a professed infidel,)—and in the sanguinary atrocities and Te Deums of ALEXANDER's grandmother CATHERINE. The only difference (and mark it well) between the want of religion in those persons, and the want of religion in latter times, is this,—that in the former it was mixed with a hypocritical profession of it, and violated together with morality in almost every action of their lives; whereas in the latter, it has been the result of speculation and conviction, first set on foot by those very enormities.

Then as to morality. What, in the name of common sense, is the morality which is to be restored? Is it the morality of the courts and personages above-mentioned? They comprised, under fine sounding titles, the lowest, most vulgar, and most selfish of the human species? Is it morality truly so called,—equal justice, benignity, sympathy, generosity, the undervaluing of self compared with the common good? Let them give up their mean passions and usurpations, before they talk of it. “The misfortunes of the times” forsooth have hurt morality! Yes, that common cant of morality, which consists in demoralizing the world with selfishness and superstition,—which sets the belief of a thing above the practice of it,—and allows men to think or to call themselves good and virtuous, while they are degrading their own nature into slaves, and the Divine Spirit's into that of a devil. There is a finer feeling of morality gone forth all over the world at this moment, than has been witnessed perhaps since the world began; and it is this,—that people begin to feel the rights common to all human beings without exception, and not merely to speak of them indifferently or violently, or make them matter of a faith eternally contradictory, but to demand them with quiet determination, and consider them as the indispensable ground of all virtue and policy. This is what the old Greek philosophy meant, and would have seen practised if it could;—this is what Christianity itself means, divested of all that the violence and absurdity of followers have put upon it; and are we to be mouthed at, at this time of day, with the sovereign nonsense of restoring morality?

There is one person among the Allies, whom we conceive to be partly in earnest on some of these latter matters, and who continues to think, perhaps, that he really does think upon them all;—but we are warned by the length to which our article has run, and must keep this point to begin the next with.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Nov. 30.—The Duke of Richelieu, on arriving yesterday at his hotel, found the Grand Cordon of the Order of the Holy Ghost, granted to him by the King, in testimony of his satisfaction at the important mission which his Excellency had fulfilled with so much success.

A private letter, dated Valenciennes, the 27th November, says,—The arrival of a regiment of the Royal Guard has excited a delirium of joy. It is a contest who shall lodge the officers—who shall feast the soldiers. Banquets, balls, and assemblies succeed to each other without interruption. The white flags float at all the windows. Our city has been illuminated three days following. We have noticed several excellent devices, and, among others, the following, at the door of an individual who had lodged a great many English officers:—“Plus je vis d'étrangers, plus j'aimai ma patrie.”—Anglice—“The more I see of foreigners, the more I love my country.”

GERMANY.

MUNICH, Nov. 15.—The Act of Union, of the Lutheran and reformed Confessions, in the Bavarian circle of the Rhine, was confirmed by his Majesty on the 10th of October. The Chief contents of this document relate to the following points:—

A. General Regulations.—The two confessions are fraternally united, under the name of Protestant Evangelical Christian Church. It has no other basis of faith than the Holy Scriptures.—B. Religious Doctrine.—It declares the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper to be a festival of remembrance of Jesus Christ, and of the most blessed union with him. Confession is a self-examination before partaking of the Lord's Supper; it is therefore no longer called confession, but preparation. With respect to Predestination and Elective Grace, this Church expresses its conviction that God has destined all men for salvation, and does not withhold from them the means of attaining it. It recognises no necessary baptism. These are the few main fundamental principles from which all the other rules for the practice of divine worship are deduced, viz.—C. Rites and Liturgy.—D. Religious scholastic instruction.—E. Property of the Church, its union, administration, and application.—F. Constitution of the Church.—G. Religious Discipline.

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Oct. 20.—In a late promenade on the banks of the Black Sea, the Sultan observed a country-house built in so elegant a style, that he desired to be informed to whom it belonged. He was answered that the owner was an Armenian, professing the Christian religion. The Sultan immediately proceeded to the house, saw its master, and asked him how much it had cost him. The Armenian, fearing to pass for too rich, promptly replied 300 purses (about 450,000 francs), though he had in reality expended more than triple that sum. The Sultan took him at his word, ordered the 300 purses to be paid down, and declared himself proprietor of the house. The unfortunate Armenian was in the greatest despair; but what was his surprise when, a few days after, two Bostangis delivered to him, with the following message, a casket containing 1,000 purses (1,500,000 francs):—"The prophet hath said that the liar is always caught in his own snares, and thou hast experienced the truth thereof; but thy master is too great to take advantage of thy weakness."

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, DECEMBER 6.

THERE is little news this week from the Continent. The principal Allied Ministers have been repairing to Paris. The Emperor of RUSSIA and King of PRUSSIA are on their way to their respective homes, though the former pays a great many visits as he goes. His activity, as the papers observe, seems to be hereditary; for, to say nothing of his grandmother CATHERINE, his mother, the Dowager Empress, is a prodigiously stirring woman, transacting a world of we know not what business, and astonishing the Dutch courtiers during her visit to the Prince Royal, by being every where and looking at every thing, even to the rummaging of the nurse's drawers—"up stairs, and down stairs, and in my lady's chamber." Her MAJESTY also opens the eyes of the spectators by an enormous quantity of diamonds, with which she is said to be usually showered all over. It is an old Russian custom. POTESKIN used to pass hours together in arranging his diamonds upon a black velvet table. It is the usual mistake of semi-barbarous powers, who confound splendour and preciousness with taste. NAPOLEON's court was formed more after the Greek model; but this new exhibition in civilized countries is, we suppose, to outshine it, and shew what royalty really is. Should her MAJESTY come over to this country, and visit by any chance the squalid villages that are to be found by the side of some very flourishing ministerial lords of the manor, the eye of poverty, which knowledge as well as sorrow has rendered very keen of late, will see in her imperial, royal, and precious person, the singular spectacle of an old lady wearing millions of loaves of bread.

But we must take care how we talk of Empresses and Queens; for the Ministerial writers, whose abuse of other women amounts to an almost moral phenomenon, and who can aim blows in plenty at females when living, at women of the most estimable and amiable natures, at the excellent Mrs. BARBAULD, at the frank and warm-hearted Lady MORGAN,—aye, and even at the very crutches of poor Mrs. ROBINSON, though not when she was a Prince's mistress,* have now found out that it is "ungenerous" to doubt the generosity and exquisite virtues of a dead QUEEN. They had better be quiet.

* See the Baviad or Mæviad of that poor creature GIFFORD, who will be held up sprawling at last, if he does not take care, to the disgust of society.

The subscription of one guinea from each subscriber, for erecting a monument to the memory of the late Princess CHARLOTTE, amounts to very near twenty thousand pounds.

The Quebec Mercury of the 29th October states, that Mr. GOURLAY, the gentleman who took the lead in establishing what is called the Upper Canada Convention, is returned from New York to Kingston, where, under date of the 20th Oct., he has published an address of an extraordinary character to the Convention, or friends of free inquiry, on the Governor's speech, and the Assembly's answer, intimating his determination to persist in maintaining their rights and principles.

Three houses of great respectability, in the Manchester line, stopped payment yesterday. The total sum they have failed for is said to be to a very large amount.—Sun-Saturday.

LORD RANELAGH.—Our readers (those particularly who reside at Fulham within the little sphere of the Noble Lord's fame) will be amused with the report of the trial of the Lord Viscount RANELAGH, for an assault and extortion, of which, delorable to relate, he was found guilty, and immediately fined in the sum of 50*ls.* When to this is added the costs of each party, which the Noble Viscount must pay, he will perhaps have discovered, though somewhat late in the day, that arming his dependants, threatening war, and raising contributions, on his own individual authority, is after all rather a dangerous and expensive pleasure.—On the overwhelming chagrin which his Lordship must be supposed to feel at this ugly misadventure, we shall not venture to dwell,—informed as we have been of the Noble Viscount's excessive sensibility even in small matters,—fearful that the slightest additional annoyance might possibly induce an awful catastrophe.—

"With edge of penny cord and vile reproach."

But though we dismiss my Lord RANELAGH without any further remark beyond that of expressing a hope that he will benefit by the lesson on good manners thus read to him at Clerkenwell, we must say a word or two respecting the young Plaintiff and his friends, who behaved throughout the whole affair with infinite propriety, with the single exception, perhaps, of submitting to pay for their liberation, though even this may have been well designed. Mr. HALL's father, too, the Rev. WALLACE HALL, of Herefordshire, deserves honourable mention, for having actively supported his son in the prosecution; which he did, we understand, on the sole ground, that so public a violation of the laws of decorum as well as of the land, deserved public exposure and rebuke, more particularly as the culprit was a man of rank and great wealth.—The Reverend Gentleman has, we are told, filled various honourable official situations abroad and at home; but he was obliged to retire from his last,—that of Chaplain to the Royal Hospital at Haslar,—owing to indisposition. He gave his son, the present Plaintiff, a classical education, and designing him for the profession of the law, he placed him with the respectable gentlemen mentioned on the trial.—The sneer at the "Lawyer's Clerk" came with a very ill grace, we think, from Mr. ALLEY. The Barrister however does not appear to have served his Noble Client much better, when he admitted, that if the charges against him could be proved, he would be unworthy of his rank!—They were proved; and his Lordship must not therefore look even to Mr. ALLEY for a character.

SHOES AND BOOTS.—The following method of preparing water-proof leather, at a very small expense, will be found invariably to succeed:—Take one pound of drying (boiled Linseed) oil, two ounces of yellow wax, two ounces of spirits of turpentine, and one of Burgundy pitch, melted carefully over a slow fire. With this composition new shoes and boots are to be rubbed in the sun, or at a distance from the fire, with a small bit of sponge, as often as they become dry, until they are fully saturated; the leather then is impervious to wet, the shoes and boots last much longer, acquire softness and pliability, and thus prepared, are the most effectual preservatives against cold.—Leeds Mercury.

STOLEN CHILD.—We have the satisfaction to announce, that Mrs. HORSLEY has received, by the Hamburg mail of yesterday, letters from Mr. HORSLEY of the 25th ult., in full confirmation of the intelligence received a few days ago, via Holland, of the safety of the child, and the apprehension of the villain who stole it; which took place on the 23d ult., at Braka, near Bremen. The clothes of the child were changed; but it was in perfect health, and was safely lodged in the house of the British Consul, until due authority could be received from the Government of the country where Braka is situated, for delivering him to his father. The perpetrator of this atrocious act could not be surrendered for the purpose of removal, to take his trial in this country, until an application was received from our Government.—Times—Thursday.—An evening paper says, that when the father was introduced, with other gentlemen, into the room in which his child was, the little fellow no sooner set eyes on him, than, bursting into a kind of hysterical laugh, and running into his arms, he at last got his tongue to articulate, calling out, "O Pa! my own dear Pa!"—The unfeeling thief, Rennett, when he found his hellish purpose frustrated and himself arrested, implored mercy in the most abject and humiliating terms. He is in safe custody; and the necessary measures for transmitting the base wretch to England are in progress.—It is stated that Rennett and the child were actually on board the vessel, ready to sail for America; and that but for the prompt and most praiseworthy vigilance of Mr. Coleman, the British Consul at Bremen, the villain would in all probability have got off with his prize.

The CHANCELLOR is so afflicted with the gout in his legs, that he cannot get down to his Court. We wish him better, particularly if on his recovery he would take a walk into the Fleet Prison, and see if any more prisoners for "contempt of Court" were likely to follow poor SMITH into the grave.

The case of Mr. RANSON, the Artist, who was so illegally sent to prison for resisting the arbitrary demands of the Bank, will be tried in the course of the week. He very properly seeks damages for the outrage.

THE SHE DANDY, AND THE HE ONE.

(FROM THE EPILOGUE TO THE NEW TRAGEDY OF BRUTUS.)

But bless me—what two nondescripts together!
The she—a pile of ribband, straw, and feather;
Her back a pillow, all above and on it—
A church bell? cradle? tower?—No, faith, a bonnet!
Aye, and an actual woman in it—able,
Rouse but her tongue, to make that tower a Babel.

Now for the he, the fellow nondescript—
Whence has that mockery of man been shipt?
Have ROSS or BUCHAN brought him to console
The quidnuncs for the passage to the pole?
While on her iceberg howls some Greenland squaw,
Robbed of her pretty monster till next thaw!
No; Paris has the honour. "Ah que oui!"—
Voilà!—the air, grace, shrug,—smell of Paris!
France gave his step its trip, his tongue its phrase,
His head its peruke, and his waist its stays;
The thing is contraband,—Let's crush the trade;—
Ladies, insist on't—all is best home-made.
All British, from your shoe-tye or your fan,
Down to that necessary brute—call'd man!
Now for the compound creature—first, the wig,
With every frizzle striving to look big;
On the roud cheek the fresh-dyed whisker spread,
The thousandth way of dressing a calf's head.
The neckcloth next, where starch and whalebone vie
To make the slave a walking pillory.
The bolster'd bosom, ah! ye envying fair,
How little dream you of the stuff that's there!
What straps, ropes, steel, the aching ribs compress,
To make the Dandy—beautifully less!
Thus, fools, their final stake of folly cast,
By instinct, to strait waistcoats come at last.
Misjudging Shakspeare—this escap'd thine eye—
For though the brains are out—the thing won't die!

A Correspondent begs to recal to our recollection—"a fact, which is still fresh in the memories of the retainers of Carlton-house, of her Majesty having some years ago sent to her relatives at the Court of Mecklenberg, by a messenger who was going that route, part of a Cheshire cheese, and six pounds of genuine, unadulterated Bohea Tea, accompanied by a most gracious letter, which at that period appeared in all the journals. Thus, Sir, you perceive (adds our Correspondent), unless some friendly biographer rescues us, our most liberal acts will sink into oblivion."

Can it be true, as we are told, that the Barrack-master of Harwich is an attorney? If this be so, it is a shameful abuse, for such situations should be kept for deserving veteran officers.

No. 316.

DRURY-LANE.

A new Tragedy, called Brutus, or the Fall of Tarquin, was produced here last Thursday. It is from the pen, we understand, of Mr. Howard Payne, an American Gentleman, who made a noise a short time since as another young Roscius. The subject, from various causes, has long been unknown to the English stage; but it is familiar with every body who has looked into a book, and was in earlier times one of the most frequent and popular to be found. Lucretia was one of the favourite heroines of the chivalrous ages, which is the reason why the name is met with so often among the Italians. CHAUCER has told her story briefly, but in his best manner, with an intense feeling of character. SHAKESPEARE has devoted to it a whole poem, apparently as a contrast, and neutralization to the effect of his Venus and Adonis.

With respect to the other part of the story of Brutus, the fall of Tarquin, the only drama on the subject with which we are acquainted is the Bruto Primo of ALFIERI. We believe however there is a play of VOLTAIRE's on the subject which is acted on the French stage; and the newspapers speak of one by LEE, to which Mr. PAYNE, they guess, has had recourse. We must confess, with due critical horror, that we never read it; neither can we say that we discern the usual characteristics of LEE in the style of the new tragedy. If, as the town seems to understand, it is considerably indebted to other productions, we should rather think that its greatest obligations are to some French writer though we can hardly think VOLTAIRE; for its chief merit is stage-effect; the language and sentiment, with the exception of the scene in which Brutus exults over the fallen statue of Tarquin and execrates his astonished son, have not much more ardour than originality.

The effect however, upon the whole, is managed with great skill. The story, generally speaking, is the same as it is told in OVID and LIVY. Some young Romans in camp are sitting over their wine, and rallying Collatinus on his grave conjugal affection. He grows warm; the rest maintain the pre-eminence of their respective wives; and the dispute is at last terminated by their all agreeing to snatch a ride back to Rome, to come in upon their wives unawares, and see how they are employed. The result is in favour of Lucretia, who is found occupied with her maidens in handiwork. Tarquin grows enamoured; and with the old wilfulness of royalty, determines to possess her. The atrocity is perpetrated. Brutus, whose father and mother had been murdered by old Tarquin, and who in order to save his own life and secure his revenge, has acted the part of a half-idiot (what would not SHAKES-PEARE, by the bye, have done with this?) meets the young prince on his return from Lucretia, and is gaily told by him the infamous story. To the latter's amazement, he bursts forth into imprecations, the very phrenzy of which is of too reasonable a nature not to betray the pretended idiot's secret. Brutus then hastens to the house of Collatinus, and seizing the knife with which Lucretia has just dispatched herself, proclaims his possession of reason, and his resolution to exterminate the Tarquins. Lucretia's kinsmen swear to act with him. Her body is brought out upon a bier, into the forum, and Brutus ascending the rostrum over it harangues the people, and rouses their fury against the royal family. They rush to the palace, and batter down the gates; Tullia, the young prince's mother, who had driven her chariot over the dead body of her own father, is sent to be kept in custody in the latter's sepulchre, where alarmed with fancied groans she insists upon bursting open the door that holds his remains, and dies of horror and remorse at the sight of his statue between burning lamps. The Government is then overturned, and Brutus appears as one of the Consuls;—not however to enjoy the new happiness which he has given his country. His son (two of his sons, according to history) is implicated with some conspirators, in consequence of a passion which is given him for the Princess Tarquinta, and which, by the way, is quite in the French taste. The Senate, out of a fatal honour to Brutus, and in the hope that he will be kind to himself, leave the final judgment on his son in his own hands; and then comes that dreadful struggle between the father's and the patriot's feelings, which is of necessity implied on such an occasion, and which has rendered his conduct so renowned. This scene is particularly well managed. Brutus descends from the judgment scene, and talks hopelessly yet kindly with his son, bids him a quiet yet heart-shaken farewell, then reascends, orders the Licors to bear the criminal to the fatal spot at a little distance, and to strike when he holds up his hand, endeavours two or three times to hold it up accordingly but recoils, finally waves it in a majestic manner, and when the trumpets announce the result, descends again and falls back into the arms of those about him. The curtain closes.

The reader will easily imagine many interesting scenes out of this story, besides the one we have just mentioned; and as far as a certain theatrical tact goes, Mr. HOWARD PAYNE has shewn great taste, judgment, and feeling, in making the most of them. At present, we cannot compliment him farther, nor would he perhaps desire it, if the piece is so much of a compilation as it is said to be. But he is young; and the perceptions which now enable him to dispose the materials of others to the best advantage, may hereafter teach him to see for himself.

KEAN's performance of Brutus is an addition to his great and deserved reputation; and we cannot say a higher thing of it. All that the piece itself failed to give it, he supplied;—supplied with intenseness of feeling and admirable variety of expression. You seemed as if you should every now and then rise and sit down again, with an involuntary accompaniment to the struggles within him as he sat endeavouring, as it were, to nail down his spirit to the judgment seat. We quite agree with a contemporary critic in recollecting no instance of an actor like him "who could stand silently on the stage for minutes together, and calling up in succession all the shades and degrees of passion on his countenance, move his audience to silence and to tears of the truest sympathy." Next to some of the passages in Othello, it is perhaps his finest exhibition.

We cannot say much of the acting of the other performers. Mrs. GLOVER's, in Tullia, was the best. Mrs. WEST, if she does not take care, will degenerate into a regular tragedy-actress, mistaking hysterics for pathos, and launching her loud words forth into a sort of disdainful slide downwards. We warn her in very good and sincere spirit, for she seems to have fine elements in her. As to Mr. HENRY KEMBLE, who has given up his part, it seems, to Mr. HENRY JOHNSTON, we never see this good-looking and intelligent-looking young man, who is no actor, without wishing him where he perhaps wishes himself,—at college. We must not omit, that the royal ladies in this piece mistake the Roman colour of purple. Their dresses should not be what is now commonly called purple, but red, which was the colour of the ancient royalty, and the strict meaning of the word purpureus. We are sorry to talk Latin to Ladies; but if their dresses will talk bad Latin to us, what can we do? However, the point may be instanced in translation. Thus GRAY, in his usual learned style, speaks of "the purple light of love" on the cheeks of VENUS, which it would be a great heresy to think blue; and COWLEY, in rendering a delightful ode from CATULLUS, retains the same word in speaking of a Lady's mouth; which is the best red, we take it, extant:—

And her purple mouth with joy
Stretching to the delicious boy.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

FUNERAL OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

(From the Times of Thursday.)

"Longum producere funus

"Ad tumultum jubet ipse dolor."

It is now our duty to perform, as it were, the last rites to her Majesty the late Queen of these Realms, by presenting to our countrymen a faithful report of the solemn proceedings which took place yesterday on her interment. We shall not waste many words in the preamble. The common lot of mortality, which consigns all to the earth from whence they sprung, is but too well known to need enforcement here. It is no less obvious, that Monarchs, as well as the meanest of their subjects, are obedient to this law. But as the examples of the former are less frequent, they are therefore the more impressive. The stroke of death levels us all; after that, no distinction exists; and if any apparent difference is created by the funeral pomp that may chance to follow, it is the living which reap the advantage of it: the dead feel it not.

With respect to the commencement of the procession, there appears to have been a misconception on the part of the public: they seem to have imagined that the whole pomp was to burst upon their sight at once, when the hearse moved from Kew; and accordingly, thousands of almost all classes were drawn from London, and within at least a dozen miles around, to Kew and Hounslow, to observe the remains of her late Majesty pass, as they imagined, in grand procession. Several, to secure to themselves good places, left town on the preceding day. Long before the light dawned, all the footpaths between London and Kew were filled with pedestrians, and the road choked with carriages. The immediate vicinage of the Palace had been patrolled during the morning by small parties of Lancers. The road which runs through the centre of Kew-green was lined on each side with carriages, while an immense assemblage of people almost filled the space behind. The path-ways leading to Kew-bridge and on to the Star-and-Garter, at the foot of the bridge, were in like manner crowded. The open space in front of the Star-and-Garter was occupied by several rows of carriages—comprising almost every species of vehicle that has been constructed since the first invention of carriages. These were loaded, both inside and out, with spectators. The multitude extended as far as the eye could reach, in every direction; and not a window, a wall, or a tree, from which a glimpse of the procession was likely to be obtained, was untenanted. It had been rumoured in the course of the morning, that the procession would move by way of Richmond; and the spectators stationed on Kew-green and in its vicinity waited quietly until the fact should be ascertained; but the moment the advanced-guard of Lancers wheeled to the left, as they emerged from Kew-green, a general movement took place towards the bridge. An unusual eagerness prevailed to pass the bridge and head the procession. In consequence, a most tumultuous scene took place at the tollhouse. The toll-keeper, after some coaches had passed, endeavoured to shut the centre gate, through which the people were rushing like a torrent; but he was immediately borne away by the stream, and had nearly fallen a victim to his indiscretion.

At Brentford, at Hounslow, &c. from half a guinea to two guineas had been readily given for places at windows.

Soon after nine o'clock, the Lancers, who were to conduct the Royal remains, assembled in front of the Palace at Kew; and half an hour after, the hearse, with eight horses, was drawn up and received the coffin, when the procession began to move in the following order:—

Two Lancers mounted to clear the way.

Twenty ditto mounted, two and two.

Eight of the late Queen's Servants, in full scarlet livery, on horseback, with black scarves and hatbands.

The Beadle of Kew Parish, on foot, with silk scarf and hatband.

Eight Assistants, on horseback, in deep mourning.

THE HEARSE,

Covered with Black Velvet, profusely decorated with Plumes of Ostrich Feathers, and ornamented by seven Escutcheons (three on each side, and one at the back), drawn by eight Black Horses, bearing Ostrich Plumes, an Escutcheon being affixed to the Black Velvet Covering of each Horse. There was nothing remarkable in its appearance.

A party of Lancers.

Assistants on horseback, in deep mourning.

Assistants on horseback, in deep mourning.

A party of Lancers.

Eight Assistants on horseback, in deep mourning.

Seven private carriages of her Majesty, each drawn by six chesnut horses. The Coachmen and Footmen in deep mourning. The usual hammer-cloth of scarlet and gold was retained. The first six carriages had the Royal Arms emblazoned on them, and the letters C. R. in a small cypher inserted in a compartment above them. The last had only the Crown, surmounting the letters C. R. in a very large cypher.

A party of Lancers, six abreast, and about 60 in number, closed the cavalcade.

This was the whole of the procession at its starting; it occupied in length about 300 yards. It was just six minutes (at the rate it travelled, about two miles an hour) in passing any given object.

The procession entered Hounslow-heath at a few minutes past twelve o'clock, when most of the London visitors left it, and returned to town. There were no other soldiers to be seen, except the few that preceded and followed in procession. No carriages belonging to the living members of the Royal Family then followed in the procession, nor any carriages of the nobility. The Queen's carriages had not the blinds drawn up, but were all open; and each contained two or three persons, some of whom were females.

The procession, thus meagre, when compared with what public expectation had anticipated, arrived at Frogmore about seven o'clock, where it received an addition both in numbers and pomp. The people of Windsor, and the numerous visitors who had flocked from London, began about the same time to move from the town to meet the funeral; and the whole foot-path, nearly a mile, was filled with spectators. From St. George's Chapel to the extremity of Windsor the road was lined with foot-guards; from thence to Frogmore lines of cavalry kept the ground; and instead of every sixth man bearing a torch, there was one in almost every hand. At length, soon after seven o'clock, the advance of a party of horse showed that the funeral was coming; and the spectators, who had been pacing backwards and forwards, now stood still to view it. First marched a squadron of Life-guards, then came seven carriages of the Queen, with the blinds up, drawn by six horses covered with black saddle-cloths; but the great object of attention was the hearse, which next followed, drawn by eight black Hanoverian horses, well known to those who have been in the habit of observing the Royal stud. A large body of Life-guards immediately preceded and followed it. This part of the procession was certainly very imposing, though the splendour of its covering, added to the glittering bustle of a military escort, took away all that solemnity which a hearse is in general calculated to inspire. After the hearse, came the carriage of the Chief Mourner, the Prince Regent; and his Royal Highness was very visible, notwithstanding the clouds of cavalry that hovered round his coach. He seemed in good health. We understood that the Duke of York rode in the same carriage with his Royal brother, but we did not see him: at any rate, his carriage and six moved next in the procession: after which followed the carriages of the Dukes of Sussex and Gloucester, and of Prince Leopold, all full. There was no carriage, so far as we could see, of either of the other Royal Dukes; but the funeral pomp concluded with about a dozen coaches, belonging, we believe, to the nobility and gentry connected with the household; and the rear consisted of a large body of Life-guards intermixed with Lancers. The grandest effect in the procession was the appearance of the military when the torches were lighted: the illumination extended nearly a mile, and the rich glow of their scarlet uniforms, together with their splendid helmets and caparisoned horses, gleaming along the lines, formed a picture that would at once have excited the transport and baffled the skill of the finest artists: but it will be seen from this account, that even with the large accession acquired at Frogmore, the procession was neither so numerous nor so splendid as had been expected.

The procession, we believe, arrived at St. George's-chapel nearly an hour sooner than had been expected; and some inconvenience resulted from this unusual excess of punctuality. We understood that several persons, whose business it was to form part of the chapel procession, arrived too late to gain admittance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Bathurst were excluded: some of the higher officers of the Queen's Household gained admittance with great difficulty; and it was asserted, though we cannot vouch for the fact, that the Duke of Northumberland, appointed to be one of the pall-bearers, could not enter to perform his allotted functions. Either from this circumstance, or the limited number invited, the chapel had certainly a meagre and empty appearance. There was also a want of policy in the paucity of admission-tickets issued for the ante-chapel; for a procession without spectators is, of all things, the most uninteresting; and yet this was the case yesterday. That grand and ample space which would have contained several hundreds of spectators had only a few soldiers, whose torches scarcely illuminated the place, and only served to show the dreary solitude over which they were scantily scattered. Before we dismiss this part of the subject, it may be fit to say a word as to the conduct of the numerous bodies of military, who, with a selection not apparently very suited to the occasion, formed a principal part of the procession to conduct a Queen to her tomb. The cavalry, without any exception, behaved with the utmost propriety, and performed their civil duties of maintaining order with much good temper and courtesy. The behaviour of the Foot-guards was less conciliatory—less gentle; but it is merely common justice to say, that the officers, whenever applied to, listened to every complaint of those who thought themselves aggrieved, with the most ready, polite, and anxious attention.

We now proceed to describe the ceremonial, as it took place within the walls of St. George's-chapel. The number of persons admitted as visitors on this occasion, and not forming part of the preparation itself, was very small, being limited to fifty-four, who were allowed, by means of tickets, to pass by the eastern door of the chapel, adjoining to the deanery, and to take their station in the organ-loft, from whence a tolerable view both of the entrance of the procession and the solemn concluding ceremony could be obtained. These visitors were admitted soon after six o'clock, at which time the chapel was still so dimly lighted as scarcely to render objects visible. The scene, however, soon began to assume the appearance of illumination in a slight degree, as the soldiers who were stationed in the ante-chapel were gradually supplied with torches. The choir, though lighted in the usual manner, from the effect of the black cloth with which it was covered, still remained gloomy and indistinct. At seven o'clock the bell of the chapel began to toll, as an intimation that the procession had moved from Frogmore; while the marshalls and the persons belonging to the Lord Chamberlain's office began to call over and to form those who were to precede the procession into the choir. This was managed with great decorum, and so as scarcely to disturb the general silence that reigned throughout the arcades of this noble building. The interval till eight o'clock was thus occupied, when the quick moving of lights and general bustle discovered through the windows announced the arrival of the funeral cavalcade. At this moment the notes of the organ were heard, and the choir entered, each singer bearing a lighted taper in his hand, and singing the well-known anthem from Croft's burial service. The strength and completeness of this choral band; at least treble the usual number allotted to the cathedral service, and the select members of the principal choirs in and near the metropolis, breaking in upon the silence which before prevailed, produced an effect truly solemn and impressive. The procession then entered by the south door of the chapel, nearly in the same order as given in the ceremonial previously arranged for the obsequies of her Majesty. The pall which covered the Royal body was supported on each side by three Dukes; the Dukes of Northumberland, Dorset, and St. Albans, on one side; of Newcastle, Montrose, and Beaufort on the other. The Royal body was followed by the Prince Regent, as chief-mourner, supported by the Marquisses of Buckingham and Winchester, and attended by the Marquisses of Bath, Salisbury, Headfort, Cornwallis, and Camden, as train-bearers: next followed, as assistants to the chief-mourner, Earl Delawarr, Viscounts Lake and Bulkeley, Lords Boston, Amherst, Arden, Graves, Longford, Beresford, Rivers, Grenville, St. Helens, Henley, and Hill. As these severally entered the chapel, the van of the procession moved forwards into the choir, the Windsor knights, pages, ushers, and other officers ranging themselves around and on the steps of the altar. The members of the Royal Family, of whom we perceived to be present the Dukes of York and Sussex, and those noblemen on whom the Order of the Garter had been conferred, stationed themselves in their respective stalls: the great dignitaries of the Church, of whom were present the Archbishops of York and Canterbury, with the Bishops of London and Salisbury, occupied their respective places within the choir. The Royal body having been carried to the steps of the altar, was placed on the platform prepared to receive it; the pall was removed, and the crown and cushion placed on the coffin. The Prince Regent, as chief-mourner, being seated in a chair at the head of the corpse, surrounded by his supporters and train-bearers, standing, the funeral service commenced in the usual manner, as performed at cathedrals, and at the demise of great and illustrious persons. The first Psalm having been chanted by the choir, in the same finished manner as the anthem with which the ceremony commenced, the service was read by the Dean of Windsor, in that unaffected and impressive manner which is required by this sublime portion of our rubric. At the end of the first part, the celebrated anthem by Kent, "Hear my Prayer," was introduced, and executed in a very finished manner. The body of her Majesty was then let down into the vault prepared for it, and the solemnity was closed in the manner usual on these occasions, by the venerable Sir Isaac Heard, who pronounced in a distinct voice, and standing near the grave, the style and titles of her late Majesty. As the mourners and attendants on this striking ceremony began slowly to separate, and to quit the chapel, the notes of the organ again filled the edifice, and produced at once the richest and most soothing effect. The numerous company separated without the least disorder or inconvenience; and in a few minutes after the obsequies of her late Majesty had closed, no vestige remained of the solemn pageantry which had just passed before the eyes of the spectators.

The whole ceremony was conducted in a manner that reflects great credit on all concerned in its management: no confusion or difficulty arose in its progress; nor did the different persons who formed the procession appear at all embarrassed, or at a loss to discover the situations in which they were to be placed.

It is impossible to dismiss this subject without noticing the limited attendance and homage paid by the peerage on this occasion, as well as by other persons who occupy a distinguished rank in the State: neither was there, we believe, any female of rank who honoured the ceremony with her presence. The funerals of Sovereigns are a part of their state, and should be attended with the same marks of exterior respect as any scene over which they may be called, when living, to preside. The choir was by no means filled by the numbers who were in attendance.

Of his Majesty's Ministers, the following were present: Lords Liverpool, Sidmouth; the Lord Privy Seal, the Lord President, the Right Hon. C. Bathurst, G. Cannigg, and W. W. Pole.

Upon the whole, though something seemed wanting to fill the full measure of public expectation, yet there was nothing to offend; there was no disorder, no tumult, such as is usual when large crowds are collected. The length, however, of the journey, by breaking the immense multitude into parts, had prevented that confusion which must have arisen, had the whole mass been collected on one spot. As it was, the number assembled at Windsor was far less than on the occasion of the funeral of the Princess Charlotte; but the whole number scattered on the road must have been fully as great.

The appearance of the metropolis was nearly similar to that of a Sunday. All the public offices were closed, all shops were shut. As far as we have learned, the day was observed with equal respect in the country. The Royal standard was hoisted half-mast high, on board the men of war in commission at the several out-ports; and each ship was to fire 30 minute-guns. The same ceremonies were observed at all the garrisons throughout the United Kingdom.

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

SIR,—I have witnessed a most disgraceful scene here to-day. The Churchwardens sent about hand-bills very properly recommending all shops, &c. to be kept shut this day, being that appointed for the funeral of her late Majesty, which has been almost universally attended to; but you will, I doubt not, be surprised, as we are all here, to hear the workmen at the Pavilion have not been allowed to suspend their labour for one moment—in fact, the hammering and noise was, or seemed to us, greater than usual, to the annoyance of the neighbourhood, and particularly of those disposed to say their prayers quietly in the Chapel Royal!—I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant,

COURT ANECDOTE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

"Upon my soul a lie! a wicked lie!"

—Which I enclose you, Mr. Examiner, as printed in the Courier of this present evening, December 4th.* The lady alluded to never was the divorced wife of an English Peer, or ever had the slightest inclination to drive into the court-yard of a Palace where she could not be received, and for this simple reason:—any subject marrying a Sovereign, the marriage is termed on the Continent, Une marriage à la main gauche, and she is not acknowledged as his wife at any European Court. Here, Sir, is a plain statement of the case; now, Sir, for the paragraph. In order to shew his toilsome and unceasing loyalty, and to tire the public ear with a repetition of the virtues of our much-lamented Queen, the Courier begins with a most direct and positive falsehood in the first line of his anecdote, by which he may possibly rake up the remembrance of some failings in a lady now in her seventieth year, who has three daughters, and some twelve or thirteen grand-daughters, all moving in the first circles of society, and possessing the most spotless reputations. If you insert this letter in your next, you certainly will exhibit a liar and sycophant in his native deformity, though one inch of your paper is certainly more than the animal is worth.—Your humble servant,
A. C. B. H.

* When the M—e of A—, the divorced wife of an English Peer, returned from the Continent the wife of a German Prince, she sent notice to the Lord Chamberlain's Office, that as a Princess, connected by marriage with the Royal Family, she expected permission to drive her carriage into the Court Yard of St. James's Palace on the approaching Birth-day. The Earl of B—, then Lord Chamberlain, took an early opportunity of referring this demand to her Majesty, who replied—"If the M—e has any wish to drive into the Court Yard at St. James's, by all means admit her—farther than the Court Yard she must be sensible she cannot come."

DREADFUL CASE OF WM. SMITH.

"He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more. Therefore I will not refrain my mouth: I will speak in the anguish of my spirit; I will complain in the bitterness of my soul."

This unfortunate man breathed his last on the 27th ult. in the Fleet Prison, in which he was confined for what is termed "Contempt of Court,"—that is, a non-compliance, either from wilfulness or inability, with the orders of the Chancery Court, which subjects the party to unlimited imprisonment! An inquest was held on his body, as is the course very properly taken on all who die in a jail. There was nothing remarkable in his death—the only wonder is, that it did not occur sooner, shut up as the sufferer had been for SEVENTEEN long YEARS, in one of the dreariest and dirtiest of English prisons.—Is it too much to suppose that Mr. Smith fell a victim to this system of law—this absurd, unjust, and savage system? We think not.

The distinguished Person who presides in the Chancery Court (and whose order it was perhaps that doomed the deceased to imprisonment for life, for the high crime of being unable to pay about 100*ls.*, the costs of a suit in which he had been engaged)—the Chancellor, we say, is described by his friends as a very moral and religious man. He goes regularly to Church, where he prays for all manner of persons, for those who are afflicted in mind, body, or estate, and for the imprisoned in particular. If his Lordship has not "a hand open as day to melting charity," yet he has "a tear for pity," as his frequent weeping in public abundantly proves. Yes indeed; my Lord Eldon seems to shed tears poetically—"He weeps the more, because he weeps in vain." He weeps copiously at a Pitt Dinner—he weeps still more copiously, when sitting in Court, he dilates on his own most scrupulous anxiety to do justice on all occasions. But has he wept, or will he now weep, at the sad fate of poor Smith, who descends from a prison to the grave, after seventeen years of protracted wretchedness? Or, which would show some undoubted and useful feeling, will he now, in his senatorial character, stand up and move for the revision of a law, which thus shuts up in a dungeon for life a fellow man, for an offence (if an offence) which might not deserve even a month's confinement? Until he does this, or something like it, his Lordship's weeping, either for himself or others, will pass for nothing, or worse than nothing. It will in truth only excite ones scorn.—Such exhibitions remind one of those theoretic sentimentalists, who shriek out on seeing a spider drag into his cobweb den a struggling fly, yet neglect to put forth a little finger to rescue the victim from a hideous death.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 17.—MR. BROUGHAM.

—Tell not me of times or danger thus!
To do a villany is dangerous;
But in an honest action my heart knows
No more of fear than dead men do of blows:
And to be slave to times is worse to me
Than to be that which most men fear to be.

G. Withers' Motto.

It may be said, that in order to arrive at the subject of the present article I have passed over many individuals, who, in point of seniority at least, might claim precedence—that if I step behind the Bar, I am encountered by Messrs. LAWES, BARROW, and many others, who, being omitted, have some reason to complain of neglect: as however I am influenced not merely by the claims of rank and standing, but by those of talent and acquirement, those gentlemen perhaps may have more reason to rejoice, that though occupying the front row in Court, as far as these articles are concerned, I have let them remain in the background. Undoubtedly they are men of great respectability in their line, but I am not aware that they deserve any particular remark—or, in other words, that any thing I could say regarding them and their practice would materially illustrate the subject upon which I am engaged: not that I affect to be influenced solely by considerations of public utility: it is not by being useful merely that a man now-a-days, or indeed at any time, can procure and fix attention; he must often be contented with making that a secondary and least obvious purpose: "utility is not a butt at which a man may appear to take a direct aim."

The friends of those gentlemen whom I think it proper to exclude from observation may also urge, that Mr. BROUGHAM can have but little expectation to find his name among criticisms upon those who practise at the Bar; and to a certain extent they are in the right: true it is that Mr. BROUGHAM seldom makes his appearance in any of the Courts at Westminster among men (to use the well known words of a well known orator) contentionis quam veritatis cupidiores; but I do not know that the quantity of business an individual enjoys is the rule by which I should be guided in my selection, nor do I exactly see why the notion of the Bar should be so narrowed: undoubtedly many more cases and causes are heard in those Courts than elsewhere, but they are often, almost always, of much less importance than such as are discussed and decided before the two great Courts of Appeal, the Privy Council and the House of Lords: here, too, the business is more profitable; and as Mr. BROUGHAM, from the nature of his other engagements, both parliamentary and private, cannot give that close attendance in the King's Bench which is necessary for successful practice, he prudently confines his principal attention to them: in the Cockpit he is often employed, and in the House of Lords, when the Lord Chancellor sits there, his attendance is almost daily. Surely such occupations, (independent of his representative character, which in an article like the present is inevitably coupled with his legal capacity) are much more worthy of criticism and remark, than paltry motions for rules to shew cause upon points of practice, or formal references to the Master. In cases of real magnitude, however, Mr. BROUGHAM does not refuse his presence and assistance in the Court of King's Bench; and only two terms ago he sought, through the authority of their Lordships, to compel the Bank of England to render some account of its unknown and enormous profits—profits not merely derived from the pockets, but made out of the lives, of the subjects of the country, as was indisputably established in the last Session of Parliament. In fact, on trifling occasions it is not worth his while to appear; nor is it to be denied, that from his little acquaintance with the technical routine of business, most of the industrious note-taking juniors of the back-rows would be more competent. I do not apprehend that any applause is due to him on the score of an accurate acquaintance with the fee-multiplying intricacies of Tidd's Practice.

If a knowledge of these matters constitute a Lawyer, (and in the more modern acceptation of the word perhaps it does) Mr. BROUGHAM has but little right to that title: I believe he is about the last man who would wish to make any pretensions to it: he is an able, industrious, and zealous Advocate, learned in the first principles and foundations of jurisprudence, in the spirit in which laws originated, the purposes for which they were established, the corruptions that have since crept into them, and the disadvantages that have resulted from them; he is better acquainted with the mind than with the body of law—with the spirit than with the substance; and all unimportant details he rejects as matters partly introduced by Lawyers for pecuniary objects, to make the subject as intricate and unintelligible as possible, and partly the effect of time and altered circumstances. Yet where details are necessary to the comprehending of a particular topic, the labour he bestows upon it is unceasing, and the mass of information he collects is astonishing: still he seems never overwhelmed by it;—he always keeps steadily in his eye the object to which he ought to direct his inquiries, and all he obtains in his researches is adapted by him to its proper situation. He is almost the only man I ever heard of, perhaps the only man at the Bar, who is at the same time capable of taking the most enlarged view of any question, and investigating, when necessary, its most involved minutiae, producing order and consistency out of apparent confusion and discordance. There are very few men, and now unhappily still fewer Lawyers, who enjoy that expansion of mind which can look at a wide subject, in all its bearings, at once—as if it were laid down in a sort of intellectual map before them, with its boundaries and relations. There are a thousand beings in the profession who seem born only to become and continue drudges, who grope in the dark and sometimes bring to light what they do not understand the use of, but what others comprehend and apply; but Mr. BROUGHAM stands alone pre-eminent as a man who includes in himself the most valuable of these qualifications—his intellect is capable of embracing the most expanded subject—his industry is competent to the examination of its most obscure particulars—and his acuteness and judgment enable him to refer to its best use and proper place every particle of information he acquires. There seems no task too difficult for his ardour to attempt, and he always appears more animated by the glory of success than deterred by the disgrace of failure: obstacles that would appal others, animate his exertions—urge him forward, and inspire him with additional powers and energies—with an undaunted resolution to overcome and accomplish: he seems — a spirit that on life's rough sea

Loves to have his sails fill'd with a lusty wind,
Even till his sail-yards tremble, his masts crack,
And his rapt ship run on her side so low
That she drinks water and her keel ploughs air.

G. Chapman's Byron's Consp. A. 4.

Such, if I may use the expression, is Mr. BROUGHAM in theory; but I am quite ready to allow, that he is by no means all this in practice. His labours as an Advocate are marked by great ability, much knowledge, and a strong and laudable anxiety in favour of the party for whom he is engaged. I believe that few suitors, who from time to time have employed him, have had good reason to complain that he neglected their interests, or amid his numerous avocations, that he did not use his utmost exertions, whether of study or argument, in their favour.—I do not consider him so close a reasoner as many of his professional opponents; but he is distinct in his statements, acute in his observations, and generally sure in his conclusions: if he now and then wander from the strict line of discussion, it is seldom without some result, which leaves little reason to regret that he travelled out of his course. The matters upon which he is usually engaged in his professional capacity, the place where they are considered, and the persons before whom they are discussed, preclude almost the possibility of displaying more talent than men of less talent than Mr. BROUGHAM possess.—In questions relating to the law of Scotland, I am informed that his opinion is looked up to by high authorities with great respect.

Mr. BROUGHAM's parliamentary is not perhaps quite so distinct from his professional character as could be wished; or to speak more plainly, he is rather too much of a Lawyer in a place from which I should wish to see all mere Lawyers excluded. What I mean will be readily understood by those who recollect the prefatory remarks I made in the criticism upon Sergeant Copley (Examiner, Oct. 18) to explain why instances were so rare, in which men brought up to the law, and obtaining a considerable share of business, were successful as speakers in the Houses of Commons or Lords. It is true, that much of what I then said will apply less to Mr. BROUGHAM than to the Learned Gentleman whose qualifications were then under discussion, because in the technical sense of the word, the former is less of a Lawyer than the latter; and what is perhaps more important, he has had little or nothing to do with Nisi Prius practice. It may seem strange to many, but it is not less true, that there are scarcely any two things more distinct, than the speech of an Advocate to a Jury, and the speech of a Representative in Parliament;—they have probably little more in common than the continuous flow of language and the purpose of persuasion; for the means by which the end is to be attained are very dissimilar. I do not intend again to enter into this subject, which I before tolerably fully discussed, and I only recur to it to make more intelligible what I wish to be understood, when I say, that Mr. BROUGHAM is too much of a Lawyer in Parliament: he wanders about too much in search of objections to what he is urging; he takes pains to conjure up what perhaps but for his ingenuity would not have been produced against him; he furnishes his antagonists with weapons instead of driving right on to the end of his subject, and illustrating and enforcing it by every auxiliary circumstance. If an objection be obvious, it may be well to remove the apparent obstacle; but when a plain road is open, it is idle to desert it for the sake of scrambling over hedges and ditches.

It is on this account principally that I am by no means an admirer of the mode in which Mr. BROUGHAM brings forward a great subject in a set speech, after long study and deliberation; it has a great deal too much of the Edinburgh Review about it:—not that I wish to speak slightly of that perhaps incomparable production in its kind, but I wish to shew that there ought to be a great difference between a sort of exposée of a whole subject in the pages of that miscellany, and a speech in the House of Commons to a popular assembly, and through that assembly to the whole nation. That his harangues upon such occasions are infinitely laboured in the matter, I readily allow; that he goes not only to the bottom of a subject, but examines it on all sides “with a most learned spirit of human dealing,” I have already stated; but independently of the objection that it may be too learned and too laboured for the occasion (which may fairly admit of dispute), I say that he weakens himself and his argument, and fatigues even his most willing hearers, by doing much more than is necessary. It is true, that after a long debate the House is generally too impatient, to listen to the most favoured speaker in what is termed the reply or the summing up of the mover, and it may be urged, that Mr. BROUGHAM is anxious to give at once and in one view his own arguments, the points that will be advanced in opposition to them, and his refutation of those points. This may be so; but still the proceeding is injudicious, and he should recollect, that he is not the only Member in the House who is likely to support that side of the question: his practice in the profession might have taught him, that an Advocate will generally from motives of prudence leave something to his junior, without tiring the Court by requiring it to listen only to one Counsel on one side, who will speak at such length as to exhaust both the subject and his auditors. On occasions like these to which I refer, Mr. BROUGHAM engrosses the whole debate: it is too much to require any set of men to listen unceasingly to a single voice for four, five, and six hours, in succession.

I confess that I think he is never heard to such advantage as in reply, and especially in reply to the flimsy flippancies of Mr. CANNING: it is quite heart-rejoicing to see him turn upon his back this bodiless porcupine, who has all his life been darting a venomous quill at every party that would not patronize him: no man does it so well or so effectually as Mr. BROUGHAM; and Mr. CANNING knows it, and fears it: he always endeavours to postpone speaking until Mr. BROUGHAM has been heard, and then he runs riot in the insolence of his uncontrolled self-sufficiency. Every recent Session has afforded several instances in point; and on one occasion I well remember Mr. CANNING made a formal complaint to the House, that Mr. BROUGHAM could so seldom be drawn from “his lurking place” until after he (Mr. CANNING) had risen.

The chief characteristic of Mr. BROUGHAM's stile of speaking is nervous energy: he aims at little refinement: he would rather say a thing in a strong than in an elegant way; and to make himself distinctly intelligible, does not scruple sometimes to utter acknowledged vulgarisms: he takes no pains about the formation of his periods; and if his expressions are well chosen and well adapted, he is more indebted to the inspiration of the subject, than to previous and deliberate purpose. I do not think that his eloquence ever goes much beyond the forcible and the argumentative; and though, when he was a younger man, I have once or twice known him attempt to wind up an harangue by a studied peroration, I cannot say that he was successful; and his early abandonment of the practice, shews that his persuasion was the same. His stile of address is therefore peculiarly adapted to replies, and his memory appears so tenacious, that he has little need of notes to prompt him either with the arguments on the other side, or with the answers he intends to give them.

His voice and manner are not the happiest: the first is capable of musical intonation, but he neglects all art, and often very impolitely commences in so high a key, that he is exhausted before he arrives at his conclusion: many men, who are not gifted with lungs so strong, would be worn out long before. His action is unvaried, and not by any means well calculated to add to the force of what he is urging: he sways both arms in the same direction and at the same time, and if he happen by accident to place his hat under one of them, it is a considerable relief to the eye.

There is one suggestion I would offer with diffidence in conclusion, chiefly because I wish Mr. BROUGHAM to lose none of his impressiveness in the House, or his influence in the country; and that is, that he should not allow himself so frequently to be roused to take part in a debate. I know that with a man of strong feelings this self command and restraint is a matter of difficult attainment, especially with so many provocatives on the one side, and so few members, from recent calamities, capable of speaking with much effect on the other. Had I adverted to this subject before the last Session, I should probably also have suggested, that he should shorten his addresses by judicious compression.

CORN LAWS.

MR. EXAMINER.—If the Gentleman that replies to me on the subject of the Corn Bill had not signed himself “A Constant Reader,” I should have taken him for one who had been better employed than in the acquirement of empty knowledge: he may be one of the profession, as he calls it, but by the term I suspect he is no Farmer, but a Meal-man of some sort or other, writing against the No-meal men; and it is likely he reads the Monday Examiner when he comes to the Corn-Market in Mark-lane.

As he professes to be a constant reader, I am authorised to conclude he saw both my letters: my style might not be polished, but it was pretty plain, and my arguments, if not good, were numerous: he had his choice of any weak points that there might have been for his assault; but he attacks none of them, for they were founded on a rock.

He tells you very gravely, as a proof “that he reads your printing-hand,” that I consider the Corn Bill a cruel measure: but he does not attack a sentence which I wrote to prove it so. The reason why he supposes I consider it cruel is, that I made slight mention of its having starved thousands and thousands to death, and left us the typhus fever as a memento of its ravages: he has not a word to say against my charging this dreadful havoc upon the Corn Bill, as the cause of the exhausted state of our granaries, nor against my assertion that similar famine or worse must ever be the consequence of a bad harvest, while the gaunt and deadly Corn Bill is in force. The present state of our labourers and poor manufacturers, half-starved upon a scanty allowance of watery potatoes, after a fine corn-harvest, he does not think proper to notice, nor the unattainable minimum of bread. A Minimum for bread! Shades of Nero and Caligula, rest ye in peace.

He says (which I never did), that I would rather have had corn imported till the price became so low as to have ruined Farmers with small capitals: he is a dreamer: I consider these men as the great body of the Farmers upon whom we depend, and I argued that the Corn Bill, with the help of the Poor's Rates which it has doubled, renders their small capitals quite inadequate to their expenses, and consequently throws them upon the no mercy of the great Capitalists and Managers of the Corn Markets; whereas, the very price they generally got for their corn this year, being obliged to sell in a glut, would have sufficiently checked importation without the Corn Bill, by the standard of which these small capitalists have every thing to buy the whole year round to their ruin; while the great speculators are sitting upon velvet. He threatens that these Dives will withdraw their capital; but a tremendous reverse of this is shewn. I called the Corn Bill, truly, a Monster in Legislation, which never dared shew its head before under Pharaoh or Caesar, (by the consent of nations the purchase of bread had been free as the air we breathe), and behold the natural progeny of this ill-omened monster! They are afoot again; their yell is heard in the gale; and the mother hugs her famished infant to her breast with terror and dismay!

These pitiless persons* petition for a prohibitory duty; we are to have no corn from abroad! After a bad season we shall perish half of us: our suppliers will cease to grow corn for us, and turn to manufacture, to the ruin of our trade and commerce: and who are the people then that will be able to pay the Farmers the price for corn at home? Or, without being able to barter English articles of ingenuity and industry, how shall we get a supply after a desolating wet summer, which is too frequent—coming upon the harvest too with empty granaries—what a prospect for us! Our Island will be as defenceless too as the Isle of Sky or of Man.

If the policy had been doubtful, is the starving of our poor manufacturers and labourers of no weight in the balance? It is of no consideration indeed by either party: there was an universal uproar while the Bill was passing, and it has not fallen short of men's fearful expectation; but now both parties keep it snug, and I dare say damn these Corn-dealers for bringing up the subject again. A Constant Reader and J. L. may read each other; I fear the question is a dead letter in your paper, compared to the Funeral of the Queen and the Election for Westminster; but Heaven will bless you.

J. L.

* They were foreseen by Agur the son of Jaketh, and I treat your readers with the fine oriental language of his prophecy:—"There is a generation whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw-teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth.—The horse-leach hath two daughters crying, Give, Give!—There are three things that are never satisfied, yea four things say not, It is enough:—The grave and the barren womb, the earth that is not filled with water, and the fire, that saith not, It is enough."

CHARGE OF NEGLECT.

MR. EXAMINER,—Observing in your paper a heavy charge brought against me on a late act of Suicide, I beg leave, through the medium of the same, to repel so unjust an attack upon my character. At the time I was sent for to attend the unfortunate man, I was professionally engaged from home, and did not return for several hours after; and that so far from refusing to attend on such a melancholy occasion, I should most willingly, and with the greatest promptitude, have rendered my assistance.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
44, Shoreditch, Nov. 30, 1818.

T. EATON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I have this day (Nov. 30) received a note by the post, signed Amicus, and dated the 24th, respecting a paragraph which appeared in your paper of the 22d, in which my name is improperly introduced, and offering me, in your name, the insertion of my answer in your next paper. The delay in the delivery of the note prevents my availing myself of that opportunity, had I been inclined to have intruded on your columns. Should the writer be known to you, I beg leave to acquaint him, that the charge of inhumanity, as it relates to me, is entirely groundless, as I was from home at the time the transaction occurred, and knew nothing of it till it was long over. My Assistant, who alone was in the way, and to whose humanity and attention all who are acquainted with him will bear ample testimony, on that day, most unfortunately, was so singularly situated, that he had it not in his power to attend the call.

The Constable's evidence was chiefly given for the purpose of throwing blame upon him, for medical assistance had been obtained long before he made his application, which was more than an hour after the event had taken place, and his conduct was in other respects very reprehensible.—I remain, Sir, your's, &c.

Shoreditch, Nov. 30, 1818.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

CRUELTY TO A CHILD.

On Monday, Charles Elliott, and Leonora his wife, were charged with ill-treating their son, Russel Elliott, an infant of nine years old, by keeping him tied with a leather strap to a bedstead quite naked, and very often without a sufficiency of the necessaries of life.

Mrs. Lee gave the following statement:—"I am a widow and the mother of two children. In June last I went as servant to Miss Matthews, to lodge at the house of Mr. Elliott, in Fishers-street, Red Lion-square. About a fortnight after I heard a cry in a faint voice, as if from some person in distress. I listened and heard the same voice call out in a very mournful manner for a little bread and water. I became alarmed, and anxious to ascertain from whom the voice proceeded. I went up stairs, and heard the same voice, as if from a child in the upper garret. I then called out, and was answered by a child. I asked what it wanted, and it answered "Give me a little bread and a little water." I went down and communicated what I had heard to my mistress, and Mrs. Elliott, (the mother.) She first said I was mistaken: she then answered "Oh! it is my fool." She gave me no further explanation then. The next day or the day after I saw the brother of the child go up stairs. I followed him. When I saw him open the door I asked to be admitted, but he refused, saying that his mother would be displeased if any person but those of the family were to see him. I forced my way in, when I beheld a spectacle that quite shocked me. The poor child was naked as it came into the world, and fastened by a leather strap to the post of a bedstead: the stench from the filth with which the child was surrounded, was almost insupportable; the boy had brought with him a few crusts of bread and some water; after this I frequently heard the child cry, as if some person was beating it: I also heard the sounds of slaps, as given to it; but did not seem to be severe: I knew that his brother and sister frequently beat him." When asked whether she had ever spoken to Mrs. Elliott on the subject, after the first interview, witness answered, "Yes, very frequently; I often said to her "Surely you may send the poor child to the workhouse, where he will be kept clean, and every attention paid to him without any expense." To this she replied, "that would cost me too much." I asked her how much it would cost, and she answered, it would cost two or three shillings a week; and that would do us at home. I very often gave her bread and meat to give to the child, but I found he never got any of it; and I once saw her give it to her other children, and eat some of it herself. I one day heard the little boy crying very bitterly and calling for bread, on which I went down to Mrs. Elliott and said, your child is crying for something to eat, pray do let it have a little. To this she replied, "Oh hang it, I wish it was dead: I could cut its throat if I dare!" Whenever I saw the child, it was always in the same naked and filthy state in which I saw it on the first occasion. To this evidence the witness added her belief that the father of the child was not conscious of all the treatment it received; for that when he was spoken to about it, he said it should have whatever it wanted.—She underwent a long cross-examination by Mr. ALEY, the object of which seemed to be, to show that the whole story was a fabrication on her part, from motives of hatred to Mrs. Elliott; but her answers did not evince any other motive against her, than that of dislike, in consequence of her treatment of the child.

Mrs. Burlingham had lodged in Elliott's house. She had been some time there before she knew of the child's situation, and then she was given to understand that it was confined because it was an idiot. Being a mother herself, she considered that a child in such a state required more attention than under any other circumstances. On one occasion, she heard the child cry for bread, and she spoke, in consequence, to the mother over the stairs. She told her it was crying for a little bread and some water, and begged that some might be sent up to it. Mrs. Elliott said to her "Some people have very delicate feelings, but I could cut its (the child's) throat to-morrow, if that was all." The father did not evince the same severity towards it.

Wm. Read (the officer of Hatton-garden) stated, that he was sent by the Magistrates to inquire into the treatment of the child. On his arrival at the house, he saw Mr. and Mrs. Elliott. He asked how many children they had. She answered three or four, he could not say which. He wished to see them; but she said they were all out at play. He asked whether there were any of them in the house; to which she replied in the negative. He inquired where they usually slept, and was answered, they slept in the attic. He then wished to see the place, and produced his authority. Mrs. Elliott, seeing that he was about to proceed up the stairs, got on before. He followed immediately, and saw her unlock the door of the room where the child was tied. He got in along with her, and saw the child tied with the strap, naked, and in every other respect in the situation which the first witness had described. He with difficulty loosed the strap from the bed-post. (Here he produced the strap. It appeared about two yards long, and was broader and thicker than a horse's bridle.) From the manner in which it had been made fast to the post, the child could not move a yard from the bedstead. There were no bed-clothes, but he believed it might have been able to get sitting on the side of the tick-bottom.

Mr. ALEY, on behalf of the prisoners, endeavoured to show, first, that the whole case was a conspiracy between the first two witnesses; and secondly, that no further restraint was laid on the child than was necessary to preserve it from doing injury to itself or others, it being occasionally subject to paroxysms of insanity. In support of the second ground, he called

Ellen Nesbit.—She stated, that she had known the child from the time it came from the nurse. It was then weak and helpless. She had been in the habit of visiting the family up to last April, and she always saw the same, and even greater attention paid to this, than to any of the other children. It was extremely irritable and mischievous; she considered it insane; it would throw any thing within its reach or power of using, at those by whom it conceived itself annoyed.

Eliza Neatherhead and Mrs. King deposed to nearly the same effect.

Edward Staines sent for the child once, in order to examine it, and had no doubt that it was an idiot.

Sidney Elliott, a boy about 13 years old, the son of the prisoners, stated, that his brother had been confined about four months before he was removed. He was confined in consequence of his being extremely mischievous. He used to break the plates and the windows, and tear whatever clothes were put on him. Witness never saw him get any ill-treatment from his father or mother. He was very dirty in his habits. He always got the same kind of victuals that were used by the rest of the family. Witness and his sister used frequently to go up and play with him, by desire of his father and mother.

Mary Elliott, the sister of the last witness, deposed to nearly the same effect as her brother.

Mrs. Elliott begged leave to address the Court. She then, apparently with the view of removing any degree of blame from her husband, stated, that he was a hardworking man; that being obliged to be out from morning till night, the care of the children was entirely left to her. She also described him as the best tempered and most humane man alive.

The Court said they would take that into consideration after the Jury had decided.

The Jury, without hesitation, returned a verdict of guilty against both prisoners.

The CHAIRMAN, on Tuesday, after an eloquent and pathetic address to the woman, in which he dwelt on the enormity of her offence, and the total want of all motherly feeling which she had evinced towards her helpless infant, sentenced her to be imprisoned for 12 months in the House of Correction. The man, in consideration of his not having many opportunities of seeing how the child was treated, and of some feelings of compassion which he occasionally evinced towards it, was only sentenced to be imprisoned for one month.

TRIAL OF LORD RANELAGH AND HIS SERVANTS.

On Tuesday, James Gregg and John Byrne, two of Lord Ranelagh's servants, were put to the bar. His Lordship was allowed a seat at the table near his Counsel.—The indictment charged the Right Hon. Thomas Lord Viscount Ranelagh, and his two servants just named, with assaulting James Wallace Richard Hall, with a gun, a pitchfork, and certain bludgeons called Indian clubs, and with an illegal detention of his person. Other counts contained charges for similar assaults, and illegal detention of Henry Waldo, John Le Gall, and James Colbourne. Another count charged his Lordship and his servants with extorting, by threats and menaces, on the same day and place, the sum of seven shillings from the same parties.

Mr. Adolphus observed, that this was a charge against a nobleman of high rank, and the crimes imputed to him were assault, false imprisonment, and extortion of a sum of money from four young gentlemen, under circumstances of no ordinary aggravation. The gentlemen who brought the prosecution had no vindictive motive in it. Their principal object was, that their names should be rescued from the imputation of having tamely submitted to unmerited insult, and he might add, outrage; and here he felt it due to the character of those young gentlemen to state, that had the moderate but manly course which they had proposed been pursued; had that manly and dignified feeling which should characterise the conduct of a nobleman been adopted on the other side, the case might long since have been settled, and never have met the public eye. But that would not satisfy Lord Ranelagh; he had chosen to come into Court, and as that was his wish, he should take its consequences upon himself. The issue of that appeal would teach him, that in this free country, the peer of highest rank dare not with impunity violate the rights of any, even the very lowest. The gentleman by whom the prosecution was brought was the son of a most respectable gentleman, the Rev. W. Hall, of Herefordshire; and he was of the liberal profession—"of our profession," continued Mr. Adolphus, "and God forbid that I should ever crouch so low as to admit that it was inferior to any in society." The other gentlemen concerned in the prosecution were all of them highly respectable.—[Mr. Adolphus here stated the facts of the case, which will appear in the evidence.]—He (Mr. Adolphus) had said that the present case, though rather a singular one, was not entirely new. The Jury were aware, that in the times of baronial power, it was the practice of the Lords of those days to sally forth from their castles, at the head of their retainers, and levy contributions upon those who had not means to resist their oppression. Modern refinement had worn down those barbarous customs; but it did not appear that every vestige of them was obliterated; for the Noble Lord, imagining perhaps that he had all the right as well as the high and noble blood of those ancient barons, thought fit to make a display of both on this occasion. He called his domestics round him, and having armed them and himself, and placed them in military array, he conceived that he possessed all the rights of former barons, and therefore it was quite natural that he should raise a subsidy from those whom his forces were intended to subdue. (A laugh.) A few days after this, application was made by letter to his Lordship, stating the intention of the parties to have recourse to the law, if he did not acknowledge the ill-treatment and make some apology. This was sent by a special messenger; but the Noble Lord, would not lessen his high dignity by condescending to return any answer. Another similar communication was made, and with the same success. At length, the affair was laid before the Magistrates; and his Lordship gave an undertaking, that he and his servants would appear to answer any charge. A day was appointed, and the parties attended; but though they and the Magistrates waited for a considerable time, neither his Lordship nor any of his servants attended. Great stress would no doubt be laid on the circumstance, that the young gentlemen had committed a trespass on Lord Ranelagh's grounds. He would admit, that in point of law they had committed a trespass, but he put it to the Court, whether a trespass such as that, would be a justification of the conduct which he had mentioned? He appealed to the Jury, whether the liberty of the subject could be justifiably invaded, and his right of property violated in the manner he had described, for such a trespass as that of taking shelter on a man's ground in a violent storm? If Lord Ranelagh conceived himself injured, he had his remedy; but the law never intended that he should be the judge in his own case, and inflict a punishment according to his own caprice. The sum taken from Mr. Hall was, it was true, a small one, and their forcible detention but of short duration; but it was not the amount of that sum, nor the length of the imprisonment, of which they complained; but the principle which caused the extortion of the one, and the enforcement of the other: for if Lord Ranelagh might demand 7s. now, he might from the same principle increase his demand to any indefinite sum, or lengthen the imprisonment according to his caprice, at any future period. This, he trusted, the Jury would not allow. Their verdict would show to the public, that no man, however high in rank or station, could with impunity make himself the arbiter of the liberty, or the disposer of the property, of any of his fellow-men for one moment beyond that which the law authorized him.

James Wallace Richard Hall—"I am an articled clerk to Messrs. Alliston and Hundleby, of Freeman's-court, Cornhill. On the 24th of July last, I went in a small boat up the Thames, in company with Mr. Waldo, Mr. Le Gall, and Mr. Colbourne. We had proceeded as far as Fulham-bridge, when we were overtaken by a violent storm of thunder, lightning, and rain: anxious to avoid a wetting, we landed on a bank, near to which was a beaten track, which led us to the shelter of a large tree. Here, after remaining for a short time, we brought from the boat some bread and beef and some porter, which we partook of. We were only a few yards from the water. After we had finished our repast, we were about to return to the boat, when I saw a man coming towards us, with a large bludgeon, accompanied by a dog. He said that my Lord was quite surprised at our conduct in coming to trespass on his grounds. At this time I saw other men coming towards us. One had a double-barreled gun, and another was armed with a pitchfork. The bludgeons appeared to me to be Indian clubs. The man with the pitchfork came on one side; those with the clubs on the other; and he who held the gun, whom I found to be Lord Ranelagh, advanced in front of us. When I saw him approach I proceeded towards him, but he called out in a loud voice, "Halloo, what business have you there? You must know that you are committing a trespass." To this I answered, that we had been driven to the place for shelter from the storm; that we had not intended to do, nor had we done any harm, but that we would then go away, and were very sorry for having even unintentionally committed a trespass by coming on his grounds. After this I stepped forward to go towards the boat; but Lord Ranelagh waved his hand, and two men immediately ran between the boat and me. One of them presented the pitchfork at me, and refused to let me pass. His Lordship said, "No, no, I won't let you off so easily; you shall follow my servants to Bow-street, to answer for your conduct; for I took another set of fellows there the other day." I answered, that we were perfectly willing to go any where to answer for what we had done; for that we were not conscious of having committed any act cognizable by law. Lord Ranelagh replied, "You must have known that these are my premises, and that you had no right to enter them without my consent;" and he followed this, by asking, "Who are you?" I said, we were gentlemen; and as such, I presented him my card, telling him at the same time that he would find from that address what I said to be correct. I also gave him the name and address of the gentlemen to whom I am serving my clerkship. He then asked Mr. Waldo who he was. To which Mr. Waldo made a similar answer, and referred him for its truth to Mr. Scott, a magistrate at Hammersmith, who was his friend. About 20 minutes then elapsed, which were filled up with a long conversation, in which he endeavoured to prove, and I to disprove, the impropriety of my conduct. At length he put an end to it, by saying, "Well, I shall let you off on your making some compensation to my servants for their trouble." We gave 7s. to Byrñe. We felt ourselves in a very awkward situation, and but for that we should not have paid the money. After we had paid, we were suffered to depart."

Mr. Waldo and Mr. Le Gall were next examined: their testimony was almost a repetition of that given by the first witness. In Mr. Le Gall's direct examination, there was this additional circumstance, that when Mr. Waldo had referred Lord Ranelagh to Mr. Scott, a magistrate at Hammersmith, his Lordship asked, whether he was Scott the bricklayer?—To some questions from the Court he answered, that neither he nor his companions had sauntered about the grounds; that he was quite positive as to Lord Ranelagh's having insisted on the compensation, and that he looked upon it as a necessary condition of their being allowed to depart.

Mr. ALLEY addressed the Jury for the defendants. His Learned Friend had thought it necessary to remind the Jury how much it was their duty to administer justice with an equal hand to the peer and to the peasant. Such a warning was unnecessary, he trusted, to any Jury of Englishmen. Why should the Learned Gentleman have conceived it necessary to say that which was calculated to degrade the rank of the nobility, or to confound their rights and privileges with those of the lower order of society? Why should he have thought it necessary for his cause to make those allusions in the hearing of a rabble? The Learned Gentleman adverted at considerable length to the aspersions which he said had been cast on the character of the Noble Lord—aspersions which, he felt it his duty to say, were as malicious as they were false. He imputed them not to the Learned Gentleman, but to those by whom he had been instructed. The character of Lord Ranelagh was as pure and unsullied as his rank was elevated. He was proud and honourable; but his was that pride which placed him above the disposition to do any act which could in any degree derogate from the honour and dignity of that rank of which he was so much the ornament. His rank was elevated, but he was every way entitled to it by his virtues; but he would, indeed, be every way unworthy of that rank, if he could be guilty of the crimes which had been imputed to him. Mr. Alley then commented in very strong terms on the conduct of Mr. Hall, and on his presumption in sending the letter to Lord Ranelagh. That letter complained of ill-treatment on the part of Lord Ranelagh, and threatened him with prosecution if he did not make an apology—an apology, after he had been humanely suffered to pass unpunished, after having been guilty of a trespass for which an action might be maintained against him and his companions. The very mention of it was ridiculous. And he also complained that this letter was not answered. It was not answered. Lord Ranelagh treated it with the contempt which was due to the impudent scribbling of a lawyer's clerk; who forgot the respect which was due to his superiors. The impudent libel which that letter contained, he would have no hesitation in advising the Noble Lord to have answered in a Court of Law, in the way it deserved.

Here Mr. Alley read the letter, which was as follows:—

MY LORD,—I beg leave to address you on behalf of myself and my three friends, in respect to the illegal treatment we received at your hands on Friday evening last. Although at the time we felt fully convinced of the unjustifiable nature of the proceeding, we were not aware that it amounted to actual robbery, which our professional friends advise us is the case. If landing and seeking protection from a most tremendous storm be any trespass, the very act alone of your surrounding us with armed men is itself contrary to every principle of law; but not content with a most ample apology, and detaining us for nearly half an hour, environed by yourself armed and your armed servants, and of course in bodily fear, you also required us to remunerate your servants before you gave us our liberty. We cannot sufficiently regret that we did not, at all hazards, refuse to submit to this extortion, but judging by the conduct we had already received from you, we naturally concluded that you would have turned our boat adrift, and otherwise ill used us. This reason alone induced us to comply with your unwarrantable requisition, which can be considered in no other light than that of a robbery. Regard, therefore, to our own characters induces me to inform your Lordship, on my own behalf and that of my friends, that unless you cause to be refunded the seven shillings taken from us by your servants, by your direction, and make a suitable apology to us for your behaviour, we shall apply to Bow-street ourselves for warrants against yourself and your servants. When your Lordship considers to what extent this affair may go, and what will be considered of your Lordship when the world finds that this extraordinary mode is the means which your Lordship uses for keeping your servants, I think your Lordship will not hesitate to avow to me that you were wrong in so acting, and to return to me the money. I shall await your Lordship's answer till twelve at noon on Wednesday.—I am, my Lord, your obedient servant,

WALLACE HALL.

Freeman's-court, Cornhill, July 27, 1818.

Please to address for me at Messrs. Alliston and Hundleby, Freeman's-court, Cornhill.

Mr. ALLEY expressed a doubt whether the parties, if indicted for the threat it contained, might not be found guilty of a felony without benefit of clergy. He then contended, that Lord Ranelagh had a right to detain parties caught trespassing on his grounds, in order to procure redress; that the law allowed redress for such a case; that in no case did it allow redress without also giving the means of obtaining it; and that Lord Ranelagh could have had no other in the present case, but a detention of the person. He then called

Anthony Macwith, butler to Lord Ranelagh, who remembered the 24th of July last; it was a fine day. Did not remember a storm of thunder; was present when Lord Ranelagh came down to where the prosecutor and his companions were. One of them expressed his sorrow, and said he did not know of any harm in what was done. Lord Ranelagh told him that he had been robbed frequently by persons coming there; and after some further conversation, told them they might go away. His Lordship then returned towards his house, after one of the parties had thanked him for his politeness. They then proceeded towards the boat; but one of them turned and gave him (witness) some silver for himself and the other servants who were present. Lord Ranelagh was on his way to his house at that time, and could not see what was done. He never told any of them to give the money, nor did he offer to detain them from the boat.

Two or three other servants of Lord Ranelagh gave nearly the same evidence as Macwith.

Mr. ADOLPHUS rose to reply. He defended the conduct of Mr. Hall, and said he threw back the charges which had been made against that respectable young gentleman with contempt—let that word light where it may. With respect to the defiance which had been thrown out, of intended prosecution against his client, he treated it with indignation and contempt as the effort of imperious pride and impudent audacity—let those terms be taken where they might.

Mr. ALLEY.—Do you mean that as a personal insult to me, Sir? If you do, it shall not be unnoticed.

Mr. ADOLPHUS said, that he had not meant the words to apply to Mr. Alley; but if, under the cover of what he felt it his duty to state, any impression of that nature were taken, he was to be seen in another place. Mr. Hall was as respectable as Lord Ranelagh; and here he could not avoid using the old adage—that the King could make a lord, but he could not make a gentleman; and he now said, in the hearing of any who pleased to take it, that, as far as the affair at issue was concerned, there was not a gentleman in it, but Mr. Hall and his three young friends.

The CHAIRMAN summed up the evidence with great clearness and accuracy; and the Jury, without hesitation, found his Lordship and the servant Byrne guilty.—The sentence of the Court was, that Lord Ranelagh should pay a fine of 50*l.* to the King, and that the servant should pay a fine of 1*s.* The trial lasted nearly the whole of the day.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.—An inhabitant of Mornington-place, Hampstead-road, and his son, lately appeared to summonses to answer the complaint of a neighbour, for a profanation of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday. The particular act of which the informer complained was their working in a garden and planting gooseberry-bushes, and he also complained generally of their working in their garden on Sundays, planting cabbages, &c.—The Magistrate inquired what business they were of, to ascertain if they were gardeners by trade. The father replied, he was not in any business, but lived upon the produce of his property. The son replied, he was a licensed victualler in London. The Magistrate held, that the defendants' conduct did not come within the meaning of the Act of Parliament passed for the better observance of the Lord's day, which was for the prevention of persons following their trades, callings, or professions, on Sundays for gain; and held that a man would be as much liable for writing a letter to a friend as for amusing himself in his own garden, and dismissed the charge.

GUILDHALL.

Catherine Sutherland, an Irish woman, was on Thursday brought before the sitting Alderman, charged with felony. The first witness called against her gave his name Valentine Sutherland; and on being asked whether the prisoner was a relation of his, said, "Yes, your Worship, she is my wife."—Alderman SMITH. "Your wife! Why she is charged with felony. A wife cannot commit a felony against her husband."—Witness. "I can't tell, your Lordship, how that is; but this I know, she has robbed me, and of all I have got in the world too."—The husband stated, that he was a seaman, lately come from abroad; his wife was very glad to see him, and the more so when she learnt he had some money to receive. He went to the Admiralty, and received upwards of 50*l.* which he placed under the bed. When his wife made the bed, she said she would take care of the money; she accordingly took it away. He had some suspicion of her, and therefore thought proper to look after her, and hearing that she was going off into the country, got an officer and had her taken into custody just as she had taken a place in the Plymouth coach.—Catherine Sutherland, the wife, said her husband knew she had the money, and she was only going into the country to see her friends. The Magistrate then questioned her as to what she had done with the money, to which he replied, with much affected innocence and simplicity, and every appearance of regret and distress, "Please your honour, I've lost it all."—Hawkins, the officer, sagaciously hinted the propriety of searching the prisoner, and she was taken into a private room for that purpose. On the return of the parties, the features of the husband, which had exhibited nothing but melancholy during the time he was relating the tale of his misfortunes, were lightened up with a smile when Hawkins announced that the whole of the property, amounting to 52*l.* had been found upon her.—The notes were accordingly restored to the husband, who returned thanks to the Magistrate for his kindness, and said he would be at the trouble to take his wife home to her father and mother in Ireland, and have nothing further to do with her. The prisoner was then delivered into his care after a suitable admonition.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—An inquisition was taken on Friday, in Beer-lane, Tower-street, on the body of Mariano Marquez de Castro, a Spanish Gentleman, aged 30 years, formerly a Captain in the Spanish service, who was compelled to exile himself from his country in the early part of this war, in consequence of his being charged as one of the persons who entered into a conspiracy to dethrone the King of Spain. His death was caused by his shooting himself with a large pistol in the mouth.—The Jury took a view of the body, which lay on the bed at his lodgings, in a room on the second floor, at the house of Mrs. Warner, 24, Tower-street; the deceased's head was nearly severed from his body; his face was blown to pieces, and a pistol, the barrel of which was burst, and made flat like the blade of a knife by the explosion, lay at his feet; a razor open lay on a table near the bed-side; the wall was beat to pieces by the balls which the pistol was loaded with, and the place was covered with blood. The bed was very much burned, and the deceased was much burned by his clothes having taken fire, and which was extinguished by the blood which flowed from the wounds.—Mrs. Warner deposed, that on Wednesday night the deceased went up stairs to bed. Between one and two o'clock she was awoken by a noise; she did not think it was the report of fire-arms, and went to sleep again. On the following morning, the deceased's servant came, as usual, and went up to his bed-room; in a very short time, he came running down stairs, seemingly much agitated; he said, "he has cut his throat." She went over the way to the late Churchwarden and told him; he came over directly, and looked at the deceased, and said that he had not cut his throat, but shot himself.—Hillary Ramon, clerk to Messrs. Firmin de Tastet and Co. merchants, Trinity-square, knew the deceased in Spain; he was of a distinguished family in Seville. He acquired a most excellent character as a soldier, and was also in private life much respected. After the return of Ferdinand, the deceased conspired to re-establish the Cortes. The plot was discovered, and the deceased and others escaped to foreign countries. In February the deceased arrived in England; he became greatly distressed; he made known his circumstances to Mr. De Tastet, and he relieved him. The deceased was at times very desponding; he would strike his forehead, and seemed to labour under great emotion, which caused witness to believe that he was affected in his intellects.—[Here the Coroner opened the pocket-book of the deceased, and found a note which was written opposite the date of the day he committed the act, the 3d of December, which was translated literally into English—"I shall put an end to my mortal existence, and the reason is nothing to any one but myself."—This note was in the handwriting of the deceased.]—The Coroner (Mr. Shelton) having recapitulated the evidence, stated that he did not see any proof of insanity in the deceased's mind at the time he committed suicide.—The Jury consulted for some time, and returned a verdict of Felo de se.—The property of the deceased is forfeited to the Crown. We understand that he had not 5*s.* in the world at the time of his death, and lately was so distressed that he accepted some apparel on Saturday, his own being in so very deplorable a condition. The verdict caused a considerable degree of surprise. We understand that his body will be buried in the cross-road at the top of Mark-lane.—Another account says, the deceased had been implicated in the cause of the unfortunate Gen. Porlier. He was driven to this dreadful act by the pressure of personal distress. Before he died, he wrote several letters, which were found in his apartments, the sensible and vigorous style of which manifest that till the last moment he retained the utmost abhorrence of the horrid system of government existing in his native country, which had been the cause of all his misfortunes.

An Inquisition was taken on Monday night, at the Poor-house of St. Sepulchre's, Smithfield, on the body of a woman, apparently about 50 years of age, who was found in a dying state in the street, and whose name is supposed to be Harris.—It was stated that on Saturday the deceased, who was ragged and filthy in the extreme, and very emaciated, was seen by Mr. Frost, the turnkey of Giltspur-street Compter, sitting on a bench near the entrance of the Compter, surrounded by a mob. She appeared to be in a dying state; the by-standers requested Frost to take the miserable creature into the prison; he declined, stating that he was not authorised to do so, unless she had been charged with an act of vagrancy and committed by a Magistrate. She lay there until Mr. Line, the beadle, passed by, and seeing her apparently on the point of death, he immediately procured an order, and she was removed to the Poor-house and put to bed; she soon afterwards expired. In her pocket was found a pawnbroker's duplicate of a handkerchief, which she had pledged two days before her death for 3d.—A Surgeon stated, that her death was caused by disease and poverty; there were marks on her head and side, which, in all probability, were caused by her falling; they were not of that description likely to have caused her death. Verdict—Died by the visitation of God.

Sunday a young man, named Edward Bell, who resided in Paternoster-row, opposite the watch-house, put an end to his existence, by hanging himself. He had been dead some time when he was discovered.

About seven o'clock on Monday evening, as Mr. Nicholls, brush-maker, of Bowling-green-lane, was crossing the parade in St. James's-park, he was attacked by three men, who knocked him down and robbed him of what money he happened to have about him, which was only two half-crown pieces and some half-pence. On some person approaching the thieves ran off, and effected their escape.

A few days since the Leeds mail was robbed, between Nottingham and London, of a parcel, containing bank-notes to the amount of upwards of 12,000*l.*, directed to Messrs. Glyn and Co., bankers, in the city.

Monday evening, about dusk, some villains entered the mansion of Lord De la Zouch, in Stratford-place, and during the absence of the servants, contrived to enter the plate-room, from which they stole a large silver fluted tea-pot and stand, with the family arms engraved on them, a small plain tea-pot, crest a Griffin, and on the side a motto "Pro Deo et Ecclesia;" also 10 table-spoons, with a baron's coronet, and a falcon, 6 desert-spoons, 15 silver forks, fluted, 2 sauce ladles, and 4 tea-spoons. The robbery was not discovered till some time after, when the servant going to examine the plate missed the above articles. Notwithstanding the utmost exertions of the police, no trace has hitherto been discovered likely to lead to a discovery of the perpetrators.

Tuesday night the house of Mr. Wilson, linen-draper, near Vauxhall, was entered by robbers, who carried off property to a considerable amount; they were observed by the patrol as they were leaving the premises, who called to them to stop; they ran off, and he levelled his blunderbuss and wounded one, supposed severely, as blood was on the ground, and the robber left one of his shoes behind him, which was dyed in blood.

On Friday morning, between two and three o'clock, the neighbourhood of St. John-street, Clerkenwell, was thrown into the greatest consternation and alarm, by the discovery of a fire in the extensive manufactory of Messrs. Green and Co., vinegar manufacturers. It originated in a part of the building called the mustard-warehouse, in which were upwards of 50 tons of that article, which, with the whole of the building, was completely destroyed. The fire was confined to that part of the building in which it was first discovered.

A shocking event took place at Worcester on Thursday week. One of the passengers in the coach, after taking his seat at the dinner table at the inn, suddenly went out of the house. He returned in a few minutes, walked up stairs into a bed-chamber, and there shot himself through the heart. It appears that when he left the dinner-table, he had proceeded to a shop in the neighbourhood, where he gave 5*l.* for a case of pistols. He had written in pencil a few words of a letter to his parents, but they did not lead to a discovery of his connections. He was from London, and slept on Wednesday night at the Talbot, Bristol, where he appeared much distressed, and said he was going to Liverpool. He was booked by the name of Jackson. The unhappy man seemed to be about 30 years of age, and of respectable appearance.

As the Bath and Exeter mail was on Wednesday week going over Dunkerton-hill, the driver observed a man lying in the road, apparently in the agonies of death. He stopped the coach, and with the assistance of the guard, and a passenger, raised the unfortunate man, who it appeared was choked with wind, occasioned by his having ate some raw turnips to appease his hunger. By proper attention the poor fellow was recovered, when he declared that the only sustenance he had received for three days, consisted of three penny loaves! Mr. Coles the passenger supplied him with the means of purchasing refreshment at a neighbouring inn.

FROM these practical evidences of the little value of their words, we may guess how far the Allies are in earnest. What indeed could be expected from them, after the evidences they have given of their unteachable nature? It is a fine thing, or rather used to be a fine thing, to hear of emperors, and kings, and august assemblages; but the Allies are not only men; they are common men, and one or two of them what would be called in the cant of society "great bores." The Emperor of AUSTRIA appears to be a dull elderly gentleman; the King of PRUSSIA a sort of serious barrack-master; the King of FRANCE a man of the world and a gross liver, though not deficient in national cleverness; the PRINCE REGENT of England a complexionally good-natured man, spoiled by want of understanding and by the heartless habits of vulgar pleasure and frivolity. The Ministers, if we were to judge by our own (which is not fair) are only better, inasmuch as they have been bred up to understand something, in the necessary routine of office. Lord CASTLEREAGH indeed is hardly this. He is an illiterate man of fashion, who knows how to box, and perhaps has some talent for common political intrigue, but who makes himself ridiculous when he speaks. The Duke of WELLINGTON is a mere soldier, who manages things well enough when they are in a barrack-state, but no further. Of this, his talking to the French about "a great moral lesson" is a sufficient proof,—a strange misplaced thing in a man of his description, and which naturally appeared very ridiculous to that lively people. RICHELIEU is perhaps a man of some ability, as well as sprightliness, having shewn it, it is said, when he was an emigrant in Russia, where he was made Governor of Odessa. METTERNICH, we believe, is a regular old German diplomatist. Pozzo di Borgo, the Russian Minister, is curiously enough a native of Corsica, and an old rival of BONAPARTE. He is understood to be a man of talents; and in our opinion serves the only Allied Prince, who may be considered as in earnest.

How far the Emperor ALEXANDER is in earnest, is another question. But we take the secret to be this. ALEXANDER was the favourite grandson of CATHERINE, and would have been educated by D'ALEMBERT, if that illustrious philosopher could have been tempted to go to Russia. Perhaps he thought a despot incurable. We believe the same offer was made in vain to DIDEROT. The consequence was very curious. CATHERINE began to be irritated with French scepticism, when she saw it tending to overthrow despotism as well as superstition; and the education of the young prince fell into the hands of La HARPE, a worthy man but somewhat inclined to fanaticism, and who had separated himself in great trepidation from the infidel philosophers. LA HARPE, however, though appalled on the score of religion, could not help retaining a good deal of the liberality of his old acquaintances in other matters. The pupil was docile, good-natured, and had been accustomed from infancy by his grandmother to love literature and aspire to the character of a reformer, though an imperial one. He even inherited perhaps something of her natural talents, which her husband PETER had not been able to neutralize altogether in their unfortunate son PAUL.* From the result of these circumstances combined, the Emperor may be regarded as a royal curiosity. He is kindly disposed, but cannot forget that he is an imperial dictator. He approves of liberty in the abstract, and thinks he disliked the ambition of BONAPARTE; yet he flattered the illegitimate conqueror, then undertook to free the Continent from his sway, then helped to restore Legitimacy and its old usurpations, keeping Poland by way of setting the example. Above all, he is religious; and what with his education and the extraordinary circumstances that have made him the leading prince in Europe, he has wondered himself into a mystic. He is not quite sure, at times, that he is not destined to bring about the Millenium. But then he likes to go the imperial road to heaven; and at the same time, he is ambitious of the character of liberality and of the applause of the knowing. By the men of letters, he would be thought lettered; by the men of business, a man of business; by the military, a warlike prince; by the philosophers, a despiser of show and a reformer; by the religious, a royal fulfiller of prophecies; and by the ladies, a good dancer. Add to this strange mixture of ambitions, a robust habit of body, a tall and perhaps somewhat gaunt person, which he is not unwilling to dress to advantage, and a face betwixt the Tartar and the German, more goodnatured-looking than wise, yet with an expansive forehead; and you have a pretty correct portrait of this imperial sublimation of common-place, who thinks himself, and really is at present, the most important personage in Europe.

The Emperor ALEXANDER, perhaps half-unconsciously, has in fact got one very shrewd suspicion in the midst of his inconsistencies; and that is, that the age must go on improving, whether he and his brother-allies chuse to let it or not. In spite therefore of his hereditary hankerings after the old species of power, the better part of his education is singularly brought into play by his very tendency to superstition; and alternately giving way to covert recommendations in favour of despotism as far as the old allies are concerned, and to more open ones in behalf of liberality when less secure monarchs are in doubt, he wishes upon the whole to be considered as one who consents to be an Emperor only that he may be the most powerful Philosopher of his age; and he hopes to lead it at all events, whether compelled to do so or not.

* We look upon this personage, who was an unhappy mixture of ugliness, insanity, gross folly, shrewdness, violence, and benevolence, to be an awful specimen of the consequences of congenial and embittered wedlock,—a subject most worthy the attention of the philosopher.

[To be concluded next week.]

EMIGRATION.—MR. FEARON'S WORK.

The opinions of the Americans on European politics, according to Mr. Fearon, are very strange and inconsistent. Although very proud of their own liberty, they seem to have no sympathy with the friends of freedom in other parts of the globe. They read and like the political writings of the English Tories, and look upon our Reformists as anarchists and desperadoes. A large body of citizens of the State of Massachusetts passed resolutions expressive of their joy at the restoration of Louis "to the throne of his ancestors, to which he is called by the entreaties of his people," and of their approbation of the "moderation, disinterestedness, foresight, and determination of all the Confederates, to sacrifice every thing to the repose of Europe." The South American Patriots, who are now endeavouring to do what the people of the United States glory in having done, have received no assistance from them as a nation, but merely by means of private mercantile speculations.

There is no state religion in America, and every man is allowed to avow his sentiments; but it appears that in New England those persons who do not believe in the doctrines of any of the different sects must nevertheless contribute to the support of one of them. This is both unjust and absurd: the principle is first acknowledged that every body may profess his religion without injuring his interests, and yet a partial exception is made against, and a tax laid on, all those who do not agree with any of the existing opinions. "Religious controversy," says Mr. F., "appears unknown." The people in general appeared to him to be characterized by "a cold uniform bigotry;" to pay great attention to outward forms; to be inaccessible to argument, and ignorant of the scriptures. "The great proportion of attendants at any particular church appear to select it either because they are acquainted with the preacher, or that it is frequented by fashionable company, or their great grandmother went there before the Revolution, or because (what will generally have a greater weight than all these reasons), their interest will be promoted by so doing." The fanaticism of the Methodists is extreme; as the following account of the religious exercises at Ebenezer Church in Philadelphia will show: it is by no means a rare occurrence:—

"I went at eight o'clock in the evening. The door was locked; but the windows being open, I placed myself at one of them, and saw that the church within was crowded almost to suffocation. The preacher indulged in long pauses, and occasional loud elevations of voice, which were always answered by the audience with deep groans. When the prayer which followed the sermon had ended, the minister descended from the pulpit, the doors were thrown open, and a considerable number of the audience departed. Understanding however that something was yet to follow, with considerably difficulty I obtained admission. The minister had departed, the doors were again closed, but about four hundred persons remained. One (apparently) of the leading members gave out a hymn, then a brother was called upon to pray; he roared and ranted like a maniac; the male part of the audience groaned, the female shrieked; a man sitting next to me shouted; a youth standing before me continued for half an hour bawling, "Oh Jesus! come down, come down, Jesus! my dear Jesus, I see you!—bless me, Jesus! Oh! oh! oh! Come down, Jesus!" A small space farther on, a girl about eleven years of age was in convulsions; an old woman, who I concluded was her mother, stood on the seat, holding her up in her arms, that her ecstasies might be visible to the whole assembly. In another place there was a convocation of holy sisters, sending forth most awful yells. A brother now stood forward, stating, that "although numbers had gone, he trusted the Lord would that night work some signal favours among his dear lambs." Two sisters advanced towards him, refusing to be comforted, "for the Lord was with them;" another brother prayed—and another. "Brother Macfaddin" was now called upon, and he addressed them with a voice which might almost rival a peal of thunder, the whole congregation occasionally joining responsive to his notes. The madness now became threefold increased, and such a scene presented itself as I could never have pictured to my imagination, and as I trust, for the honour of true religion and of human nature, I shall never see again. Had the inhabitants of Bedlam been let loose, they could not have exceeded it. From forty to fifty were praying aloud and extemporaneously at the same moment of time: some were kicking, many jumping, all clapping their hands and crying out in chorus, "Glory! glory! glory! Jesus Christ is a very good friend! Jesus Christ is a very good friend! Oh God! oh Jesus! come down! Glory! glory! glory! Thank you, Jesus! thank you, God! Oh, glory! glory! glory!!!" Mere exhaustion of bodily strength produced a cessation of madness for a few minutes. A hymn was given out and sung; praying then recommenced; the scene of madness was again acted, with, if possible, increased efforts on the part of the performers. One of the brothers prayed to be kept from enthusiasm! A girl of six years of age became the next object of attention. A reverend brother proclaimed that she "had just received a visit from the Lord, and was in awful convulsions—so hard was the working of the spirit!" This scene continued for some time; but the audience gradually lessened, so that by ten o'clock the field of active operations was considerably contracted. The women, however, forming a compact column at the most distant corner of the church, continued their shriekings with but little abatement. Feeling disposed to get a nearer sight of the beings who sent forth such terrifying yells, I endeavoured to approach them; but was stopped by several of the brethren, who would not allow of a near approach towards the holy sisterhood. The novelty of this exhibition had, at first sight, rendered it a subject of amusement and interest; but all such feelings soon gave way to an emotion of melancholy horror, when I considered the gloomy picture it represented of human nature, and called to mind that these maniacal fanatics were blaspheming the holy name of Christianity. Notwithstanding my warm love of liberty, I felt that, were I an absolute lawgiver, I would certainly punish and restrain men who thus degraded their nature, who set so wicked an example of religious blasphemy, and so foully libelled the name and character of revelation. I have since understood that one of the female converts upon this occasion had been turned away from her situation the previous evening for stealing five dollars."

Speaking of the apparent contradiction which this violence presents to the usual cold indifference of the Americans, Mr. Fearon very justly observes, that "the general theory, which attributes warmth of feeling to the fanatic, is perhaps, after all, a false one. Who so bigoted, so exclusive, so illiberal towards others, so wholly devoid of every generous sentiment? The extreme fanaticism of these maniacal saints may perhaps therefore actually spring from the absence of real enthusiasm, combined, of course, with gross and excessive ignorance."

Slavery is sanctioned by law in twelve of the States, and is practised (with the exception of New England) throughout the Union. The unfortunate negroes are indentured to their masters for 14 or 15 years, and at the expiration of that term, transported into the slave States and sold for life. This dreadful evil can not be removed, until the prejudices of the people against the black population are overcome by reason and humanity. At present, as in our West Indian colonies, the negroes are looked upon as an inferior order of beings; the lowest class would esteem themselves degraded by an association with them; and they are frequently treated with great cruelty. An anecdote related by Mr. Fearon will illustrate the general feeling on this subject in New York, where slavery is not legal:—

"Soon after landing, I called at a hair-dresser's in Broadway, nearly opposite the city-hall: the man in the shop was a negro. He had nearly finished with me when a black man, very respectably dressed, came into the shop and sat down. The barber enquired if he wanted the proprietor or his boss, as he termed him, who was also a black: the answer was in the negative; but that he wished to have his hair cut. My man turned upon his heel, and with the greatest contempt, muttered in a tone of proud importance, "We do not cut coloured men here, Sir." The poor fellow walked out without replying, exhibiting in his countenance confusion, humiliation, and mortification. I immediately requested that if the refusal was on account of my being present, he might be called back. The hair-dresser was astonished: "You cannot be in earnest, Sir," he said. I assured him that I was so, and that I was much concerned in witnessing the refusal from no other cause than that his skin was of a darker tinge than my own. He stopped the motion of his scissors; and after a pause of some seconds, in which his eyes were fixed upon my face, he said, "Why, I guess as how, Sir, what you say is mighty elegant, and you're an elegant man; but I guess you are not of these parts."—"I am from England," said I, "where we have neither so cheap nor so enlightened a government as yours, but we have no slaves."—"Ay, I guessed you were not raised here; you salt-water people are mighty grand to coloured people; you are not so proud, and I guess you have more to be proud of; now I reckon you do not know that my boss would not have a single ugly or clever gentleman come to his store, if he cut coloured men; now my boss, I guess, ordered me to turn out every coloured man from the store right away, and if I did not, he would send me off slick; for the slimmest gentleman in York would not come to his store if coloured men were let in; but you know all that, Sir, I guess, without my telling you; you are an elegant gentleman too, Sir."

"At the dinner-table I commenced a relation of this occurrence to three American gentlemen, one of whom was a doctor, the others were in the law: they were men of education and of liberal opinions. When I arrived at the point of the black being turned out, they exclaimed, "Ay right, perfectly right: I would never go to a barber's where a coloured man was cut!" Observe, these gentlemen were not from the south; they are residents of New York, and I believe were born there."

The indolence of the Americans seems to be acknowledged on all hands: Mr. Fearon traces its origin to the great and sudden influx of wealth at the time when Europe was agitated by the French Revolution, and the carrying trade was thrown into the hands of the Americans. "The means of living were in the hands of every man, with the occupation of but one-fourth part of his time. They were in the possession of political and domestic ease, the sources or the value of which their want of reflection prevented them from estimating; and having at once the means, the time, and the opportunity of gratifying their passions or indulging their indolence, they have not pursued learning beyond their school-books." If the means of living are not quite so easy of attainment now, that "wearisome anxiety about pecuniary affairs, from which even the rich are not exempt in England," is not yet felt in America, and it is no wonder that a people, not stimulated by necessity, and too uncultivated to feel any ardour for scientific or literary pursuits, should be too fond of ease and enjoyment.

The American ladies are treated by our author as unceremoniously as the gentlemen: perhaps something may be allowed for the prejudices of an Englishman, who may think too much of the absence of those domestic qualities for which his countrywomen are so celebrated.

"The American female character requires our attention: in mental pursuits it would appear to be at present but little advanced. This proceeds no doubt from a variety of causes; all that has been said of the male population, by a natural reaction affecting the female also. The demand, too, (if I may be excused a mercantile phrase upon such a subject), exceeding the supply, together with the comparatively less value set upon domestic comfort, may, perhaps, have tended to produce the extreme attention to mere personal ornament, and the universal neglect of either mental or domestic knowledge, which appears to exist among the females here, as compared with those of England."

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

A numerous meeting of the Inhabitants of Westminster was held on Tuesday at the Fives-Court, Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair. After several Resolutions had been unanimously passed in favour of Mr. HOBBHOUSE'S election, that Gentleman spoke nearly to the following effect:—

"GENTLEMEN,—The Chairman has desired me to come forward to make such professions as become a candidate for the honour of representing you: the professions of candidates, however, are now become so common that they are despised, and as that is the case, I must decline making any, and must trust to the favourable opinion which those who have put me in nomination have already expressed regarding my character; not but that I could make as fair a string of professions as any other individual; but even if I did, you would look to my Parliamentary conduct, and hereafter consider, whether it was such as to justify and confirm the kind opinion which you have now adopted. It has been justly said, that every candidate should be explicit upon the topic of reform: I therefore say at once, "that Westminster ought to send a Reformer to Parliament." If Westminster does not intend to send a Reformer to Parliament, I am not a candidate for its representation. I come before you in the cause of reform, and in no other cause. When I say in no other cause, I do not mean to say that the representatives of the people in Parliament ought to confine their duty to this question alone; but they ought to make reform their particular object; to pursue it with a constant and ardent pursuit. If you do not elect a Reformer to act in unison with your present Representative, you will elect some person who will counteract all his measures, and commit an act of suicide upon your own liberties. If you send Sir Murray Maxwell to Parliament, there will be an opportunity for saying, "Westminster is not for reform: one accident placed Sir F. Burdett in the House of Commons, and another has put Sir M. Maxwell by his side." Such argumentation no sophistry can evade. But your adversaries talk of schemes concerted and things done in a corner. We, however, do not any thing in secret; for how indeed can we, when it is the cause of the people that we advocate, and when it is they who assist us in advocating it? Your enemies, and the enemies of all England, have had several, what they call public, but what, from their numbers, I should call secret meetings. The whole number of people collected in them all would not really, I scarcely exaggerate, amount to one-thousandth part of the present multitude. In one parish they mustered an assembly of five; out of these five, three sent out the invitations; the other two came to visit them, (Laughter.) In another parish they mustered the enormous number of nine; (laughter again); but these, though few in quantity, were great in power. First came the headle of the parish. (Loud laughter.) I myself recognized him as a deliverer of Sir Murray's placards, in the last election—next came the tax-gatherer—then the overseer. Your adversaries also talk of the base, mean, and dirty acts committed by the Reformers at the last election; what they mean by it I am at a loss to discover; there were base, mean, and dirty acts committed, but not by the Reformers. A time shall be found for recounting the whole tissue of them. If not done before, I will do it at the hustings in January; and in all probability they will be kind enough to furnish me with some new cases before that time arrives. I have heard, too, of select vestries; what select vestries are I can scarcely tell, unless they be one of the many engines used to cheat, gull, injure, and distress the mass of the people. Men not used to cry, not given to the melting mood, repeatedly told me in the course of the last canvass, "Sir, if we vote for Sir Francis Burdett, we are ruined in our fortunes; if we do not vote for him, we are ruined in our peace of mind." There are nothing like facts. In the course of a friend's canvass the other day, he went into the shop of a respectable tradesman in Piccadilly, and solicited his vote. He replied, that he should have great pleasure in voting for Mr. Hobbhouse, if the Duke of York did not send him orders to the contrary. During the interval, which has elapsed since the last election, I can assure you, Gentlemen, that the Committee has not been idle. All that they have discovered shall be exposed. All the money subscribed for Sir Murray Maxwell's election comes out of the pockets of those who have ruined your pocket. (Laughter.) Not one of his 100L. subscribers but receives at least 1,000L. a-year from the taxes. Thus the tax-consumers take money from you, and use it against you; or, in other words, ruin you with your own money. In the next place I have to inform you, that the list of stewards to Sir Murray Maxwell's election-dinner consisted partly of young officers in the Guards. What these young gentlemen may call campaigning I do not know; their valour is indisputable, or I should have thought that their time might have been better spent than in feasting and rioting at the expense of your liberties;—one of them, however, a Colonel of the Guards, deserves to be commemorated; for of him it was boasted, at a late election dinner in Westmorland, that had he come earlier into the field, Sir Murray Maxwell would have been returned for this City. It has been said, that the ladies were all for Sir Murray Maxwell, because his cause was their own! There were, indeed, some ladies who went about in their carriages, intimidating tradesmen; these ladies must be brought to the same tribunal; but it shall be done without any violation of the respect due to their sex, or any infringement of any of the decencies of life: their letters, however, shall be read, their names mentioned, their deeds exposed, and all their dark practices told to the public.—Mr. Hobhouse here begged leave to recur to the words, liberty, order, and virtue, as he thought he could give the real meaning of the words in the mouths of those who used them. By liberty, they meant the liberty of putting their hands into your pockets; by order, the order which Caleb Baldwin and his orange-riband men established when they commenced their affray in the last election; and as for virtue—(poor virtue! she had never been introduced into such bad company before)—I cannot find any other meaning for it, unless it be that sense in which Milton makes Satan use it, when he addresses his legions in Pandæmonium, and calls them

“Thrones, principedoms, dominations, virtues, powers.”

He calls the devils virtues, and in that sense, I suppose, the German author of the placard had most certainly used it. The reason why they talk of vote-jobbers, is because they trade in votes. We who only spent 1,240*l.* upon the election, could not job much for votes. As great misrepresentations had gone abroad on that point, I overlooked the accounts, which may be examined by any individual who chooses; and I pledge my honour, that not a single farthing has been expended which is not there accounted for. He congratulated the Reformers upon their present union, and hoped that, as a remedy had been found for their miseries, they would not be slow in applying it, and would not be in the number of those who thought the remedy worse than the disease.”

Other resolutions were then put; the thanks of the meeting voted to Mr. Richardson, the chairman; and the assembly quietly dispersed.

“There has been a rumour for two days, that a Candidate is likely to start for the Representation of Westminster, on those principles of rational Reform which so powerfully recommended Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY to the choice of the Electors.”—Morning Chronicle.—“It is in contemplation, we understand, to propose a candidate supported by the Whig Interest, to fill the present vacancy for the City of Westminster, the memory of whose father will give him strong claims on the support of the Electors. The second son of Mr. WHITBREAD will, in all probability, be proposed, who is a Gentleman of sound political principles, and of the most promising talents. Should this be the case, we should not be surprized to find Sir MURRAY MAXWELL retire from the contest.”—Morning Advertiser.—By proposing a Whig Candidate for Westminster (says a Correspondent), do the Whigs mean to give the Court Candidate a good chance for the seat, to the exclusion of a determined Reformer?—Would they rather see the Court succeed than the Reformer?

Whether Mr. Hobhouse is the very best candidate that could have been proposed for Westminster, is not for us to determine. It would not be an easy task to name any one individual to whom objections of one kind or another might not be made. In a matter of this kind, as in most others, perfection is out of the question. No candidate will ever be found whose character and qualifications will of themselves be sufficient to secure the support of all the independent party. But when a candidate comes forward, who, like Mr. Hobhouse, is supported by a numerous and respectable body of the Electors, who is besides distinguished for his talents, and who has given the most unequivocal proofs of attachment to the cause of freedom, we certainly think that any independent elector, who, by refusing him his support because they may happen to differ on some point of minor importance, facilitates, as such conduct must do, the return of the Treasury minion, acts in the most selfish and improper manner. The maxim that we ought either to have all or nothing, is as absurd as it is inapplicable in the ordinary business of life. What should we have thought of the understanding of the individual, who, because all taxes were not repealed, should have refused to avail himself of the repeal of the Income Tax? This, though an extreme case, differs only in degree from many that are every day occurring. Mr. Hobhouse may not in all respects come up to the ideal standard which some of the independent electors of Westminster have formed of a representative, but still it is their duty to support him by every means in their power. If two candidates are set up by the popular party, they are almost sure to lose the election. Mr. Hobhouse, it is obvious, will be supported by a numerous and powerful body of electors, and this, in our opinion, is of itself a sufficient reason why he should be supported by the whole. The approaching contest in Westminster is not to decide a matter of punctilio; it is not to decide whether a representative shall be chosen who will go this length or that length in support of Reform; but it is to determine whether the second city of the empire shall be represented by an independent gentleman, or by a mere nominee,—a cat's-paw of the Treasury. This is the simple question for the consideration of the electors. They have it not in their power to choose between BROUGHAM, BENNET, or HOBHOUSE. Their only alternative is HOBHOUSE or MAXWELL. And if they do not drop their ridiculous dissensions, if they do not throw away the husk rather than lose the kernel, and sacrifice their paltry animosities to the preservation of their political independence, it is easy to foresee who will be elected. There will be no difference of opinion among their opponents. The Treasury pack will strain every nerve to wipe off the disgrace of their late defeat. And supported, as they are sure to be, by Court influence, private subscriptions, and secret service money, it will require the cordial and vigorous exertions of the whole independent party to defeat their unprincipled machinations.—The Scotsman.

FRANCE.

PARIS, DEC. 4.—Yesterday the Duke of Wellington had the honour to dine with the King and their Royal Highnesses. His Grace was decorated with a diamond grand cross of the Order of the Holy Ghost, which had been presented to him that morning by his Majesty. This present is valued at 500,000 francs.

DEC. 5.—By a new order just issued, the Court will go into mourning on Sunday next, for 21 days, on the occasion of the death of the Queen of England.

An event has happened at Fahlun, in Dalecarlia, (a province in Sweden), which might figure in a romance. On working to establish a communication between two mines, the body of a man was found in a perfect state, impregnated with vitriolic water. This corpse was pulpy when first discovered; but it became hard after being exposed to the air. No person could recognise the features; but the catastrophe which entombed the victim in the bowels of the earth was well recollected to have taken place about fifty years ago. All inquiries relative to the connexions of the deceased had ceased, when one day a woman, decrepit from age, and supporting herself on crutches, came to the spot; she approached the body, and soon recognised it to be that of a young man to whom she had been promised in marriage half a century ago. She threw herself on the corpse, which resembled a bronze statue, bathed it with her tears, and fainted under the delirium of seeing again the object of her tenderness before she sunk into the tomb. The singular scene may more easily be imagined than described, on contemplating this couple; one of whom, notwithstanding an interment of about 50 years, had preserved all the features of youth; whilst the other, bending under the weight of years, had preserved all her love.

The Quarterly Review, (Evelyn's Memoirs) observes of one of our Rulers, that "the flatterers by whom he was surrounded, perhaps prevented him from feeling any remorse for the evil which he had done; but they could not take from him the stinging consciousness, that he had done none of the good which it had once been his intention and desire to do."—Is this backing a friend?

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, DECEMBER 13.

THE most curious piece of intelligence from the continent this week is the following Royal Decree, which has been issued at Madrid under the authority of the Grand Inquisitor, who is also the Creature's confessor. We call FERDINAND so by way of eminence. We have Creatures among ourselves, such as Old Bailey Creatures, Quarterly Review Creatures, &c.; but he is undoubtedly the Creature emphatically. GIFFORD himself is a respectable reptile to him. He is the Sovereign of the Order.

In the name of the Holy Trinity, &c.

Whereas it has been made known to us that various publications of a heretical, irreligious and seditious tendency are in circulation among the subjects of this kingdom; and whereas it is of the last importance that their progress should be arrested, and the authors, publishers and circulators duly punished, it has been determined that such measures shall be taken instantly as will most effectually accomplish this purpose.

All persons having in their possession works bearing the following titles, shall be brought before the Holy Office, and such punishment inflicted as the case shall seem to require, provided it be not less than solitary imprisonment under the authority of the Holy Office for three months, and the payment of a fine of not less than 25 doubloons. The works prohibited are—"The History of the Inquisition"—"Reasons why the Inquisition should be abolished"—"A few Remarks upon the Re-establishment of the Brotherhood of the Order of Jesus"—"The Theory of the Cortes"—"The Necessity of National Representation"—"Observations on the Conduct of several of the Courts of Europe"—"Patriotic Songs"—"The Difficulties at present to be encountered."

The greater number of these heretical and seditious productions have been printed in foreign countries, in the Spanish language, and secretly introduced into this kingdom.

A proportionate punishment will be inflicted upon such individuals as have in their custody any foreign Journals, Newspapers, &c. containing matter against the Government and Institutions of Spain.

Given from Madrid, this 19th day of Nov. A.D. 1818.

(Signed)

FRANCISCO XAVIER MEIR Y CAMPILLO,
Grand Inquisitor of the Kingdom.
ANDRES FLOREZ PEREIRA, Secretary.

The meaning of this is,—

Any man who reminds the restored creature of his promises, shall be dreadfully punished:—

Any man who publicly says that the Patriots, who restored the creature, and took him for a human being, ought not to be dungeoned and killed, shall be dreadfully punished:—

Any man who says there are any other difficulties than what the creature chooses to acknowledge, shall be dreadfully punished:—

Any man who says that the Holy Allies have no right to be promise-breakers, like the creature, shall be dreadfully permitted:—

Any man who has a Chronicle, Examiner, Minerve, or Espanol Constitutionnel in his possession, that is to say, any Journal in which the creature is called by his right name, shall be dreadfully punished:—

Any man who ventures to write an account of the Inquisition's own actions in former times, shall be dreadfully punished:—

Lastly. Any man who says that his fellow-creatures ought not to be dungeoned, racked, thumb-screwed, dislocated, suffocated, and burnt, because they differ with the creature and the Inquisition in opinion, shall be dreadfully punished.

The very least thing, it seems, which can allay the rage of the Inquisition at being differed with, is a solitary imprisonment of three months. Precious religious Ogres! And such are the decrees, they think, which are to restore vigour and security to the state of things in Spain! The very fact, that they are under the necessity of threatening these "heretical and seditious" opinions, is a sign of the times which would convince any persons to the contrary, who are not the most bigoted and stupid of living beings.

And yet what can our own countrymen think, when they hear, that Lord CASTLEREAGH, a man purporting to be an Irishman born and an English Minister, is understood by the Spanish Patriots to take part against them, as he does indeed against the press, and every species of liberty? The shameful treatment of the Spanish officer, who killed himself the other day, was, we grievously suspect, an intended compliment to the understood opinions of government on these subjects. This gentleman was concerned in the noble conspiracy of PORTIER,—that is to say, in a conspiracy to procure the very constitutional freedom which the creature had promised him in common with all his preservers. He was imprisoned in consequence, and subsequently got to England, where instead of finding his patriotic countrymen taken by the hand by those who flattered and encouraged them to fight the French, he saw them struggling against poverty, calumny, and hostility. It was perhaps a combination of these circumstances, and the yearning after his unfortunate country, which drove him to put an end to himself; and then comes a set of Englishmen (we blush to call them so) and wreak the despicable letter of the law on his dead and naked body, to the disgust of the beholders and of every decent heart in the nation. The barbarous folly of this custom has been shewn over and over again;—it does not prevent the deed; it cannot hurt the deceased; but from obvious feelings of association, it sharply wounds the living, and exhibits the inflictors in the light of barbarians; and when in addition to all this, we know how partially the law is managed, and what would have been done, for instance, had the unfortunate Marquis, instead of being a refugee Patriot, been in the train of the Spanish Ambassador, the disgust and scorn are completed.

The strong sensation produced by this circumstance was superseded however by another naturally much stronger, inasmuch as it involved the most obvious feelings and interests of the nation at home. We need not tell our readers that we allude to the acquittal of the persons tried for forgery. The public had long viewed with disgust and horror the easy condemnation to death of any one, whom the Bank Inspector chose to pronounce guilty. The Juries first gave way to him, under the Judge, apparently in consequence of that feeling which overcomes the objections of people when they find a man pretending to rights and powers which it would seem almost a superhuman and impossible impudence to lay claim to without justice. At last, however, what with the public astonishment, and their own, they could bear it no longer, and refused to take the fatal ipse-dixit of an official servant of the prosecutors,—an ipse-dixit, be it observed, which he avowed he could not explain, lest the rest of the world should be in the secret!—that is to say, lest the very men who got into a chance of being hung by passing forged notes, perhaps innocently, should know how to avoid it in future! The wretched inconsistencies into which the demi-official Paper the Courier has fallen on this occasion, partly from habitual nonsense, and partly from annoyance at seeing Juries do what others ought to have done, have been so coolly and admirably anatomised in the Times, that the trouble is more than taken off our hands. First it abused the Public for crying out against the punishments,—then the Jury for overthrowing them, and perplexing the Bank,—then the Bank for not having thought of it all before, and making so light of men's lives. We should have thought that different writers had been trying their demi-official hands one after the other on this occasion, had not the regular Government Scribe absurdity and impudence enough for any thing. We shall return to this important subject.

The Paris papers which arrived yesterday, brought the following speech of the King of France on the opening of the Chambers: it is in the usual affected and general style of such productions; the talk about his French heart is really ludicrous in a Monarch who run away from his dear subjects on the first show of danger:—

"GENTLEMEN,—At the commencement of the last Session, at the same time, that I deplored the evils which afflicted our country, I had the satisfaction to give reason to consider the termination of them as near at hand. A generous effort, and of which I have the noble pride to say, no other nation has afforded a fairer example, has enabled me to realise these hopes; and they are so. My troops alone occupy all our strong places; one of my sons, who hastened to join in the first transports of joy of our eastern provinces, has with his own hands, and amidst the acclamations of my people, hoisted the French standard on the ramparts of Thionville; this standard now floats on all the territory of France.

"The day on which those of my children, who have borne with so much courage the burden of an occupation of more than three years, have been delivered from it, will be one of the finest days of my life; and my French heart has enjoyed no less the end of their distresses than the liberation of the country. The provinces which have so painfully occupied my thoughts till this day, deserve to fix those of the nation, which has admired, as I have done, their heroic resignation.

"The noble unanimity of heart and of sentiments which you manifested, when I called upon you for the means to fulfil our engagements, was a brilliant proof of the attachment of the French to their country, of the confidence of the nation in its King; and Europe has eagerly received France, replaced in the rank which belongs to her.

"The declaration which announces to the world, the principles on which the union of the five Powers is founded, sufficiently shews the friendship which prevails among the Sovereigns. This salutary union, dictated by justice and consolidated by morality and religion, has for its object to prevent the scourge of war, by the maintenance of treaties, by the guarantee of existing rights, and permits us to fix our eyes on the long days of peace, which such an alliance promises to Europe.

"I have awaited in silence this happy epoch, to turn my thoughts to the national solemnity, in which religion consecrates the intimate union of the people with their King. When receiving the Royal Ounction in the midst of you, I shall take to witness the God by whom Kings reign, the God of Clovis, of Charlemagne, of St. Louis; I shall renew at the altar, the oath, to confirm the institutions founded on that Charter, which I cherish more, since the French, by a unanimous sentiment, have frankly rallied round it.

"In the laws which will be proposed to you, I shall take care that its spirit shall be always consulted, in order to secure more and more the public rights of the French, and to preserve to the Monarchy the force which it must have to preserve all the liberties which are dear to my people.

"In seconding my wishes and my efforts, you will not forget, Gentlemen, that this Charter, delivering France from despotism, has put an end to revolutions. I depend on your concurrence to repel those pernicious principles which, under the mask of liberty, attack social order, conduct by anarchy to absolute power, and whose fatal success has cost the world so much blood and so many tears.

"My Ministers will lay before you the Budget of the expences, which the public service requires. The protracted effects of events, the consequences of which we have been fount to bear or to accept; have not yet allowed me to propose to you, a diminution of the burdens imposed upon my people; but I have the consolation to perceive, at no great distance, the moment when I shall be able to satisfy this desire of my heart. From this moment a limit is fixed to the increase of our debt; we have the certainty that it will diminish in a rapid progression. This certainty, and the loyalty of France, in the fulfilment of her engagements, will establish on an immovable foundation the public credit, which some transitory circumstances, common to other States, had seemed to affect for a moment.

"The French youth have just given a noble proof of love to their country and their King. The Recruiting Law has been executed with submission, and often with joy. While the young soldiers enter the ranks of the army, their brothers, who are released, remain in the bosom of their families; and the veterans, who have fulfilled their engagements, return to their homes; they are both living examples of fidelity, henceforth inviolable, in executing the laws.

"After the calamities of a scarcity, the remembrance of which still affects my soul, Providence this year, lavish of its benefits, has covered our fields with abundant harvests. They will serve to revive commerce, whose vessels visit every sea, and shew the French flag to the most remote nations. Industry and the arts, also extending their empire, will add to the sweets of general peace. To the independence of the country, to public liberty, is added private liberty, which France has never so entirely enjoyed. Let us, therefore, unite our sentiments, and our expressions of gratitude to the author of so many blessings, and let us know how to render them durable. They will be so, if banishing every sad remembrance, and stifling every resentment, the French thoroughly persuade themselves, that their liberties are inseparable from order, which itself rests upon the Throne, their sole palladium. My duty is to defend them against their common enemies; I shall fulfil it, and I shall find in you, Gentlemen, that support, which I have never yet invoked in vain."

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturday, Dec. 12.

ASTON v. ELLIOTT.

This was an action brought by the Plaintiff, a man of fortune, against the Defendant, a Nephew, we believe, of Lord Auckland, for Criminal Conversation with the Plaintiff's Wife.—It appeared in evidence, that Mr. Aston had married the daughter of a Spanish merchant at Cadiz,—a young, interesting, and handsome woman. Some disputes, however, had arisen, on the ground, as the Plaintiff alleged, of violent temper on the part of Mrs. Aston; but it appeared from the evidence of Sir George Cockburn and Mr. Hume, Physician to the forces at Paris, that Mrs. Aston had been afflicted with a certain disease, which by Mr. Aston's own confession he had communicated to his Wife. Sir G. Cockburn, however, had been applied to by the husband, to procure a reconciliation, which he thought he had effected.—Mr. Elliott, the Defendant (as appeared in evidence), was known to Mr. Aston, and visited at his house; but he used most frequently to pay his visits when Mr. Aston was absent. A French servant, the nursery-maid, deposed, that she one night saw Mr. Elliott in her mistress's bed; though her mistress had not then returned home (this was at Passy, near Paris), and that in the morning the bed appeared to have been lain in by two persons;—that Mr. Aston was sleeping in the house at the time.—Another French servant, the coachman, said that on one occasion, when he was driving his mistress home from Paris, Mr. Elliott being with her, he looked round, and saw them in a very improper situation. And a third servant deposed, that on going suddenly into the room, he observed Mr. Elliott kissing Mrs. Aston. On the other side, a witness deposed, that he had seen Mr. Aston go into a house of ill-fame in London with a woman of easy virtue.—Mr. GURNEY, on the side of the Plaintiff, contended that his client should have moderate damages, although he admitted it was not a very strong case.—Mr. SCARLETT, on the other hand, maintained that the whole was a foul conspiracy against his young and inexperienced client (only then 18) and that the French servants were unworthy of credit; at the same time, he said, he did not deny (as he could not, for letters of the Defendant had been read) that Mr. Elliott was deeply in love with Mrs. Aston.—Mr. Justice BURROUGHS summed up, and certainly with much impartiality; and the Jury, after a few minutes consultation, found a verdict for Plaintiff—Damages, only One Hundred Pounds.

The Court was crowded to excess during the whole of the trial, as the parties, it seems, moved in the highest circles, both English and French, at Paris. The trial lasted from three till past eight at night.—Mr. RANSON'S Case against the Bank, was put off till next term—and so was that of Lord HOWARD v. the Rev. T. B. MORRIS, for an alleged libel—a case which was looked forward to with much interest, on various accounts.

The account of the strange interview between Lord RANELAGH and Mr. ADOLPHUS, given in another part of our paper, is said by some to contain gross misstatements; but they have not been pointed out.—A Correspondent, who signs himself Moses, observes, that had Lord RANELAGH, or any other Lord, come to his house, and told him that he was a liar, he (Moses) if he could not have made the Lord swallow his words, would at least have made him swallow some of his front teeth.—It would seem from this that our Correspondent was a descendant in a right line from "the meekest of men."

The RECORDER, we hear, has had two melancholy fits of the bile since the Juries have refused to hang the note forgers.

MR. BUTT'S CASE.—This Gentleman, we learn, lately brought an action against Mr. FEARN, for the recovery of the money stopt by the Stock Exchange Committee, and given by them to Public Charities.—The Defendant having been arrested, put in bail; when Mr. B. (being a prisoner for misdemeanour in the King's Bench Prison) applied by Mr. CHITTY to the Court for a habeas corpus in order to plead his own cause, not being able to fee Counsel, owing to pecuniary inability, caused by his long imprisonment.—Mr. CHITTY'S application was refused, on the ground of want of precedent; Mr. B. then petitioned Parliament, but in vain, to be allowed a habeas corpus, in order that he might attend the Court. This delayed the proceedings till the late term, when due notice of trial was served on Mr. FEARN; but the Court was moved to quash the action, in consequence of Mr. BUTT'S not proceeding to trial the previous term!—To this the Court agreed. Mr. B. in person was heard against this decision but the Court, after taking time to consider the point, decided it against the Plaintiff, who has thus lost all claim upon Mr. F., and is saddled with all the costs of suit, because (as he affirms) he was unable to get into Court.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, we are very concerned to hear, is given over by his physicians: he labours under a complicated attack of apoplexy and palsy.—Times.

Some individuals in and near the metropolis, whose names are not made known, have been circulating the form of a Petition to Parliament, praying for some further alteration in the Corn Laws, adopting as a kind of motto, "the principle of open ports and protecting duties." It has however been withdrawn from the place where it was first exhibited in London. We do not find that the real practical farmers give any sanction to the measure, probably thinking it most prudent to "let well alone"—a wise maxim, which will hold good in this as well as in every other speculation.—Norfolk Chronicle.

RECORDER'S REPORT.—Monday, the RECORDER made his report to the REGENT of the convicts under sentence of death, when John Driscoll, William Weller, George Cashman, for uttering forged notes, and J. T. B. Williams, for burglary, were ordered for execution on Tuesday next. The rest were respited during pleasure.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

THE LATE QUEEN.

"I know not" (says a writer in the Dundee Advertiser) "what those Presbyterians of olden time, who, by royal authority, were hunted like the beasts of the field,—and who, through the deepest persecution and affliction, held fast the form of sound words,—would have said, had they anticipated that their successors would have for a moment forgot the doctrines and the cross of Him whose kingdom was not of this world, and flared, in all the pomp of eloquence, in an apothecosis of any piece of mere clay, however elevated and however virtuous: but certain it is, that the Laureate himself could not have been more fiercely pathetic on the subject, although both the salary and the sack had depended on his success. In one church, in the forenoon, I heard CHARLOTTE lauded at the expense of CAROLINE; and what was farther still from the subject, a fierce philippic uttered against the editors of newspapers for not being more ostentatious in their grief. For a moment, my imagination transformed the learned Doctor into an editor behind the scenes; and I speculated on the kind of olio that he would serve up, till I quite forgot him in his sacerdotal capacity. In the afternoon, I went to another church, where the praises of the QUEEN were poured forth as smooth as oil and as sweet as honey. Her parentage, her age, and her life, were descanted on with all the minuteness of a court newsman; and, to round the whole, she was pronounced without a vice,—"not a spot or stain, except some faint clouds produced by the radiance of her excessive brightness." Then for her virtues: She was the kindest of wives, the tenderest of mothers, the most pious of Christians, the perfect model of Queens. Her conduct to the Princess CHARLOTTE,—here was a little difficulty; but "the excess of grief is so like no grief at all," that short-sighted mortals cannot distinguish between them. This, though a new, is an excellent doctrine; and if use from it be properly raised, it will stand the cold-hearted and the unfeeling in good stead. One who reasons in the old way would not indeed impute the QUEEN's absence, if not indifference, at the unfortunate accouchement of her much-lamented grand-daughter, to excessive grief, as the event was fondly looked to as one of the greatest joy; but here, again, we may be told that excessive joy cannot be distinguished from excessive grief. Upon the whole, though the QUEEN had possessed every virtue with which mere mortal can be endowed,—and though it be highly decorous in the British nation to mourn for a Queen abstractedly from her character as a woman,—yet the propriety of converting the pulpit on Sundays to a mere stand whence to eulogize mortals, of whom the Scripture says there is none who "liveth and sinneth not," is altogether a different question."

THE KING'S JEWELS.—It is now said, that the only jewels of his MAJESTY which are now missing are his Star and Garter. The former was very splendid, being studded all over with diamonds; and the buckle of the garter was also richly studded in the same manner. Their value is estimated at between 6 and 7,000*l*. A close search has been made for these jewels, and though it has not yet been attended with the desired result, yet no apprehension is entertained of their having been irrecoverably lost. It is generally believed among the officers of his Majesty's Household, that they have been deposited in some place of secret safety by the KING himself.—Morning paper.

His Royal Highness the PRINCE REGENT devoted a portion of the morning of Thursday week, to a contemplation of his afflicted and venerable parent; he was attended by Sir H. HALFORD. Our beloved Monarch was, of course, unconscious of the presence of his son; but the REGENT derived the greatest consolation in ascertaining that his revered father received every comfort and attention that might soothe the calamity with which he is visited. We understand that the PRINCE REGENT has signified his intention to carry into effect many of the plans of his MAJESTY for the improvement of Windsor-castle. We rejoice in the intelligence, as the alterations projected were in the best taste; and their incomplete execution is greatly to be deplored by every admirer of this monument of ancient magnificence.—Windsor and Eton Express.

The PRINCE REGENT has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the great seal, for granting the dignity of a Baronet to the following gentlemen, and to their heirs male, viz.

Sir Edward Hamilton, of Trebinshun-house, Brecon, Knight Commander of the Military Order of the Bath, and Captain in the Royal Navy.

Ross Mahon, Esq. of Castlegar, Galway.

LITERARY NOTICES.

No. 45.

INTRODUCTION TO THE LITERARY POCKET-BOOK.

THE following is the Introduction to the LITERARY POCKET-BOOK which has just appeared. The list of Errata, by the by, at the beginning of this Introduction, does not comprise all the mistakes in the letter-press; but the latter are evidently the result of accidents, which are perhaps unavoidable in a first publication of this nature. In the list of Eminent Persons, for instance, St. John Chrysostom, by a process which Sir Thomas Brown would have envied in his wishes for a gratuitous and prospective faith, has got among the Ancients, between Zeno and Euclid:—

Totam infusa per artus

Mens agit at molem, et magno se corpore miscet.

Virgil.

"Mind agitates the globe, and incorporates itself with every part of it."—This is a very grand motto for so small a thing as a Pocket-Book, though not grander perhaps than the figure of Atlas and his world, which is common among our ornamental brethren. But when it is considered that a part of the very greatest thing may be very small, and that the intellectual spirit is now beginning to pervade every corner and atom of the civilized world, the least literary novelty may look upon itself as affording proofs of its influence, and answering to its demands.

The intellectual power of society indeed has so much increased of late, and has become so prominent, as one of the ruling or controuling authorities, that it seems proper and necessary it should have a sort of Court Calendar of its own; and the LITERARY POCKET-BOOK is an attempt to supply one. There are already quite enough of these useful publications to inform us respecting courts and offices, matters of business, and mere days of the month; but persons of taste or literature felt a want of something else in their Pocket-Companion. Those intended for grown persons were found too exclusively full of business and traffic; while those for the younger were too partial and uninformed. The moment the plan of the present work was mentioned to some intelligent individuals, it struck them as calculated to supply the deficiency; and it can be no very provoking ambition to hope that their opinion has been justified.

The Calendar of Nature was not intended to be so long; but it grew like its subjects. It is hardly necessary to say that it does not supersede the interesting little work of Messrs. Aikin, entitled the Natural History of the Year, the utility of which remains uninjured. The chief feature of their work is information,—its account of the causes or operation of things; the main one of the present is attraction,—the diffusion of the love of their appearances and effects. But we must not deny that we are much indebted to it, or to the more elaborate and most entertaining work of the Rev. Gilbert White, called the Natural History of Selborne, to which those Gentlemen acknowledge their own obligations.

In the Diary, opportunity has been taken of the enumeration of each day in the month, to set down such birth-days of men of ORIGINAL genius as we could readily find. Their birth-places will be found on reference to the list that follows; which contains also the years wherein the great men of antiquity flourished. The birth-days will perhaps come pleasantly upon the reader's eye, when he turns, for his ordinary memoranda, to the Diary, and he may be tempted to make some little homage in the course of the day to the memory of a favourite writer or artist,—to drink it after dinner, or turn to his life or works, or discuss the influence he has had upon taste and opinion.*

We need not dwell upon the other features of the work, which from the nature of it can mostly be nothing but nomenclatures; though all of them, except the mere lists of stamps, hackney-coach fares, &c. are in some way connected with intellect. We may only observe, that it is the first time that nomenclatures of this kind have found their way into Pocket-Books. The list of the great names that have enlightened the world may fairly take place of the common chronologies. A copious catalogue of our living authors is now first given in a work of this kind; as well as of the contemporary writers of France, Italy, Germany, and North America.—Those of the last-mentioned country will perhaps be regarded with double curiosity, as furnishing the only list that has appeared in Europe. The living artists and musicians of England, France, Italy, and Germany, and the artists of North America, make their proper appearance on the strength of their talents, as distinguished from the ambiguous eminence arising from Societies and Academies. The musicians and musical performers, in particular, have never been publicly enumerated before. A List of the Performers at the Theatres is given also for the first time under any circumstances; and lists of Print and Plaster-cast Shops, as well as Booksellers and Circulating Libraries, have been added, for purposes that will be obvious to people of taste.

The selections from celebrated authors at the conclusion have been made upon the principle that wishes to animate all this little publication,—that of exciting a love of intellect, nature, and a generous wisdom. Of the Poetry, we can easily say that it is original in one sense of the word,

* It must be recollected, that all which took place before the year 1752 should be calculated according to the Old Style, which was 12 days later than the New, as may be seen in the instance of Old May-Day, which now falls on the 12th of that month.

and may safely answer for some of it, that it is original in the other.

All the new matter, both at the beginning and end, will be varied from year to year; and the mere lists, corrected, amended, and enlarged. The living writers, artists, and musicians of Spain, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark,—the artists of Germany, and the musicians, if any, of America, and the continental sculptors, architects, and engravers, will appear in our Number for 1820.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

WE lament that we were prevented from being at the Institution Gallery last week till the day after the Exhibition to the Amateurs, of the copies and studies from the exquisite paintings by the Old Masters, when many of the originals and copies were either sent away or taken down. Instead, therefore, of a detailed, we must give only a brief account of a partial view of what we found, even from such a view, to be the very best Exhibition of the imitative works of the Students. We, however, trust, and indeed are pretty confident, that the evidence of the very increased and successful feeling of the beauties of those Masters, will enable us to shew, from future original productions of the Students, the important results of such studies and exhibitions on the minds and tastes of Artists and the public. Messrs. HAYDON, ALSTON, LANDSEER, HOFFLAND, STARKE, VINCENT, and others, have already shewn them, and given evidence, that the ardour and genius elicited by such glowing examples, connected with a close companionship with Nature, the presiding tutor over all, are among the most efficient causes of success in Art.

Among other successful Paintings were those by Messrs. VINCENT, STARKE, CLATER, STEVENS, CREGORY, CARSE, CHILDE, &c. Copies from VANDERNEER by Messrs. HOFFLAND and DAVISON, and from CUYP, &c. by Mr. WERGE. Our attachment to Art, not to mention our gallantry, would be somewhat questionable, were we not to praise the delicate and deeply felt miniatures from RAFFAELLE, GUIDO, and REMBRANDT, by the Misses SHARPE and HAYTER, &c.

The grand and beautiful forms, and the workings of the human mind exhibited by RAFFAELLE in his Cartoons, have been with eminent power copied by Messrs. LANDSEER, BEWICK, and BEHNES,—all, except the latter, pupils of Mr. HAYDON. These young men are arrived at that enviable point of interest, when their talents are discussed in society; the cold blooded may doubt them—the envious may deny them; but those who are neither envious or cold blooded, bear testimony to their powers with pleasure and enthusiasm.—It was gratifying to see the effect produced by their drawings amongst the visitors who were neither Artists nor Amateurs, who are perhaps the best judges of what all feel, expression; and by them was the expressions, they had so feelingly transmitted, acknowledged in high strains. It is by the exhibition and study of works in the exalted class of the Cartoons that the public and the professional feeling, views, and success in Art, will be most essentially benefited. We are therefore glad to observe the plan adopted by the Institution in bringing them annually before the public eye for delight and study. They will dispel error and infix truth of principle. They will, in conjunction with the Marbles of PHIDIAS, at the British Museum, purify, by their potent and magic influence, the atmosphere of the Arts, for they appeal to and stir up the inbred sympathies of our nature, while the impression they make on our memories and our hearts is lasting. They vanish only with our lives.

REVISION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.

On Thursday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, for the purpose of "considering the propriety of petitioning Parliament to revise the Criminal Code."—Mr. FAYELL introduced his motion for the Resolutions which follow in a clear and ingenious speech; he argued that the present laws defeated their object, by their inequality and excessive severity, which both prevented many individuals from prosecuting offenders, and induced Juries to violate their oaths rather than their humanity. He cited many celebrated writers in support of his arguments, and censured the present system of prison discipline. The motion was opposed by a Mr. JACKS, who wasted a great many words to show that our laws were not too severe, because those of the Greeks and Romans were many of them very atrocious. He also cited his authorities,—to wit, "these learned persons" Mr. Recorder * and Common Serjeant! and quoted PALEY, as a set-off against Mr. FAYELL's long list of noble names: and PALEY, the sophistical supporter of every thing established, the man who candidly declared that he was too poor to keep a conscience, was of the "highest authority!" The humane Gentleman was shocked that laws which had existed for 1000 or 1200 years should be abolished or altered on "conjecture and hypothesis," as if that was not in most cases the very reason for their abolition. We suppose that the Parliamentary Papers, showing the enormous increase of crimes, are merely "conjecture," and the supposition that the hanging a man for stealing five shillings is unjust, a silly "hypothesis." But the whole speech is full of the same heartless nonsense, and too contemptible for further notice. We are glad to see that his blundering stupidity was not kept in countenance by any body else: Mr. WILKINS and Mr. R. TAYLOR spoke strongly in favour of the motion.

* We never think of this man without regretting, that feelings which seem to qualify him so well for a finisher rather than an expounder of the law, should be found in a Magistrate, who must have considerable influence over the lives of his fellow-creatures.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved—That the Corporation of London, being greatly interested in the Police for this City, and for the County of Middlesex, where his Majesty's Commission is yearly issued for the trial of offenders, and in consequence of which eight Sessions are held within the year, are deeply impressed with the conviction of the increase of crime, the irregularities of the Criminal Law, and its effect upon public morals.

Resolved—That upwards of 200 crimes, very different in their degree of enormity, are equally subject to the punishment of death, which is enacted not only for the most atrocious offences—for burglary, for rape, for murder, and for treason—but for many offences unattended with any cruelty or violence, for various minor crimes, and even for stealing privately to the amount of 5s. in a shop.

Resolved—That from returns to the House of Commons, it appears, that crimes have been for some years rapidly increasing, both in number and malignity, to the injury of the rising generation, and the debasement of the national character.

That there were committed for trial in the year
1812 1665 | 1814 1646 | 1816 2226
1813 1707 | 1815 2005 | 1817 2686

The capital convictions for Middlesex, were, in the year
1812 122 | 1814 158 | 1816 227
1813 138 | 1815 139 | 1817 208

There were executed in Middlesex, in the year
1812 19 | 1814 21 | 1816 29
1813 17 | 1815 11 | 1817 16

There were confined in Newgate, only of boys of 17 years and under, in the year
1812 123 | 1816 217 | 1817 359

There were committed for trial, in the different gaols in England and Wales, in the year
1805 4605 | 1813 7184 | 1815 7818
1806 6576 | 1814 6390 | 1816 9091
And in 1817 13,932

Resolved—That without the adaption of the criminal laws to the moral and religious sentiments of the nation, the increase of crimes must be progressive; because, strong as the obligations upon all good subjects to assist the administration of justice, they are overpowered by tenderness for life, which originates in the mild precepts of our religion.

Resolved—That many injured persons refuse to prosecute, because they cannot perform a duty which is repugnant to their natures, by being instrumental in the infliction of severity, contrary to their ideas of adequate retribution; and by such impunity young offenders, instead of being checked in their first departure from virtue, are suffered to advance from small offences to crimes of greater atrocity.

Resolved—That some Jurymen submit to fines rather than act as arbiters of life and death, in cases where they think the punishment of death ought not to be inflicted.

Resolved—That some Jurymen are deterred from a strict discharge of their duty, and acquit guilt, or mitigate the offence, so as not to subject the offender to the punishment of death, and thus assume a discretion never intended to be vested in juries, and relax the sanctity of a judicial oath, upon which the trial by jury much depends.

Resolved—That this determination by Juries to oppose the severe enactments of our laws is of daily occurrence.

Resolved—That, amongst other instances, a Jury, rather than be instrumental in inflicting the punishment of death for larceny to the amount of 40s. from a dwelling, found a 10l. note to be worth only 39s.

Resolved—That another Jury, influenced by the same motives, found two bills of exchange, value 10l. each, and eight Bank-notes, value 10l. each, worth the same sum of 39s.

Resolved—That we have no feeling but gratitude and respect at the administration of the law by the learned Judges, or in the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy; but they are influenced by considering the state of the law itself, as affording the means of evasions dangerous to the community, and opposite to the mild precepts of the gospel, which teacheth us to love as brethren, and desire not the death of a sinner; but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live.

Resolved—That Petitions be presented to both Houses of Parliament, praying for a revision of the Criminal Code, and to take such measures as their wisdom may deem meet.

THE PERSIAN PRINCES.

Meerza Jaafar Hali Zainey, and Meerza Saulih, have honoured our city with a visit, after inspecting Gloucester. They were shown the Blind Asylum and the Infirmary. They seemed affected by the circumstance of a black man being among the patients; and being told that the institution embraced those of every nation and colour, observed that "this was true charity." Among their country excursions was included Barley-wood, the residence of the estimable and celebrated Hannah More. Jaafar has been studying at Woolwich our military tactics, and especially engineering, under Dr. Gregory. He is fond of poetry, has a profound admiration for Milton, and is pleased with the poems of Lord Byron, and with the Lalla Rookh of Mr. Moore. Saulih has directed his attention to printing, and has acquired the skill of composing for the press. He has read Paley's Natural Theology; and both are curious in their inquiries as to this department of our literature, as well as that of ethics. They are liberal in sentiment, which, like politeness of manners, is in fact the characteristic of their nation—free religious inquiry being allowed there. They seem disposed to give every attention to the evidences of Christ being the only mediator; though they assert that no Mahometan can ever receive Christianity as it is often presented to them by Theologians. They seem acquainted with the Old and New Testament; and their acceptance of certain terms and titles in the Persian and Arabic tongues illustrates very strikingly the Scripture phraseology. They observed, that the preaching in our churches was wholly mystical; and that in Persia, the reader of the mosque dwelt, in his exhortations to the people, on practical moral duties. They can perfectly follow a discourse, and even a hymn. Though they have been only three years in England, they speak the language with great readiness, and maintain an argument without being at any loss for expressions. They betray scarcely any foreign accent, and can instantly detect any peculiarities of dialect when they hear English spoken by others. They show an equal attention to grammatical niceties; and Jaafar corrected the past tense of a verb which had been written, instead of the participle, began for begun.

In person they are remarkably tall and stout-limbed. Meerza Jaafar has a fine set of dark features and a most expressive regular physiognomy, large dark eyes, eyebrows black and uniting, as described in the Greek and Eastern poets; nose straight from the forehead, very long eye-lashes, and white teeth. He is usually pensive, but often unbends in raillery and repartee. Saulik has a countenance less prepossessing, but which gains, on near intercourse, by its frank good nature. He has much humour, and is social and easy, particularly with ladies. They wear the national costume, with the exception of adopting our shoes and stockings.

The return of these amiable and interesting individuals to their own country, with the acquirement of printing, and with the books which they will have collected, may be productive of important effects. They will be followed by the good wishes of all who witnessed their friendly and ingratiating manners and the acuteness of their intellect; and who feel an interest in the amelioration of the species, and the extension of knowledge and of religious truth.—Bristol paper.

LORD RANELAGH AND MR. ADOLPHUS.

The following is a pretty accurate account of an occurrence that took place between Lord RANELAGH and Mr. ADOLPHUS, the day after the memorable trial at Hicks's-hall, in which his Lordship was convicted, and fined 50*l*. for an assault:—

Mr. ADOLPHUS, who was sitting alone in his chambers in the Temple, heard a tap at the door of his study. He desired the person to walk in, and was immediately honoured with the presence of Lord RANELAGH; who, upon being very civilly asked to take a chair, told him that he had a few words to say to him.

Mr. ADOLPHUS having repeated his request that his Lordship would be seated,

Lord RANELAGH said, "Sir, you were talking of me for two hours yesterday, and it is only fair that you should hear me tell my mind for a little while; I came to you for that purpose."

Mr. ADOLPHUS observed, that he had not spoken to, or of his Lordship, quite so long.

"Perhaps not, Sir," said his Lordship, "but I come to tell you, that you yesterday proved yourself a coward, a liar, and a scoundrel. Your clients are all perjured. My servants told the truth, and you know it."

Mr. ADOLPHUS very coolly asked his Lordship, whether his object in using such words was to provoke him to fight a duel?

Lord RANELAGH replied in the affirmative.

Mr. ADOLPHUS said, "he always considered that when a man thought himself injured, and entertained an idea of seeking honourable redress, the usual course was to do so by written communication, or through the medium of a friend. In no instance had he ever known that a man came to abuse another, under pretence of provoking him to go to the ground."

His Lordship was of opinion, that there was another mode of demanding redress beside the two alluded to by Mr. Adolphus, and thought that resorted to by him unexceptionable.

Mr. ADOLPHUS made his Lordship acquainted with a fact of which his Lordship seemed to have had no idea, namely, that his Lordship was under the roof of him to whom he addressed these epithets. He said he did not know whether he should be fool enough to send his Lordship the intimation he seemed to expect, or whether he should move the Court for a criminal information against him; the latter was the more probable course of the two; but in the business he should be wholly guided by his friends, to whom he should mention this very ceremonious transaction. In case he should think it more expedient to do the latter, he presumed his Lordship would not deny the words he had just used.

"Certainly not," said Lord Ranelagh; "and for fear you should forget them, I'll repeat that you are a coward, a liar, and a scoundrel!"

In the commencement of the conversation Mr. ADOLPHUS said, he had been induced, from his respect to the rank of the defendant, to omit phrases that might have been more closely adapted to the subject of his speech than those he had used.

His Lordship retired without being in the slightest degree ruffled, and seemed perfectly satisfied at the part he had taken in this business.

Mr. ADOLPHUS sat down to finish the business which his Lordship's visit had interrupted; and then mentioned the circumstance to some of his friends, who advised him to adopt the course he had before deemed most worthy of selection. He preferred a bill on Monday night against his Lordship for having endeavoured to provoke him to fight a duel. The bill was found by the Grand Jury. Mr. Adolphus immediately directed his solicitor to move the case, by certiorari, to the King's Bench. This was accordingly done, and notice to that effect was served upon Lord Ranelagh's solicitor.—Times.

A NATIONAL DISGRACE.

INTERMENT OF A SPANISH OFFICER IN THE CROSS-ROAD.—On Saturday se'nnight, preparations were made to put into execution the revolting ceremony adopted towards suicides. The body of the deceased remained at the house of Mrs. Warner until every thing was ready for its removal. About eight o'clock in the evening, a number of labourers began to dig a large hole at the top of Upper Thames-street, within a few yards of the chain, Tower-hill: the hole, when completed, was seven feet deep and six feet long. Great numbers were collected together, and they expressed great disapprobation of the proceedings, and during the absence of the labourers for a short time they endeavoured to fill up the hole; but some City constables arriving soon caused them to desist. Between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, the Sergeant at Mace and the City Marshals, with a number of officers, arrived, and when the place was prepared to receive the body, they went to the house of Mrs. Warner: some labourers then removed the naked body down stairs and placed it on a shutter; it was covered with a sheet, when it was carried upon the shoulders of four men to Upper Thames-street, some of the officers bearing torches: crowds followed the body to the burial place. On its arriving at its destination, the shutter was laid at the side of the grave, and by that time a great concourse of persons, females as well as males, had assembled to witness the disgusting scene. The cloth was removed from the body, and it was exposed naked to the view of the public, who immediately expressed a feeling of horror at the sight; cries of "Shame, shame," "scandalous," and "shocking," were loudly uttered by the bystanders. After the body had lain in that condition for a short time, it was thrown headlong into the hole prepared to receive it. When it fell in, the noise caused a renewal of the expression of public feeling. "Disgraceful to a civilized country," "Horrible and inhuman exposure," was the just language used on the occasion.—The officers ordered the place to be filled up, and guards were appointed to prevent the body from being removed.—[Thus it plainly appears, that the mob of London have a stronger sense of what is decent and humane than those statesmen and legislators who continue to allow such brutal exhibitions.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—If you think the following remarks on a late occurrence worthy insertion in your paper, you will greatly oblige an enemy to false notions of correctness, either political or civil.

When the public have before them an account of an occasional self-murder, (and I bear in mind an excellent letter which appeared in your paper on the subject of Suicide, but which has never been replied to, the argument being so conclusive and just), what must be their different opinions on the subject? The case I before mentioned, i. e. that of the unfortunate Spanish Gentleman, is one, that all parties must feel as a natural consequence: they must see in this instance a man descended from a good family, possessing of course, in addition to the far-famed pride of his nation, "the pride of birth"—(and it is not for me to argue how far he was correct in this particular)—with the best prospects before him, and having chosen the army as an agreeable mode for the exertion of his talents, he there "distinguished himself," and was proceeding in his gay career, when the success of his countrymen, aided by those of our own, speedily blighted his hopes, and the hopes of all good men and true patriots, by introducing a Crowned Embroiderer of Petticoats, and a worthless tyrant: the rest is well known. And I appeal to your judgment and that of your readers, whether a verdict of Felo de se should have been given in this case; that verdict which always brings with it their attendant evils, which are a disgrace to a Christian country, and I am convinced that human nature shudders at the idea!—That England should hold out as an example to those barbarians,—whom she appears so desirous of turning from the "error of their ways,"—a custom so replete with barbarity in its worst light, seems to me another of her inconsistencies! Besides, it is generally received as an opinion that a verdict of Felo de se never has the effect of preventing the perpetration of the act of suicide:—then why persist in it; why barrow up the feelings of the living by such a horrid spectacle, as the view of such a mutilated corpse as that of the poor Spaniard? Does not the law permit some modification in the application of the sentence?—if not, I am certain that this is a part of it that wants a serious "reform," and calls loudly for amendment.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

LEONIDAS.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Wednesday, Dec. 9.

THE KING v. AUGUSTINE BOGLE FRENCH AND OTHERS.

This was an indictment for conspiracy. The defendants, Nathaniel Bogle French, who had died before the indictment was found, Augustine Bogle French, — Cook, — Burke, and Matthew Welch, had sent a brig to Spain, in 1812, to be there fitted out as a privateer with a Spanish crew, and under the authority of a Spanish letter-of-marque, to capture English vessels licensed to trade to France. The vessel was nominally sold first to a Spaniard, and again by him to another, and there was a Spanish Captain, but it was proved that Burke first and Welch afterwards were the real Commanders, and acted in concert with the other defendants. The privateer brought a valuable Danish ship as a prize into Portsmouth, and suspicion of the fraud having been excited, it was released to the owners; and the captor seized and condemned in the Exchequer. French and Co. also failed, and papers were discovered by the assignees which disclosed the whole affair.

The Jury found all the defendants guilty, but recommended A. B. French to mercy, on account of his youth.—[Mr. Cock had sent us a letter, in which he says, "I solemnly declare, that I never had, directly or indirectly, at any time, any concern or interest whatever in the said house, nor in this privateer or her prize."]

FOUL PERJURY.

The Court was this day chiefly occupied in the trial of various persons for perjury. One Alcorn, it appears, had sworn (on the trial of Messrs. Guy, Bishop, and others, for smuggling) that they had assisted with carts in the landing smuggled goods between Seaford and Newhaven. It was now clearly proved that Messrs. Guy, &c. were not near the place, some of them being in fact 20 miles off.—The Jury found Alcorn Guilty.—One Bridger was then found guilty of the same offence; committed on the same occasion.

Wm. Sowter was also charged with the like crime, committed on the trial of Mr. Henty, a banker at Worthing, who had been found guilty of smuggling on the coast of Sussex.—Sowter had then sworn that Mr. Henty was assisting in landing tubs of gin from a lugger—whereas it was now sufficiently proved that he was not so doing, and that in fact no such transaction had taken place at all!—The Jury of course found the scoundrel guilty.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Tuesday, Dec. 8.

CLITHEROW v. PETERS.

Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN stated the case to the Jury. The plaintiff was a Captain in the 3d regiment of Guards, and ranked as Lieut.-Colonel. In 1809 he married Miss Burton, daughter of General Burton, to whom he had been Aide-de-camp. He had been for years acquainted with the young lady; his addresses were approved of by both their families. They married when she was 23 years of age, he 25. Soon afterwards he went to Walcheren, next year to Spain. He was severely wounded at Fuentes-d'Honores, and came home. He went again to Spain in 1815: as soon as peace rendered it safe for his wife to go abroad she came to him. They both went to the South of France, and remained in Tours for some time: there they became acquainted with the defendant, the eldest son of Mr. Peters, the banker. The defendant—a circumstance which aggravated his crime—had himself been married, and had lost his wife in January, 1816. He went abroad to dissipate the melancholy occasioned by such a loss. In February, 1816, he was introduced to the plaintiff and his wife. The plaintiff had one son, an only child, then seven years old. The parties met frequently in France. On the 25th of July they met at Geneva, and afterwards travelled in company. Every proper precaution was, during this time, observed on the part of the plaintiff. If, as might sometimes happen, Colonel Clitherow travelled on the outside of the coach, nothing criminal was to be apprehended, when a boy of seven years of age was with his mother within. When they arrived at Dover, Mr. Peters was invited to Colonel Clitherow's mother's house. In May, 1817, Colonel Clitherow returned to duty at Bexhill barracks. Mr. Peters, after this time, never visited under his own name. So late, however, as the 13th of December, he partook of the plaintiff's hospitality, and must have gone to Worthing to dine with him, for the very purpose of planning the elopement. But on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of July previously, it would be proved, that a criminal connexion had taken place. The defendant and Mrs. Clitherow were now living together in France. The elopement took place in December last year. Why was not this action brought sooner? The cause was the absence of the defendant, and the want of any proxy to appear for him. It was necessary to adopt proceedings for outlawing him. He would leave the Jury to judge from the evidence, whether there was not every aggravation. Colonel Clitherow was attacked in the only part in which he was vulnerable, while he was absent in the service of his country, by one who had been introduced to him as in melancholy from the loss of a wife, and who received the kindest treatment from him. This person is found sapping the affections and virtue of the plaintiff's wife when every person is asleep. When the seeds of this criminal attachment were sown did not appear; it was probably on the Continent.

Several witnesses deposed to the apparent happiness that the plaintiff and his wife enjoyed together.

Sarah Webb, a girl of 14, lived in Colonel Clitherow's family, in July last, at Bexhill. Col. Clitherow left Bexhill to come to London on the 5th of July. On the 4th, her mistress had ordered her to get shrimps and lobsters for the 5th, but to bring her no message on that day till her master was gone. On the 5th she told her to go to different places, and to get all the flowers she could, to make the bed-room very neat, and to put clean linen on the bed. She ordered her not to sit in the bed-room to work, as usual, and not to go into it after she had made it up. Witness had, however, forgotten her thimble in the room, and went for it. She found the things differently laid from the way she left them. The night-clothes had all been put up in a silk bag. She was not in the house, and saw none come at night. On the morning of the 6th a gentleman came, whom she had never seen before. He had a piece of black sticking-plaster on his face. It was between nine and ten in the morning. She saw him on that day, about half-past four, sitting in the parlour. She saw him again next day, and he came afterwards in November, when her master was on duty at Windsor.

Jane Luck, the cook-maid, was with Col. Clitherow before July last. Her mistress told her on the 4th of July that she must be particular in having every thing necessary for dinner on the 5th, and not trouble her after the company should come. It was known in the family that Colonel Clitherow was to be from home on the 5th. After he was gone, her mistress repeated her former directions. The dinner was not served up. Witness went to bed about twelve: her mistress was up, and she heard the voice of a gentleman in conversation with her. She had heard the voices and a conversation about half-past eleven from the parlour. The parlour had a communication with the bedroom, without coming to the stairs. She was up at half-past seven next morning, but saw no gentleman in the house. The girl Webb did not sleep in the house; she returned generally at eight in the morning.

James Hillier was in the service of the plaintiff, in July last, as his footman. A gentleman came at night, on the 5th, between nine and ten. He asked if Col. Clitherow was at home, and then for Mrs. Clitherow, and desired witness to tell her that a gentleman called with a letter for her from Mr. Peters. Mrs. Clitherow desired witness to show him in. As witness was shutting the parlour door he heard her say, "Sit down, my dear—I hope you have had a pleasant journey—I hope you have not caught cold." He went to bed at twelve in another part of the house from the general door. He heard them conversing.—[On inquiry from the Court, it was here admitted by both parties that the defendant had been at the time in question 25 years of age; Mrs. Clitherow, 32.]—The gentleman could have got out without his knowledge. He came next morning at breakfast about ten, and stopped till one or two. He went then to dress for dinner, and remained afterwards till two next morning. A servant from the Bell-inn had come for him at nine, as they were all going to bed. Mrs. Clitherow was quite flurried, and said he was gone, or would go directly. Witness went to bed at twelve, and he was there then. Next night he met them walking late on the parade, and they turned hastily another way: they were arm in arm. He had strong suspicions that all was not so right as it should be.

William Pritchard succeeded the former witness in October. He remembered the plaintiff going to Windsor about the 14th or 15th of November. A gentleman came to his master's and dined there on that day; he had a silk plaster on the left side of his cheek. Witness went to bed at half-past eleven. He thought the gentleman was then in the house. His mistress left Bexhill finally about the 21st of December, about seven in the morning, in a post chaise, and told witness to get every thing ready, as she would be back in a few days. About August witness went to France in pursuit of them, and found them at Forges, in a private house. He was sure it was the same person that had been before with his mistress. He knew him by his complexion and the mark upon his cheek. They were both together, and she went by the name of Mrs. Peters.

Mr. Sergeant LENS addressed the Jury on behalf of the defendant. This case could not be exempted from common cases. All that had been said of her vulnerable and unguarded state, when the plaintiff was on the Continent, had been pressed into the service; for it was not till 1816, and on the Continent, that the defendant became acquainted with them. The case had nothing to do with military service. The plaintiff came to London on military business for one day, just as other gentlemen came on other business. The defendant's loss of his own wife had been mentioned, although it formed no part of the case: He would ask them whether the blandishments of female charms would not in such a state of mind produce deeper impressions? He remarked on the nature of the evidence and the disparity of their ages. The defendant had fallen a victim to artifices; he had sinned, as others had done before,

"Against his better knowledge; not convinced,

"But fondly overcome with female charms."

It was a great injury; but as to how it originated, or how it was perpetrated, they were left in the dark. Whether this were viewed as a case of public or of private justice, they would feel it to be not a case of aggravation, but of commiseration and regret that a young man should have fallen into such a snare.

The CHIEF JUSTICE recapitulated the evidence: he censured the neglect of proof of the adultery in the plaintiff's evidence: attachments might be proved, improper familiarities might take place, and yet all stop short of a criminal intercourse. The Counsel for the defendant, with that wisdom which never failed him in any case, had not pressed this point, because the elopement supplied this defect in the plaintiff's case. There ought at least to have been proof that they lived together as man and wife in France. This was, however, a case of an unfavourable complexion. If the defendant has sinned as others sinned before, he must suffer as others have suffered before. He was kindly treated by the plaintiff in the hour of affliction, and he dared to avail himself of his absence on duty to deprive him of the wife of his youth and the mother of his child. The difference of age was the only alleviation. That the wife was taken away in the absence of her husband was a great aggravation. He could not hear this case called a slight one. No proof of fortune had been offered; they were therefore left entirely to their discretion as to damages.

The Jury in a few minutes found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 3,000*l*.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Tuesday, Dec. 8.

THE KING v. FAVENC AND CO.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, after an inquisition upon a writ of extent, at the instance of the Board of Excise, against Jervas Bradberry, a debtor to the Crown, and by which it appeared that the defendant was indebted to him (Bradberry) to the amount of 1,866*l*. 13*s*. 1*d*.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL opened the case, observing, that this was a proceeding against the defendant which was denominated in law an extent in the second degree, and signified that the debt sought to be recovered by the Crown was a debt due to another person who was himself indebted to the Crown. The circumstances of this case originated in an adventure to South America, undertaken in the year 1809. The different parties to this undertaking agreed to despatch a vessel called the Remoceda, with a cargo to Lima. Among the parties were the defendants and Mr. Bradberry, the immediate debtor. For the share which the defendants purchased of Mr. Bradberry they accepted two bills of exchange, amounting together to the sum of 1,632*l*. 18*s*., and dated September, 1810. These bills were drawn by Mr. Bradberry, and had never been paid; on the contrary, that gentleman had been induced to pay a part of their amount, viz. 611*l*. 19*s*. to the persons holding these bills, he being liable as the drawer for the whole. The question was whether the sum of 601*l*. 19*s*., having been paid by Mr. Bradberry in discharge of part of the debt to which the defendants had become liable, did not make him their creditor to that amount.

Mr. James Allwyn proved the facts stated by the Attorney-General. The adventure to South America was expected to be good in May, 1812; at which time, and previously, he had understood that Mr. Bradberry was willing to re-purchase the whole of the defendants' interest. He knew Mr. Bradberry's hand-writing, and believed a letter which was now shown him had been written by him. He believed nothing was proved by Mr. Bradberry under a deed of trust, executed by the defendants, and by which they assigned all their property to their creditors.

Mr. JERVIS addressed the Jury for the defendants, and began by some observations on the law of extents, which, he said, it did not become him to arraign; but some change of which he thought cases like the present might, when known, appear in another place to render necessary. Mr. Bradberry, who was the real plaintiff, had once acted as the broker of his clients. Immense sums of money had passed through his hands on their accounts; and yet now, for a claim which he had forgone till the statute of limitations had almost passed over it, he was proceeding against his former benefactors, not in the ordinary course of law, but by the process of an extent. For this purpose he had put himself into the hands of the excise, on the pretence of being indebted to the crown to an immense amount; whilst the fact was, that his debt did not exceed 235*l*., with the addition of 174*l*. costs. He would undertake to prove the improbability of any legal debt owing by the defendants to Mr. Bradberry, from the circumstances of his having so long abstained from bringing it forward, and his not attempting to prove it under the deed of composition, by letters of his own, and by a release of the whole amount of the bills in question by the holders of these bills to the defendant, on the payment of this dividend.

Mrs. Fry deposed, that she was executrix to her late husband, and received a dividend of 5*s*. in the pound on the bills accepted by the defendants under the assignment of their property, and granted a release of all further claims on their account. Her evidence was supported by that of Mr. Tomlinson; and two or three other witnesses were called, for the purpose of proving the extent of dealings formerly carried on between the parties, and a balance upon them accruing to the defendants.

A variety of papers were then put in, the most material of which was a letter, dated May, 1812, in which Mr. Bradberry, previous to the return of the ship, signified to the defendants his readiness to take back their share of the adventure, and promised to send back the bills cancelled.

The CHIEF BARON summed up. The two questions into which the inquiry resolved itself, were, first, was the debt incurred by the defendants by the bills which they accepted, extinguished, and the contract annulled, by Bradberry's re-purchase of all their interest in the adventure? The other point was one of law, and, in his opinion, although the fact seemed somewhat singular that the defendants should have paid a dividend upon the whole amount of the bills, £611. 19s. 6d. which had been paid by Bradberry, and that this fact had been explained, still, in his opinion, a release of the whole amount to the acceptors did not, in this case, discharge them from Bradberry's claim.

The Jury, after a very short consideration, found for the defendants; and some slight applause being manifested at the verdict, the Court declared that it should feel itself singularly obliged to any gentleman, friendly to justice and decorum, who would point out those who had transgressed both.

OLD BAILEY.

On Saturday week, John Williams was indicted for uttering as true a forged 11. Bank-note, with intent to defraud the Bank of England.

The first witness called was a fellow named Underwood, describing himself as a calico-printer, who stated, that he had been employed by the Bank, under the pretence of being a dealer in forged notes, to negotiate with the prisoner. He proved, that on the 7th of November last, at the Coach and Horses, Charles-street, Drury-lane, he received ten 11. forged bank-notes for less than half their nominal value, and that on a subsequent day he received five more for the same price.

Mr. ADOLPHUS.—Have you ever given evidence against individuals charged with this offence before?—I never have been in a Court of Justice before.

That is not my question, and you know it. Have you ever given evidence before?—Yes; I believe I have.

You know you have, and I will make you tell me.—Yes; I have given evidence against two persons.

What are their names?—The one is Edwards, and the other is his wife.

Have you given evidence against no one else?—Yes; against a man of the name of Stanley.

And all these are individuals charged with a similar offence as the prisoner at the bar, whom you have been honest enough to entrup, by the assistance of the Bank of England?—Yes.

Mr. Chalmers proved that the prisoner, in September, purchased a pair of shoes at his shop in High Holborn, for which he paid him with a forged note, at the same time giving him the false address of "Edwards, Rickmansworth."

J. Glover had been an inspector of Bank-notes upwards of 25 years; and he pronounced the whole of the notes to be forgeries, and all from one plate.

The Jury desired to inspect the notes; which having done, they expressed a wish that the Bank-inspector would give them some specific mark in the body of the note, by which they might judge of his capability of distinguishing between good and bad notes; for that they had compared them with good notes, and found them so well executed that they could not make up their minds on the subject.

Mr. Baron Wood said, it would lead to great inconvenience to the public if the Bank-inspectors were compelled to give to public knowledge the private marks by which they can determine on the genuineness of notes. Besides, did they think that the prisoner would have sold a genuine note for 7s. when every body allowed it to be worth 20s.? The Jury still seemed dissatisfied; and at last Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET, Counsel for the Bank, put some sonie questions to Mr. Glover, from which it appeared, that the Bank paper receives the water-mark at the time of its being made; but in all these notes, it was produced by compression, which made the wavy lines elevated on the reverse of the note. The line which contains the month, the day of it, and the word "London," was stated to be put in stereotype; whereas, in all these notes they were engraved in the plate, and consequently the ink would not slur, as in the case of stereotyped notes.

Mr. Baron Wood summed up the evidence, and the Jury retired for an hour, and on their return, said they found the prisoner guilty of uttering the forged note to Mr. Chalmers. The indictment against the prisoner was for one of the 10 notes sold to Underwood. The Jury stated, that they could not believe the evidence of Underwood. The Learned Judge then said, they must acquit the prisoner. Verdict—Not Guilty.

He remains to be tried on the Middlesex side, for uttering the note to Mr. Chalmers.

William Connor was indicted for uttering several forged notes, with intent to defraud the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. No less than five persons gave evidence to the prisoner's having passed forged notes to them. The Jury retired for three hours, and then returned the following verdict:—Guilty of passing the note in question; but the Jury are not satisfied of the evidence of the note being forged.

COMMON-SERGEANT.—Gentlemen, you must return a verdict of guilty or not guilty.

JURYMAN.—The prisoner is guilty of passing the note in question; but we are not satisfied that it is forged.

COMMON-SERGEANT.—If you are not agreed, you must retire and reconsider your verdict.

JURYMAN.—We are agreed.

COMMON-SERGEANT.—If you are not satisfied of the note being a forged note, you must acquit the prisoner.

FOREMAN.—We are not satisfied.

CLERK OF THE ARRAIGNS.—Is the prisoner guilty or not guilty.

FOREMAN.—Not Guilty. (Much applause.)

On Monday, John Dye was capitally indicted for uttering a forged Bank-note, knowing it to be forged.

Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET stated to the Jury, that the present prosecution rested principally on the testimony of the witness whose evidence had been given on a former trial (Williams's). As no evidence could be adduced in corroboration of this witness (Underwood), whose character had been impugned, he should not detail the case to the Jury.

The prisoner was accordingly acquitted.

Wm. Howard was also indicted for uttering a forged 11. note, knowing it to be a forgery.—The evidence against this prisoner was very slight. It consisted in the testimony of the prosecutrix, who proved the circumstance of the uttering.

Mr. Glover, one of the inspectors of Bank-notes, gave the same testimony as he had done in the case of Williams, regarding the private marks on the Bank-notes. The forged note uttered by the prisoner was not similar to the genuine Bank-notes in respect to the water-mark and stereotype in particular; but in all respects it was a forgery.

The Signing Clerk proved the signature was not his writing.

The Jury, however, not thinking the testimony sufficiently strong, acquitted the prisoner.

On Tuesday, John Williams was charged with uttering a forged 11. note, with intent to defraud James Chalmers.—It will be recollected that this prisoner was tried on Saturday. The Jury upon that occasion refused to convict the prisoner, upon two grounds—1st, the disbelief of the testimony of Underwood; and 2dly, the deficiency of proof that the notes thus sold were actually forgeries.

Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET observed, that it was determined not to adduce any evidence against the prisoner on this charge. The testimony which could be brought forward was so mingled with that which on a former occasion the Jury had declared their unwillingness to believe, that he would not now trespass upon their time in detailing the facts of the case. The legal advisers of the Bank had been consulted upon this occasion, and the ultimate determination was to relinquish the prosecution.

No evidence having been adduced, the prisoner was of course acquitted.

This is the fourth prosecution of the Bank for uttering forged notes, all of which have failed.

THE LONDON JURY AND THE RECORDER.

In the evening, when a trial was going forward, the Foreman of the London Jury (Mr. French) begged the Recorder would order all the witnesses for the prosecution out of Court, except the one under examination.

The RECORDER seemed surprised at the request. He requested to know why the Jury had made so unprecedented an application. He never heard of such a thing before.

The FOREMAN said, their application to the same effect the night before had been attended to, and he trusted that no objection would be now made to a regulation which had struck him and his fellows as highly necessary.

The RECORDER observed, that it might have been done the night before, but that was not to be considered a precedent. He did not see any possible purpose it could answer, except that of throwing imputations upon tradesmen as respectable as the gentlemen of the Jury themselves.

The FOREMAN of the Jury said, it had been observed frequently that witnesses seemed to act as if they thought it indispensably necessary to deviate in no respect from the evidence that went before on the same side: they paid the utmost attention to what was going forward, and often acted on the principle of acquiescence.

The RECORDER said, the application was nothing less than an insinuation that respectable persons were guilty of perjury. "However," said he, "Gentlemen of the Jury (four or five of them had risen), if it is your taste, be it so."

The witnesses not under examination were then excluded.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

THE STOLEN CHILD.—On Tuesday Mr. Horsley entered the office, and thanked Mr. Birnie for all the assistance he had rendered him in the pursuit of his stolen child. The Municipality of Braka behaved uncommonly well in the business. Rennett having applied for a passport to go to Baltimore, he was asked if he had any person with him; to which he replied in the negative, adding, however, only a child, his son. He was told the child must be seen, as they must be both fully described in the passport. Rennett replied he would go and fetch the child; he was told, if he would say where his hotel was, the child should be fetched, it being strongly suspected that Rennett was the man who had stolen the child. An officer was sent to the hotel where Rennett described himself to be lodging, took possession of the boy, and conveyed him to the Municipality, who took great care of him till the arrival of Mr. Horsley, when the boy was delivered up to him. Charles Rennett was detained in custody, and on his coming into the presence of Mr. Horsley, he fell on his knees, and begged for mercy; he acknowledged that his object in stealing the child was to lay Mr. Horsley under contributions to obtain the child again, although Mr. Horsley states, that he gave him 3,000*l.* some time since. Mr. Horsley applied to Mr. Birnie for the discharge of Mrs. Rennett, who had been confined in the House of Correction on suspicion of her being concerned with her husband in the horrid transaction; Mr. Horsley being convinced of her innocence, he prayed her discharge, which the Magistrate readily complied with.—Braka is under the Government of Oldenburg; and on Mr. Horsley leaving the office, he proceeded to Earl Bathurst for the necessary official documents authorizing the officers of that Government to deliver Charles Rennett into custody, to be brought to England, to take his trial for the offence.—On Monday Mr. Horsley's house in Canonbury-lane, was thronged with visitors, anxiously inquiring respecting the health of the child. Mr. Horsley appeared in much worse health than when he left England, owing to the harassing journey and agitation of mind, although on the Magistrate inquiring respecting the state of his health, he replied he was very well. He also said his recovered child and Mrs. Horsley were in good health.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MOST MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—Mr. Charles Peregauz, a native of Switzerland, bore a commission in the Spanish service, and was actively engaged in the war prior to the re-establishment of Ferdinand on the throne. At the termination of that war, he came to England with a brother officer named G—. Captain G. visited his relatives in the country, and took the deceased with him. During this visit Mr. Peregauz was smitten with the beauty of one of G.'s sisters, a very lovely woman, and he took an opportunity of making a declaration; she did not discourage him; but from his not having a fortune, she was averse to making any engagement upon so important a subject. The deceased returned to London with his friend. A short time ago the young lady came to London on a visit to some friends, and the deceased was again introduced to her by her brother; he pressed upon her his former suit: she did not discourage him, but only expressed a wish that his financial prospects were better. His visits at the house of the Gentleman where Miss G. resided (Mr. Hamley, Red Lion-street) were frequent, and he was received in the character of her future husband. The last time but one that the deceased visited Miss G. he pressed her much to consent to a marriage. She told him that such a step would be imprudent before he had a suitable establishment. He then expressed an opinion that she had formed an attachment for some other gentleman; she denied it, and he then declared that he would do something to make himself worthy of her. On Wednesday night last the deceased again paid the Lady a visit; he was left alone with her in the parlour in conversation for several hours. He again pressed her to marry him; he acknowledged that his mind was on the rack lest she should marry some one else.—Miss G. endeavoured to remove his ungrounded jealousy, but nothing she said could relieve him from his terrors upon the subject, unless she would give him her hand, as he knew some of her friends were not favourable to his pretensions. He endeavoured to force from her her consent to their immediate union, by persuasions, intreaties, and tears, and she at last said that she could not give him a favourable answer upon the subject, but referred him to the gentleman under whose protection she then was, and whom she considered as her father, for an answer; he declined, stating, as his reason, that that gentleman would not sanction their marriage. He then requested pen and ink, wrote a letter in a foreign language, addressed to a particular friend. It was between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, when he first entered the house, and between eight and nine when he expressed an intention of going home; Miss G. also wished him to go, she was so greatly distressed at his apparent misery. A short time prior to this, she left the deceased a few minutes, and told the gentleman of the house the nature of the proposals made to her by the deceased; she said she did not know what to say to him, he was in such an extreme state of anguish; he gave her advice, and she returned to the deceased. In a few minutes she came out of the parlour, and gave orders to the servant to go for a coach for Mr. Peregauz. On her return to the apartment where she had left the deceased, she endeavoured to open the door, but was prevented by the deceased having fallen against it. She succeeded in opening it, so as to be able to see that the deceased was bleeding; she screamed and assistance came; the deceased was raised from the ground; the blood flowed from a number of wounds in his breast, and a dagger was found in his side. He was unable to speak, and appeared to be dying. Mr. Vincent, a surgeon, arrived directly and sent for further aid; Mr. Hall, a surgeon came, and assisted Mr. Vincent. They found three deep wounds in the left side of the deceased, which appeared to have penetrated the heart. The deceased lived until one o'clock on Thursday morning. He has been opened since death, and the heart was found to be incised in three places. The dagger had entered his body up to the handle. The letter written by the deceased was opened; it referred to his intention of ending his existence, and takes leave of all his friends. The situation of the young lady may be better conceived than described.

PAROCHIAL INHUMANITY.—Joseph Pelham, a carman at the London Docks, was on Saturday morning seized with a fit, and seemed to Mr. Chapman, an officer at the Docks, fast approaching to his last hour. He applied to the poor-house. Saw both the churchwardens and the resident beadle. They refused to admit him, saying, "We know our duty." It was urged, without effect, that he was a parishioner. During the conversation deceased came staggering towards the workhouse; application was renewed, but the beadle said he could not be admitted without an order from the Upper Warden. At half-past two, deceased had crawled back to the dock-gates. Mr. Chapman applied to a neighbouring parish; they sent their beadle, and conducted him once more to the adjacent workhouse, as their parish workhouse was half a mile distant. The officer said "He could not help it, deceased must be passed in the regular way." The beadle from the last mentioned parish observed, "You are acting with the greatest inhumanity: probably before the deceased reaches the other poor-house, he will die." Deceased was then shaking all over, and had the appearance of a person dying. Finding their application useless, the beadle supported him towards their poor-house. On his arrival there he instantly died. Mr. H., a medical man, found him affected with rigours, from which, and other symptoms, he concluded it was a case of hydrocephalus. Went down to the first mentioned work-house, heard the altercation: the officer refusing admission, asked whether he considered deceased in a very dangerous state? Said that he did so; asked if he was in imminent danger; replied he was not. The officer then observed, it is really painful to me to refuse admitting him, but the law will not permit me to act otherwise.—The CORONER said, that whatever was inhuman was illegal. It was clear that every person in extremity, whether stranger or parishioner, must be received into the nearest work-house, and not removed thence until it can be done with safety.

An individual forcing a sick person into the street, and death ensuing, had been held to be guilty of wilful murder. This case did not go to that extent, but there was sufficient ground for a charge of misdemeanour; that was for the consideration of the parish. Verdict—Died by the visitation of God.

An inquisition was taken on Friday, at the Board Room of Clerkenwell Workhouse, on the body of a man unknown, found dying in the street.—Joseph Windsor, the superintendent of the watch at St. John's Clerkenwell, stated that he found the deceased lying in St. John's-lane, in a dying state; he had him removed into the watch-house, and sent for a surgeon, who came and said he was dying. Some wine was procured for the deceased, but he appeared too far gone to take sustenance; when it was put into his mouth he could not swallow it; he was removed to the workhouse, where he died immediately. He was in a most filthy condition, was a complete skeleton, appeared to have suffered much from poverty, and to have died from want of nourishment. A piece of bread was found in his pocket and 18d.—A gentleman, who is an assistant to Mr. Austin, the surgeon, stated that he saw the deceased when he was brought to the workhouse, he was in a most wretched condition, was extremely emaciated and diseased; he appeared about fifty years of age; he had no doubt that the deceased died a natural death; there were no marks of violence upon his body; the deceased's name is unknown; there was no document about his person to lead to a discovery of who he was. His dress was a grey coat, dark waistcoat, corduroy small clothes, and shoes, and there is a large mole or wart on the right side of his neck.—One of the Jury expressed an opinion, that he died for want.—The CORONER said, it was almost impossible he could die for want, as there was bread found in his pockets and 18d.—Verdict—Died by the Visitation of God. [Mr. Stirling really should not talk such pernicious nonsense. The finding bread and money about the deceased amounts to nothing. Both most likely were given too late to the wretched sufferer.]

On Monday last, there occurred a practical example of the Levite and the Samaritan. A poor destitute woman, quite sober, but in the depth of distress, lay pelted by the rain at a common stair in one of the suburbs. Application was made to the Elder of the district to find her a covering, under which to shelter or die. This he refused, as a matter of conscience; but the case being stated to a Constable, he provided a lodging, in which the poor woman died in the course of an hour.—Dundee Advertiser.

On Monday an inquest was held at the Steel-yard Coffee-house, Upper Thames-street, on the body of a man commonly known by the name of Lord Castlereagh, but whose real name is Daniel McSwiney. Philip Cunningham deposed, that on Friday morning he was standing at the bottom of Allhallows-lane, and saw something lying in the Thames, which he thought was a dog. He called to a person who was nearer to the object than himself, and said to him, "Is it a dog?" He said "No, it is a man;" he went up to him and saw the deceased's face; he said, "My God, it is Lord Castlereagh, is he dead?" He then assisted in taking him to the nearest house to the spot, quite dead. CORONER—Why did you call him Lord Castlereagh?—Witness: He went by that name; I have worked with him; I was informed by one of Mr. Calvert's men that he saw the deceased on the evening of Thursday, washing some potatoes by the water-side, and he was at that time in a state of intoxication.—Verdict—Accidentally Drowned.

We have this week to record a most brutal murder, which was committed in this neighbourhood on Wednesday last. A woman of the name of Nixon was found about dusk in the evening, in the road from Derby Chapel to Fazakerley, with her throat cut. She was not dead, but expired in a short time afterwards. The knife with which the fatal deed had been committed was found near the place where the woman was lying; it being traced to belong to the family by whom the woman's husband was employed, suspicion fell upon him, and he was immediately taken into custody to await the verdict of the Coroner's Jury. We understand that the woman and her husband have not lived together for some time. On Saturday an inquest was held on the body, when a verdict of Wilful Murder was returned against the husband, who was immediately committed for trial, and sent off the same afternoon to Lancaster.—Liverpool Mercury.

A novel kind of explosion took place in the kitchen of Mr. Huntley, Bishopwearmouth-green, on the morning of Sunday week. Mr. Huntley, jun. was standing near the kitchen fire, when the oven, in an entire state, was projected past him on to the floor; and at the same time a report, as loud as that of a small cannon, assailed his ears. Upon investigation it was ascertained, that the oven not having been in use for several months, and the damper being down, a quantity of carburetted hydrogen gas or fire damp had lodged in the flue of the oven, and there mixing with the atmospheric air, was ignited by the kitchen fire. After this description, we need scarcely advise our kitchen friends to be attentive in examining the state of their oven vents, in order to prevent such accidents in future.—Carlisle Journal.

MARRIAGES.

Captain Carew, R.N. brother to S. Carew, Esq. M.P. of the county of Wexford, to Mrs. Saunders, with a fortune of 80,000*l*. On the 5th inst., at Tottenham, George, fourth son of the Rev. Thomas Greenwood, Vicar of Calne, to Mary Ann, only daughter of John Sherer, Esq. of Tottenham.

DEATHS.

On Wednesday, the 9th instant, in College-street, Brompton, Mary Henderson, the wife of Thomas Barron, Esq. of the General Post-office.—Her amiable disposition (says our Correspondent) endeared her to all who knew her, and has caused her to be sincerely lamented.

Suddenly, on the 29th of November, at Paris, Mr. Hayter: he had been at church in the afternoon of that day, and returned home quite as well as usual; he went to bed, was seized with apoplexy, and expired almost instantly. He was in the 63d year of his age. Mr. Hayter had been employed by the Regent for many years in deciphering the manuscripts found at Herculaneum.

Suddenly, on Wednesday week, Susan, daughter of Mr. John Peter, of Island, North-hill, aged 19. Miss Peter rose apparently in perfect health, and whilst dressing, she fell and instantly expired.

On the 4th inst., in Bedford-square, John Lumsden, Esq. a Member of the Court of Directors for the affairs of the India Company.

On Sunday evening, in an apoplectic fit, Mr. De Bruyn, surgeon, of North Audley-street.

A few days ago, at her cottage near Gleadless, Phoebe Watkinson, aged 108 years.

On the 19th ult. Wilson Gale Braddlyll, Esq. of Conistead Priory, near Ulvestone, arrived at the Devonshire Arms Hotel, Skipton, about six o'clock in the evening. Whilst the waiter was laying the cloth for dinner, he said, "You are giving yourself much useless trouble, for I don't think I can eat any thing;" and in fact he only eat a morsel. He soon retired to his chamber, accompanied by his valet, and when going to bed, desired him to fetch something from the adjoining apartment, in the act of doing which, he heard his master fall, and found him on the floor, having had an attack of apoplexy. Medical assistance was immediately provided, but he never spoke afterwards, and died at half past ten on Friday morning. He was Groom of the Bed-chamber to his Majesty, and Colonel of the Royal Lancashire Militia.

It grieves us to announce the death of Miss Jane Auchinleck, the lady formerly mentioned as affected with hydrophobia. She lingered during Friday in a state of apparent insensibility, and breathed her last without a struggle about seven o'clock that evening. On the following Sunday, one of the servant-maids who had been bitten by the same animal began to exhibit similar symptoms. The medical attendants having experienced the inefficacy of antispasmodics in the case of Miss Auchinleck, as only affording temporary alleviation, Schoolbred's plan of bleeding ad deliquium was adopted with great and immediate relief. Still, however, the disease held on its course; and on Tuesday forenoon, the patient died. It was remarkable in the case of this young woman, as in that of Miss Auchinleck, that none of the horrible and unnatural symptoms, of which we have been accustomed to hear from our infancy as characteristic of hydrophobia, appeared. No restraint was necessary in either. Resignation, though with a preternatural flow of spirits, seemed to accompany the disease throughout. Both patients insisted that they felt neither pain nor distress, so long as they were not importuned to make attempts to swallow; and both were more anxious to comfort their sorrowing friends, than to receive their sympathy.—Dundee Advertiser, Dec. 4.

CHRISTMAS ENJOYMENTS.

WE intended to write another long paper or two this year upon Christmas; but having been carried into the season by a tide of unavoidable occupation, almost before we were aware of it, we must refer our readers, for the present, to the articles with which we were fortunate enough to please them last winter. By many, those articles, we know, have not been forgotten; and with such persons the recollection will be vivid enough to supersede the necessity of any further excitement. Should the writer's plea of business be thought to militate against his doctrines on this occasion, he can safely say that it has been no business uncongenial with the spirit and sentiments of this paper, but calculated to promote both, as he hopes the public will see. The following may be briefly recapitulated as the

MATERIALS FOR THE KEEPING OF CHRISTMAS.

1. An absence of false religion, that is to say, of cruel opinions of God, and uncharitable opinions of each other.
2. A spirit that does not shrink at earning its enjoyments in-doors by exercise in the cold without.
3. Holly or other evergreens to stick about our rooms, and remind us of the never-dying beauties of nature.
4. Plenty for all the house; and if possible, for some poor neighbours.
5. A good blazing fire.
6. Chestnuts to crack in it,—mince-pies, plumpudding, snap-dragon, &c.
7. The Wassail-Bowl,—(the indispensable Christmas cup),—a composition of spiced wine or ale, occasionally mixed with eggs, and always swimming with roasted apples, which were called Lamb's-Wool. This, with cake or bread, will alone constitute a Christmas repast.
8. Instrumental or vocal music, or dancing, or both, or all.
9. A short game of cards out of charity, if some of the company cannot do without it:—if possible, a round one, to keep up the glee of the younger sort;—if not, a sharp-pointed one to produce the requisite pungency for the older. Only, during the season, your regular whist-players really must not frown annihilation at any unhappy merry-soul, who takes a King for a Knave.
10. A raising of the servants to as great a level of enjoyment with their masters and mistresses as possible,—agreeably, not only to the first known origin of this festival, which was the Saturnalia, but to reason, humanity, and true delicacy, at all times.
11. A kiss (Good God! What will TOMKINS say!)—a kiss under the missestoe, by any one who has taken a walk to get it, provided he be worthy,—to whomsoever he offers it, provided she does not refuse from a consciousness of being otherwise.

12. Such other pastimes as the oldest remember, the sprightliest approve, and the dullest do not think absolutely degrading.

To this list we may as well subjoin

A FEW AUTHORITIES FOR SOCIAL ENJOYMENT, Selected for the Benefit of Those "who prefer an authority to a reason," and will not be happy but on good precedent.

To proceed chronologically, it is our chance to begin with the trifling authority of SOLOMON.—See his writings in general, the spirit of which however, upon the whole, is somewhat too Epicurean, in the ordinary sense of the word.

HOMER, the Father of Poetry, who in the person of DEMODOCUS delights to unite music and good cheer.

SOCRATES, the First of Philosophers,—a dancer and symposiac.

PLATO, the Divine, the great recommender of his manners and opinions.

ARISTOTLE,—somewhat in the excess, we believe, like SOLOMON.

EPICURUS,—vulgarly supposed to be a gross liver, but in fact the most rational of enjoying ones.

EPAMINONDAS, the greatest of the active Greeks,—an accomplished dancer and musician.

ALEXANDER the Great,—in the excess.

CATO the Censor,—a little over-fond of his bottle.

PLUTARCH, the father of moral essay-writing,—a symposiac and musician.

JESUS (if it be not thought profane to put him, where he would not have scrupled to go himself),—a fonder of little children, and a guest at wedding-dinners, where it is related of him that he even converted the water into wine.

ALFRED the Great,—a practiser of minstrelsy, which in those days comprised jesting and the telling of stories;—(to say nothing of his being a notorious toaster of cakes.)

CHAUCEER, the Father of English Poetry;—guess from his works.

MARTIN LUTHER, the first modern assertor of liberty of opinion;—a great player of music, to which, he said, the Devil had a natural antipathy.

MONTAIGNE,—one of the most candid as well as shrewd of philosophers,—a great advocate of genial and sworn foe of melancholy customs.

CERVANTES the Inimitable;—guess from his works.

SIR PHILIP SYDNEY the All-Accomplished,—a writer of holiday-masks.

SPENSER, whom MILTON "dared be known to think a better teacher than SCOTUS or AQUINAS;"—guess from his works.

BACON, the great light of modern philosophy, famous for his high and hospitable style of living. See also the evidences in his works.

GALILEO the Astronomer,—remarkable for his hilarity and joyous tastes.

SHAKESPEARE, whose Twelfth-Night was the last of his productions.

MILTON, the supposed austere MILTON, who roasted Christmas chesnuts with his friend DEODATI, kept Gaudy-Days (Festive Holidays) with "young gentlemen about town," and talks, in our favourite old sonnet, of light and choice repasts,

Of Attic taste, with wine, whence we may rise
To hear the lute well touched, or artful voice
Warble immortal notes and Tuscan air.
*He who of these delights can judge, and spare
To interpose them oft, is not unwise.*

TRIALS FOR FORGERY.

THE late trials at the Old Bailey for forgery on the Bank of England, have excited a great sensation. The question is indeed one of infinite importance; it is, whether a company of Traders, who have substituted their notes for the metallic coin, and have procured a law for compelling the public to take them, though not convertible into gold—who have been for the last fifteen years prosecuting the miserable creatures whom poverty and the facility of imitation have induced to forge them—who refuse to sustain the loss which this forgery occasions to individuals, although the risk is incurred for their own advantage,—whether, we say, this set of people shall be suffered to go on any longer with their hangings in defiance of the public, or whether they shall be compelled to get the present punishment mitigated, and either to make good the promise on the face of the note, or to issue others in which some confidence may be placed. This is the very least they should do; and their impudence in having gone on so long without doing it is sufficiently gross: but what is to be said for their humanity—for the humanity of men who have been so long not only spectators but actors in the bloody tragedies at the Old Bailey, and have done nothing to prevent the repetition of such scenes? The Bank Directors could not say that nothing could be done, that their despicable piece of paper could not be so improved as to put it out of the power of the least skilful forgerers to imitate it;—no, they would not say this, because they could not hope to be credited; but they said, when urged, that a committee had been sitting for fifteen years, endeavouring to discover some means of rendering forgery more difficult! Did they think that such a pitiful pretence would avail them, that the public could be deceived by such nonsense, because it came from the mouth of a Bank Director? The public know very well, that the forgerers are in general nothing but writing engravers, and that any thing like mechanical skill, aided by fine art, would greatly baffle them.—The callousness of public bodies has been often remarked: the reason of it is obvious; the responsibility being divided among many, each individual feels less called on to exert himself; and men are so accustomed to sophisticate in their own favour, that every one easily shifts the blame of negligence or misconduct on the rest. A man of strict integrity will not, however, avail himself of this excuse; if he cannot do his duty, he will not retain the situation; if he finds his efforts to have that done which he thinks right of no avail, he will, either by retiring or by making known his sentiments, disconnect himself in the public opinion from his colleagues. Now the Bank are under great obligations to the People of England. They have received a great deal of their money as managers of the Debt; and above all, as they have done them injury by not paying their notes in specie, are bound to make all the reparation possible, or at any rate to make the evil as light as it could be made. Instead of this, they have done just the reverse. As if they were not content with having done one injury, they have added an outrage;—not content with having committed a political crime, they have added a moral one;—not content with having violated their promises, they have violated justice and humanity. Let not then any one of these Directors think himself exonerated, because he, as an individual, has not done these things: he is an accessory, and as he has chosen to remain where he is, he must take the consequences of public indignation.—We should be sorry in general to cast a stigma on particular persons separately, for what they may have done as a body; but the conduct of the Bank has been such, that we cannot help coming to this conclusion,—that the Directors have acted either with savage ferocity, callous indifference to human suffering, or grasping stupidity.*

The question with respect to the Juries is still more important. A Ministerial Editor attacked the Jurors who acquitted the men first tried, and charged them with having infringed on the province of Parliament, by assuming a discretionary power, instead of contenting themselves with deciding according to the evidence. But the fact is, that the Jurors were legally correct; for not only was the evidence such as they might conscientiously doubt, but they acted, as has been observed by more than one writer, agreeably to a great law maxim, which requires that the best evidence shall be produced. The best evidence, that of the Signing Clerk, has been given in more recent cases, and the prisoners have been found guilty, but not without an evident struggle between the feelings of the Jury and their unwillingness to break through the bounds prescribed by the law. There are times, however, when it may be not only allowable, but praiseworthy, to pass those bounds, and perhaps the present time is such. The chief legislative body, it is notorious, is now the corrupt engine of a few Boroughmongers, whose interests are in the main opposed to the interests of the rest of the nation; the people not being represented in Parliament, have therefore no hand in making laws or imposing taxes, although the fundamental laws of the land declare that they should do both. If the constitution is to be restored, and the many are to prevail over the few, how could it be better done than by that Institution, which has to a certain extent escaped the general corruption? How fortunate for the people, and how glorious to that institution, would it be! That this is not a mere conjecture, may, we think, be easily shown. Suppose that a case should come before a Jury, in which an inhabitant of Manchester sought to recover damages for the seizure of his goods, who had resisted the payment of those taxes, in the imposition of which he and his fellow-citizens were not at all concerned. The Jury would then have it in their power to cause a quiet reform by their honest verdict; and should they do it, who would complain but the slavish, the bigoted, and the interested? Who but those would reproach them with having despised a form, when by so doing they had obtained a great and substantial good? Was the political state of this country such as it should be, we should be far from encouraging any man to depart from the usual and generally proper course: it would be then an insolent and ridiculous assumption, which should be held up to public indignation. Nor is it ever a thing desirable in itself: it is only by far the least of two evils. But no usurped authority can be overturned according to law, for this simple reason—that the laws are made by the usurpers. It is however much better that the good should be effected by a stretch of authority in an established body, than that the danger, which always attends an assumption of power by private subjects, should be incurred. The Jury would have the sanction of public opinion, and there is no better or higher authority. It should be remembered also, that in such a case as that we have supposed, the Jury would not go out of their way to erect themselves into a new tribunal, but would only take advantage of an opportunity presented to them while in the discharge of their ordinary duties.

THE CORN LAWS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—The bulk of the people are so fully occupied in their respective callings, that they look to the Press for conclusions on abstract points of national policy, which require intense study and laborious research: hence the great influence of the Press. I consider you to have a full share of that influence; and before you exert it on the subject of protecting duties on agricultural produce, I hope you will deeply and thoroughly consider the matter. A small portion of your talent would be sufficient to raise an outcry against the most politic measure, if connected with the necessities of life: I do not believe there is one individual who would do it wilfully; but many I fear will carelessly:—glancing superficially over it, they may consider it merely as a plan to extort money from one part of the community to put it into the pockets of the other, and (taking it in that light) from the best of motives, deprecate and endeavour to run it down.—Bred a Farmer, and with little leisure or inclination to cultivate other studies, I do not for a moment suppose that my opinion, on a subject of such magnitude, can be of much value; but I wish to call the attention of those who are competent to the subject of protecting duties, and yours in particular.

The question, as it affects individuals, is, whether the Farmer ought to have secured to him a fair profit on his capital and industry: as it affects the public, it is, whether the land is to be cultivated or not, and whether it is politic or impolitic to depend on a foreign supply of the necessities of life.

The Citizens of America, I should think, who purchase their land at nine shillings per acre, and have neither tythes, tax, or poor-rate, can deliver their corn here cheaper than we could grow it if our land was rent free: now, if we admit that, it follows of course that if we have no protection for our produce, the culture of the soil of these kingdoms will be discontinued. The consequence will be, that Farmers of small capital must break, and be added to the number of paupers already considered insupportable:—those with larger capitals will go and cultivate the rich wildernesses of America to supply the British markets; and what then becomes of the labouring husbandmen, their wives and families? They, I suppose, must emigrate too, or wander about the country like wild Arabs, digging here a spot and there a spot, sometimes something to eat, and sometimes nothing. The next thing we have to consider is, what will be the situation of the manufacturing and trading interest, when the proprietors of land, the occupier, and labourers, are not among their customers. Then let us imagine ourselves in London or Manchester, when continental dearth, contrary winds, or hostile fleets, have cut off the promised supply, and when America shall be possessed of the talent—and what will remain of the capital at present employed in British agriculture, will it not act as a stimulus to her manufacturer? I cannot pretend to say how such a state of things may affect the interest of this kingdom, when negotiating about other matters with powers on whom it will depend for its daily bread; but when wily Jacob treated with famished Esau, he required his birthright for “a mess of pottage.” I know very well that before agriculture has fallen to that extremity, the attention of the Legislature, and of the traders and mechanics themselves, will be roused; but neglect at this moment may give it a blow which it may be long first, if it ever does recover. On the other hand, when agriculture is so much protected as to insure the cultivation of all wastes that ought to be cultivated, improvements when wanted, and a spirited system of husbandry in general, with Landlords’ living in a style suited to their rank, Farmers doing well, and labourers fully employed, will not manufacturers and mechanics share the prosperity? That some protection is necessary, I suppose every one will admit. Whether the protection it has at present is sufficient or not, I am not, as I before observed, qualified to give an opinion, but it must be the interest of the country that the soil should be made the most that can be made of it. We should consider him an improvident man who suffered his own garden to lie waste and void, and bought vegetables of his neighbour: the case I think is pretty well in point. I again request, Mr. Examiner, that you will give the subject your particular and immediate attention. One thing I think I may venture to promise, that if the Legislature will do its duty to the country by fairly protecting us, and the Landlords will do their duty by granting long leases, the Farmers will do theirs by highly cultivating the soil, and England may eat of her own fruits and sell of her abundance.

Northleach, Dec. 4.

A COTSWOLD FARMER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I know not how sufficiently to apologize to you for troubling you again on this subject, but I am led to it by having seen another letter by J. L. in your last Monday’s Examiner, in which he seems very angry with me for having dared to differ in opinion from one apparently so positive as himself.

“Where the judgment’s weak the prejudice is strong.”

He says he suspects I am a Mealman of some sort or other: I can assure him he is as much mistaken in this opinion as in that he entertains of the Corn Bill: I neither am a Mealman nor acquainted with any one belonging to that trade: I will however compliment him, by following his example so far, as to inform him what I imagine him to be, viz. from his canting and scripture-quoting method of writing I consider him to be a Methodist Preacher, accustomed both to whine and denounce with hypocritical solemnity; he is probably too a follower of the Spafford Orator. He says his style is pretty plain; to me it appears neither pretty nor plain, but confused and artfully jumbled together. He complains that I have not attacked those assertions of his which he, at the same time, declares are founded on a rock. He writes too:—“The reason why he supposes I consider the Corn Bill cruel is, that I made slight mention of its having starved thousands and thousands to death, and left the typhus fever as a memento of its ravages." Thus he takes upon himself to make assertions for other people quite at random, as (to repeat his own words)—"He says so, I never did." He has also added a few more thousands to his former statement; it was before "thousands"—now "thousands and thousands;" the typhus fever is known to visit and have visited people in affluent as well as those in indigent circumstances, and ought not to be charged to the Corn Bill, and that is of much more recent date than the disorder in question. Of the "thousands and thousands" (how many thousands does he mean to insinuate?) starved, I cannot believe he has an accurate list: no such account has been heard of till he mentioned it; and it sounds very unlikely that "thousands and thousands" (a very vague method of expressing himself) of human beings should have perished from want; no such miseries have come within my observation or hearing: if, instead of mere talking or writing, he had relieved such distressed objects, it would have been of more real service to his fellow-creatures: many poor men are out of employment, and it is a most lamentable circumstance, but the Corn Bill cannot be the cause of it. If all the waste lands in the kingdom (and they are very numerous) were to be brought into a state of cultivation, we need not go to foreign markets for supplies of corn; we should have more than enough of our own growth; and it would likewise be the means of giving employment to those who are now so much in want of it. He (Mr. J. L.) also complains, because I did not attack the following assertion in a former letter:—"Here let it be particularly cautioned, that the heavy load of the taxes be not identified with the scarcity of bread; the scarcity is the effect of the Corn Bill." Has he forgotten the scarcities of former years? and how does he connect them with the Corn Bill of such recent date? I have somewhere seen a scale of the prices of corn for a hundred years, by which any one must be convinced that years of scarcity have existed long before the Corn Bill; and unless Mr. L. is a very young man indeed, he must have some recollection of such years himself. He calls a wet summer a desolating one; that however is only the case on some sorts of soils; some are benefited by a wet, and some by a dry summer: between clay and sand Mr. L. requires to be told there is a very great difference. It has never, I believe, been till this time ascertained that Dives was a Farmer; that discovery was reserved for Mr. J. L. There cannot be managers of the markets, either for corn or other articles; if there were, such situations would be much sought after, and Mr. J. L. would be as likely to join in the race as any one, was he to make himself acquainted with facts instead of writing by guess; he would understand that all markets rise and fall, and that all saleable articles find their level in time. He very politely calls me a dreamer: I was however perfectly awake, both when I wrote, and when I began reading his letters, however soporific I found their effects before I had finished them. He concludes his letter to you, Sir, with a "Heaven bless you." Although possessed of such good wishes towards you, I should not have ventured to express them so; in case you should have suspected me of canting: I will however hope that that Power will protect you and all of us from such people as those to whose letter I am now replying.—I am, Sir, with much respect, your humble servant,

A CONSTANT READER.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, DEC. 14.—We lately announced, that an attempt had been made to assassinate Mr. Hervey, an English physician, residing at the entrance to the town of Bayeux, on the road to Caen. Five persons, among whom were three chasseurs of the regiment of the Somme, in garrison at Bayeux, were accused of this crime. These five persons having made some confessions, and afterwards retracted them, were on the 8th brought before the Assize Court of Caen, where the proceedings excited a species of interest resulting from a contrast between the cool obstinacy of three of the prisoners, and the repentance displayed by the two others.—They were found guilty.

A new census has lately been taken throughout the several departments comprising the French Monarchy, whereby it appears that the total population amounts to 29,327,388 souls. Of the departments, that of the Seine, comprising the capital, is of course the most populous, Paris containing 713,765 souls.

In consequence of the intervention of the Allied Sovereigns at Aix-la-Chapelle, the Family of BONAPARTE at Rome have been invited to choose and nominate a Physician to attend on the EX-EMPEROR in St. Helena, and accordingly they have appointed M. de BEAUREGARD, the able medical man who attended on BONAPARTE in the Isle of Elba, and who returned with him to Paris, where he remained at the particular request of NAPOLEON, but with instructions to follow him to North America, as soon as it should be known where he took up his abode. M. de BEAUREGARD is to go immediately, and we have no doubt but that it is a part of the arrangement, effected by representations made at Congress, that this Gentleman will not find Sir Hudson Lowe the Governor on his arrival.—Chronicle.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, DECEMBER 20.

It is supposed, that the long-expected news of some change in the despicable Spanish Government has at length arrived, but that the Ministers keep it a secret. The natural excess of rumours becomes more natural on such an occasion. Some say, that there has been a general insurrection, the soldiers of the line making common cause with the Guerillas, and that the Creature has fled from Madrid with the English Ambassador; others, that he has been murdered; others, that he has killed himself. That something important has happened, we feel pretty certain; because, while the Spanish Bourbon interest in this metropolis can only throw the ordinary difficulties in the way of proof, which however do not hold in this instance after all, the demi-official organ of Government speaks in a very guarded tone, and seems intentionally to prepare the public mind for what it expects. The argument that nothing serious has occurred in Madrid, because letters have arrived to the 3d instant, has been shewn to be of no importance, by the fact that an express arrives in half the time of the post; and in answer to the objection that the thing must have been known among the merchants here, it is justly said, that their Correspondents in Spain might not yet have ventured upon such intelligence, and that communications from that country are easily cut off. Rumour adds, that a remonstrance had arrived to FERDINAND from Aix-la-Chapelle,—that the people got news of it, and testified their joy,—but as the Creature took no steps in consequence, a secret association had been formed, in order to compel a change of measures, to the amount of 40,000 persons. Every one who takes the least interest in the rights of his fellow-creatures, awaits with anxiety for further intelligence, which it is supposed cannot arrive till next Tuesday, when the post comes in.

The following is the manner in which the Courier speaks of the matter in two different paragraphs, Thursday and Friday:—"To this report" (that of a general revolt) "we are not inclined to attach credit." But we cannot add that there appears no likelihood of any event occurring to disturb the internal tranquillity of Spain. It is difficult to procure accurate information from that country, and therefore not easy to form any decisive opinion: but we are quite convinced that things cannot long remain as they are."

And again:—

"Such are the different conjectures which prevail upon the subject; and we give them without any assurance on our own parts that they are authentic. For ourselves, indeed, we can only repeat, that the aspect of affairs in that country was such as made it but too probable some crisis was at hand."

But why "too probable?" Oh, because it is certain that one man at least must suffer by such a revolt, and that man is a king, the head of the few:—millions have been suffering in consequence of his more revolting atrocities against gratitude and humanity; but then they were the people,—the many.

The following (says last night's Courier) is an extract of a Private Letter from Madrid, dated the 3d inst.:—

"Madrid, Dec. 8.

"We have no news here of any importance, that I can learn, but we are in such a state of ignorance upon political matters, that we hardly know what is going forward in the Provinces. We have had reports here of the concentration of bands of robbers in different parts, whose purpose is the plunder of travellers, but who pretend other motives for taking up arms. How far this is true it is impossible to say, nor do we know whether there is any ground for believing that the principal cause of the delay of the expedition from Cadiz is the rapid and uncontrollable desertion of the troops."

The reported changes in the Ministry, says the Courier, "have no foundation in fact, with the exception of the retirement of Lord MULGRAVE from the Master Generalship of the Ordnance, which is to be filled by the Duke of WELLINGTON.—There is no foundation for another report, that Sir HUDSON LOWE is to be removed from the Government of St. Helena. Sir HUDSON is to continue Governor."

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.—It is with much satisfaction that we find the rumour of Mr. SAMUEL WHITEHEAD's starting for Westminster has entirely subsided. If we are to trust to common rumour, the plan was suggested by an insidious notice from the Treasury, that Sir M. MAXWELL was forthwith to be withdrawn. A passing wish to unfurl the banners of Party upon a field where they had floated so triumphantly on a recent occasion, made some persons overlook the fact, that the popular cause was already in the hands of those who have deserved some gratitude from the public for having, during several successive Elections, placed both the seats of Westminster beyond the reach of power, and thus secured two constant votes, if not two two cordial friends, for the lists of Opposition. But the disinterested interposition of a friend to the party, as well as to the public, produced a hesitation, and, unless we are misinformed, the young Gentleman in question showed no wish to lend an honourable name to a pernicious purpose. No farther measures were taken, and, as we learn, none will be taken.—In the mean while, the Committees for conducting the Election of Mr. HOBHOUSE are in a state of the utmost activity; they are numerous composed of respectable tradesmen in every parish. Public Meetings, at which Mr. HOBHOUSE has been present, have been assembled in every quarter of the city. A canvass, more vigorous than ever was known so long previously to an Election, has been attended with the greatest success; and the friends of the Court Candidate, who were again brought into the field by the rumour of a division of the popular interest, have again begun to feel the effects of the union which now so happily subsists.

Notice is given in last night's Gazette, "that upon the present melancholy occasion, it is not desired or expected that the public should appear in mourning after the 29th instant."

There is a PAGE in the history of a certain high Legal Character, who has acted as Trustee, which requires elucidation; the particulars of which will shortly appear. There is, in fact, no less than a gross deviation from Truth, if what is stated in writing by one Party be correct.

The remains of Lord ELLENBOROUGH are to be removed on Tuesday morning next from his late residence in St. James's-square, for interment in the Charter House: they are to be deposited in the vault by the side of the remains of Mr. SUTTON, its founder, who was interred in the reign of Queen ELIZABETH, upwards of 200 years ago. His Lordship was in his 69th year.

An old man named Courtois, who had been a hair-dresser, lately died at obscure lodgings, leaving, they say, nearly two hundred thousand pounds.

LICENTIOUSNESS OF THE BAR.—We hear much of the licentiousness of the Press; and none talk more loudly of it than the Lawyers. But what shall be said of the Bar, then—and that too in matters respecting the private actions of individuals?—Hear two of the most eminent. On the late trial for Criminal Conversation, Mr. GURNEY said, that Mr. ELLIOTT “had not only been committing the crime of adultery, and injuring a husband in the person of his wife; but he had been exhorting the wife, and plotting to get a settlement out of the husband’s pocket, on which he might support himself in affluence at the injured husband’s expense. Never was any thing so base, so infamous as this.”—(Observe, reader, nothing of the kind was proved in evidence.)—And Mr. SCARLETT, with the desire, it should seem, of making his Learned Friend’s Client as consummate a scoundrel as his Learned Friend had endeavoured to make his,—stoutly maintained, that “Mr. ASTON’s case was bottomed in a foul conspiracy, in order to gratify what had long been his object, namely, to obtain a separation from his wife—that conspiracy being supported by perjury.”—(Observe, again, that there was not a jot of evidence in proof of this.)—As the Judge took no sort of notice of all this slander, would it have excited any one’s surprise to have heard, that the persons so foully misrepresented had well tweaked our “Learned Friends” noses on their stepping out from the Court?—The licentiousness of the Press truly!—Here are direct charges against both men and women, of the most abject baseness and the foulest perjury, made under the very nose of the Chief Justice;—but not a word in rebuke. It is all “according to law,” and what is more, all for the benefit of the Craft.—When it is recollected, too, that our Learned Friends are hired to talk in this style, one’s respect for the profession is not mightily increased.

THE OPPOSITION.—The present systematic opposition are the enemies of every radical reform. They would wash the outside of the Constitution, but they do not want to purify it within. They have no objection to the patronage of the crown, when they can procure it for their own purposes, and in settling a few pensions upon themselves, they have no objection to increase the people’s burthens. They talk about the rights of the people, but they merely mean the rights of place.—They do not want to alter measures, but men. They have no objection to a tolerable exercise of power, but then it must be in their own hands. Hostile to decided measures, they despise all those who call for a radical revision of all abuses, and will leave to “one or two members” the merit of supporting those men who attempt to bring them into public notice, that they may be rectified, “though the universal experience of mankind, the plainest principles of justice and humanity, combined with the most obvious dictates of common sense, may imperiously demand it.” In one word, they shrink from whatever is likely to destroy the present system of boroughmongering, the hope of places, and the possession and reversion of pensions, which many of them enjoy. From the efforts of such men, it is in vain to look for the retrenchment of useless expenditures, and the reformation of abuses at home and abroad, or rather for their radical destruction, “which ought alone to be reckoned the master principle of all parliamentary efforts.”—The above Character of the Whigs as a body is copied from “Strictures on an Article in the Edinburgh Review, on the State of Parties”—originally published in Drakard’s Stamford News.

A specimen of a new form intended to be given to Bank-notes has been shown at some of the public offices. The paper is of the same size as at present, but the written and engraved parts are all contained in a small oval in the centre. At each corner is a sort of stamp, of curious and singular appearance, which, it is hoped, cannot be imitated.—Courier.

SURREY INSTITUTION.—We are sorry that unavoidable occupation has prevented us from attending the two last lectures of Mr. HAZLITT; especially after what we hear of them from our friends. Mr. HAZLITT, we understand, gave a masterly delineation the other night of JOHNSON’S character as a critic, and after expounding it pretty plainly, entered into his character as a man with all that natural charity and knowledge of human nature, which is always at the bottom of this gentleman’s criticism. The most vehement instances in which he seems to forsake it, only arise out of his impatient sense of the reverse feeling in others. It is his happy talent at divesting the authors of the mere common-place idea of them as authors, and shewing them in their finer and more congenial character as men, which helps to render his lectures so attractive.

When Mr. PARISH, of philanthropic celebrity at Bath, solicited her late MAJESTY’S aid for a charity in that city, and the poor children of the schools were presented to her, she said she approved of the charity, but she left nothing for them. The bathing woman was the only person that shared the late QUEEN’S bounty, and she sent her the liberal sum of one guinea! And the owner of the furnished house in which she lodged was not much benefited by majesty, for a private individual was employed by her to take it as for himself, on the most reasonable terms! The Courier also informs the public, that the Queen, in her great charity, when there was a failure in the Windsor bank, ordered 400*l.* in Bank of England notes to be distributed among the poor sufferers throughout the town, by exchanging them for those of the broken bank. Now, the Courier has told a downright lie; for we are informed, through the medium of a gentleman, who has made it his business to enquire, that the affair was wholly confined to persons in the Queen’s employ, and that the sum distributed did not, it is supposed, exceed one-tenth of what is so proudly stated!—Stamford News.

LORD RANELAGH.—We are informed by a Correspondent, but we do not vouch for the fact, and hope it is not well founded, that this Nobleman, in consequence of a recent verdict, and to prevent the necessity of personal attendance in future on similar occasions, has had several spring-guns made, under his own direction, and of an uncommon size, such as before were never heard of.—Sun.

Bishop Warburton’s Opinion of the Court of Chancery.—“As unfit as I am for Heaven, I had rather hear the last trumpet than a citation from the Court of Chancery. If ever you have seen MICHAEL ANGIO’S Last Judgment, you have there, in the figure of the Devil, who is pulling and hugging at a poor sinner, the true representation of a Chancery Lawyer, who has caught hold of your purse.”

Two persons have died within the last fortnight, in the Fleet Prison, who were prisoners for contempt of Court. One of them, ROBERT NEWMAN, had been confined nine years!

Mr. SETREE, (Mr. BORTHWICK’S Solicitor) says, “the statement in the Times, respecting Mr. BORTHWICK, is wholly unfounded in fact.”—We have thought proper to copy it nevertheless.

HINT TO FLORID SINGERS.—The absurdity of the extravagant ornament, or senseless flourishes with which some otherwise good singers are apt to fritter away the very meaning as well as melody of their composer, may perhaps strike them a little if transferred to mere words. The inconsistency is only more obvious, though scarcely less foolish. What would they think for instance of a beautiful passage in Twelfth Night delivered in the following manner:—

“If music be the food of” — fally ral de riddle iddle tum de iddle— “love, play!” — tum, tum, riddle iddle fat de rally—“oh.
“Give me excess of” — tol lol de riddle fol, tiddle toddle—“it; that “surfeiting
“The appetite may sicken, and so” — ti tum de tiddle liddle, tiddle liddle ro—ri lol fol de riddle—“die.”

The Literary Pocket-Book.

The utmost uncertainty every where prevails as to the criteria by which the forged is to be distinguished from the genuine paper. Individuals who are most in the habit of examining it are frequently deceived; and the great bulk of the people are absolutely without any means whatever of forming even a probable opinion upon the subject. This uncertainty has almost banished the circulation of small Bank of England notes from this part of the country, a circumstance which accounts for the comparatively small number of persons who have suffered under the Bank prosecutions in this county. But it is not only on account of the risk of pecuniary loss that the taking of Bank of England paper is disliked, every man feels that in so doing his good name, his liberty, nay, even his life, may be placed in jeopardy; and it is by no means an impossible case, that the most innocent man in the world might be capitally convicted. We will mention an instance:—at the last Spring assizes for this county, a person of the name of Leatherland, was convicted of uttering forged notes; it appeared from the evidence that he had paid four of those notes to one person, who had negotiated two of them; the other two remaining in his possession: now if this man had been apprehended, and had been unable to prove (and the person who had paid them was an entire stranger to him) how he had come into the possession of these notes, he might either have been convicted of uttering, or have been induced to plead guilty to the lighter charge of having them in his possession. The danger to which this innocent man was exposed struck Mr. Justice BAYLEY so forcibly, that in passing sentence upon Leatherland, he mentioned the danger in which he had placed this person, as a considerable aggravation of his offence.—Leeds Mercury.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

CARLTON-HOUSE AND THE PRINCE REGENT.—The PRINCE REGENT was occupied for many days previously to his departure to Brighton, in determining on the style of architecture to be introduced at his future residence; and at last the new arrangements are determined upon. Carlton-House is to be levelled with the ground. The first proposition from the architect was to raise the building a story; but insuperable difficulties were found to be in the way of adding effect to grandeur. The whole structure, therefore, will be removed in the spring of next year, and a new Palace erected in its stead upon a magnificent scale. To give effect to this, Warwick-house and Warwick-street will be removed, and the site occupied by a court-yard and domestic offices. Some houses on the east and west, in Pall-Mall, are also to be removed.—Morning Post.—The Courier observes upon this article—“There is not the slightest foundation for the statement that alterations are immediately about to be made in the buildings of Carlton-House, Warwick-House, and Warwick-street. Indeed we have reason to believe, that the statement relative to this subject is in every other particular totally unfounded.”

On Sunday afternoon the Marquis and Marchioness of HERTFORD arrived at Brighton on a visit to the REGENT. The Marquis of HERTFORD, and others of the same stamp, are also paying their visits of condolence.

An article dated Brighton, Dec. 15, after naming seventeen “distinguished individuals,” among whom are the Marchioness of HERTFORD, Lord YARMOUTH, and the Bishop of EXETER, says, “the PRINCE REGENT resides in seclusion from all additional company, and no invitations have been issued for evening parties, in consequence of the mourning. With the exception of last evening, his Royal Highness dispensed with the attendance of his private band of musicians, and upon that occasion their performances were confined to a selection of sacred music.”

THE QUEEN'S PROPERTY.—It now appears certain that her late MAJESTY had no other property to bequeath but her diamonds; they are to be divided among the PRINCESSES, in equal proportions. A valuation has been taken, and these jewels are estimated at little short of a million sterling. The codicil to the will disposes of the QUEEN'S ready money, viz. four thousand pounds! The other property, namely, the wardrobe, goes to the unmarried daughters: it is very valuable; for be it remarked, that a Lady of high rank, many years attached to the Household, observed, “her MAJESTY was the richest Queen in Europe in wardrobe.”—Courier.

MR. JOHN MURRAY.

“A Magazine, avowedly a rival to an elder one of the same class, is announced for publication in London—its first number defames an individual in such a manner, that the publisher threatens to discard the work from his counter; he is appeased and the punishment due to the Authors of the libel, is averted by an explanation which it is difficult to imagine would be resorted to by any man who believed he had been writing the truth, but which it is easy to reconcile with the shifts and subterfuges of a premeditating slanderer. The Editor of the Magazine however, being advised by his legal friends that in the event of an action, the damages might be merely nominal, renews his cowardly attack with greater virulence, although he has upon enquiry learnt from the very enemies of his victim, that his moral character was unimpeachable! You Mr. John Murray are now the publisher of that Magazine!”

“The same number contains a more extensive, but not more atrocious libel, upon some of the highest literary and scientific men of Edinburgh, written in a style which you may recollect quoted by Mr. Hone, as an infinitely more flagrant instance of the profane, than that for which he was prosecuted. It was bought up in terror of the law; but prosecutions were nevertheless commenced, and although dropped in compassion to the Edinburgh Publisher, one was referred to the private decision of an enlightened and amiable Judge of the Scottish Court, whose sentence convicted the Publisher, and fined him two hundred and thirty pounds, for a foul and indecent libel. This conviction was upon a private hearing between a private prosecutor and the offender. You will judge what it would have been with the concurrence of the Lord Advocate in a public trial. You Mr. John Murray now publish the work of a convicted libeller!”

Besides the continuance of a brutal abuse of the inoffending individual first alluded to, after his good nature had secured the libellers from danger, and their counsellors had made them bold in defamation, there commenced a system of private slandering, which, while it promised fair to sink the work in irretrievable obscurity, provoked a species of punishment possibly the best adapted to the offence, namely, a horsewhip. You, Sir, are the London publisher of a horsewhipped bookseller in Edinburgh!!!

“Since the occurrence of these notorious facts, the Editor of the work in question has indulged himself freely in his darling theme. He has vilified one friend, betrayed the confidence of another, ridiculed and detracted several. Two Gentlemen, eminent alike as Churchmen and Scholars, whose names were avowed as contributors to his Magazine, withdrew their support in disgust. The Publisher in London, long ashamed of his share in the concern, threw it up, in dread perhaps of the chastisement which he was conscious the work merited;—and if any respectable persons are yet connected with it, they are anxious to conceal their connexion, and only wait a favourable opportunity to shake it off. But in this abject state of blackguardism, (the phrase is to the matter) you Mr. John Murray, when the appearance of this work upon your parlour table would be at least of doubtful propriety,—after its authors and their organ had been branded, convicted, horse-whipped;—while it was in your own knowledge that they were the assassins of character, the detractors of merit, the calumniators of private life, the betrayers of friendship;—nay, for I must speak the whole truth,—while you, Sir, were expressing openly your knowledge and abhorrence of these atrocities, you publish this Magazine!—you connect yourself publicly with the scoffers of your friends and patrons, you declare to the world that the stigma of cowardice, the sentence of a court, the horsewhip of a justly irritated individual, are no bars to your acquaintance, to your connection in business, to your support!—From A Letter to Mr. John Murray, of Albemarle-street, occasioned by his having undertaken the Publication, in London, of Blackwood's Magazine.

No. 347.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A NEW comedy, entitled A Word for the Ladies, was produced here on Thursday, from the popular pen of Mr. KENNY, author of the World, Raising the Wind, &c. &c. Drury-Lane and Covent-Garden appear to have changed characters for the present. The former has taken to tragedy and the latter to comedy. And the variety is agreeable:—for they have middling comic performers enough at Drury-Lane to spoil the effect of the good ones, especially since Mrs. DAVISON, Miss KELLY, and DOWTON, no longer perform there. Proper use also is made of the talents of KEAN, the only great tragedian living: and at Covent-Garden, there has been such a long spell of tip-top tragic mediocrity, that it is quite reviving to hear a laugh again.

The following is a statement of the plot, as it has been given in the daily papers:—

Old Bowerscourt	Mr. W. FARREN.
Young Bowerscourt	Mr. ABBOTT.
Winterland	Mr. MACREADY.
Dorrington	Mr. C. KEMBLE.
Larum	Mr. YOUNG.
Adamant	Mr. CONNOR.
Silvertongue	Mr. LISTON.
Curvette	Mr. JONES.
Seud	Mr. EMERY.
Gray	Mr. CHAPMAN.
Miss Adamant	Miss BRUNTON.
Clara Winterland	Mrs. FAUCHI.
Mrs. Singleton	Mrs. YETES.

The chief interest of the piece turns upon the distress of Young Winterland, who, having incurred the displeasure of an uncle on whom his fortunes depended, is disinherited, and hides from his creditors in a fisherman's cottage. His sister, who shares his misfortunes, is attached to young Dorrington, his sworn friend, to whom he has formerly made great sacrifices, and who has been to the West Indies to take possession, as he believes, of a rich inheritance. On his return, the Winterlands depend on his fulfilling their hopes, both of marrying Clara, and relieving her brother. His conduct, however, becomes mysterious and equivocal; and the most affecting of the situations arise from Winterland's resentment of his conduct, the disappointed passion of Clara, and the severe reproach of her feelings, which she incurs from the high spirit and wounded pride of her brother. Circumstances render Dorrington the bearer of an offer of marriage to Clara from Young Bowerscourt, who had suffered overtures to be made in Clara's prosperity, and which his father holds him more than ever bound to follow up; an explanation ensues between Dorrington and Clara, when he declares himself disappointed also of his inheritance, and urges the suit of Young Bowerscourt, in order to save Winterland from despair and ruin. Bowerscourt's heart has, however, in spite of his better reason, been ensnared by Miss Adamant, a gay woman of fashion, of a generous disposition, but flighty manners, which revolt him. The difficulties of these parties are finally removed by a seasonable discovery—Mr. Hastings, the uncle of Winterland, had left the property to an unknown stranger, who had saved his life from robbers on the coast of Cornwall, on his identifying himself; if not, it passes to a Mr. Silvertongue, a more distant relation. Silvertongue, by a cowardly caution to avert the supposed indignation of Dorrington, calls on him to explain his conduct, and unfolds particulars which prove Dorrington himself to be the fugitive incognito, in the last hour allowed him to set up his title. He arrives, however, at Old Bowerscourt's, the trustee, just in time, and the possession of the property enables him to do justice to Winterland, and to confirm his engagements with Clara. Young Bowerscourt is thus released of his obligation—both he and his father become reconciled to Miss Adamant, who remains the mistress of his heart. Mr. Larum is a natural agent in the plot, and some amusing situations arise out of his having abandoned his wife, from a hasty and erroneous conviction of her infidelity; and being afterwards employed by Old Bowerscourt to promote a match with her for the old gentleman, she being then unknown to him under the name of Singleton. This leads to a satisfactory explanation, by which they are also reconciled. The impertinent gallantries of a Mr. Curvette, which have a great tendency to create the jealous fancies of Young Bowerscourt, form also a considerable share of the earlier acts of the comedy.

This account however does not exhibit the piece to advantage. It is too serious; and the objectionable passages were all confined to the serious part. The comic is throughout extremely amusing. The character performed by Liston is that of a lack-a-daisical pretender to sensibility, who is only sensitive on his own account, and exposes his awkward selfishness and cowardice in every company. Larum (Mr. Young) is a kind of mitigated misanthrope, a jaundiced compound of Blue Devils and the Green Man, who has a talent at making the worst of every thing in his words and the best of every thing in his deeds. Jones is a whipper-snapper coxcomb, ashamed of his dancing-master origin, and thrusting himself among people who are obliged to insult him. And Farren has an original and very entertaining part, as a good-hearted old gentleman who thinks he has retreated snugly for life into a villa by the sea-shore, but finds himself pestered by all sorts of visitors and parties. Neither must we forget a short character performed by Emery,—an old seaman, who makes brief work of his opinion of Mr. Silvertongue; and of whom the latter relates, in a great heat and horror, after an alarming passage in a pleasure-boat, that he called him "Billy with the chill off." In short, in all the humorous part of his comedy, Mr. KENNY has realized what was expected of him. The characters are laughable, but founded in nature; the language more terse and informed with thinking, than that of any other comic writer of the day; and some of the situations are excellent, particularly the one in which Old Bowerscourt, whose carriage has broken down, is helped home by a lady with whom he is quite enchanted, and who, on the entrance of his son, turns out to be the very one he wished him not to marry. Among the many pleasant touches in the dialogue, a person complains of the outrageous attentions of some toast-masters of his acquaintance, who "hunt him so fiercely from jollity to spleen, that he could swear the peace against them."

The comic parts are well performed. Mr. Farren, in a humorous character which demands something natural and effective without being very rich, is just where he ought to be. Liston, we suspect, does not make his Silvertongue exactly what the author intended it,—not quite smooth and canting enough: but he brings out all the buttism of it with full effect; and is very happy in that passage, where after refusing a gentleman his place in the pleasure-boat, he wishes to give it up on hearing that a storm is expected. Jones is amusing as usual, but overdoes his part, and is a little too excessive and gaping-voiced in his Bond-street tones. Young acts the part of Larum very well indeed,—with a judicious mixture of natural earnestness and acquired despondency; but there appeared the other night a certain jaunty cut in his sober clothes, and in the fashionable fall of his waist, which contradicted the bald head he had adopted, and gave him somewhat of the singular aspect of a Dandy Misanthrope. Emery's old seaman is an excellent rough sketch; he must the Miss Adamant of Miss BRUNTON be forgotten, which is equally well dressed, unaffected, and agreeable.

Of the serious performance we cannot speak so well. CHARLES KEMBLE and MACREADY did indeed what they could; but Mrs. FAUCETT declaimed, wept, and turned away, at a very ineffectual rate; and Mrs. YATES, a sort of imaginary Mrs. Haller in a veil, was found out for a wife to YOUNG. To say the truth, the public vehemently suspect, even from the evidence of the Dramatis Personæ, that Mr. KENNEY has brought in various unnecessary characters in order to please the performers rather than himself. We have often noticed the demands which they make upon authors in this and similar instances; and we think it high time that they should be put an end to. Why should a writer against his judgment run a chance of being damned, and the theatre itself in fact be injured, in order that such and such a performer should have something to say as well as TOMKINS or JENKINS? It is hard no doubt to deny a gentleman the liberty of stalking about a little, and much harder to resolve that a lady shall not be made love to, or even (if she insists upon it) ruined and forsaken. But authors should really vindicate their old privilege of being allowed to know what they mean and think fit. If they were to do so, and the actors should choose to withstand it, it would only hasten the time when the little and more modest theatres will be the ruin of the great ones,—as will infallibly be the case at last.

The author of the new comedy has retrenched, we suppose, what was most objectionable in the sentimental parts; but whether he has or no, we can safely recommend our readers to go and enjoy all the others; and we earnestly recommend also, that the next time he sits down to write a comedy (which we hope will be as quickly as possible) he will give free current to his natural and undoubted vein for humour, and beg the tragedy-interferers to spare both him and us.

It was not without a feeling of pain, that we observed Miss KELLY among the spectators on the first night of the new comedy. What does she do before the curtain? She should have been on the stage. With such youth, such talents,—

Those powers of pleasing, with that will to please, it is too much that she should be forgotten, discarded, laid aside like an old fashion. It really is not yet the season for her "among the wastes of time to go." Is it Mr. STEPHEN KEMBLE, or the Sub-Committee; or what heavy body is it, which interposes itself between us and this light of the stage?

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 18.—MR. HART AND MR. BELL.

Ben sielē accoppiati, io giurerei.

Ariosto. O. F. C. 20.

No person, though little acquainted with the difference in the nature of the business transacted in our Courts of Law and Equity, could fail to be struck almost at first sight with a remarkable difference, especially in the countenances, of the practisers in the one and in the other. In the King's Bench, taking that as an example of the first, if there be a number of heavy lifeless plodders, the majority of the Counsel attending have at least an appearance of quickness and shrewdness—a vivacity and a sparkling animation, not unfrequently artificial and assumed, but most commonly aided or produced by the kind of proceeding in which they may be engaged, or of which they may be spectators. Setting aside the variety of questions occupying the Judges in term-time, the trials at Nisi Prius, in which so many curious and entertaining facts are developed, keep the mind alive and the faculties in a state of activity: the vivā voce examinations of witnesses, where something new either of manner or conduct is offered in every stage, and the readiness that is required and displayed by Advocates in managing them, is of itself sufficient to account for the difference: the expression given to the face on such occasions in time becomes fixed and habitual.

In Chancery, the effect follows the cause just in the same way, and men look dry and dull because the business of the Court is ordinarily dry and dull also: the faces of the Counsel here possess quite a different character: some of them have "the strong lines of thought" sufficiently marked, but there is nearly a total absence of life, spirit, and energy, as if "Dulness o'er all possess'd her ancient reign," and that with full consent and approbation: many keep their features even in stiffer buckle than their wigs; and if they have no business (which not a few of those that look most sagaciously have not) with their senses scarcely awake, yet, with their eyes open, they preserve all day a sort of listening attitude with a blind pertinacity almost equal to that of an Indian Fakir;—"list'ning they hear not, looking they not see." Whether a cause be or be not proceeding, whether a Counsel be or be not speaking, they "still sit fixed to hear" with a most solemn gaze of unthinking investigation; as if striving to look wise with all their might, the exertion had been so great as to send them off in a sort of half doze, or, like a sober man ashamed of being a little tipsy, using every effort to command his relaxed features, and to call up a look of uncommon thoughtfulness.—Though elbowing each other for hours, they comparatively seldom converse: a hearty joke in Chancery would be something like the coup-de-main in the Scheldt which LORD CHATHAM was to execute, and which WINDHAM so successfully ridiculed: such a thing is never heard, or if it were hazarded, the Barristers would either not be sufficiently awake to comprehend it, or would meet it only by a smile of compassionate surprise. Now and then indeed the LORD CHANCELLOR may "make a sun-shine in a shady place," by launching a pun, but the illumination is only partial; it reaches the Solicitors and the Suitors, and sets them giggling, but very rarely produces an enlivening effect upon the serious rows of wigs and gowns.

As I have said, this sombre appearance is occasioned chiefly by the nature of the business in which the Counsel in Chancery are engaged.—I recollect once hearing a lady, (for ladies are the best judges of these matters) on entering the Court for the first time, remark, "Dear me, what a set of ill-looking men they are;" and it was true of them as a whole, though of course there are exceptions: the hollow cheeks, sunken eyes, and unrefreshed complexions of many of the Barristers, sufficiently shew the unalleviated laboriousness of their occupations, particularly out of Court. Of fifty or sixty Counsel who devote themselves to the profession in Chancery, I scarcely know of more than one complete exception, and he, with a great deal of business, and necessarily a close attention to it, still preserves much of the external, if not internal, freshness of the flower whose name he bears. If MR. HART in some degree keeps up appearances in this particular, he is indebted for his swarthy complexion to his West Indian birth and originally oriental extraction. MR. BELL is corpulent, but it is less attributable to health than to sedentary employments.

With regard to the acquirements and qualifications of these two gentlemen, it seems to me that they are pretty nearly matched, excepting that the manner of MR. HART is superior to that of MR. BELL: the latter is a north-countryman, and in every way seems through life to have disdained all kind of polish or refinement: his brogue is,

I apprehend, quite as strong now as when he first left his native country; and I am not at all sure that of late it has not been of some service to him, and that, if it had been possible, it would not have been extremely impolitic in him to have corrected it. It is a common remark, that a man's enemies sometimes turn out to be his best friends, and this is the case with Mr. BELL's provincial accent: it might be an obstruction to his progress when a younger man, but of late years he has built his reputation and his fortune very much upon it; for in a Court like the Chancery, where so little depends, as I have before explained, upon externals, suitors immediately conclude that a man who is so defective in voice, manner, and pronunciation, must be an admirable Lawyer; that he will have taken great pains in one way to countervail such serious obstacles in another. There are not many men now at the Bar who recollect "honest Jack Lee" (as he was familiarly called, principally on account of his coarse straight-forward bluntness) but I am told by those who do, that he had the same northern brogue as Mr. BELL, and that he gained a great deal of his extensive practice in the same way, by obtaining a character for being a good Lawyer, because, popularly speaking, he was a bad Advocate. There is not the least doubt, however, that Mr. BELL merits much of what is attributed to him upon this score; and there is not a man who knows him, from the Barrister to the Chancellor himself, who does not look up to his opinions, particularly upon ecclesiastical matters, with the utmost respect.—"Equity (says SELDEN in his most, or rather his only, popular work) is a roguish thing: for the Law we have a measure, we know what to trust to; Equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is Equity. 'Tis all one as if they should make the standard for the measure a Chancellor's foot: what an uncertain measure would this be. One Chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot: 'tis the same thing in the Chancellor's conscience."—Most likely, Lord ELDON has this sentence, or at least this sentiment, impressed upon his mind, and it occasions the dilatoriness of which parties, Counsel, Suitors, Solicitors, and even the Judge himself, complains;—but it is not a little increased when his Lordship knows that Mr. BELL's opinion is in opposition to that which he himself has adopted. To state it however, is not such high praise to Mr. BELL as might be imagined, for he is by no means singular in this respect. There can scarcely be a greater misfortune connected with the administration of justice, than for a Chancellor (a man placing himself in a situation where he is called upon to determine, and for which by taking the office he declares himself in his own judgment competent) to have no opinion of his own, and to prefer that of the Advocate whose business it is to endeavour to mislead him.

Mr. BELL is a remarkable instance of success in spite of an absence of all those qualifications usually considered requisite in an Advocate; except industry, and a memory of peculiar retentiveness. Independent of his broad accent, he is a very hesitating speaker, and has sometimes great difficulty in making himself intelligible: it is generally said, setting diffidence aside, that what a man sees clearly he can state clearly; but I think Mr. BELL is an exception; for he has a good deal of subtlety in drawing distinctions, but is totally deficient in all facility of explaining them. He is however extremely patient and persevering, and will not object, whatever may be the wishes of his hearers, to go over the same point again and again, until he thinks he is distinctly understood.

Mr. HART is also what is termed a very sound Equity Counsel, and besides his public practice has, like Mr. BELL, a great quantity of Chamber business, or cases to be answered. He has certainly a much better voice and manner than Mr. BELL, for at least there is nothing about them that is offensive and displeasing to the ear or eye. Mr. HART, however, is a dull man—a mere plodder in old beaten tracks, where he has most merit who can remember most of the way he has gone. I do not say that he wants shrewdness, but he most assuredly wants intelligence, and on this account I do not consider him by any means a good reasoner. His chief merit, independent of his knowledge, seems to me to lie in this,—that he can state the facts of an interwoven and entangled case with tolerable perspicuity; but in this there is a great deal that is merely mechanical, and applause may as frequently be due to the Solicitor who instructs him, as to the Advocate, who perhaps only simply states the circumstances in the order in which they have been detailed in his brief. Upon this point, therefore, it is sometimes difficult to settle the quantum meruit of praise: it is but a second or perhaps a third-rate faculty at last, unless it be accompanied with that ingenious location of facts, for which the present Solicitor-General is so distinguished, and which, without more, is of itself an argument on the side of the case he supports.

Mr. HART is fluent but never forcible. I never heard him utter an eloquent sentence even by accident; all he aims at is a regular conversational mode of doing business, by which he travels over his ground quickly, and thereby renders his practice as profitable as other circumstances will allow.

AMICUS CURIAE.

[No. 19, Mr. NOLAN, and Mr. GASELEE the new King's Counsel.]

APPOINTMENT OF MR. JUSTICE ABBOTT.

"Things done well,
And with a care, exempt themselves from fear;
Things done without example, in their issue
Are to be fear'd. Have you a precedent
Of this commission? I believe, not any."

Henry 8th.

SIR,—In support of the principle which I attempted to establish in my letter of the 6th ult. on the appointment of Mr. Justice Abbott as Lord Ellenborough's successor, I might have referred to high authorities; and I am tempted to strengthen the argument by the following quotation from the celebrated Sir Wm. Jones. After observing that he would decline the acceptance of any different station from what he held, that the Legislature might offer him, he adds,—in words that deserve to be kept in everlasting remembrance,—"The character of an ambitious Judge is, in my opinion, very dangerous to public justice; and if I were a sole legislature, it should be enacted, that every Judge, as well as every Bishop, should remain fixed in the place which he first accepted." Lord Kenyon succeeded to Lord Mansfield, though there was then a Judge on the Bench of consummate talents and learning, who expected, as I have been informed, to be noticed on that occasion, and who would in all probability have been raised to the vacancy that occurred, had not the constitutional principle, for which I have contended, interposed to prevent the elevation of Mr. Justice Buller. Report says, that Lord Erskine was desirous of presiding in the Court where he formerly shone as an advocate with unrivalled splendour, but that having been Lord Chancellor, it was deemed contrary to etiquette. Is not the recent appointment contrary to etiquette, as well as the violation of a maxim, that ought to be held sacred in the distribution of forensic honours? Lord Erskine has not, that I am aware of, since he became a Peer, ever meanly truckled to men in power; but he has in many instances nobly maintained those independent principles, which have been the guide of his conduct through life. In this case, too, there would have been a saving of 4000*l.* per annum, which however ought not to be taken into consideration, if the selection of Lord Erskine for the chief Justiceship could be proved to be radically objectionable. He would not, I believe, have disgraced a situation that has been dignified by such men as Hale, Holt, and Raymond.

The object of the present letter is to point out a circumstance, that may possibly lead to the most mischievous results, and involve more important consequences than even the appointment so generally condemned. I mean,—the promotion of Mr. Justice Abbott without a Peerage. I would beg leave to suggest two possible cases:—either a title was offered and declined; or it was not offered, but held out as an object of future remuneration. In the first instance, it may be regarded as a personal affair, and prudential reasons may have operated with Mr. Justice Abbott in bar of his acceptance of the proffered dignity. Upon this supposition, the refusal would have been honourable to him; and it is incumbent on me to declare, that in what I say of Mr. Justice Abbott I have reference only to his public conduct.

"Fuit hæc sapientia quondam, Publica privatis secernere."

As a private individual, he may possess every quality that is excellent and estimable; and I am ready to confess, that I never heard of any taint on his character. But in the second instance, the most dangerous effects may be anticipated. The Judge may become the tool of the Minister, and be induced to sacrifice his integrity at the shrine of ambition. We should no longer be induced to look for the protection of our liberties to that seat, from which they have formerly been proclaimed with the voice of thunder. The purity of our Courts might be exposed to the sickening and infectious blast of a cankered influence; moral depravity might be again designated with the soft epithet of a venial offence; and we may once more witness that daring outrage of seeing a Chief Justice become a political officer, and occupy a seat in the Cabinet.

How far it is proper to hold out the prospect of a Peerage to any aspirant at the Bar may be a subject of useful inquiry. It has not been at all times considered necessary to invest a Chief Justice with this distinction, though it has been acted upon till now during the present reign. The instance before us proves, that it is not considered necessary for the Chief Justice to have a seat in the House of Lords; and why should it be? As the Judges ought to keep aloof from all party and political contentions, it would perhaps be more consonant to the strict sense of propriety, that the Chief Justice, as well as his brethren, should be merely called upon to deliver their opinions in that assembly upon any points of law, whenever required to do so. Though there have been a few brilliant examples of Lawyers in both Houses of Parliament, yet I do not think Lawyers are in general best qualified to act as Legislators; for Junius has keenly remarked, "their profession is supported by the indiscriminate defence of right and wrong; and I confess I have not that opinion of their knowledge or integrity to think it necessary that they should decide for me upon a plain constitutional question." Sir Philip Francis's opinion is still more to the point.

The recently vacant chief Justiceships were, it is said, offered to the present Attorney and Solicitor-General, and refused by both. These are rare instances of self-denial, as the temptations placed in their way were such, as few persons would have had the fortitude to resist. But I have the same objection to such vacancies being offered to the Attorney and Solicitor-General for the time being, merely from their official rank, as to the promotion of a puisne Judge to the chief seat. It is an encouragement to servility, and has often been fatal to reputation. Mallet, in his Preface to the Life of Bacon, states, that "the offices of Attorney and Solicitor-General have been rocks upon which many aspiring Lawyers have made shipwreck of their virtue and human nature." How truly was it illustrated in that wonderful man's life! He was the first Attorney-General* who was permitted to sit in the House of Commons, and with him originated the jurisdiction of the House of Lords in cases of appeal; and it is extraordinary, that the first appeal, presented and decided, was against himself for his infamous and corrupt practices. The presence of the Attorney and Solicitor-General in the House of Commons seem to be regarded as indispensable; but, as it strikes me, without reason. They thus become completely identified with the minister of the day, whatever their previous political opinions may have been, and vote with him upon all occasions, often bartering their independence for ambitious influence or mercenary aggrandisement. To enter into a discussion upon the origin and intention of their office, would be to trespass more than can reasonably be expected on the limits of your columns. Suffice it to say, that if the anecdote referred to by Amicus Curia, in his criticism upon Mr. Sergeant Lens, be true, it would appear, that on the offer of the Solicitor-Generalship to him, his becoming a Member of the House of Commons would have been dispensed with, provided he would merely give his advice. Honestum prætulit utili. It was creditable however to those who made the proposal, and shows that it is not essential for a Law Officer of the Crown to take any part in the duties of St. Stephen's Chapel. I had hoped indeed that no paltry impulse of chagrin or disappointment would have debarred them from paying that just tribute to sterling worth, by appointing Mr. Sergeant Lens to the vacancy created by Lord Ellenborough's retirement. Such a conduct would have absolved them from any imputation of political dishonesty, and so far as relates to the pure administration of the law, would have secured to them the approbation of the Bar, and honoured them with the applauses of the public.

It ought not to be inferred, from any observations which I have made, that I am inimical to the profession of the Law. The profession is an honourable one, and merits every encouragement; the practice of it is dishonourable, and merits the reprobation of every liberal mind. Bentham was too conscientious to make it the business of his life, (and happily for the world that he did not) though no man ever stood a better chance of gaining its highest rewards. Others that I could mention, one in particular "of the greatest promise, that ever came into note," have relinquished it from disgust, and an abhorrence of the dirty tricks to which it would have exposed them. "Bishop Burnet relates of the father of Sir Matthew Hale, that he had such strictness of conscience as to lay down his profession, because he disapproved of the common mode of giving colour in pleadings, which he thought a culpable deviation from truth. It is recorded also of Sir Matthew Hale himself, that whenever he was convinced of the injustice of any cause, he would engage no farther in it, than to explain to his client the grounds of that conviction."†—As to the independence of Lawyers, I fear it is now but little more than the mere shadow of a name. With two or three exceptions, they dare not resist the authority of the Bench.—Erskine, in his day, was the intrepid defender of the people's rights. He despised the frowns of the Court, and has left an example that is in every way worthy of imitation. Brougham is almost the only one, at present, to whom I can compare him, and on one particular occasion, Rex. v. Houston, he evinced a spirit most creditable to him, both as an advocate and a man, and that seemed to set at defiance the haughty and domineering manners of the late Chief Justice. In truth, so servile has been the practice of this particular Court, that there is scarcely a chance of a man's gaining a verdict in case of prosecution for an imputed libel, however innocent his intentions and pure his motives, unless he has the courage to defend his own cause; and the most memorable instance of this kind perhaps that ever occurred, was the recent one of Hone's trial.

We speculate, and very justly, upon the probable consequences of a reform in our House of Commons; whether feasible or not is foreign to my purpose, but I am anxious also for a reform in our Courts of Law. It is considered almost high treason to question the integrity of the Judges, or to doubt the honourable character of the Bar. I am not the indiscriminate eulogist of either, though ready at all times to bear my tribute of applause to genuine merit, whenever I find it. And when I again see a Holt, (as in the Aylesbury case) threatening to commit the Speaker and some Members of the House of Commons, if they did not immediately retire, when they went to the Court of King's Bench in order to deter that noble Judge from proceeding;—or an Erskine, advocating the cause of the persecuted, (as in the case of the Dean of St. Asaph) I will no longer ask, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?"

REPLY TO AN ARTICLE ON SUICIDE.

MR. EXAMINER.—The letter on Suicide inserted in the Examiner, of Oct. 18, appearing to me unsound in argument and mischievous in its tendency, I addressed some remarks on it to you, but an accident having prevented this reaching you, I should perhaps not have troubled you, had not my attention been again called to the subject by a Correspondent, in your last number, characterizing the letter as unanswerable.

As Suicide is by much the most frequent species of murder, and, in the greater number of instances, it is likely that the persons perpetrating it fancy that they have a right to commit the act, the question involves interests of great importance to society.

The writer alluded to argues, that Suicide is one of the rights or privileges of man—a right to be exercised indeed with prudence and deliberation, but capable of this association—a right which no law, if the "creature of an enlightened and unprejudiced mind," would interfere with; for although persons who feel an inclination to kill themselves "should be as holy as severe" (which is a very strict measure certainly, for the severity is extreme) yet "as the course of nature has committed to them the momentous power," the right follows as a matter of course; and this writer's opinion: but whether he is considering it as a "legislator, a moralist, or a lover of mankind," I am at a loss to determine.

As no case is stated in which this valuable privilege may be prudently exercised, but the extreme one, of being condemned to die by the most horrible torments, the selection is left to the "deep reflection" of those who may be in a situation to need this writer's advice; but if that should not be effectual to deter from Suicide in all cases, it need not be wondered at, "for he writes, he says, for those who live, and not for those who die."

As it is my wish to write for those who may be in danger of the most bitter death, I will endeavour to shew that this writer founds his conclusion on three false assumptions, viz.

That man has a right over his own existence.

That God has not forbidden self-murder.

And that man can destroy himself without injury to his fellow-creature.

I deny that man has a right over his own existence, unless he be self-existent: if it be derived, he must hold it subject to the conditions on which it is imparted, and if it be true that "self-preservation is the first law of nature," then deliberate self-destruction must be its most criminal violation.

I assert that God has forbidden self-murder, when He says, "Thou shalt do no murder." It is the Creator speaking to his creature; and if man's blood be shed, the law is equally violated (unless a Divine warrant can be produced for the act, as in the punishment for murder) by whomsoever the deed be done.

I assert, in the third place, that no man, without having first violated all his duties in society, can destroy himself without injury to others—if he have a right then, it must be a right founded in wrong. The most miserable Suicide needed only to have believed, that he might live to repair the wrongs he may have done to his family or to society, and he must have allowed he could have no right to destroy himself.

I am much surprized that a man should think it worth while to tell his fellow-creatures, that they have a right which they are sure never to exercise whilst calm and unbiassed, yet which they never must exercise in any other case. It surprises me much, that a man who should think himself capable of viewing the question as "a legislator, a moralist, and a lover of mankind," should think it expedient to assert a general right to do that which, he must know, in 999 cases out of 1000, is done under the influence of over-wrought feeling and passion. He would be a bad legislator who is ignorant that laws are meant to advance the happiness of individuals. He must be a bad moralist who inculcates, that a man's obligation to continue in a situation where alone it is possible he should perform his duties, can be question of feeling. He, like some pretended lovers of womankind, will betray them to their ruin, whom he shall persuade to cherish the right of Suicide among the privileges of their nature. No, Sir, it is a foul, unnatural crime; its victims are only the subject of pity, from the total and irretrievable ruin with which they are overwhelmed. To teach that it is venial, is to encourage the practice; to impress that it is criminal, is to close the little breach through which the desolating torrent first issues. Think of the agonized families of Whitbread, of Romilly, and of the thousands who, in the interval between their murders, have claimed the fatal right, and you will deprecate the extension of its practical exercise: beware then, lest you scatter abroad firebrands and death, meaning only to agitate an abstract question.

MORE EXECUTIONS FOR FORGERY.

Tuesday morning, at five o'clock, the usual apparatus, preparatory to the execution of criminals, was moved to the front of the Debtor's-door of Newgate. From this moment to the time of execution the crowd increased till the Old Bailey and all the avenues to it were completely filled. At half-past seven the Sheriffs entered the inner-yard, when the prisoners, Driscoll, Weller, Williams, and Cashman, had their irons knocked off. At eight o'clock the bell tolled as usual, and the prisoners were brought out.

A Quaker lady (Mrs. Ripley), had been admitted to the prisoners, and had taken much pains to give them religious instruction; she was with them again by six o'clock on Tuesday morning, by their own desire. Driscoll was the first who mounted the platform, which he did in a most hurried manner, and with great agitation. Having ascended it, he gazed wildly around upon the spectators, and once or twice pushed his cap from his mouth. Weller was the next ushered to the scaffold, and he exhibited a considerable portion of firmness. Williams followed. Cashman, alias Emanuel, followed; he was a Jew, and by the tenets of the Mosaic religion was not permitted to sleep during the night; he was attended by a priest of his own persuasion, and Mrs. Ripley, who manifested great anxiety for his future state. She accompanied him even to the scaffold, but there her feelings overcame her, and she burst into tears. The priest who attended him furnished the executioner with a peculiar kind of cap, which was substituted for the ordinary one used upon such occasions. By a quarter-past eight, all the malefactors were arranged, Driscoll labouring under great emotion and agitation. The Mosaic Priest, the Rev. Mr. Devereux, and the Rev. Mr. Cotton, continued for a few minutes addressing prayers to the delinquents, when Mr. Cotton gave the signal, and thus they were launched into eternity.—Immediately upon the unfortunate culprits being launched off, some of the populace vociferated—“Shame! shame! Murder! murder!!!—After hanging the usual time, their bodies were cut down, and given over to their friends for interment.—The Rabbits who attended Cashman were permitted to cut him down. They took away the rope along with the body. Shortly after, a great crowd of Irish, men, women, and children, applied for the body of Driscoll, which they bore away with the usual custom of howling. The bodies of the other two were taken into the prison, to be delivered to their friends.

Weller was a mere youth of 20 years of age. Williams was only 20 years of age, a Welch youth. Driscoll has left a wife and five young children. He was a plasterer's labourer, brought up in great ignorance, and unable even to read. He said he was led to the commission of the crime for which he suffered, by the persuasion of others: but he could not be induced to communicate the names of his confederates.—Cashman had been discharged from the hulks, where he had been confined for previous offences.—Weller was the son of respectable parents, who had paid every attention to his education: but associating with bad companions, he was early initiated into their vices.—Williams was a shoemaker, and had been convicted on two separate indictments of having robbed several houses at Enfield. Driscoll was tried on the 14th of September; but he had previously pleaded guilty before the Common-Sergeant, who, after much trouble, prevailed upon him to retract that plea. The chief circumstances against him were these:—On the 11th of July he went to the shop of Mr. Sporston, and purchased a quantity of of velveteen, in payment of which he tendered a 5*l.* note, which afterwards turned out to be forged; he gave a fictitious address. He also uttered another forged 5*l.* note to a publican, and at his lodgings in Lamb's-court, Whitecross-street, a rolling-pin was found, the top of which screwed off, and in the inside of it were found five other 5*l.* notes of a similar description.—Weller and Cashman were tried before Mr. Justice Burrough, and the brief circumstances against them were these:—A woman, named Fears, obtained an introduction to them, and, after a deal of caution, succeeded in purchasing ten 1*l.* notes of them, at 7*s.* 6*d.* each. It is worthy of notice, that the Bank had a body of guards down, especially for this occasion, lest any disturbance might have been occasioned by the people after the execution of Cashman, Weller, and Driscoll. Within the walls of Newgate preparations had also been made to resist any attack which might have been made by the mob. For this purpose 50 or 60 constables had been expressly employed; and if any attack had been made, the populace would have been foiled in their attempt.—We have good authority (says the Times) for stating that the petition purporting to be signed by Cashman, Weller, and Driscoll, inserted in the Observer paper, and copied into the Times of Monday, was never even seen, much less signed, by these unfortunate individuals. On the day previous to the insertion of this petition in the Observer, it was sent to Mr. Brown, keeper of Newgate, enclosed in an anonymous letter, requesting him to get it signed by these three men. Mr. Brown did not even show the petition to them, but immediately transmitted it to Mr. Capper, of the Secretary of State's Office. The next day, however, to his surprise, he saw this very petition in print, signed with the names of Cashman, Weller, and Driscoll. The petition therefore was so far a fabrication that the very men who purported to sign it did not even know of its existence.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Friday, Dec. 18.

WALDEGRAVE V. BIGNOLD.—(LIBEL).

Mr. Serjeant LENS said, the assignees of Mr. Waldegrave had brought an action against Mr. Bignold, as Secretary of the Norwich Union Fire-Office, and recovered the sum estimated to have been lost. Mr. Bignold afterwards published, in the shape of hand-bills, remarks upon that trial. His “Summary,” subjoined to his remarks, was the libel which formed the ground of this action: “It should be remembered, that Mr. Waldegrave was insolvent. The fire happened on Saturday night. All suspicious fires occur on Saturday night or the next (Sunday). No cause has appeared for this fire.” They could not doubt for a moment, that the object of these observations was to fix upon the plaintiff the imputation of having wilfully set fire to his premises. This was as false as it was malignant; it was sufficient, in order to shew this, to refer to the verdict of the Jury.

—Bignold, defendant's son, said his father had been Secretary to the Institution for 20 years. Hesitating to say whether his yearly income was 4 or 5000*l.* or whether his last year's income was not 6000*l.*, he was asked if he was not a man of considerable property, and answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Serjeant Copley attempted to show, that the sole object of the publication was, not to calumniate or injure the plaintiff, but to justify Mr. Bignold for having defended Waldegrave's action.

CHIEF-JUSTICE.—I am of opinion, that the object manifestly is to impute the fire to the plaintiff. But I lament that a son, on bad terms with his father, should ever be brought into a Court of justice to prove the property of his father, for the purpose of obtaining heavy damages. Any one who brought him in this case has done ill. If he came of his own accord, it is to be deplored indeed.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 500*l.*

OLD BAILEY.

On Monday, Richard Broderick was put to the Bar: he was one of several prisoners who had pleaded guilty of having forged Bank Notes in his possession; but it seems some of them had been induced to withdraw such plea, in order to stand their trials for the heavier crime. When the Prisoner therefore was brought up, he was particularly questioned by the Judge as to his present determination; and after many questions (for the poor creature seemed scarcely to understand a word that was addressed to him) he distinctly expressed his desire not to be tried, but to plead guilty to the minor charge, which is punished by transportation.

Wm. Jones was then put to the bar;—he also pleaded guilty to the minor offence, but had withdrawn such plea, and now pleaded not guilty.—After a speech from Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET, in which he insisted much on the humanity of the Bank proceedings, evidence was adduced. It was proved that the prisoner, when he paid away the one-pound forged note, gave a false address to the tradesman, and he was detained in consequence; but he forced his way out of the shop, and struck Mr. Hanks. He was however secured.—Mr. John Lees, the Bank Inspector, said the note was a forgery in every respect: the paper was not that used by the Bank; the water-mark was not, as that of the Bank, put in when the paper was made; the line which should be stereotyped, was engraved; and the name signed was a forgery.—[A Jurymen asked Mr. Lees, whether he had ever known an Inspector so deceived as to have taken a forged for a genuine note?—Mr. Lees answered, that he had once; but the note was old and quite worn.]—Mr. Tabor, a Signing Clerk, deposed, that the name on the note, purporting to be his, had not been written by him. This witness said, he signed a thousand and upwards a-day.—[There are 30 Signing Clerks, we learn—and they sign among them, we are also told, about 50,000 notes a-day.]—The Prisoner made no defence: the Judge (Woon) summed up, observing, that if all this was not proof of forgery, than there was no such thing as proof; and that the Jury were bound by their oath to convict the prisoner, provided they believed the evidence.—The Jury returned a verdict of Guilty.

Wm. Davis, who had wished to retract his former plea of guilty of the minor offence, was put to the bar, from which however he was removed on his expressing his wish to be allowed so to plead.

Wm. Clacker was then arraigned, for having passed forged notes, knowing them to be forged.—It was proved that the prisoner had gone to three several places, and at each of these he passed off a 1*l.* note, for which he got change, after deducting the price of the small articles he had purchased. In each of those places he gave a different name and address, and told a variety of stories, which it was impossible could be all true, as they were utterly at variance with each other.—Mr. Lees proved the notes to be forgeries by the same kind of evidence which he gave on the first trial.—This witness was examined by a Juror (Mr. I. E. Miller.) He was asked, “Is it not possible for a note to be so dirty and worn as to lose all those characteristics by which a good note may be distinguished from a bad one, and may not those marks be effaced by a chymical process?—Witness. I cannot answer as to a possibility.—The Juror observed, that he was induced to ask the question from the tattered and worn appearance of one of the notes. He knew that tradesmen were often quite at a loss to discover a good from a bad note, by its being in the state of the note then before the Court.—Mr. Lees, in answer to some questions from the Court, stated, that the note in his hand was not so worn or defaced as to leave any doubt.

his mind of its being a forged one. He had never seen any note so much worn as not to have those marks visible by which its being good or bad could be ascertained.

The Prisoner, who stood with much apparent indifference during the whole trial, being called upon for his defence, said, "My Lord, I have nothing at all to say: those people who have sworn against me have sworn as false as God is true; I shall therefore throw myself upon the mercy of the Court."—Mr. Justice HOLROYD observed, that from the decision the Jury had already given, he had no doubt they would, whatever might be their opinion as to the policy of the law and the punishment, decide only by the evidence.—The Jury immediately returned a verdict of—Guilty.

Wm. Sutton, John Morris, James Mullens, and Henry Townsend (the last only 17 years old) were then severally put to the bar, and all begged to be allowed to put in their first plea of guilty to the minor offence. This was admitted, and they were then acquitted of the capital part.

On Wednesday, John Kingston was charged with having uttered forged Bank-notes knowing them to be so.—The proof was clear.—The Bank Inspector was again closely questioned by the Jury. He said he had been once deceived in a forged note, and but one. Many forged Bank-notes had been paid in at the Bank in the last year, but he could not tell precisely the number; but certainly the Bank Clerks had been deceived, generally from negligence.—Mr. Baron Wood—"It is only from negligence then?"—"I believe so. It is a rule in the Bank that any Inspector who passes a forged note is obliged to pay the value of it."—He had no difficulty in distinguishing between the notes now presented. The following questions were then put to the witness by the Jury:—"I wish to put a question to you, to which no answer was given on Monday. Has an instance ever occurred where a genuine note has been rejected as a forgery?"—"An instance has occurred."—"And suffered to stand as a forgery?"—"Yes."—"When?"—"A recent instance of a very old tattered note has occurred, having been passed by a young Inspector. The note was pasted at the back with little pieces of paper. It was actually a genuine note, although considered as a forgery."—"Have you any private marks besides those described?"—"Yes, we have."—One of the Jurymen then said, "After the scene of yesterday, (alluding, we suppose, to the execution of the three unfortunate men for forgery,) the feelings of the Jury are very great; and where the life of a fellow-creature is at stake, we think the fullest evidence ought to be given."—Mr. Baron Wood—"Gentlemen, you have had the fullest evidence in this case, more full than in any other case."—The prisoner said nothing in his defence, nor were any witnesses called to his character.—The Jury brought in a verdict—Guilty.

Jeremiah Heffert was next put to the bar, charged with having in his possession a forged 1*l*. note, knowing it to be forged.—The prisoner was proved to have attempted to pass forged notes at various places.—Mr. Lees proved the notes to be a forgery, in a similar manner as in the last case; and the signing clerk proved that the signature was not his hand-writing.—A verdict of Guilty was pronounced by the Jury.

Wm. King was next indicted for having in his possession a forged 1*l*. note, knowing it to be forged.—The Jury found a verdict—Guilty.

Mr. Sergeant BOSANQUET congratulated the Jury that this was the last case of this nature which they had to try.

Thomas Daniels, a clergyman, who graduated at Cambridge, of very respectable appearance, and about 32 years of age, was indicted for picking the pocket of a coachmaker, in Bridge-street, during the procession on Lord Mayor's day.—The prosecutor felt a push at his pocket as he walked along with the crowd, and was immediately after asked by a gentleman whether he had lost any thing; on putting his hand to one of his pockets he missed his snuff-box. An officer who had watched the prisoner pointed at him as the thief. The prosecutor took hold of him, and told him to give up the snuff-box, but the prisoner denied that he had it. The prosecutor persisted in his demand, on which the prisoner presented it to him, saying that one of the crowd had just put it into his hand. The officer took the prisoner into custody, and brought him before the Magistrate at Guildhall, when a confession of the theft was made, and distress pleaded in excuse.—On the prosecutor's cross-examination, he said he had ascertained that the prisoner was what he had described himself to be.—The officer who apprehended him stated, that on searching him he found four different handkerchiefs, a 1*l*. Bank of England note, three good shillings, and a counterfeit shilling. No witnesses appeared to give him a character.—The Jury found him Guilty.—The COMMON SERGEANT said the crime was greatly aggravated when the situation the prisoner held in life was considered. "Religion, morality, and law," said he, "demand that the most severe punishment that can be inflicted for this offence shall be dealt to you. You have rendered yourself unfit ever to mix in society again, and it is necessary to send you out of the country for ever."

The prisoner was sentenced to be transported for life.

At eight o'clock the whole of the trials having been gone through, the Session closed. Sentence of death was passed upon the following 18 prisoners:—John Pidgeon, Thomas Pearks, Robert Parsons, John Corderoy, George Wood, William Mattingley, James Egerton, Richard Evans, George Balfour, Joseph Mason, Sarah Thwaites, William Baldock, Robert Thrower, George William Handy, John Moon, William Smith, John Fellows, and Robert Budham.—William Williams was sentenced to transportation for life.—John Kingston, Jeremiah Heffert, and William King, convicted of having forged notes in their possession, were sentenced to 14 years transportation. Kingston, upon being taken from the dock, said that he hoped to obtain justice in the country where he was going, as he could get none here. This was addressed to the Recorder; but Heffert interrupted the prisoner, saying, "Oh, hold your tongue; it is no use talking to him."—Ralph Cooper was sentenced to seven years' transportation. The Sessions adjourned until the 13th January.

POLICE.

UNION-HALL.

Mrs. Jones, residing in Lambeth-walk, applied on Monday to the Magistrate for advice under the following circumstances. She stated, that she had a niece of great personal attractions and attainments in music, named Elizabeth Henrietta Aubrey; her age 13 years. About July last, she was induced, by the persuasions of a person named Borthwick, who at that time resided in Village-house, Kentish-town, and who represented himself as a professor of music, to article the young lady to him for seven years, upon the understanding that he was to provide her with board and lodging, perfect her in music and dancing, and, at the expiration of the term, she was to be brought forward in public, and the emoluments of her performance were to be divided between the teacher and her friends. An agreement was drawn up, and signed by both parties; and it was afterwards discovered, that Mr. Borthwick had no pupils as a teacher of music; and that his respectability did not answer the expectation of Mr. Jones. He left his residence at Kentish-town, and went to various parts of the country as an itinerant exhibitor of the young lady's accomplishments. He had not performed that part of his agreement for providing board to his pupil, but had sent in an account to Mrs. Jones for her subsistence, and arrested her for the amount. His ultimate designs upon the young lady were of an improper nature, as appeared from an intercepted letter from his brother, in Scotland, in which were the following words:—"I shall be from here, and shall be in Edinburgh the 1st of October. You said that you had a beautiful young lady, but you would say nothing more till you saw me. You may let me know what she is; if she has plenty of money, and may be easily caught. I should not mind paying you a visit, if that is the case, before I get to Edinburgh. You know I am pretty successful in captivating the young ladies." The letter was dated from Kirkcudbright, and was addressed to Mr. Borthwick, at Village-house, Kentish-town. Within a few days he had been traced, with Miss Aubrey, to a house in King-street, near the King's Bench Prison, and the Magistrate was requested to point out what measures could be adopted for the purpose of recovering the girl, and rescuing her from her disreputable mode of living.—The Magistrate directed that a summons should be issued, requiring the appearance of Mr. Borthwick, and the production of the young lady. An officer was despatched to King-street, accompanied by a friend of Mrs. Jones's, with directions to bring Miss Aubrey, and serve the summons upon Mr. Borthwick. Upon application at the house, he was informed that Mr. Borthwick and the young female in question had been there last week; they did not reside there, nor did she know to what place they were gone. The Magistrate regretted that his efforts had not been attended with success, and expressed his readiness to render every service in his power.

On Tuesday, Mr. Setree, of John-street, Bedford-row, solicitor, applied to the Magistrates, and complained of the statement made by Mrs. Jones. The whole recital of that lady, he said, was an infamous fabrication, for the worst of purposes. Mr. Borthwick was a person of great respectability as a dancing-master, and was patronized by numerous families of distinction: was desirous of producing Miss Aubrey before the Magistrates, and of submitting the whole affair to their investigation. The young lady was a prodigy of excellence in particular accomplishments, and would, when brought before the public, excite universal astonishment. She had declared herself contented and happy under the guardianship and tuition of Mr. Borthwick, and had expressed her determination to die rather than return under the protection of her aunt. The Magistrate appointed a day for the young lady in question to be produced, and for all parties concerned to attend. Mr. Setree acquiesced in this arrangement.

On Friday, Mr. Borthwick attended with Miss E. H. Aubrey, to answer the complaint of Mrs. Jones. The Magistrate said, that an agreement had been exhibited to him: that agreement being unstamped, could not be considered a sufficient authority for the retention of Miss Aubrey: the parents being deceased, the next relation, Mrs. Jones, ought to be considered as the natural guardian of the young lady.—Mr. Setree contended for Mr. Borthwick that it was a case in which the Magistrate had no jurisdiction. His client had saved the young lady from ruin and vice, for Mrs. Jones had made an attempt to place her in a house of ill-fame.—An exclamation of horror and indignation burst from Mrs. Jones at this moment.—The Magistrate proposed that Mr. Borthwick's solicitor should give the solicitor for Mrs. Jones, a written undertaking for the production of Miss Aubrey in another court: to this Mr. Borthwick agreed; but upon being asked for his address, he declined giving it, notwithstanding the pressing solicitations of the Magistrate.—A Gentleman then stepped forward and stated, that his name was Cooper, and that he was agent to the Dundee brewery. It was within his knowledge, he said, that Mr. Borthwick some time ago left his three children chargeable to the parish of Pancras. Hearing that he was coming before the Magistrate, he had attended for the purpose of demanding 34*l.* and upwards due to the concern to which he was agent from Mr. Borthwick. A female then came forward, and demanded of Mr. Borthwick payment of her wages. A butcher also put in his claim for payment of 5*l.* 11*s.*—They required Mr. Borthwick to mention his place of residence, but he refused.—The Magistrate declined further interference respecting Miss Aubrey, and recommended that an Habeas Corpus should be procured for her production in a superior Court.

Mr. Frederick William Saunders, of the 7th Regiment of Dragoons, applied on Tuesday to the sitting Magistrate, and requested that he would assist him in regaining possession of a young lady whom he had married, but who was then detained by her friends, and was by their means deprived of the happiness and comfort which had been by him and herself anticipated from the matrimonial state. He further stated, that the marriage took place in a clandestine manner, at a church in the city, about five years ago; that he went to North America with his regiment two days afterwards, and subsequently to France, from whence he had lately returned. He had demanded his wife from her relations, who were persons of great respectability at Camberwell, without success. She was entitled to considerable property; but it was not her fortune that he was desirous of obtaining, herself alone was his object. He had applied for advice to a Proctor, who recommended him to obtain a Magistrate's warrant. The Magistrate informed the applicant, that he had no jurisdiction in this case, and consequently could render him no assistance. He retired apparently much disappointed.

HATTON-GARDEN.

CHILD-DROPPING.—On Tuesday evening, a fine male child, apparently not a week old, was found in an old basket, having on a shirt, and wrapped up in a piece of blanket, lying at the door of Mrs. James, Tash-street, Gray's-Inn-lane. The poor child was nearly dead from the cold; it was taken in doors, and after it was warmed and fed, it was carried to the work-house, in Little Gray's-Inn-lane. On Thursday the parish officers attended at Hatton-Garden, where a private examination took place. It appears that a young lady in the neighbourhood was delivered of the child on Saturday week; it was shortly after taken away by the midwife to nurse to a poor woman in Clerkenwell, where it remained until Tuesday afternoon, when the midwife went to the nurse for the child, telling her the lady wished to see it before she let it go to the country. The midwife carried away the child, and the same evening the child was found as above described. The nurse, hearing of the circumstance, was induced to go to the work-house, when she immediately identified the child. She knew it by having a particular mark, and it having on the same shirt, but all the rest of the baby clothes were changed for the worse. She then gave information. Two other women, who saw the child at nurse, proved the same. The midwife was closely examined, when to exonerate herself from the charge, she was compelled to disclose the young lady's name, who is the real mother of the child, and whose family are said to be of the greatest respectability.—A warrant was granted to take the mother of the child into custody. She has not yet been found.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MURDER AT HORNSEY.—An inquisition was taken on Tuesday, at the Hornsey Wood-house, on the body of John Thomas Taylor, a medical gentleman, who was stopped on Thursday night, on the iron bridge of the New River, by some villains, robbed, murdered, and thrown into the river.—The Jury took a view of the body; there appeared violent marks of strangulation about his neck; a knife was in his waistcoat pocket, and a gold ring upon his finger, which the diabolical villains, who murdered him, in their hurry, did not take from him.—Mr. Thomas Thorpe, of Red Lion-street, Clerkenwell, deposed:—I was a particular friend of the deceased's: he was at my house on Tuesday in good health and spirits. His brother called on Friday upon me, and inquired if I had any knowledge of where his brother might be found, as he had not been home since the preceding morning. The witness then related his calling on Mrs. Pearce, and on the landlady of the Jolly Butchers at Wood-green, who gave him such information as induced him to pursue his inquiries towards Hornsey. The first information we gained was, that cries of murder had been heard near West-green on Thursday night, and we were told if we would go to the Black Boy we might obtain more particulars upon the subject. We proceeded there, and found that there had been an alarm in consequence of cries of murder about ten o'clock on Thursday evening; and that three men had entered into a house, with intention to rob it, but the family not being in bed, gave an alarm, and the robbers decamped. We then made for the wood; we traced some footsteps at the foot of the bridge, for an hundred yards, which the brother of the deceased said were much like his brother's; at the centre of the bridge we lost the trace of the footsteps, and we suspected that he had been murdered there, and thrown into the river. Mr. Taylor's suspicions were considerably excited by the marks of the boots being straight, and not right and left, as are more usually worn, because his unfortunate brother had on, when he left his home, boots of that description. We were informed that a hat had been found at the Sluice, and we found it to be the hat of the deceased. We immediately employed persons to drag the river, and the body was found. The body appeared to have been in the water several days. The watch which the deceased always carried about him was not in his fob; and there was no money about the deceased's person, and he never went out without taking money with him; his pockets were turned out; and there were appearances of strangulation and a black mark on the side of the neck. I know the deceased had a watch with gold chain and seals when he left home; he was a very high spirited young man, and from what I know of him, he would not tamely submit to be robbed; he had a practice of twisting his watch pocket after he put his watch in it, and I have frequently heard him say, that he would defy any thief to rob him, for if they took his watch, they must also take his pocket. I am of opinion that the villains who murdered the deceased, unbuttoned the flap of his small clothes for the purpose of untwisting the fob pocket and taking the watch. In his pockets remained the following trifling articles:—A watch-key, Akenside's poetical works, pair of gloves, silk handkerchief, penknife, a stick of black sealing-wax. The body was carried to Hornsey-wood House. An umbrella which the deceased had with him on Thursday night was found on the iron bridge, which was torn recently, from its appearance. From the deep marks on the bank where the body was found, I am convinced that he made great resistance; some of the heel-marks are several inches in depth in the ground.—Mrs. Sarah Wilson sworn—I keep the Jolly Butchers, at Wood-green, Tottenham. I knew the deceased before he came to my house on last Thursday evening; I invited him into the bar, as he was acquainted with my son; I asked him to tea, and he sat in my bar until between 10 and 11 o'clock at night; he had three small glasses of brandy and water; he did not drink half the liquor himself. The deceased had a watch in his pocket and some money. When the deceased first came into the bar he inquired if a gentleman had been waiting for him: when he set off from our house it was a fine bright moonlight night: he had me good night, and was in excellent spirits when he parted.—Mr. Thomas Evans, Old-street, surgeon, stated—I knew the deceased about five or six years; we were fellow pupils at the Finsbury Dispensary; I have not seen him for near a fortnight, and then he was in good health and spirits, and I am satisfied that he was not under any kind of distress or derangement of mind; nor do I believe that he would have put an end to his existence. I saw the body of the deceased, and in my opinion he was undoubtedly strangled previous to his being thrown into the water.—Mr. Richard Henry Major, surgeon—I saw the body this day, and my opinion is precisely the same as Mr. Evans's; that he was strangled cannot admit of a doubt, and he must have been nearly dead before he was thrown into the water.—The CORONER said that he had hopes, when the investigation commenced, that the death of the unfortunate young gentleman was produced by accident; but after the evidence which had been received, he was sorry to say that there was proof adduced that the deceased came to his death by the violent hands of murderers.—The Jury instantly returned the following verdict:—Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown, the deceased having been, in our opinion, strangled, robbed, and thrown into the New River.—A large reward has been offered for the discovery of the murderers. The deceased was the son of Mr. Taylor, the surgeon, of Goswell-street.

An inquisition was taken on Wednesday, at St. Giles's Workhouse, on the body of Richard Wilford, who was found dead under the following circumstances:—The deceased rented a back garret in St. Giles's, and lately had been in great distress; his wife had been admitted into the workhouse, and he was offered an asylum there if he chose to accept it; he thought proper to decline it, preferring to suffer great privations at home to what he termed imprisonment. He lay upon nothing but straw. Monday week was the last time the deceased was seen alive; in the evening he lighted a bit of candle in the apartment of a lodger; he then remarked that his distresses were so great, he thought he was not long for this world. The lodgers were surprised during the whole of last week, that the deceased had not been seen as usual going to and from his wretched dwelling. On Monday his wife went to see what had become of her husband, who had not called to see her as usual. The deceased's room was broken open, and he was found dead in bed. He must have been dead near a week.—The Jury returned a verdict—Died by the visitation of God.

Tuesday evening some persons were alarmed on passing through Essex-street, Mile-end, by hearing the cry of "fire," which continued for a length of time: at length a woman who occupies an apartment in that street, on looking through the window, saw a mass of flames in an opposite room. She ran, and informed the people of it, and went up stairs. On opening the door found an elderly lady, who was by herself, sitting in an arm chair by the fire all in a blaze. Several pails of water were thrown over her, and the flames were soon extinguished. It appeared that her husband had just gone out, and she being feeble, when her clothes caught fire, she was unable to move, and remained in that dreadful situation till assistance arrived, by which time some parts of her body were burned nearly to a cinder.—She was taken to the London Hospital, where she died in the greatest agony soon after.

Thursday morning, a young female, of genteel address and appearance, was found at five o'clock sitting under a hedge on the Deptford-road, in a senseless state, almost frozen to death. Pearse, the man who found her, carried her to the Turk's Head, where by the humane exertions of the landlord she was, after a considerable time, restored to sense and animation. She gave no other answer to the numerous questions which were asked her, than that she came to town about Friday week, that she had been treated unkindly by her friends, and that her mind was greatly distressed. She declined stating her name, or the residence of any of her friends, or from what cause her distressed feelings arose. She refused all sustenance, and when taken before a Magistrate persisted in her silence, and at last went away without communicating any further particulars respecting her situation.

A few evenings back, about six o'clock, a male child, about six weeks old, was left exposed at the door of Islington workhouse. It was dressed in an old cambric frock, flannel petticoat, cambric cap, and wrapped in an old blanket. It was conveyed to the workhouse.

J. Urmston, charged with the wilful murder of Mary, his wife, at West Derby, and II. Moncrieffe, charged with having violated the person of Anne Helme, near Lancaster, have been committed to Lancaster-castle.

A melancholy event took place in the neighbourhood of Kelso on Tuesday se'night. As a servant of Mr. Walker was returning from the river Tweed, with a cart and horse, the horse (it being moon-light) was scared by some object and overturned the cart upon the man's legs; and severely injured him. After calling repeatedly, he was at length heard by the people at Crows Point, who rescued him, considerably bruised, from his perilous situation.—Being unable, however, to raise the horse and cart without help, a boy was sent to beg the assistance of a person driving a cart on the turnpike road towards Kelso. The unfortunate man, whose aid they solicited, was James Dryden, a rag-gatherer, and the animal he drove being young and spirited, started at the upset horse and cart, and springing upon the foot-path, overturned that which it drew upon its unfortunate owner, and instantaneously killed him on the spot. Dryden has left a family to lament his loss.

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 559.

ALLIANCE CONCLUDED AT CONGRESS.

(Finished from the week before last.)

The truth is, the world will continue to advance in political improvement, whether the Allied Sovereigns wish to let it or not. If the Emperor ALEXANDER, or any other, has sense enough to go along with, and attempt to lead it, well and good;—so much the better for him;—if not, it will do without him. At present these gentlemen happen to be in the front. It is the mere chance of their fortunes; and they have not known how to take any real, lasting, and wise advantage of their situation. The world assembled behind them sees this, though they unluckily fancy themselves wiser than the world. If they do not find it out themselves, the world will perhaps not take any sudden notice of them; but it will continue to speculate upon the best road in advance, and will go on quickly at last, hurrying it's would-be leaders among it's ranky out of mere laughing indifference.

A sovereign, if ever he gets into a meditative posture, has only to look at his own knee-pans, to learn this. His very clothes, which he has in common with every decent gentleman, will inform him. External distinction in ranks has almost vanished; and it has long been a joking apothegm, that even majesty is a jest but for externals. Kings are the last people who should endeavour to shew the folly of this saying by defying it. Their symbols contain so much of their strength, that they can no more afford to do without them, than beauty without it's skin. When kings were in the habit of wearing crowns, or some other great distinction of dress, they carried magic circles about them, that made a difference betwixt them and every body else. They were kings emphatically, as angels are only angels when they have wings. Clip the wing, and the angel is a treader of earth. Take away the crown and the habitual idea of it, and the king is a common man. Nothing can compensate for the deficiency, but the power of having people's heads cut off at a moment's notice, as it did for some time. The King of Prussia, for instance, in a coat, waistcoat, and breeches, such as a common gentleman wears, is no better than a common gentleman. People look for something else in him;—some great qualities, or some striking look in his countenance: that is to say, before they can admire him, they look for the same things which they expect in any other man who puts himself forward; and not finding them, something attaches to him of the grave ridiculous. Kings have unconsciously found out this tendency in our times, which in fact is the natural consequence of the growth of knowledge; and not very well knowing how to resume their old external mystifications, they have rashly undertaken to go into the extreme of plainness, or rather to vapour themselves on dresses merely like gentlemen. But they cannot afford it. What is the natural reasoning they set us upon? It is this;—“If you are no more than gentlemen, why do you pretend to be what you ought not in other matters? Why not be altogether like the President of the United States?” And we may be sure, this is a very common question at this moment all over Europe,—aye, Prussia with all her barracks not excepted. Kings have lost and will never recover themselves, because there is nothing substantial in their pretensions over the many; and because while they affect to be one of the latter externally in order to conciliate their good sense, they take care to keep and to practise all that disgusts it. Thrones began to be undermined when the popedom was shaken. LUTHER undid them both, when in the face of Europe he called LEO the Tenth and HENRY the Eighth a couple of pretending asses. They were not asses; for HENRY was a more ferocious beast, and the Son of LORENZO DE MEDICIS was an accomplished man. But they pretended enough, LEO by nature of his office, and HENRY by his bullying, and his theology; and the first men that had the courage to utter a scornful word against, ruined “them and their heirs for ever.”—After that, opinion began to exercise herself. Kings were called to account, as soon as personal character came to be demanded of them. They then commenced the awkward compromises of which we have been speaking. CHARLES the Second's perukes, the orgies of the BOUVRONS, and the vulgarities of German dynasties, to say nothing of the writings of the French and English wits, gradually did away with the old abstract notion of royalty. The French Revolution was a mingled fit of contempt and rage against them. They now put on staid faces, as well as unassuming pantaloons, affect to be philosophical, and are in reality a little frightened and mystical. Their very success against BOUAPARTE, notwithstanding the legitimate pranks it has enabled them to play, contains something in it that perplexes them for the future; and it is natural; for in succeeding against him, they only succeeded against a man who had condescended to be one of themselves. The popular sense of right and justice, which is their great and lasting enemy, was only checked, and set thinking the more; and praise be to the enlighteners of mankind, trampling squadrons and brute force can no longer put an end to that.

There are two things, either of which alone would hinder the would-be leaders of the world from making it retrograde. One is the Press, which for the first time in the history of man has become a universal thing;—the other is Scientific Power, which is the result of the experimental philosophy recommended by Lord Bacon, and which was so emphatically instigated by him as containing the seeds of great and unexpected changes.

With the same instinctive though dull feeling which has led them into similar compromises with existing difficulties, the Allied Sovereigns, despairing of doing away the liberty of the press altogether, throw as many checks on it as possible, and at the same time take care to get literary birdings of their own, who shall conduct journals as if independently, and say "We," when in fact they mean only the old We, the Prince and his Ministers. This can do them no good in the long run. The world perceives the real feelings which influence them; and their resort to literary hirelings has this inevitable disadvantage in it,—namely, that the latter, only being allowed to take partial views of a subject, are obliged at one and the same time to challenge argument, and to argue badly. The consequence is obvious. They are easily refuted; and the value of knowledge and of impartial discussion increases in reputation and power, always upon the popular side.

With respect to the progress and irresistible effects of Mechanical, Chemical, and other Scientific Power, in altering and increasing the sources of wealth, and enabling mankind to controul more equally the circumstances about them, we shall speak at large in a series of papers, with which it is our intention, from time to time, to vary our political articles during the approaching year. We shall content ourselves at present with an assertion which contains its own proof;—namely, that an increasing knowledge on the part of the community, an increasing sense of their own wants and of the means of remedying them, and a new and mighty engine of power which is put into their hands, and which enables one individual to perform the labour of one hundred, must as infallibly change the condition of society, as knowledge and growth change the mind and body of the human being.

CHRISTMAS.

It is with great pleasure that we recognize again in the following letter the fair Correspondent, who did so much good and honour to our holiday-enthusiasm last year:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I am of the number of your readers who recollect with pleasure and gratitude your papers last year on keeping Christmas, and I looked forward with a hope, which has not been disappointed, that you would take some notice again of its return. I feel unwilling to intrude on your valuable time, yet I cannot refrain from thanking you for your cheering attempts to enforce a due observance of this delightful season. I thank you in my own name, and I thank you in the name of those to whom the spring of life is opening in all its natural and heartfelt enjoyments. I thank you in the name of the more juvenile part of the holiday circle, who, released from the thralldom of school discipline, are come home (that expressive word), to bask awhile in the eyes and the smiles of their fond parents; and lastly, I thank you on behalf of those who have none to plead for them, and to whom pleasure is but a name,—the sick at heart and sick in body, the friendless and the fatherless, the naked and the hungry. To all of these I hope to extend a portion of happiness and of help, with a heart full of gratitude to Him who has "cast my lot in a goodly heritage." I have, under this feeling, been for some days past busily employed in preparing for passing Christmas worthily. My beef and mince-meat are ready (of which, with some warm garments, my poor neighbours will partake), and my holly and mistletoe gathered; for I heartily approve of your Article, and am of opinion that to the false refinement of modern times may be traced the loss of that primitive and pure simplicity which characterised "other times." To your list of "authorities" I beg leave to add that learned and truly Christian Prelate, Bishop Hall, who in his writings * so strongly enforces the doctrine that the Creator is best honoured in a wise and rational enjoyment of the creature.

* Vide his Contemplation on the Marriage of Cana in Galilee.

Cordially wishing you the chief of sublunary blessings, i.e. health of body and health of mind, I remain, Sir, your obliged and constant Reader,

A WIFE, A MOTHER, AND AN ENGLISHWOMAN.
South Lambeth, Dec. 21, 1838.

EMIGRATION.—MR. FEARON'S WORK.

The territory included in the United States is so extensive, that there must necessarily be a considerable difference between the climate of the Northern and that of the Southern parts. Mr. Fearon speaks only of those States which he has visited. In Pennsylvania there is more heat in summer and more cold in winter than is experienced in England; and the transition from one to the other is so quick, that there are actually but two seasons in the year.

If the appearance of the inhabitants be taken as a criterion, and if that appearance be not produced or aggravated by other causes (such as excess or unhealthy practices of many kind-), I should say that this climate is not so congenial to the well-being of the human constitution as that of England. A Philadelphian (particularly a female) is as old at 27, as a Londoner at 40. Neither sex possesses the English standard of health—a rosy cheek.

Ohio is the next State spoken of.

With regard to the seasons, they are said to have severe winters of from three to four months, with a keen dry air, and cloudless sky: during summer excessive heat, (thermometer in the shade, 80 to 96), with heavy dews at night; springs, cold and heavy rains; autumns, fine, followed by "Indian Summer," which is truly delightful. This I have experienced, and can say that until now I never knew what really fine weather was.

The climate of Illinois Mr. F. considers as at present unformed; and he thinks that the Western States generally are less healthy than the Eastern, not from the natural superiority of climate, but from the greater cultivation of the latter.

The two great political parties in America are termed Federalists and Democrats. This distinction arose after the peace, by which the independence of the United States was secured. The country was in an exhausted and bankrupt state, and it was proposed to strengthen the hands of the general government: the advocates of this measure took the former, its opponents the latter, title. At the time of the French Revolution, the Federalists, from the part they took against the Republicans, were called English Tories, and their antagonists, the great majority of the people, French Jacobins. The Democrats were, in this case, the most consistent;—they very justly "considered the event as only a continuation of the struggle which they had commenced for the emancipation of the world." This party are now predominant: they have been successful in the three last elections of Presidents, and having the majority of the people on their side, are likely to maintain their superiority for some time at least. Mr. Fearon witnessed the election of a Governor for the State of Pennsylvania, which took place in Philadelphia. The candidates were both of the Democratic party, one of the more violent sort, the other of the moderate, called Republicans. The latter was supported by the Federalists, but was nevertheless defeated. During the contest, a great deal of animosity and ill-will was of course excited; there was however no confusion or disturbance; the whole was concluded in one day throughout the State. All citizens, who have paid a poll-tax of nine shillings per annum, are entitled to vote, which almost amounts to what is called universal suffrage. Yet, in spite of repeated proofs like this, we are told by the corruptionists in England, that an extension of the right of suffrage, even to the middling class, would be attended with danger; and they modestly conclude, that they are the only proper and safe persons to be entrusted with so great a privilege.

However excellent the theory of the American Constitution may be, some abuses exist in the practice of it; these are chiefly in the appointment of public officers. In New York Mr. Fearon was told that the situations in the gift of the Council of Appointment, that is, almost all the civil offices in that State, were bought and sold as notoriously as seats in our House of Commons. There is also a species of management in regard to the elections, which is practised in all the States. A meeting of the leading men of either side takes place, which is called a Caucus; and they issue a "ticket," stating whom they have fixed upon, by which the candidate who gets this "appointment" obtains the support of the party by whom the ticket is issued. By this means the division of votes among several candidates of the same party is prevented, and this is without doubt the reason why the people, actuated by party feeling, submit to this sort of dictation. The power of the Caucus is however limited to the choice of candidates who are liked by their partizans; for, as the submission is entirely voluntary, two or three attempts to get an unpopular man elected would totally destroy their influence; so that it is not unlikely that in many cases the same persons, who are now chosen in consequence of getting the "appointment," would have been as fortunate had no such system existed. It is however a bad thing; and as soon as the Americans begin to think so, will be abolished. The other mal-practices will be also put a stop to, when experience shall have shown their ill effects: as the people really elect their own representatives, and thus possess the means of correcting abuses, they are comparatively of little importance.

As most or all of the friends of Mr. Fearon were engaged in various occupations in England, his first object was to ascertain whether all or any of them could continue their pursuits in the eastern or old States with greater advantage. For the most part he is not of opinion that they would benefit by a change of country. In the cities there is already sufficient competition among the tradesmen, and the professions are completely crammed. "An anecdote is told of a gentleman walking in Broadway: a friend passing, he called 'Doctor,' and immediately sixteen persons turned round to answer to the name." The Lawyers are still more numerous, and, Mr. Fearon thinks, still more servile and tricking than their brethren in England. They hold many offices, and out of the 190 members who compose the House of Representatives, 150 are legal men. The Americans are very fond of going to law and fighting duels, and this circumstance, together with the intricacy of the civil law, which is almost the same as in England, may account for the abundance of learned gentlemen. Manufactories, which rose up during the war, are generally in a state of depression; though Mr. F. is of opinion, that with proper capital and management, several might do well. Labour of all kinds is very well paid, and the labourers of America are better off and more intelligent than the same class in England. Poor laws exist in some of the States, and, what seems to be the inevitable consequence, pauperism increases. That it has not yet reached a very great extent may be seen from the circumstance that Mr. F. did not see more than three beggars in the course of a journey of 5000 miles. The following is the summary of Mr. Fearon's opinions respecting emigration:—

The classes of British society who would be benefited by an exchange of country, are, I conceive, first, that large and much injured body of men, who are here chained to the country and the political system, which oppresses and grinds them to the earth,—I mean our extreme poor. They would not be in America a week before they would experience a rapid advance in the scale of being. Instead of depending for subsistence upon charity soup, occasional parochial relief, and bowing with slavish submission to the tyrant of the poor-house, they would, if industrious and willing to labour, earn 4s. 6d. to 6s. 9d. a day, have meat at least seven times in the week, and know "no one who could make them afraid." The second class would be the mechanics, in branches of first necessity, with the general exclusion, however, of those acquainted with the British staple manufactures of cotton and woollen only; but for others, whose earnings here are under 30s. a week, or whose employment is of that precarious nature, that they cannot reasonably calculate, by the exercise of prudence and economy, on laying by any thing for what is called "a rainy day," or on making a provision for old age—for such persons as these, particularly if they have or anticipate the having a family, emigration to America will certainly advance their pecuniary interests, though it may not enlarge their mental sphere of enjoyments. To these two classes, I would further add that of the small farmer who has a family, for whom he can now barely provide the necessities of life, and concerning a provision for whom, when his own gray hairs are approaching to the grave, he can look forward with but little confidence or satisfaction; to such a man, if he should have one hundred pounds clear, that is, after paying all his expenses of removal, &c., America decidedly offers inducements very superior to those afforded by this country. Such a father would there feel himself relieved from a load of anxiety, the weight of which upon his spirits, and its influence in repressing his exertions, he is perhaps himself scarcely aware of, till he feels the difference by comparison when he has shaken it off in the New World;—but still to every proposed emigrant, even of these classes, I would say, that he must not expect to find either the country full of gold, or its inhabitants as agreeable or as sociable as the perhaps unequalled people of England. He must prepare too for very many privations, and should previously have the mind of his family, particularly that of the mother of his children, so entirely in unison with his own, that they can all have the fortitude and good sense necessary to bear under the numerous privations they will certainly be subjected to, keeping in mind the substantial advantages they will enjoy, and setting off present evil against their future and increasing prosperity, which, in such a country, with a soil yet uncultivated, and in the infancy of its resources, may be considered as almost insured to them.

The man of small fortune, who cares little about politics, to whom the comforts of England are perhaps in some degree essential, but who wishes to curtail his expenditure, would not act wisely by emigrating to America. Indeed, should such a man make the attempt, he would return as expeditiously as did a family who arrived at New York in the Pacific, on the 25th March, with the intention of continuing, but who took a passage back in the same vessel the following week;—they went to America in the cabin—they departed from it in the steerage.

The artist may succeed, but the probability is, that he will not do so. I know instances on both sides, where, perhaps, equal talent has been possessed. A Mr. Shiels, a portrait painter, who was a fellow-passenger of mine in the Washington, has been eminently successful in New York; Mr. ———, who arrived about the same time, has been unable to procure his boarding expenses. Generally, I should not anticipate, judging from the character and habits of the people, that, at least, the superior artist would find it to his advantage to emigrate. The lawyer and the doctor, and, turning to another class, the clerk and the shopman, will find no opening in America.

The London linen and woollen draper, and haberdasher, who has large capital, good connections in this country, and who would adopt the most improved English modes of transacting retail business, would, I think, be very successful;—though it should be understood, that shopkeeping is overdone throughout America; but their plan of doing business is so defective, that I conceive there may be a good opening for a person with the above qualifications.

A literary man will not meet with any encouragement, the American library being imported, and newspaper editors having no inducement to occupy their talents upon any topics beyond extracts from English papers, advertisements, and shipping intelligence.

The very superior mechanic, in a business of which the articles have heretofore been imported, might succeed; and if he did so at all, it would probably be in an eminent degree. Two cases of this sort came under my knowledge: Mr. ———, of P——, manufacturer of bird-cages, fenders, and brass stands for fire-places, arrived in America without property, has brought up a large family, and is now a man of considerable wealth. Mr. ———, of ———, a piano-forte maker, has been similarly successful. I do not state these cases on the ground that there is now an opening in either of these callings, but merely as illustrative of the idea given at the commencement of this paragraph.

The merchant I do not conceive would be very successful, his being a profession so adapted to the passive American habits, and it is entirely pre-occupied.

To the capitalist, as such, I hardly know what to say: America is the country of speculation, and therefore, as such, capital might be employed with singular advantage. On the whole, to such I can only recommend a perusal of the previous details.

Mr. Fearon is not so sanguine as Mr. Birkbeck as to the success of those who might become proprietors and cultivators of land in the Western country. He did not intend at first to go as far as Illinois; but, finding the old settled States did not furnish any great inducements to emigrants to settle in them, he resolved to see whether the new promised better. He considers Illinois to be the most eligible place for agriculturists, because there are more choice situations unoccupied. His picture of the society is unattractive, but he expressly states that his experience does not enable him to speak with confidence.

Concerning the state of society, my experience does not allow me to say much, or to speak with confidence. Generally, I suspect that the powers of the legislature are, as yet, weak in their operation. Small provocations insure the most relentless and violent resentments. Duels are frequent. The drink is an inseparable companion of all classes; and the laws are robbed of their terror, by not being firmly and equally administered. A general character of independence, both as to the means of living and habits of society, appears universal. Here, no man is either thought or called "master," neither, on the other hand, is there found any coarse vulgarity. A cold, selfish indifference is the common characteristic of the labourer and the judge, and I should hope that Illinois state constitution will not, when formed, authorize or legalize slavery: yet, the Ohio practice will, I have no doubt, continue as it now is in Illinois, indenturing negroes for a term of from ten to fifteen years. This baleful practice promises a perpetuation of practical slavery throughout America.

He gives however the following conditional recommendation of this territory:—

"Should your minds be favourable to a western country settlement, I should wish to press upon your deliberate reconsideration the following ideas:—

First,—Is it essential to your prosperity and happiness that you should leave England?

Second,—Do the habits and character of the American people afford you rational grounds for desiring to become their fellow-citizen?

Third,—Have all of you the dispositions requisite in order to become cultivators of a wilderness?

Fourth,—Assuming that you have those dispositions, are you fitted for such an entire change of pursuits, and can you endure the difficulties and dangers necessarily attendant on such a situation?

If, after cool, deliberate, and rational consideration, with your minds as free from enthusiastic expectations connected with the continent, as they well can be under the existence of the present order of things in England, you can answer in the affirmative, then I have but little doubt of the propriety of recommending to your attention the Illinois territory.

To conclude, Mr. Fearon appears to be an intelligent and honest man. His book is both useful and amusing; without any pretensions to fine writing, the style is simple and clear. In his observations on the American character, he does not merely describe its peculiarities, but he dares to account for them upon philosophical principles, and to rest the truth of his statements upon a more solid foundation than that of his particular opinion, which shows at once his good sense and his modesty. Yet, while we give him credit for the fullest intention to be impartial, we think he has been too hard on the Americans. His prepossession in their favour gave way to disappointment and disgust. The disagreeable parts of their character, as they were not expected, made a greater impression on him, while their good qualities, which we are afraid are not very plentiful, were anticipated and consequently less remarked.

How unfavourable Mr. Fearon's book is considered to be to the Americans may be seen from this circumstance;—a ministerial writer recommends the government to purchase the copy-right of the book and distribute it at a very cheap rate, in order to check the progress of emigration. We do not imagine that the ministers will take his advice. The book, though it differs considerably from Mr. Birkbeck's, corroborates some, and does not contradict others, of the main facts stated by that gentleman. It describes America as the "country for the poor," and the inhabitants as free from all pecuniary anxiety. Are these facts, the knowledge of which would discourage emigration? And what is there to counter-balance these advantages? The disagreeable character of the people, allowing it to be as bad as Mr. Fearon makes it appear. If people are disposed to quit their country, the good or bad qualities of the people with whom they propose to live form but a minor consideration. With respect to America, there would be still less objection: the tide of emigration is there directed to the back States, which will be in a great measure, if not principally, settled by foreigners; and if the society be not so polished as in Europe, that defect will be more than counterbalanced by the great variety of character, which must necessarily result from the congregation of people from so many various countries.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, Dec. 19.—The process against Cantillon, accused of having fired a pistol shot at the carriage of the Duke of Wellington and against Marinet, implicated in the same affair, appears to approach its termination. Cantillon yesterday underwent another interrogatory before M. Meslier, Judge d'Instruction.

A pamphlet, entitled "The Wishes of the People," dedicated to the Deputies in 1818, by Alexander Grivel, author of "The Cry of the People," was seized yesterday at the house of the bookseller Plancher.

UNITED STATES.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16.—Message of the President of the United States, transmitted to both Houses of Congress:—

Follow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives,

The auspicious circumstances under which you will commence the duties of the present session, will lighten the burden inseparable from the high trust committed to you. The fruits of the earth have been unusually abundant; commerce has flourished; the revenue has exceeded the most favourable anticipation; and peace and amity are preserved with foreign nations, on conditions just and honourable to our country. For these inestimable blessings, we cannot but be grateful to that Providence which watches over the destinies of nations.

As the term limited for the operation of the commercial convention with Great Britain will expire in the month of July next, and it was deemed important that there should be no interval, during which that portion of our commerce, which was provided for by that convention should not be regulated, the Minister of the United States at London was instructed last summer to invite the attention of the British Government to the subject. He was instructed to propose, also, that the negotiation which it was proposed to open might extend to the general commerce of the two countries, and to every other interest and unsettled difference between them, particularly those relating to impressment, the fisheries, and boundaries. The proposal was received by the British Government in the spirit which prompted it; a negotiation has been opened at London embracing all these objects; and, in consequence, the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris has been associated with our Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at London, to both of whom corresponding instructions have been given, and they are now engaged in the discharge of its duties. To prevent any inconvenience resulting from the delay incident to a negotiation on so many important subjects, it was agreed, that the existing convention should be continued for a term not less than eight years.

Our relations with Spain remain nearly in the state in which they were at the close of the last Session. The convention of 1802, providing for the adjustment of a certain portion of the claims of our citizens for injuries sustained by spoliation, and so long suspended by the Spanish Government, has at length been ratified by it; but no arrangement has yet been made for the payment of other classes of claims, or for the settlement of boundaries. In the mean time, events have occurred which clearly prove the ill effect of the policy which that Government has so long pursued on the friendly relations of the two countries. A state of thing has existed in the Floridas, the tendency of which has been obvious to all who have paid the slightest attention to the progress of affairs in that quarter. Throughout the whole of those provinces to which the Spanish title extends, the Government of Spain has scarcely been felt. Its authority has been confined, almost exclusively, to the walls of Pensacola and St. Augustine, within which only small garrisons have been maintained. Adventurers from every country, fugitives from justice, and absconding slaves, have found an asylum there. Several tribes of Indians, strong in the number of their warriors, remarkable for their ferocity, and whose settlements extend to our limits, inhabit those provinces. The different hordes of people, connected together, disregarding, on the one side, the authority of Spain, and protected, on the other, by an imaginary line which separates Florida from the United States, have violated our laws prohibiting the introduction of slaves, have practised various frauds on our revenue, and committed every kind of outrage on our peaceable citizens whose their proximity to us enabled them to penetrate. The invasion of Amelia Island last year, by a small band of adventurers, not exceeding 150 in number, who wrested it from the inconsiderable Spanish force stationed there, and held it several months, during which a single feeble effort only was made to recover it, which failed, clearly proves how completely extinct the Spanish authority had become; as the conduct of those adventurers, while in possession of the island, as distinctly shows the pernicious purposes for which their combination had been formed.

The country had, in fact, become the theatre of every species of lawless adventure. With little population of its own, the Spanish authority almost extinct, and the Colonial Governments in a state of revolution, having no pretension to it, and sufficiently employed in their own concerns, it was in a great measure derelict, and the object of cupidity to every adventurer. A system of buccannery was rapidly organizing over it, which menaced, in its consequences, the lawful commerce of every nation, and particularly of the United States. In regard to the United States, the pernicious effects of this unlawful combination was not confined to the ocean: the Indian tribes have constituted the effective force in Florida. With these tribes these adventurers had formed a connexion, with a view to promote their own projects. It is to the interference of some of these adventurers, in misrepresenting the claims and titles of the Indians to land, and in practising on their savage propensities, that the Seminole war is principally to be traced. Men who thus connect themselves with savage communities, and stimulate them to war, which is always attended on their part with acts of barbarity the most shocking, deserve to be viewed in a worse light than the savages.

If the embarrassments of Spain prevented her from making an indemnity to our citizens, for so long a time, from her treasury, for their losses by spoliation, and otherwise, it was always in her power to have provided it, by the cession of this territory. Of this, her Government had been repeatedly apprised; and the cession was the more to be anticipated, as Spain must have known that, in ceding it, she would in effect cede what had become of little value to her, and would likewise relieve herself from the important obligation secured by the treaty of 1795, and all other compromissions respecting it.

There is a limit beyond which the spirit of amity and forbearance can in no instance be justified. If it was proper to rely on amicable negotiation for an indemnity for losses, it would not have been so, to have permitted the inability of Spain to fulfil her engagements, and to sustain her authority in the Floridas, to be perverted by foreign adventurers and savages, to purposes so destructive to the lives of our fellow-citizens, and the highest interests of the United States. The right of self-defence never ceases. It is among the most sacred, and alike necessary to nations and to individuals. And, whether the attack be made by Spain herself, or by those who abuse her Power, its obligation is not the less strong. The invaders of Amelia Island had assumed a popular and respected title, under which they might approach and wound us. As their object was distinctly seen, and the duty imposed on the Executive, by an existing law, was profoundly felt, that mask was not permitted to protect them. The United States suppressed the establishment. The combination in Florida, for the unlawful purposes stated, the acts perpetrated by that combination, and above all, the incitement of the Indians to massacre our fellow-citizens, of every age, and of both sexes, merited a like treatment, and received it. In pursuing these savages to an imaginary line in the woods, it would have been the height of folly to have suffered that line to protect them. Had that been done, the war could never cease. Even if the territory had been exclusively that of Spain, we had a right, by the law of nations, to follow the enemy on it, and to subdue him there. But the territory belonged, in a certain sense at least, to the savage enemy who inhabited it.

In suppressing the establishment at Amelia Island, no unfriendliness was manifested towards Spain, because the post was taken from a force which had wrested it from her.

In authorizing General Jackson to enter Florida in pursuit of the Seminoles, care was taken not to encroach on the rights of Spain. I regret to add, that, executing this order, facts were disclosed respecting the officers of Spain, in encouraging the war, furnishing munitions of war, and in other acts not less marked, which evinced their participation in the hostile combination. A conduct so incompatible with the friendly relations between the two countries could not fail to excite surprise. The commanding General was convinced, that he should fail in his object if he did not deprive those savages of the protection on which they relied.

Although the reasons which induced General Jackson to take these posts were duly appreciated, there was, nevertheless, no hesitation in deciding on the course which it became the Government to pursue. As there was reason to believe that the commanders of these posts had violated their instructions, there was no disposition to impute to their Government a conduct so unprovoked and hostile. An order was in consequence issued to the General in command there, to deliver the posts—Pensacola, unconditionally, to any person authorized to receive; and St. Marks on the arrival of a competent force to defend it against those savages and their associates.

In entering Florida to suppress this combination, no idea was entertained of hostility to Spain, and however justifiable the commanding General was, in consequence of the misconduct of the Spanish officers, in entering St. Marks and Pensacola, to terminate it, by proving to the savages and their associates that they should not be protected even there; yet, the amicable relations existing between the United States and Spain could not be altered by that act alone. By ordering the restitution of the posts, those relations were preserved. To a change of them, the power of the Executive is deemed incompetent. It is vested in Congress only.

Copies of the instructions to the commanding General; of his correspondence with the Secretary of War, explaining his motives, and justifying his conduct, with a copy of the proceedings of the courts-martial, in the trial of Arbuthnot and Ambristie; of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain; and of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, with the Government of Spain, will be laid before Congress.

The civil-war between Spain and the provinces in South America still continues without any prospect of its speedy termination. The information respecting the condition of those countries, collected by the commissioners recently returned from thence, will be laid before Congress.

It appears that the Government of Buenos Ayres declared itself independent in July, 1816; that the Banda Oriental, Entre Reos, and Paraguay, with the city of Santa Fee, are independent; that Chili has declared itself independent, and is closely connected with Buenos Ayres; that Venezuela has also declared itself independent, and now maintains the conflict with various success; and that the remaining parts of South America, except Monte Video, and such other portions of the La Plata as are held by Portugal, are still in the possession of Spain, or in a certain degree under her influence.

By a circular note, addressed by the Ministers of Spain to the Allied Powers, it appears that the Allies have undertaken to mediate between Spain and the South American provinces, and that the manner and extent of their interposition would be settled by a Congress, which was to have met at Aix-la-Chapelle in September last. From the course of proceeding observed by the Allied Powers in regard to this contest, it is inferred that they will confine their interposition to the expression of their sentiments, abstaining from the application of force. I state this with the greater satisfaction, because it is a course more consistent with justice, and likewise authorizes a hope that the calamities of war will be confined to the parties only, and will be of shorter duration.

From the view of this subject, founded on all the information that we have been able to obtain, there is good cause to be satisfied with the course heretofore pursued by the United States in regard to this contest, and to conclude that it is proper to adhere to it, especially in the present state of affairs.

I have great satisfaction in stating, that our relations with France, Russia, and other Powers, continue on the most friendly basis.

In our domestic concerns, we have ample cause of satisfaction. The receipts into the Treasury, during the three first quarters of the year, have exceeded 17,000,000 of dollars.

After satisfying all the demands which have been made under existing appropriations, including the final extinction of the old six per cent. stock, and the redemption of a moiety of the Louisiana debt, it is estimated that there will remain in the Treasury, on the 1st day of January next, more than 2,000,000 of dollars.

The gross revenue which has accrued from the customs during the same period, amounts to 21,000,000 of dollars, and the revenue of the whole year is estimated at not less than 26,000,000. The sale of the public lands during the year has greatly exceeded that of any former year; and there is just reason to expect a progressive improvement in that source of revenue.

It is gratifying to know, that although the annual expenditure has been increased by the last session of Congress providing for revolutionary pensions to an amount about equal to the proceeds of the internal duties, which were then repealed, the revenue for the ensuing year will be proportionably augmented; and that, whilst the public expenditure will probably remain stationary, each successive year will add to the national resources, by the ordinary increase of our population, and by the gradual development of our latent sources of national prosperity.

The strict execution of the revenue laws, has, it is presumed, secured to domestic manufactures all the relief that can be derived from the duties which have been imposed upon foreign merchandise. Under the influence of this relief, several branches of this important national interest have assumed great activity; and although it is hoped that others will gradually revive, and ultimately triumph over every obstacle, yet the expediency of granting further protection is submitted to your consideration.

The measures of defence authorized by existing laws have been pursued with zeal and activity, the survey of our maritime and inland frontiers continue, and at the points where it was decided to erect fortifications, the work has been commenced, and considerable progress made. Last session, the Board of Commissioners were directed to report their opinion of the most suitable sites for two naval depots. This work is in a train of execution. The opinion of the board on this subject, with a plan of all the works necessary to a general system of defence, will be laid before Congress.

Treaties have been formed with the Quapaw Indians; with the Great and Little Osages; the tribes in the states of Indiana; Ohio and the Michigan territory; and with the Chickasaws; by which very extensive cessions of territory have been made to the United States. Negotiations are now depending with the tribes in the Illinois territory, and with the Choctaws, by which it is expected that other extensive cessions will be made.

With a view to the security of our inland frontiers, it has been thought expedient to establish strong posts at the mouth of the Yellow Stone-river, at the Mandan village, on the Missouri; and at the mouth of St. Peters, on the Mississippi, at no great distance from our northern boundaries. It can hardly be presumed, while such posts are maintained in the rear of the Indian tribes, that they will venture to attack our peaceable inhabitants. A strong hope is entertained that this measure will likewise be productive of much good to the tribes themselves, especially in promoting the great object of their civilization. Experience has clearly demonstrated, that independent savage communities cannot long exist within the limits of a civilized population. The progress of the latter has, almost invariably, terminated in the extinction of the former. To civilize them, and even prevent their extinction, it seems to be indispensable that their independence, as communities, should cease. The hunter state will then be more easily abandoned for pursuits tending to dissolve the ties which connect them together as a savage community. I present this subject to the consideration of Congress.

It has been necessary, during the present year, to maintain a strong naval force in the Mediterranean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, and to send some public ships along the southern coast, and to the Pacific Ocean. By these means, amicable relations with the Barbary Powers have been preserved, our commerce has been protected, and our rights respected. The augmentation of our navy is advancing with a steady progress towards the limit contemplated by law.

I communicate with great satisfaction the accession of another state, Illinois, to our Union; because I perceive, from the proof afforded by the additions already made, the regular progress and sure consummation of a policy, of which history affords no example, and of which the good effect cannot be too highly estimated. By extending our government, on the principles of our constitution, over the vast territory within our limits, on the Lakes and the Mississippi, and its numerous streams, new life and vigour are infused into every part of our system. By increasing the number of the states, the confidence of the state governments in their own security is increased, and their jealousy of the national government proportionably diminished. The impracticability of one consolidated government for this great and growing nation will be more apparent, and will be universally admitted. Incapable of exercising local authority, except for general purposes, the general government will no longer be dreaded. In those cases of a local nature, and for all the great purposes for which it was instituted, its authority will be cherished. Each government will acquire new force, and a greater freedom of action, within its proper sphere. Other inestimable advantages will follow: our produce will be augmented to an incalculable amount, in articles of the greatest value, for domestic use and foreign commerce. Our navigation will, in like degree, be increased; and, as the shipping of the Atlantic states will be employed in the transportation of the vast produce of the western country, even those parts of the United States which are the most remote from each other will be further bound together by the strongest ties which mutual interest can create.

The situation of this district, it is thought, requires the attention of Congress. The growing population, already considerable, and the increasing business of the district, furnish additional motives for recommending this subject to your consideration.

When we view the great blessings with which our country has been favoured, those which we now enjoy, and the means which we possess of handing them down, unimpaired, to our latest posterity, our attention is irresistibly drawn to the source from whence they flow. Let us then unite in offering our most grateful acknowledgments for these blessings to the Divine Author of all good.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, DECEMBER 27.

ACCORDING to Tuesday's Courier, letters had arrived from Madrid up to the 7th instant, which contain no news of a convulsion. The CREATURE had not left that city; but was waiting, together with the English Ambassador, in daily expectation of the QUEEN's lying in. It adds however that "large bodies of banditti, who are assembled in the mountains, make descents upon the towns and villages, and lay them under contribution;" and by the tone of the same paper the preceding week, it is evident, either that Ministers knew something which does not or is not allowed to transpire in these letters, or that they are at least as convinced of the inevitability of a Spanish convulsion as any other persons. The truth was, perhaps, that one of the descents alluded to was expected in Madrid, and that the obvious consequences were described beforehand. The bodies called banditti answer no doubt, in some instances, to their name; and the existence of such men is alone a sufficient specimen of the condition of the country, as it is in the Neapolitan territory; but there are other bodies of freebooters of a more respectable and alarming nature, composed of soldiers from the late armies who saved the CREATURE's throne for him; and if these should ever get to Madrid, the result is clear. The report that the troops of the line had already joined them, and that 10,000 private persons in Madrid had conspired against the Government, shews what opinions are ready to start forth at the first notice. The CREATURE can no more continue his system, than a toad can stay in a house at daylight.

The American President's Address to Congress has arrived in town. It represents the discussions with this country as proceeding in an amicable temper on both sides; though still difficulties are evidently anticipated, and nothing is settled. With respect to the matter of ARBUTHNOT and AMBRISTER, it says only that the documents concerning it shall be laid before the Representatives. But it contains what was expected,—a confirmation of the alleged circumstances under which the American General took possession of the Floridas. At least, it asserts them to have been true; and if the CREATURE can prove them false, let him assemble the Cortes, as he promised, and inform them of things in the same open manner as Mr. MONRO. But oh! the infinite difference between the CHIEF of a free people and a cowardly TYRANT!—This Message from the AMERICAN PRESIDENT contains the most valuable testimony that has yet appeared to the growing independence of the South Americans. He says of the civil war, that there is not "any prospect of its speedy termination." Commissioners have been among them for the purpose of bringing back an account of the actual situation of things; and it is easy to see by the following extracts from the reports of these gentlemen, what issue the American Government expects from the contest. The matter which they contain is not altogether new; but it comes in a compressed shape of detail and from a source especially authentic, and will awake for the hundredth time the indignation of the reader:—

Extract from the Report of Mr. GRAHAM:—

"Their means of defence, of which they are fully aware, are, in proportion to their numbers, greater perhaps than those of almost any other people, and the duration and the events of the war have strengthened the general determination never to submit to Spain. This determination rests upon the recollection of former sufferings and deprivations; upon a consciousness of their ability to defend and govern themselves; and upon a conviction that, in case of submission, on any terms, they would, sooner or later, be made to feel the vengeance of the mother country. These considerations doubtless have the most weight upon those who have taken a leading part. They of course use all their influence to enforce them, and thus to keep up the spirit of the Revolution. In this they probably have had the less difficulty, as, although the sufferings of the people have been great, particularly in military service, and in raising contributions necessary for that service, yet the Incubus of Spanish power being thrown off, and with it, that train of followers who filled up almost every avenue to wealth and consequence, the higher classes have been awakened to a sense of advantages they did not before enjoy. They have seen their commerce freed from legal restraints, their articles of export become more valuable; their supplies furnished at a lower rate, and all the offices of Government, or other employments, laid open to them as fair objects of competition. The lower classes have found their labour more in demand, and better paid for; and their importance in society greater than it formerly was."

Extract from the Report of Mr. RODNEY:—

"Their commerce was confined to the parent country, and to Spanish vessels exclusively. They were prohibited, under the penalty of death, to trade with foreigners. The natives of Old Spain composed the body of their merchants. Though this part of the system had, previously to the revolution, been relaxed in some degree, particularly by the statute of free commerce, as it is styled, the relief was partial, and the restrictions continued severe and oppressive. All access to the Spanish settlements was closed to foreigners, and even the inhabitants of different provinces were prohibited from intercourse with one another, unless under the strictest regulations. The various manufactures, that might interfere with those of Spain, were not permitted. They were prevented, under severe penalties, from raising flax, hemp, or saffron. In climates most congenial to them, the culture of the grape and the olive was prohibited. On account of the distance of Peru and Chili, and the difficulty of transporting oil and wine to these remote regions, they were permitted to plant vines and olives, but were prohibited the culture of tobacco. At Buenos Ayres, by special indulgence of the Viceroy, they were allowed to cultivate grapes and olives, merely for the use of the table. They were compelled to procure from the Mother Country articles of the first necessity; and were thus rendered dependent on her for the conveniences of life, as well as luxuries. The Crown possessed the monopoly of tobacco, salt, and gunpowder. To these oppressive regulations and restrictions was added an odious system of taxation. From the Indians was exacted a tribute in the shape of a poll-tax, or a certain servitude in the mines, called the mita. A tenth part of the produce of cultivated lands was taken, under the denomination of tithes. The alcavala, a tax varying from two and a half to five per cent on every sale and re-sale of all things, movable, was rigidly exacted—though, in some cases, a commutation was allowed. Royal and municipal duties were laid on imports, and on the tonnage, entrance, and clearance of vessels, under the different appellations of almojarifazgo, sisa, alcavala, ceruo, consularo, armada, and armadilla. To these may be added the royal fifth of the precious metals, the most important tax in the mining districts. Besides all these, there were stamp taxes, tavern licenses, and sums paid for the sale of offices, of titles of nobility, papal bulls, the composition and confirmation of lands, with a number of others of an inferior grade. Under the Spanish Monarchs, who had early obtained from the Pope the ecclesiastical dominion, and thus had united in their royal persons all civil and religious authority, a most oppressive hierarchy was established, with its numerous train of offices and orders, succeeded by the Inquisition. The posts of honour and profit, from the highest to the lowest, were filled, almost exclusively, by natives of Old Spain.

In addition to this most favourable intelligence from North America, an answer has transpired from the patriotic General ZARAGA to the royal tool MORILLO, who after attempting to play the part of Duke of Alva in miniature, and getting a name sufficiently infamous for cruelty, now endeavours to vanquish his enemies by bribes. The following is the first paragraph, which, we should think, must have been quite enough for Master MORILLO:—

"Head-quarters de los Boquerones, Oct. 5, 1818.

"THE GENERAL OF BRIGADE, PEDRO ZARAGA, TO SEÑOR DON PABLO MORILLO.

"I know not that there is any thing in common between you and me to authorise you to apply to me. I blushed exceedingly on receiving your two letters of the 2d and 24th of September of this year, for communication with a Tyrant, such as you are, is the greatest outrage that can be offered to a Patriot like myself. I am confounded when I think what causes could have persuaded you to think that I could be capable of betraying my duty, my honour, and my country, by passing over to the disgraceful standard of Ferdinand. The more I think of your audacity, the more I am confounded, without knowing to what to attribute the stain which you have wished to attach to my name, by endeavouring to draw me over to the party of the King. Accustomed as you are to sell the liberties of your country for the favours of a tyrant, you have succeeded in persuading yourself that all men participate in your own unnatural character."

The remaining piece of happy news which we have to communicate, is the arrival of the Speech of General BOLIVAR, Supreme Chief of Venezuela, who, notwithstanding the envious and malicious reports to the contrary, shews himself to have taken the North American Chiefs for his model,—an example which it was always thought would be fatal for the interests of Spanish despotism in America;—aye, and it may be added, of despotism all over the world. In setting out again for the army, the General recommends the Venezuelans to set about forming a final and complete Government, and relieving him, a soldier, from the incompatible task of determining the regulation of the State. This is good. This is noble. Such ever are the natural and inevitable destroyers of tyranny; and must succeed every where. They have found out the true, social secret of prosperity.

A letter from Paris in the Courier, speaks of a project which is to be submitted to the Chambers for extending the Sittings to five years. It seems that when Ultra-Royalists go out, they never get in again: and as their wish to be saved from these yearly losses falls in with the natural tendencies of power to encroachment, and the Ministers find the Liberals a little too impartial and in earnest, it is supposed that the project has met with their approbation. The existence of a certain number of Ultras in the House has indeed this peculiar advantage to Ministers,—that it enables them to affect to consider the Liberals as going to as great an extreme one way as the Ultra-Royalists do the other, and so of taking the credit between both of a judicious and moderate policy. The Courier's correspondent, with a non-chalance that is very instructive, says, that the proposal has "only the single defect of being contrary to an article of the Charter." The Courier also, in conformity with his usual British opinions, thinks this a mere trifle; and gravely asks whether things are not to be improved, when they are found faulty? His masters say not; the opposers of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY's efforts to amend the savage Criminal Law said not; the opposers of the Slave Trade Abolition said not, till opinion forced them. Nor is the French charter a thing grown weak and necessary to be repaired from age. It is a new promise, made by a restored Monarch, doubtless against his will, but only the more necessary on that account; and was demanded of him at a time, when those who consented to restore him thought themselves bound in decency to make some stipulation in behalf of the people. They were not likely to make a wrong one at such a moment; and be this as it may, it would be the most impudent thing in the world (the Spanish BOURBON always excepted) were the Charter to be violated so speedily, and for the evident and pernicious interest of the few. With what earnest and lofty faces have not the King, his family, and his Ministers, been trumpeting up the Charter for some time past, as if their adhering to it even in words was a talisman for their security; for they have violated it already in smaller matter. But this!—It originates perhaps with some concealed Bonapartist, who thinks it would be followed, as it ought to be, with a popular insurrection.

The Will of the lamented Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY has appeared. It contains many affecting proofs of the intelligence, beneficence, and latterly of the agitated state of the writer's mind. Sir SAMUEL, notwithstanding his heaps of business in the Courts, occupied, it seems, his few leisure hours in preparing a work on Criminal Law. In expressing a modest wish that his friend Mr. WHISHAW or Mr. BROUGHAM would undertake the trouble of doing something public with them, he pays a valuable compliment to the latter, "who finds time," he says, "for any thing that has a tendency to the advantage of human happiness." There is one passage in this Will, to which our readers will pay particular attention, and which will doubtless have considerable effect on the public at large. We give it as we ought in the first person. "It is my earnest and anxious wish that none of my sons should be educated at any public school, by which I mean such schools as Eton, Westminster, Winchester and Harrow. If their guardians think it advisable to send them to an English University, I do not object to it."

We forgot last week to say any thing respecting the late Lord ELLENBOROUGH. We shall devote the article at the head of our paper to his Lordship, the second week in the new year. During the week, a personage of much greater real importance has died,—Sir PHILIP FRANCIS. We need not add, we shall devote an article also to him.

The subjoined letter has been sent to the friends of Ministers:—

"Foreign-Office, Dec. 22, 1818.

"As, upon the meeting of Parliament, which is fixed for Thursday, the 14th of next month, the House of Commons will immediately proceed to the choice of a Speaker, and to the consideration of other matters of great importance, I take the liberty to acquaint you that a full attendance is most highly desirable at the opening of the Session.—I have the honour to be, your most faithful and obedient servant, CASTLEREAGH."

On Monday morning, the Duke of WELLINGTON arrived in town.

Lord and Lady CASTLEREAGH, who have arrived from France, had a very rough passage from Calais. The packet sailed from Calais on Friday afternoon, about four P.M. with a favourable wind, which after some time died away to a calm; and about six o'clock it began to blow hard to N.E., which increased during the night, with a tremendous sea. In shifting jibs the packet pitched away her bowsprit, and the Mate unfortunately had his thigh broken, while employed in securing the broken spar to set a smaller sail on the stump, which with some difficulty was effected: and the packet, after being driven down as far as Dungeness Light, arrived without any further accident. His Lordship and Lady CASTLEREAGH were on deck in their carriage, but received no injury.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S WILL.—The property left by the learned Lord, we are told, exceeds 240,000*l.* To the present Lord he has bequeathed 10,000*l.* per annum; to the widowed Lady 2,000*l.* per annum; and to each of the other children 15,000*l.* The house in St. James's-square, which is a freehold, is directed to be sold, and also the villa at Roehampton. The late Peer gave 18,000*l.* for the town residence.—Courier.

The LORD CHANCELLOR has not yet made up his mind to take possession of his magnificent house in Hamilton-place. It was built by the late Lord MONTGOMERIE and purchased, with the furniture, for a sum about ten thousand pounds less than the first cost by the Learned Lord nearly two years ago.—Morning Chronicle.

INHERITANCE.—A man of wit being told the other day that a foolish politician was not so foolish, after all, as his father said, "he has not yet come to his estate."—Literary Pocket-Book.

SEDUCTION.—About a fortnight since, a most beautiful and accomplished girl, 18 years of age, the only daughter of a respectable tradesman at Bath, eloped with a Captain of the army, and who it seems is already married. The afflicted father lost no time in pursuing them, but it was not until Wednesday that he succeeded in discovering that they had taken apartments in Manor-place, King's-road, Chelsea; and having made application at Bow-street, he procured Smith and two other officers to accompany him to the residence of the lovers. On inquiry, finding they were expected home to dinner, the father and officers placed themselves in ambush nearly opposite, where, after having waited upwards of three hours, they saw them pass on the opposite side of the road. The father and officers pursued, and overtook them just as they were entering the house. The father seized his child, who, in all the agony of surprise and terror, clung to the Captain, who vowed no earthly force should part them; and it was not without the utmost difficulty (the lover being of a most powerful make) that they could be separated. The father and daughter, with the officers, proceeded to the public-house, followed by the Captain in tatters, when a scene ensued that baffles description; the father, entreating his child to return to the arms, and ease the anguish of her almost broken-hearted mother—the lover imploring her, with tears, not to forsake him. This having taken place in a public tap-room filled with spectators, the father, daughter, and the Captain, with the officers, retired to a private room, and at length the two former, still accompanied by the officers, drove off in a hackney coach, leaving the Captain vociferating that he would immediately follow them to Bath, and assuring the weeping fair she should soon be restored to him. The father of the young lady more than once expressed his determination to prosecute the Captain for seduction.

The three sons lately delivered at one birth, by the wife of Mr. THOMAS BAXENDALE, of Preston, have all fallen a sacrifice to the small-pox; and JOHN CROSS, a boatwright, of Marsh, in Lincolnshire, has within the last fifteen days lost his wife and six fine children, by that dreadful disease.

During the thick fogs of Tuesday and Wednesday last, a good many accidents occurred in London and its neighbourhood. Some bones were fractured by persons coming in sudden contact with carts and other vehicles, but only one life, as we understand, has been lost.—Some ruffians too, took advantage of the concealment afforded by the fogs, to ill-treat and rob several individuals—nor were the numerous pickpockets (those, we mean, of the lower order) idle, as may well be supposed. The loss in handkerchiefs seems to have been immense; and many shawls were dragged from the shoulders of the ladies. A good deal of this work was performed by lads with links who pretended to offer their services.—The mail and other coaches were considerably delayed in their first stage from the metropolis.

Our Correspondent, it appears, was mistaken when he said he observed Miss KELLY among the spectators at Mr. KENNEY'S Comedy on the first night.

Mr. COURTOY, who died the other day, was worth the enormous sum of two hundred and thirty-nine thousand pounds: he lived in a miserable house, No. 31, St. Martin's-street, Leicester-fields, where he let lodgings, and hardly allowed himself the common necessities of life. He was never known to have purchased a new coat. He came to England about 70 years ago. He was nearly 100 years of age.

MR. GODWIN.

The following character of this eminent writer was given by Mr. HAZLITT, in his lecture of Tuesday last:—

Whoever else is, it is pretty clear that the author of Caleb Williams and St. Leon is not the author of Waverley. Nothing can be more distinct or excellent in their several ways, than these two writers. If the one owes almost every thing to external observation and traditional character, the other owes every thing to internal conception and contemplation of the possible workings of the human mind. There is little knowledge of the world, little variety, neither an eye for the picturesque, nor a talent for the humorous in Caleb Williams, for instance, but you cannot doubt for a moment of the originality of the work and the force of the conception. The impression made upon the reader is the exact measure of the strength of the author's genius. For the effect, both in Caleb Williams and St. Leon, is entirely made out, neither by facts nor dates, by black-letter or magazine learning, by transcript nor record, but by intense and patient study of the human heart, and by an imagination projecting itself into certain situations, and capable of working up its imaginary feelings to the height of reality. The author launches into the ideal world, and must sustain himself and the reader there, by the mere force of imagination. The sense of power in the writer thus adds to the interest of the subject.—The character of Falkland is a sort of apotheosis of the love of fame. The gay, the gallant Falkland lives only in the good opinion of good men; for this he adorns his soul with virtue, and tarnishes it with crime; he lives only for this, and dies as he loses it. He is a lover of virtue, but a worshipper of fame. Stung to madness by a brutal insult, he avenges himself by a crime of the deepest dye, and the remorse of his conscience and the stain upon his honour prey upon his peace and reason ever after. It was into the mouth of such a character that a modern poet has well put the words,

—“Action is momentary,

“The motion of a muscle, this way or that;

“Suffering is long, obscure, and infinite.”

In the conflict of his feelings, he is worn to a skeleton, wasted to a shadow. But he endures this living death to watch over his undying reputation, and to preserve his name unsullied and free from suspicion. But he is at last disappointed in this his darling object, by the very means he takes to secure it, and by harassing and goading Caleb Williams (whose insatiable incessant curiosity had wormed itself into his confidence) to a state of desperation, by employing every sort of persecution, and by trying to hunt him from society like an infection, makes him turn upon him, and betray the inmost secret of his soul. The last moments of Falkland are indeed sublime: the spark of life and the hope of imperishable renown are extinguished in him together; and bending his last look of forgiveness on his victim and destroyer, he dies a martyr to fame, but a confessor at the shrine of virtue! The reaction and play of these two characters into each other's hands (like Othello and Iago) is inimitably well managed, and on a par with any thing in the dramatic art; but Falkland is the hero of the story, Caleb Williams is only the instrument of it. This novel is utterly unlike any thing else that ever was written, and is one of the most original as well as powerful productions in the English language. St. Leon is not equal to it in the plot and groundwork, though perhaps superior in the execution. In the one Mr. Godwin has hit upon the extreme point of the perfectly natural and perfectly new; in the other he ventures into the preternatural world, and comes nearer to the world of common place. Still the character is of the same exalted intellectual kind. As the ruling passion of the one was the love of fame, so in the other the sole business of life is thought. Raised by the fatal discovery of the philosopher's stone above mortality, he is cut off from all participation with its pleasures. He is a limb torn from society. In possession of eternal youth and beauty he can feel no love; surrounded, tantalized, tormented with riches, he can do no good. The races of men pass before him as in a speculum; but he is attached to them by no common tie of sympathy or suffering. He is thrown back into himself and his own thoughts. He lives in the solitude of his own breast,—without wife or child, or friend or enemy in the world. His is the solitude of the soul,—not of woods, or seas, or mountains,—but the desert of society, the waste and desolation of the heart. He is himself alone. His existence is purely intellectual, and is therefore intolerable to one who has felt the rapture of affection or the anguish of woe. The contrast between the enthusiastic eagerness of human pursuits and their blank disappointment was never perhaps more finely portrayed than in this novel. Margueretta, the wife of St. Leon, is an instance of pure and disinterested affection in one of the noblest of her sex. It is not improbable that the author found the model of this character in nature.—Of Mandeville, I shall say only one word. It appears to me to be a falling off in the subject, not in the ability. The style and declamation are even more powerful than ever. But unless an author surpasses himself, and surprises the public as much the fourth or fifth time as he did the first, he is said to fall off. A great deal is made out of nothing, or out of a very disagreeable subject. I cannot agree that the story is out of nature. The feeling is very common indeed; though carried to an unusual and improbable excess, or to one with which from the individuality and minuteness of the circumstances, we cannot readily sympathise.

It is rare that a philosopher is a writer of romances. The union of the two characters in this author is a sort of phenomenon in the history of letters; for I cannot but consider the author of Political Justice as a philosophical reasoner of no ordinary stamp or pretensions. That work, whatever its defects may be, is distinguished by the most acute and severe logic, and by the utmost boldness of thinking, founded on a love and conviction of truth. It is a system of ethics, and one that, though I think it erroneous myself, is built on following up into its fair consequences, a very common and acknowledged principle, that abstract reason and general utility are the only test and standard of moral rectitude. If this principle is true, then the system is true: but I think that Mr. Godwin's book has done more than any thing else to overturn the sufficiency of this principle by abstracting, in a strict metaphysical process, the influence of reason or the understanding in moral questions and relations from that of habit, sense, association, local and personal attachment, natural affection, &c.; and by thus making it appear how necessary the latter are to our limited, imperfect, and mixed being, how impossible the former as an exclusive guide of action, unless man were, or were capable of becoming, a purely intellectual being. Reason is no doubt one faculty of the human mind, and the chief gift of Providence to man; but it must itself be subject to and modified by other instincts and principles, because it is not the only one. This work then, even supposing it to be false, is invaluable as demonstrating an important truth by the reductio ad absurdum; or it is an experimentum crucis in one of the grand and trying questions of moral philosophy.—In delineating the character and feelings of the hermetic philosopher St. Leon, perhaps the author had not to go far from those of a contemplative philosophical Recluse. He who deals in the secrets of magic, or in the secrets of the human mind, is too often looked upon with jealous eyes by the world, which is no great conjuror; he who pours out his intellectual wealth into the lap of the public is hated by those who cannot understand how he came by it; he who thinks beyond his age, cannot expect the feelings of his contemporaries to go along with him; he whose mind is of no age or country, is seldom properly recognised during his lifetime, and must wait, in order to have justice done him, for the late but lasting award of posterity:—"Where his treasure is, there his heart is also."

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 19.—MR. NOLAN, MR. GASELEE, MR. CASBERD, MR. WARREN, AND MR. HARRISON.

Numbers are nothing—but the force
That each man brings.—These now are things of course.
R. Brathwaytes. T. A.

In the present article it is my intention to speak of the Counsel with silk gowns in the Court of King's Bench, whose names and qualifications I have not mentioned in previous numbers. I give Messrs. NOLAN, GASELEE, and CASBERD, a precedence here, which they are not entitled to elsewhere, because as they have been recently appointed, and their advancement in consequence inserted in the newspapers, they are perhaps better known to the public than Messrs. WARREN and HARRISON, who are of considerably longer standing before the Bar.

Without meaning to say any thing unnecessarily unhandsome, I really am quite at a loss to conjecture for what reason Mr. NOLAN has been nominated one of his Majesty's Counsel learned in the law: in general that situation has been obtained either by commanding talents or commanding influence, but most commonly by the latter: of this I am well convinced, that though the individual in question may be a very good natured, well-intentioned man, with a competent share of professional knowledge, he has few other qualifications to entitle him to the rank he has attained. If length of standing were the criterion, there are several gentlemen who ought to have been advanced before him; and in learning I could point out several acknowledged superiors who have not yet dreamt of aspiring to such a station. True it is, that Mr. NOLAN has written a book—a book, I am ready to allow, of authority on a particular branch of the law; but in this respect he is by no means singular, though (perhaps with one exception, and that too an exception applying to one of the worst books ever published) if he be indebted to it for his honours, he is singular in being the first man who ever was so rewarded, and on such an account. There are not a few individuals, who have printed admirable volumes; upon many complicated subjects connected with the administration of justice, who have been remunerated neither by the profits of the labours of their pens, by increased practice, nor by sharing in any of the honours which the Administration is capable of bestowing. What private influence Mr. NOLAN may enjoy, it is not for me to inquire: my business is only to ascertain, as impartially as I can, his fitness for the situation he now holds.

I have already said that Mr. NOLAN is by no means a man of talents in any sense in which the word can be applied to an Advocate. His friends and admirers at the Surrey Sessions, the Magistrates who usually preside, and with whom he may be upon terms of social intimacy, may think that I do not fairly estimate his powers; and it is very true that I have but rarely seen them exercised in that situation: it is equally true, however, that I have witnessed his practice in the Court of King's Bench and on the circuit very frequently, and I am not aware that he ever much distinguished himself by displaying eloquence and skill in addressing a Jury, acuteness in interrogating a witness, or readiness in meeting a point of law, and obviating an objection of form. I do not say that he is by any means deficient, but supposing private influence out of the question, I am at a loss how to account for his elevation. This was by no means the case with Mr. WARREN or Mr. HARRISON, two other King's Counsel, of whom I shall say more presently: every body knows that the first was connected with many Members of Parliament, and the other for a series of years had luxuriated in the office of Counsel to the Treasury. I do not believe that Mr. NOLAN had any such advantages.

The remarks I have made upon Mr. NOLAN will to a considerable extent apply to Mr. GASELEE who has even less popular talent. He is reckoned a very skilful pleader, a very industrious and well-informed chamber Counsel, and a very judicious and useful junior, but these are not qualifications which usually have obtained for a Barrister the distinction of a silk gown: he would perhaps have been the last man I should have named, had I been told to guess at the appointments, not merely because his attainments, and in some sort the peculiar nature of his business, seem to fit him to act in a subordinate sphere, but because I should suppose that he would be a great loser by his promotion: he must of course give up all that lucrative part of his practice which is technically called drawing, and the opinions required from him must of necessity be diminished: few will give two, four, or six guineas, for that which elsewhere they can obtain for one, two, or three. I never saw Mr. GASELEE address a Jury, and very probably I never shall, for the notion I entertain of his abilities is, I believe, common among those whose good opinion it is most important for him to secure; he has neither force of language nor of manner to make any impression as a speaker, and though upon matters of law and delicate niceties of pleading he may be able to make himself very intelligible to the Court, and to obtain a number of admirers of his learning in decided cases, and of his subtlety in drawing distinctions, such qualifications, as I have often said, have little or no connection with the duties of a Nisi Prius Advocate. The very best Nisi Prius Advocate that ever lived was most deficient in all these particulars. I admit that the business of a King's Counsel is not merely to lead in cases before a Jury; but if he be not competent to that, he must forego one of the most profitable parts of the profession.

Mr. CASBERD has succeeded in obtaining a patent of precedence, a privilege of no inconsiderable importance, for it enables him to defend persons prosecuted by the Crown for any offences, without the necessity of the licence, which is obtained for a King's Counsel at a heavy expence. He is eminent as a Lawyer, having distinguished himself on several occasions, not forgetting the great case of King v. Lord Rivers, on which he addressed the Court at Serjeant's Inn for, I believe, two successive days. But independent of his attainments in this respect, he is by no means a bad public speaker, I mean in addresses to the Jury. I have had an opportunity of listening to him with pleasure several times on the Western Circuit, and if I am not much mistaken, a very considerable share of the business there will fall to his lot in consequence of his recent appointment. He by no means wants fluency, but he is rather deficient in impressiveness: he is uncommonly quick without much of the appearance of it, for he has rather a slow, or (to use an expressive though somewhat vulgar word) a drawling tone of voice, and a manner not altogether inconsistent with it: his countenance also has too little variety: we often see the faces of men express a great deal more and better than they think, but the contrary is the case with Mr. CASBERD. He is a Member of Parliament, but I do not recollect ever hearing him speak there or seeing his name in the newspapers excepting in lists of majorities. To this circumstance, perhaps, (for I speak hesitatingly), may be attributed the peculiar advantage he has within these few days obtained over his competitors.

It remains for me to notice Mr. WARREN and Mr. HARRISON, two King's Counsel, who have sat for some years before the Bar, but whose names and merits are comparatively little known to the public: yet their time has been by no means unprofitably, though unostensibly, employed, for they have enjoyed a great share of business before Committees of the House of Commons. This is a branch of the profession to which I have not yet had an opportunity of adverting, and it is not by any means the least lucrative or honourable: Counsel who are employed by Candidates, in cases of contested elections, are always most liberally feed; and where the conflict is protracted by a scrutiny or otherwise, small fortunes are made out of the pockets of those who have large fortunes to spend. In the same way, when private Bills are brought into Parliament for enclosures or turnpike-roads (which, by the bye, are not unfrequently jobs between the Attornies and Surveyors of the Parish), one party promotes and another opposes the project, and the merits are in consequence referred to a select number of Members of Parliament: Counsel are employed to discuss the matter before them, and to conduct the examinations of the various witnesses, and many hundred pounds are frequently disbursed about a piece of waste land, the fee simple of which is not worth one-tenth part of the sum expended on its enclosure.

To matters like these the attention of Messrs. WARREN and HARRISON has been principally devoted: the former of these gentlemen has never laid himself out for common law business; and though the latter, at one period of his life, would willingly have obtained it, he has latterly been quite as profitably and probably less laboriously occupied in his official capacity, in perusing and settling the various Bills brought into Parliament by Ministers, independent of those which he has been employed to consider for private parties. He has besides generally obtained his share of business before Committees; and if Mr. WARREN appeared on the one side, Mr. HARRISON generally led on the other. The qualifications necessary for such a situation are pretty much those required by a Nisi Prius Advocate, excepting that a knowledge of the practice of Parliament and its Committees is to be substituted for an acquaintance with the rules of evidence and such technical points of law as ordinarily arise in our Courts. Mr. WARREN has obtained a considerable and a deserved reputation for his learning in the law of elections, a peculiar and in some respects an intricate branch of knowledge, and for the readiness in difficulties, as well as the general acuteness he displays when the exercise of his talent is required. Sometimes, however, he is charged with being a little slovenly in the manner in which he conducts business of this kind, but I must admit at the same time that it is where peculiar industry and address were not required. He is a very fluent and a perspicuous speaker, and by no means deficient in impressiveness, the power of exciting and securing attention. The want of this faculty is Mr. HARRISON's principal defect: no man can exceed him in volubility: he perhaps utters more words in a given time than any other man at the Bar, and to the purpose, for he seldom travels out of his case; but he is the least or one of the least effective speakers in the profession. Mr. ADOLPHUS is perhaps next to him in rapidity, but far before him in emphasis and expression, for Mr. HARRISON's mode of speaking is one continued, almost unintelligible rattle, that wears the ear instead of attracting it. In examining a witness, however, he often shows great shrewdness and skill, though it not uncommonly happens that he is obliged to put a question twice over, because an unpractised witness cannot follow the velocity of his delivery. Both these gentlemen will probably reap a golden harvest in the present session, in consequence of the number of petitions presented against the returns of sitting Members.—Private Bills have been much less numerous for the last two or three years than formerly, partly owing to the re-establishment of peace and the absence of one great inducement to cultivation of the soil, and partly to the inhabitants of the country districts having been made acquainted by dear-bought experience, with the enormous expenses attendant upon Acts of Parliament for inclosures and other improvements.

AMICUS CURIE.

[No. 20, the last batch of King's Counsel in Chancery.]

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

A meeting of the inhabitants of St. George, Hanover-square, was held at the Gun Tavern, Piccadilly, on Monday evening; it was very numerous and respectfully attended. Mr. Fuller, in the absence of Mr. Bruce, who was prevented from presiding, by a severe domestic affliction (the death of his wife) was called to the chair; and, after the resolutions had been read over and put to the assembly, Mr. HOBHOUSE came forward and spoke to the following effect:—

"He observed that the prospect of division among the friends of freedom, which appeared on the day of nomination, was no longer the object of apprehension; the noble name which had been brought forward was now prudently and wisely withdrawn. Had it been his fate to have contended with so amiable, honest, and accomplished a man as the individual who possessed it, he should have had one consideration with which to satisfy himself in case of victory, and that was, that he should not have driven Lord John Russell into retreat and retirement: Lord Russell was already in Parliament, and had distinguished himself there in defence of the people; and by retiring from the present contest, had acted with his usual good sense, and had continued those favours which England and Englishmen have a right to expect from the house of Russell. (Applause.) The second event (if that might be called an event which was only a rannour) to which he alluded was, that another Gentleman, whose name was truly illustrious, had also declined to interrupt the general union. It was hard to say that he had withdrawn who had never come forward; but still he (Mr. Hobhouse) must congratulate the meeting that they had not to behold in array against them the name of Whitbread, a name which never could be mentioned without exciting esteem and gratitude in the bosom of every honest Englishman. (Applause.) At the same time he would not compromise the cause which he had undertaken to support, neither would he ever resign it unless it were into better hands. One objection against him was, that Westminster wanted a more rational reformer; it was hard to say what was irrational in such a subject: for himself, he was a moderate reformer, because he would not step beyond moderation in any thing. They too were moderate reformers, because, when they had found the remedy for their grievances, they were willing to apply it. Sir F. Burdett had told a meeting at Liverpool that the Whigs had promised to do every thing needful in the case of reform; they were willing to make parliaments triennial, and to extend the right of suffrage to householders; and that being the case, he called the reformers united, an expression which had been much cavilled at. A sort of manifesto of their opponents had appeared the other day in a public paper, under the title of Westminsteriana, which was a very long hard unintelligible word. It began, "It is not the least of modern wonders to have seen that the currull (he means curule) chair of C. Fox should be aspired to by candidates advertising their pretensions in broken English." He scarcely knew what the writer of this paragraph meant, unless it were a sarcasm on Sir M. Maxwell, whose answer to the requisition lately addressed to him was false, incorrect, and broken English. The writer then went on to say, that "it was his duel with Mr. Paul, and not his politics, which first made Sir F. Burdett member for Westminster." This was an absolute lie; it was his long-continued services in defence of their rights that made the electors of Westminster return the best of men as one of their representatives. He then proceeded—"They but offend their lungs in vaunting their weight in Westminster, unaccompanied by that something which in the 4th day of the conflict made manifest the impotence of Jacobinism, when left to itself even in its supposed emporium." The hiringling means that you were bribed to do your duty; it was hardly requisite to contradict so base, so foolish, and so insidious an assertion. Catherine de Medicis had said, that "a lie for three weeks was as good as truth," and their adversaries acted upon such a principle; but he would not allow this lie to run for more than three days, he would give it an early and positive contradiction. It is hinted, that "before Candlemas, he, Mr. Hobhouse, would be better instructed in election proceedings." Unfortunately, if it was meant that by that time he should learn to employ bribery, he must answer, that he had neither the power nor the inclination to do it; besides, if he had, no elector of Westminster would allow him to exert either the one or the other. The last paragraph of this notable writer on which he should comment, contained this extraordinary and impudent assertion—that "his election for Westminster, under all the circumstances of the present juncture, would be not a step merely, but a stride"—to what?—to revolution. (Laughter.) If by revolution were meant change, he hoped that it would; that it would lead to a change of a man like Sir M. Maxwell, for one who would act and speak according to their directions; but if by revolution were meant the disorganization of civil society, the hiringling scribe has said that which is not merely false, but that which he knew to be so: if there were any men friends to social order, it was the meeting which he was addressing; they were desirous of correcting the abuses of the present system, which, unless they were corrected, would end in a total dislocation of the system, amid that ruin, and bloodshed, and carnage, which was witnessed in Ireland; for he recollected that the blood-stained orange-riband was hoisted in London during the last election; and he knew that there was one individual who wished to see it dripping with blood in this country also. He then quitted this subject, and resumed his attack on Sir Murray Maxwell, who, he said, was determined that the electors of Westminster should have him. "It would indeed be a forced marriage; but he seems resolved, notwithstanding, to drag you to the altar, and to find a parson when he gets you there. You, however, think that you have no need of him, and as he is very kind, thank him as much as if you had." (Laughter.) Mr. Hobhouse then observed, that he had that day received a letter from a naval officer, stating that "Sir M. Maxwell had held a lucrative sinecure during the whole war, viz. the Harbour-Mastership of Surinam, which, after payment of a deputy and other expenses, was estimated at 1,500*l.* a-year. His friends say, that it was given him as a reward for his services in the capture of that colony; but in reply it ought to be stated, that many older and distinguished officers who were then there, got nothing of the sort, while he was shortly afterwards appointed to the command of a very fine frigate." This intelligence was sent to him (Mr. Hobhouse) as a positive fact; whether it was so, he had not yet had time to inquire; they might look into that most famous of all famous books to know more accurately, and if they found it there, he would not forget to tell that truth also on the hustings. It is also intimated, that the gallant Captain has an hereditary claim on a sinecure place, his father having held one of 500*l.* a-year; even if that were the case, he did not wish to visit the sins of the father upon the child, but only desired that he would be content with his 1,500*l.* a-year, without endeavouring to gain 4 or 5,000 of their votes. Sir M. Maxwell may have mistaken the applause of a drawing-room for the applause of the people of Westminster; but the lesson which he received at the last election ought to have cured him of such folly. If, when he started under such favourable circumstances of disunion among the friends of the people, he was still unable, with all the Government influence, to get himself returned; what can he expect now, when the friends of freedom are united? Mr. Hobhouse then concluded by exhorting them to exertion, and advising them to employ that activity, which, if it did not secure them victory, would at least show that they were deserving of it.

The thanks of the meeting were then voted to the Chairman, after which the assembly dispersed.

During the last election for Westminster, there were wretches despicable enough to try and buy the honest tradesmen, in that city, to vote for Sir Murray Maxwell, and where they could not buy, they employed threats; but they found that both were in vain, and their tyrannical influence did not extend far enough to effect their base purpose. A lady of title went to her tallow-chandler, and gave him a very large order; which after he had taken, she accompanied with a desire that he would give his vote to Sir Murray Maxwell. On his replying that he must conscientiously give it elsewhere, her ladyship replied in the true spirit of her party, "Then, Mr. —, I shall take away my custom from you." "Do, madam, and welcome," rejoined the public-spirited shop-keeper, "I do not reckon it worth a pin." Her ladyship walked away a little chop-fallen; while the worthy chandler lost her custom, but retained his integrity. Another lady went to the shop of a silversmith, and ordered articles to a considerable amount, desiring the vendor to make out a bill and receipt, and she would immediately pay him; he took up the pen to obey her orders, when she arrested his progress—"But stop, Sir, I hope you will give your vote for Sir Murray Maxwell."—"Is it on that condition, madam," said he, "that I am to write the receipt?" "O, certainly," answered the lady—on which the honest patriot coolly handed the articles to his shopman, "Here," said he, "just put these things in their places again," and turned to the business he was previously about. We could give the names of the honest Marvells we have mentioned; but we are not inclined to expose them needlessly to further losses. Their example is deserving of universal imitation.

The same tricks are going on again. We have been told that General Phipps is imitating the spirit of those ladies. And we know that Lord Granville Somerset and Lord Frederick Bentinck have been employing themselves in the like dirty work; and where they cannot do anything else, they try to neutralize the vote. "The latter of these gentlemen has had the impudence to tell respectable tradesmen, 'You are no judges of fit persons to sit in Parliament, you should leave it to us to point them out.' As if a sagacious tradesman was not better at any time than a dunder-headed lord, or an independent elector than a dependant peer. But these men reflect upon the wisdom of the constitution, which appoints for unbiassed electors the men they affect to despise; and so strict is the oath to be taken, that a tradesman of sound conscience, who was merely biassed to vote for Maxwell on principles of fear, on finding the words he had to repeat, relented, and gave his vote to Burdett!

With all their indirect bribery, however, the Maxwell party are in a poor plight. They do not prosper in canvassing; and the debt of last election hangs on their heels. They have not even spirit enough to pay their agent, Mr. Dawson, the solicitor in Savile-row, expended three thousand pounds, in advance, during the late contest, which he has not yet recovered; and he will not move another step, till he can obtain his money. Application has even been made to a certain quarter, but all in vain.

nothing can be got but half answers. This reminds us of a saying of Whitfield, "Whet tarry wages the devil pays his servants!" Dawson deserves his pay, for the poor fellow worked hard enough night and day in the cause in which he engaged. As for Sir Murray, he has publicly said he will not support the contest "in purse or person." Some people are too poor to keep a conscience, and he is too poor to sell one. In the mean time, the patriotic party are wise enough not to relax in their exertions, though it is thought that Hobhouse will walk quietly over the course.—Stanford News.

SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY.

(From the Times.)

The will of this much regretted individual, whether considered as a lawyer or politician, must, from his character and attainments, be a subject of interest to the greater part of those who think or feel. He made a will, dated 19th August, 1815, by which he constituted Lady Romilly sole executrix. To this will, at different times, he added 11 codicils, the contents of which run to a considerable length. It is, perhaps, curious to observe what was the state of mind of so eminent and prosperous a man, who in a codicil of Oct. 9, 1818, (so short a time previous to his death!) wrote as follows:—

"I am at the present moment of perfectly sound mind, and in full possession of all my faculties; but I am labouring under a most severe affliction, and I cannot but reflect, that insanity is amongst the evils which mental afflictions sometimes produce, without observing to myself that that unhappy lot may possibly at some time be mine. If I ever should become insane (which God forbid), it is my earnest wish that while I continue in that state, the following bounties may be paid to different relations out of my income, during my life, and may be considered as part of the expenditure which I certainly should have made if I had continued capable of managing my own affairs:—To my brother 150*l.* a-year, and to my nephew, Peter Roger, 150*l.* a-year."

There is also a great variety of remembrances to relations and friends. There are settlements and discharges of debts. The personals are proved not beyond 60,000*l.* There are some estates in Glamorganshire and elsewhere, (Warwickshire, we believe,) which go to his descendants. By particular bequests he has left 10,000*l.* to his eldest daughter on her marriage. He gives an allowance to his eldest son of 400*l.* a year at College, independently of the allowance to a private tutor. He mentions in the papers he has left behind him, that he has, at leisure moments, occupied his time in writing what concerned his life during the last twelve years, to the extent of three volumes, with a view to the instructive perusal of them by his children. Mr. John Whishaw is his executor. He has left, besides, some fragments, or materials, as he expresses it, on the criminal laws, which will, no doubt, one day see the light. On this subject he remarks, that he is well aware that many objections may be made to his opinions and views, but of them he is regardless, being convinced of their usefulness to the community; and he further recommends Mr. Whishaw to select for publication such parts of his ideas as may be fit to publish, or, in case of his declining to do so, to put them under the judgment of Mr. Brougham, of whom he speaks in high terms. He states his intention to bring up his male offspring to his own profession at the bar, or else to commercial pursuits, in which latter case he should have consulted, himself, with his friends, Mr. Baring and Mr. Sharpe; and he thinks that, in addition to the expense of the children's education, the sum of 6,000*l.* to each is sufficient to enable them to embark in trading concerns. He also recommends them to connect themselves with respectable commercial houses, in preference to a junction with speculative ones. In the awful view he entertained of possible insanity, he mentions the Marquis of Lansdown and Mr. Whishaw as his committee.

LAW.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Monday, Dec. 21.

VAUGHAN v. SMITH.

Mr. Sergeant Copley stated the circumstances of this case. The plaintiff, Mr. Vaughan, he said, brought this action for the purpose of recovering reparation in damages for the seduction of his wife by the defendant. The plaintiff was a gentleman well known in the musical world. So far back as 1805, he was introduced to a young lady of the name of Tennant. She was then 17 years of age, of great personal beauty and accomplishments; added to which, she was possessed, in an eminent degree, of the same description of talent for which Mr. Vaughan had been so eminently distinguished. At the latter end of 1805 a marriage took place. From that period down to the time when their happiness was broken in upon by the present defendant, they lived together in the greatest possible degree of harmony. Mrs. Vaughan assisted her husband in the discharge of his professional engagements. They had had several children, of whom six were now alive; the eldest not above ten years of age. The defendant was the son of a Dr. Smith, residing at Richmond, and held an office under Government. The two families, Mr. Vaughan's and Dr. Smith's were upon the most intimate terms. When Mrs. Vaughan was delivered of her last child to her husband, about two years ago, she suffered so much in consequence of an internal complaint, that her medical advisers deemed it necessary to recommend separate beds. Mr. Vaughan loved his wife with the utmost affection: but finding it expedient, for her sake, that this course should be adopted, he disregarded his own feelings, and yielded to the suggestion. From that time until the elopement, they slept in separate beds. At what time the defendant succeeded in effecting his dishonourable purpose it had not been clearly ascertained; but that a criminal intercourse had taken place upwards of a year back was manifest, from the birth of a child, of which the defendant was the father. This fact was proved by several letters from the defendant to Mrs. Vaughan; from the tone and manner of which, the intimacy which had subsisted between them was too evident. [Here Mr. Sergeant Copley read several passages from the letters to which he alluded, which were signed by the defendant, and in which he addressed Mrs. Vaughan as his "Dearest, dearest Bess, his very life! his own valued—cherished—most beloved wife."] In these letters he makes allusion to the situation in which Mrs. Vaughan was, from the intercourse which had passed between them; speaks of the pledge of their mutual regard which lay beneath her bosom, and entreats her to quit her husband's house before he discovers her pregnancy. Mrs. Vaughan finally deserted her husband and her children, and after a short residence near Turnham-green, she proceeded to Lyme, where she was delivered of a boy, the fruit of her unhappy intrigue. The most honourable persons came into Courts of Justice to recover damages in cases like the present. Damages were not a compensation, and not even an alleviation of the injury; but they felt anxious to have the opinion of a Jury upon their own conduct, and upon the circumstances and conduct which had destroyed their happiness. In this case the plaintiff's domestic life was a blank; his future prospect of happiness was a blank, without a single ray to gladden or enliven it. He had six infant children, many of them females, looking for instruction, advice, and example, to their mother. The children, from the constitution of society, must partake at least of the degradation of their parent. If this deadly blow to his domestic comfort and to his children's happiness had been struck by a stranger, it would be less severe. But it was his friend, his intimate friend, always received almost without restraint, and with the utmost hospitality, who seduced his wife, and planted a dagger in his bosom.

James Harrison, librarian for ancient concerts, knew the plaintiff and his wife for 14 years. They were as happy as it was possible for man and wife to be. Last winter he thought he observed a coldness on her part, but none on his. The defendant was from 26 to 28 years of age; Mrs. Vaughan was 34. The plaintiff was principal tenor singer of the ancient concerts. Mrs. Vaughan gave lessons in private. Her income from her profession could not be less than 500*l.* a year. The plaintiff was also principal tenor singer at the vocal concerts; he gave lessons in private.

The letters mentioned were now read by the Clerk;—they were full of such passages as the following:—"I am heart-broken at being obliged to go from you, my own adored Bess, my very life. I am wretched; I feel it is not my home I am going to—your bosom, your treasure of a bosom, is my place of comfort, is where only I can enjoy heartfelt satisfaction." * * * "Bess, my treasured, my darling Bess, my own valued, cherished, fondly cherished wife, my heart's only solace, do take care of yourself; I will be a husband devoted to your service and happiness ere long.—Oh that you would come to me on Thursday, that I might see your beloved face, that I might feel your dear hand! Think what a cruel long while is Friday. Never mind what may be said about it; recollect, it cannot last long—so what matters—do, oh do, come if you possibly can, to your own attached and devoted husband. God bless you again and again, my blessed love, my own heart's dearest treasure, prays your own affectionate husband." * * * "God bless you, my own heart, my wife, my dearest blessing and comfort. God bless you and preserve you safely through all your many trials is the fervent constant prayer of your own affectionate, fondly attached, and faithful husband." * * * "I shall then look out for lodgings, so that from September we may live together; I shall then, my own darling wife, my treasured dove, have you to myself; I shall experience no more painful separations at night, such as I have undergone, but shall seek your dear bosom as my natural place of rest." HENRY SMITH.

Mr. Charles Bell, surgeon, attended Mrs. Vaughan some time before her confinement in 1816. He recommended to her husband to send her into the country, or to live apart while she was convalescent, and for a little time after.

Mary Pagn, nurse to the plaintiff's children for 11 years, said the plaintiff and his wife had lived as happily together as she had ever known in her life. They had had eight children, of whom six were living. Mrs. Vaughan had been cool to her husband for the last twelvemonths compared to what she had usually been. She said to her, that they did not wish to have any more family. They did not sleep together. She had never seen any thing improper in the house. She went away on the 13th of June, and said she was going to see her children at Dulwich; she had children there: she contrived to conceal her pregnancy as much as ever she could; she took all pains that Mr. Vaughan should not know it, by leaning to tables and stooping downwards when he was near her. Witness was certain that the plaintiff knew not of his wife's pregnancy when she went away. She had known of it for months before; she did not mention it to the plaintiff; she durst not. Witness hesitated to say whether she had suspected Mr. Smith when she knew of her mistress's pregnancy; and when solemnly asked whether she had not advised Mr. Smith to take her away, she stood quite silent.

Martina Carter, cook in the plaintiff's family for eight or nine years, said they had always lived very affectionately together till a year or a year and a half ago. Mr. and Mrs. Vaughan slept in different beds since the last child was born. The plaintiff left his wife at Liverpool in the same house with Mr. Smith. Mrs. Vaughan and Mr. Bartleman and Mr. Smith went afterwards to Manchester. Mrs. Vaughan travelled with Mr. Bartleman and Mr. Smith on the box. Mr. Vaughan travelled along with them in a post-chaise with Mr. Kayvett.

Mrs. Grealorex was acquainted with the plaintiff and his family for six years, during which time they lived very happy together.

The CHIEF-JUSTICE, in allusion to some questions put to the former witness with respect to the concealment of pregnancy, remarked, that he had often had occasion to observe with astonishment, in cases that came into Court, with what success persons concealed their pregnancy, and with what safety they were delivered, while those who had every attention and assistance suffered extremely.

Mr. Potts keeps the house at Turnham-green, to which Mrs. Smith (he since learnt that it was Mrs. Vaughan) came first; then Mr. Smith came. They were together there as man and wife.

Susannah Berjant said, that her mistress and herself went from Turnham-green to Blandford, where Mr. Smith met them. He conducted them to Lyme, where he took lodgings, and where her mistress was delivered of a boy on the 11th of September.

Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN addressed the Jury for the defendant. The charge was that the plaintiff had been deprived of the consortium of his wife by the defendant. It was an ungallant and unmanly defence in any circumstances to say that the man was seduced; but from his own letters they could perceive what his state of mind was. More arrant nonsense—he could not say nonsense—but more arrant, warm-hearted love was never written. He was charmed by symphonies. "Her eye speaks, I'll answer it." The Learned Sergeant then commented at great length on the separation of beds without any medical recommendations; and on the visit of ten days at Burton, when his wife was confined.

The CHIEF-JUSTICE said, that the adultery was clearly proved, and the only question was, the damages. They would be directed by the situation of the parties, and the circumstances of the case. From their marriage till this criminal intercourse took place, there had been no want of harmony; they had lived together happily. This happiness was destroyed. The children, if not involved in their mother's guilt, were at least involved in her shame. The difference of ages was not material in this case. It had been said, and boldly said, that there was coldness, inattention, and even connivance on the part of the husband. This appeared to be altogether without foundation. When it was insinuated that the plaintiff had left his wife in the same house with the defendant, it turned out that her servant-maid slept with Mrs. Vaughan. He then expressed strong reprehension of the unfounded insinuation that the plaintiff had known of his wife's pregnancy, and was silent for the sake of the gains of his professional labours. This was disproved even by the letters of the defendant, where the utmost anxiety is expressed to conceal the pregnancy from the plaintiff. It appeared that the plaintiff had been very anxious till he heard favourable accounts when he visited at Burton-on-Trent; and when he had received such accounts, he might perhaps feel easy, since his wife had safely recovered in a similar situation eight times before. These remarks he made from public feelings, and in discharge of a public duty; for they sat there as guardians of public morals. It would be a melancholy close of the proceedings of that day, if small damages were given. Still they must enter upon the inquiry with coolness. He almost regretted that he had said so much; but he had felt it his duty, since the Counsel for the plaintiff had no opportunity to reply, to answer arguments urged with ability, which might have some influence on their minds, but which were not warranted by the evidence.

Mr. Sergeant VAUGHAN suggested to his Lordship that he had said nothing of the separate beds.

CHIEF-JUSTICE.—Gentlemen, it is very true that I have neglected to remark upon the separate beds. But I now say, beware, beware of laying it down as a rule, without knowing the particular circumstances of the family, that because a married pair sleep in separate beds, after they have had eight children, therefore there is an end of affection.

The Jury retired for ten minutes. Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 1000*l*.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

MYSTERIOUS DEATH.—An extraordinary charge was recently made at Bow-street, against a young man, named Henry Cooke, by William Key, who accused him of having employed him to murder Mr. Shears, proprietor of copper-mills at Merton, and having a counting-house in Fleet-market, together with his whole family: Cooke was Mr. Shears's clerk. The Magistrates considered the charge unfounded, and liberated Cooke, who subsequently prosecuted Key, who is now under sentence of transportation. On Wednesday week, Cooke, who was about 18 years of age, died, after an illness of a few hours, under circumstances of suspicion. The body was opened on Thursday, when it was ascertained that he died by poison. An investigation was taken on the body, when evidence to the following effect was given:—Mr. John Wetman, of Christchurch, said, deceased had been several years his lodger. Tuesday evening he came home from the counting-house, complaining of sickness; he vomited much; the sickness continued violent, and he went for medicine, and returned with two pills and a draught; he went to bed about ten. At eleven, witness found him more composed; he saw no more of him until five next morning, when being awake by a noise, he ran into Cooke's room, and found him prostrate on the floor, but not senseless; he assisted him into bed, and then called the servant to make tea, the deceased having complained of extreme thirst. While drinking tea he said to witness, "Those fellows put something in the beer." About seven o'clock, a man who was going to Mr. Shears's mills at Merton, called to know if Mr. Cooke, whose father was a foreman there, had any message to send; deceased desired his father might be informed that he was very ill, but hoped to go to Merton on the Monday. Ten minutes afterwards witness went into his room, and found him with his head out of bed over a basin, as if he had been vomiting, and lying upon his side; he gasped once and expired. At the time he mentioned "those fellows," he named no particular person.—Mrs. Wetman, saw deceased when he first complained of sickness. He said he had salt beef for dinner, and about half a pint of table-beer at the counting-house. He afterwards said that he feared those fellows had played tricks with the beer, for he recollected it was remarkably sweet. He said he thought he saw something white clinging to the bottom of the mug, which might be occasioned by the beer having been warmed. Next morning, when she went into his room, she felt his hand; it was very cold, and he appeared very weak. He said faintly, "Those fellows." Mr. Wetman further stated, that after Cooke's death he waited upon Mr. Shears, to inform him of the circumstance, and acquaint him with the allusions of deceased to the beer he had drunk, and to request the mug might be searched for. The clerks found it under the desk of deceased. There appeared in it a quantity of white powder mixed with dirt. Mr. Shears sealed it up.—Mr. Pollard stated, that deceased applied to him, complaining of vomiting, and pains in the stomach and head. The excessive vomiting continuing, witness again asked what he had taken; and then he said, that when he drank the beer he observed white powder at the bottom of the mug, and thought some of his companions had been playing tricks. Some medicine was then given to him. He saw no more of him until next morning, when he was called in great haste, and found Cooke dead. Mr. Wetman delivered a tin mug to witness, which contained a quantity of white powder, and which being analyzed, proved to be oxide of arsenic. He subsequently opened the body, and found in the stomach a quantity of similar powder, which he also found to be an oxide of arsenic; it had produced a great inflammation in the stomach, and occasioned death.—Dr. Callaway corroborated Mr. Pollard's testimony.—Mr. Shears, jun. stated, he had been indefatigable in his exertions to discover by whom the beer had been drawn which Cooke had drunk, without success. He had about 50 persons on the premises, but could obtain no evidence upon the subject. Morgan Deasey was warehouseman to Mr. Shears. On Tuesday, at one o'clock, he dined with deceased at an eating-house in the Old Bailey. Witness returned to business, and deceased went another way, saying he had a place to call at before he returned. Witness had been accustomed to drink a pint of table-beer with the deceased after dinner: he waited for him a considerable time, and then desired a boy to draw him some beer, which he immediately did, in a pewter pot, and witness drank it. Cooke came in about 3 o'clock. Witness shortly afterwards went into the counting-house, with the intention of having some beer with him: he saw the tin-pot produced standing on the corner of the stove, full of beer, to warm. He was immediately called away upon business: was positive that the mug was not on the stove previous to the entrance of deceased. It was the same mug he usually drank out of, and was generally placed under Cooke's desk. The witness knew not by whom the beer was drawn, nor by whom placed on the stove. If he had not been called away he should have drunk part of it himself.—The CORONER observed, that no doubt deceased had died in consequence of taking the oxide of arsenic in the beer; how it came there or by whom given remained unknown. All possible pains had been taken to bring forward every person likely to have any knowledge of the circumstances. The Jury remained in consultation about 4 hours, and at 1 o'clock on Friday morning returned this verdict—Died by poison, administered by some person or persons at present unknown.

Saturday week, an inquisition was taken at Dulwich, on the body of Mr. George Gnan. The deceased was a gentleman employed at one of the public offices in London. On the 15th instant, he absented himself from his family and friends, who reside in the city, and who made every inquiry respecting him without avail. He strolled into Dulwich, and went into the coffee-room late in the evening; he appeared much dejected and depressed in spirits; so much so, that he was not only noticed by the waiter, but by all present. He desired to know whether he could be accommodated with a bed. The waiter told him he could have a bed in a double-bedded room—to which he objected; and a bed was made up for him in another room, with which he seemed content. About 11 o'clock, he went to bed, requesting to be called up early next morning. The chambermaid went to his apartment at the time required; she knocked at the door repeatedly, but not getting any answer, she came down and informed her master, who instantly broke into the room, and was alarmed at finding him suspended by a cord from the bed-tester; he instantly cut him down, called in a surgeon, but no assistance could be rendered, the vital spark being quite extinct. It appeared that the deceased has left a wife and nine helpless children to deplore his loss.—Verdict, Lunacy.

Monday night an inquisition was held at the Cross Keys, Wood-street, on the body of Mary Price, a well-dressed female, between 20 and 30 years of age. Richard Bothers, porter at the Saracen's Head Inn, stated, that on Friday the deceased arrived at the inn between six and seven o'clock, in the Portsmouth waggon; she was then very ill, witness assisted the deceased out of the waggon; she inquired if he knew where the Norwich waggon went from? witness told her; she was then almost unable to stand; she asked witness if he could assist her? he said he was unable to attend her, and witness was unable to procure the deceased (though she expressed her willingness to pay) a porter. The deceased walked away from the inn, she had a bundle with her; soon after she was found in an insensible state sitting on a step of a door in Friday-street, but her bundle had been taken away from her by a female, who the bystanders considered was the friend of the deceased; the Parish Officers immediately removed the deceased to the workhouse, where she expired. On searching the deceased's pocket a quantity of silver and halfpence was found, and a certificate of her marriage. The deceased was a woman of genteel appearance; she was in such an extremely weak state when she was in the waggon, that the Guard thought she would not survive till the waggon arrived in London. A surgeon was examined, who proved that the deceased died of natural death. Verdict—Died by the visitation of God.

George Garrett was mate of a vessel called the George Canning, lying at Blackwall, and had been on board three weeks, during that time he had been in a state of continual intoxication, and had been ordered to be discharged. On Friday week, he called out of his cabin to Mr. Stephens, the ship's carpenter, saying, "I found myself very ill, and went to the medicine-chest, to take something, and I have made a mistake, and taken something which has poisoned me—give me some castor-oil." He showed Stephens the bottle: upon it was a label, "Corrosive sublimate." As soon as the deceased read the words, he said, "O God! it will kill me." Stephens ran for a medical man, but before he arrived the deceased was no more. Verdict—Accidental Death.

On Sunday morning, about half-past six o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in the house of Mr. Neil, bell-hanger, Green Arbour-square, Fleet-market, which extended itself with great rapidity. The lodgers in the upper part got out almost naked on the top of the house, and escaped. Immediately afterwards the flames caught the house of Mr. Walters. By this time the engines arrived, and had a plentiful supply of water. They played for a considerable time, but the fire burnt with such fury, that about eight o'clock the roof of the house where it broke out fell in with a tremendous crash, and the adjoining house was much injured. The whole of the furniture in Mr. Neil's house was destroyed. When the flames were got under, every search was made after the old man who occupied the apartments in which the fire broke out; he was at length found, burnt in a dreadful manner. The deceased was a native of Germany; he resided in the above house for a number of years, and although possessed of a considerable property, lived in the most abject state of penury, not even allowing himself the common necessities of life. He was in the habit of going about the street setting matches, and picking up bones and other things from the kennel. On his return home (to save expense) he would make a fire of pieces of wood in the lid of a saucepan, and would thus sit for some time previous to going to bed. He had done this on Saturday night, and not putting it out carefully, some papers caught fire, and the flames proceeded to his bed. Bills were found in his pocket to a great amount, and other articles of value in his apartments; and it is supposed a considerable sum is destroyed.

Friday night the family of Mr. Wm. Linton, an old inhabitant of Uxbridge, were thrown into the greatest distress by the melancholy termination of his existence. The deceased retired to bed on Thursday night, and at that time nothing extraordinary appeared in his behaviour. Not coming down to his breakfast on Friday morning, some of the family went to call him, and found him in a most dreadful condition, perfectly senseless, and covered with blood, issuing from a wound he had inflicted in his side with a knife, which lay near him on the bed. Surgeons were called in, but they could not render him any assistance; they discovered that the knife had been forced so violently into the side of the deceased, that the heart was deeply incised, and the membranes wounded. The deceased had not been in good health for some time; about six months ago he cut his throat in a dangerous manner, and would have bled to death had not a surgeon been near at hand.

On Christmas Day, Mrs. Elam, wife of Thomas Elam, Esq. of Leicester-square, a most irreparable loss to a large family.
On Tuesday evening, Sir Philip Francis, in St. James's-square. It is a singular coincidence, that this is the fourth death, within a very short period, in that corner of St. James's-square, viz. Lord Beauchamp, Lord Anson, Lord Ellenborough, and Sir Philip Francis. Sir Philip was born in Dublin, in 1740. Dr. Francis, the Translator of Horace, was his father. He received the first rudiments of his education in Ireland. In 1750 he came to England, and was placed at St. Paul's school. In 1756 Mr. Henry Fox, afterwards Lord Holland, gave him a small place in the Secretary of State's office. Mr. Pitt, who succeeded Mr. Fox, patronized him. By that patronage he was appointed Secretary to General Bligh. In 1760 he was made Secretary to the Earl of Kinnoul, Ambassador to Lisbon. In 1763 he was appointed by the late Lord Mendip to a considerable post in the War-office, which he resigned in 1772, in consequence of a difference with Viscount Barrington. The greatest part of 1772 he spent in travelling. In about half a year after his return to England, Lord North inserted his name in an Act of Parliament, to be a member of the Council appointed for the Government of Bengal, in conjunction with Warren Hastings and three others. The records of his long contest with Mr. Hastings, are preserved in the Books of Council, &c. This quarrel had previously occasioned a duel in India, when Mr. Hastings shot Sir Philip through the body. On the dissolution of Parliament, in 1781, he was elected for Yarmouth. In 1806, his Majesty was pleased to invest him with the Order of the Bath. On the 22d of the present month he expired, after having been reduced to a state of extreme debility by an excruciating disease in the prostate glands, with which he had been for several years afflicted, and from which his age precluded all chance of recovery. He has left a son and two daughters, Mr. Philip Francis, Mrs. Johnson, and Mrs. Cholmondeley. When between 70 and 80, he married Miss Watkins, a daughter of a clergyman. He had been many years employed about an historical sketch of his principal contemporaries, and it is believed by many that he was the author of the celebrated Letters of Junius.
